Sa vogue comme répétiteur diminuait, car il bourrait ses élèves de théories défavorables pour leurs examens. Il avait plaidé deux ou trois fois, avait perdu, et chaque déception nouvelle le rejetait plus fortement vers son vieux rêve : un journal où il pourrait s'étaler, se venger, cracher sa bile et ses idées. Fortune et réputation, d'ailleurs, s'ensuivraient. C'était dans cet espoir qu'il avait circonvenu le bohème, Hussonnet possédant une feuille.

A présent, il la tirait sur papier rose ; il inventait des canards, composait des rébus, tâchait d'engager des polémiques, et même (en dépit du local) voulait monter des concerts ! L'abonnement d'un an "donnait droit à une place d'orchestre dans un des principaux théâtres de Paris ; de plus, l'administration se chargeait de fournir à MM. les étrangers tous les renseignements désirables, artistiques, et autres." Mais l'imprimeur faisait des menaces, on devait trois termes au propriétaire, toutes sortes d'embarras surgissaient ; et Hussonnet aurait laissé périr l'Art, sans les exhortations de l'avocat, qui lui chauffait le moral quotidiennement. Il l'avait pris, afin de donner plus de poids à sa démarche.

— "Nous venons pour le Journal", dit-il.

— "Tiens, tu y penses encore !" répondit Frédéric, d'un ton distrait.

— "Certainement ! j'y pense !"

Et il exposa de nouveau son plan. Par des comptes rendus de la Bourse, ils se mettraient en relations avec des financiers, et obtiendraient ainsi les cent mille francs de cautionnement indispensables. Mais, pour que la feuille pût être transformée en journal politique, il fallait auparavant avoir une large clientèle, et, pour cela, se résoudre à quelques dépenses, tant pour les frais de papeterie, d'imprimerie, de bureau, bref une somme de quinze mille francs.

— "Je n'ai pas de fonds", dit Frédéric.

— "Et nous donc !" fit Deslauriers en croisant ses deux bras.

Frédéric, blessé du geste, répliqua :

— "Est-ce ma faute ?..."

— "Ah ! très bien ! Ils ont du bois dans leur cheminée, des truffes sur leur table, un bon lit, une bibliothèque, une voiture, toutes les douceurs ! Mais qu'un autre grelotte sous les ardoises, dîne à vingt sous, travaille comme un forçat et patauge dans la misère ! est-ce leur faute ?"

Et il répétait "Est-ce leur faute ?" avec une ironie cicéronienne qui sentait le Palais. Frédéric voulait parler.

— "Du reste je comprends, on a des besoins... aristocratiques ; car sans doute... quelque femme..."

— "Eh bien, quand cela serait ? Ne suis-je pas libre ?..."

— "Oh ! très libre !"

Et, après une minute de silence :

— “C’est si commode, les promesses !”

— “Mon Dieu ! je ne les nie pas !” dit Frédéric.

L’avocat continuait :

— “Au collège, on fait des serments, on constituera une phalange, on imitera les Treize de Balzac. Puis, quand on se retrouve : Bonsoir, mon vieux, va te promener ! Car celui qui pourrait servir l’autre retient précieusement tout, pour lui seul.”

— “Comment ?”

— “Oui, tu ne nous as pas même présentés chez les Dambreuse !”

Frédéric le regarda ; avec sa pauvre redingote, ses lunettes dépolies et sa figure blême, l’avocat lui parut un tel cuistre, qu’il ne put empêcher sur ses lèvres un sourire dédaigneux. Deslauriers l’aperçut, et rougit.

Il avait déjà son chapeau pour s’en aller. Hussonnet, plein d’inquiétude, tâchait de l’adoucir par des regards suppliants, et, comme Frédéric lui tournait le dos :

— “Voyons, mon petit ! Soyez mon Mécène ! Protégez les arts !”

Frédéric, dans un brusque mouvement de résignation, prit une feuille de papier, et, ayant griffonné dessus quelques lignes, la lui tendit. Le visage du bohème s’illumina. Puis, repassant la lettre à Deslauriers :

“Faites des excuses, Seigneur !”

Leur ami conjurait son notaire de lui envoyer au plus vite, quinze mille francs.

— “Ah ! je te reconnais là !” dit Deslauriers.

— “Foi de gentilhomme !” ajouta le bohème, “vous êtes un brave, on vous mettra dans la galerie des hommes utiles !”

L’avocat reprit :

— “Tu n’y perdras rien, la spéculation est excellente.” —

“Parbleu !” s’écria Hussonnet, “j’en fourrerais ma tête sur l’échafaud.”

Et il débita tant de sottises et promit tant de merveilles (auxquelles il croyait peut-être), que Frédéric ne savait pas si c’était pour se moquer des autres ou de lui-même.

Ce soir-là, il reçut une lettre de sa mère.

Elle s’étonnait de ne pas le voir encore ministre, tout en le plaisantant quelque peu. Puis elle parlait de sa santé, et lui apprenait que M. Roque venait maintenant chez elle. “Depuis qu’il est veuf, j’ai cru sans inconvénient de le recevoir. Louise est très changée à son avantage.” Et en post-scriptum : “Tu ne me dis rien de ta belle connaissance, M. Dambreuse ; à ta place, je l’utiliserais.”

Pourquoi pas ? Ses ambitions intellectuelles l’avaient quitté, et sa fortune (il s’en apercevait) était insuffisante ; car, ses dettes payées et la somme convenue remise aux autres, son revenu serait diminué de quatre mille francs, pour le moins ! D’ailleurs, il sentait le besoin de sortir de cette existence, de se raccrocher à quelque chose. Aussi, le lendemain, en dînant chez Mme Arnoux, il dit que sa mère le tourmentait pour qu’il embrassât une profession.

— “Mais je croyais”, reprit-elle, “que M. Dambreuse devait vous faire entrer au Conseil d’Etat ? Cela vous irait très bien.”

Elle le voulait donc. Il obéit.

Le banquier, comme la première fois, était assis à son bureau, et d’un geste le pria d’attendre quelques minutes, car un monsieur tournant le dos à la porte, l’entretenait de matières graves. Il s’agissait de charbons de terre et d’une fusion à opérer entre diverses compagnies.

Les portraits du général Foy et de Louis-Philippe se faisaient pendant de chaque côté de la glace ; des cartonniers montaient contre le lambris jusqu’au plafond, et il y avait six chaises de paille, M. Dambreuse n’ayant pas besoin pour ses affaires d’un appartement plus beau ; c’était comme ces sombres cuisines où s’élaborent de grands festins. Frédéric observa surtout deux coffres monstrueux, dressés dans les encoignures. Il se demandait combien de millions y pouvaient tenir. Le banquier en ouvrit un, et la planche de fer tourna, ne laissant voir à l’intérieur que des cahiers de papier bleu.

Enfin l’individu passa devant Frédéric. C’était le père Oudry. Tous deux se saluèrent en rougissant, ce qui parut étonner M. Dambreuse. Du reste, il se montra fort aimable. Rien n’était plus facile que de recommander son jeune ami au garde des sceaux. On serait trop heureux de l’avoir ; et il termina ses politesses en l’invitant à une soirée qu’il donnait dans quelques jours..

Frédéric montait en coupé pour s’y rendre quand arriva un billet de la Maréchale. A la lueur des lanternes, il lut : “Cher, j’ai suivi vos conseils. Je viens d’expulser mon Osage. A partir de demain soir, liberté ! Dites que je ne suis pas brave.”

Rien de plus ! Mais c'était le convier à la place vacante. Il poussa une exclamation, serra le billet dans sa poche et partit.

Deux municipaux à cheval stationnaient dans la rue. Une file de lampions brûlaient sur les deux portes cochères ; et des domestiques, dans la cour, criaient, pour faire avancer les voitures jusqu'au bas du perron sous la marquise. Puis, tout à coup, le bruit cessait dans le vestibule.

De grands arbres emplissaient la cage de l'escalier ; les globes de porcelaine versaient une lumière qui ondulait comme des moires de satin blanc sur les murailles. Frédéric monta les marches allègrement. Un huissier lança son nom : M. Dambreuse lui tendit la main presque aussitôt, Mme Dambreuse parut.

Elle avait une robe mauve garnie de dentelles, les boucles de sa coiffure plus abondantes qu'à l'ordinaire, et pas un seul bijou.

Elle se plaignit de ses rares visites, trouva moyen de dire quelque chose. Les invités arrivaient ; en manière de salut, ils jetaient leur torse de côté, ou se courbaient en deux, ou baissaient la figure seulement ; puis un couple conjugal, une famille passait, et tous se dispersaient dans le salon déjà plein.

Sous le lustre, au milieu, un pouf énorme supportait une jardinière, dont les fleurs, s'inclinant comme des panaches, surplombaient la tête des femmes assises en rond, tout autour, tandis que d'autres occupaient les bergères formant deux lignes droites interrompues symétriquement par les grands rideaux des fenêtres en velours nacarat et les hautes baies des portes à linteau doré.

La foule des hommes qui se tenaient debout sur le parquet, avec leur chapeau à la main, faisait de loin une seule masse noire, où les rubans des boutonniers mettaient des points rouges çà et là, et que rendait plus sombre la monotone blancheur des cravates. Sauf de petits jeunes gens à barbe naissante, tous paraissaient s'ennuyer ; quelques dandies, d'un air maussade, se balançaient sur leurs talons. Les têtes grises, les perruques étaient nombreuses ; de place en place, un crâne chauve luisait ; et les visages, ou empourprés ou très blêmes, laissaient voir dans leur flétrissure la trace d'immenses fatigues, — les gens qu'il y avait là appartenant à la politique ou aux affaires. M. Dambreuse avait aussi invité plusieurs savants, des magistrats, deux ou trois médecins illustres, et il repoussait avec d’humbles attitudes les éloges qu’on lui faisait sur sa soirée et les allusions à sa richesse.

Partout, une valetaille à larges galons d’or circulait. Les grandes torchères, comme des bouquets de feu, s’épanouissaient sur les tentures ; elles se répétaient dans les glaces ; et, au fond de la salle à manger, que tapissait un treillage de jasmin, le buffet ressemblait à un maître-autel de cathédrale ou à une exposition d’orfèvrerie, — tant il y avait de plats, de cloches, de couverts et de cuillers en argent et en vermeil, au milieu des cristaux à facettes qui entrecroisaient, par-dessus les viandes, des lueurs irisées. Les trois autres salons regorgeaient d’objets d’art : paysages de maîtres contre les murs, ivoires et porcelaines au bord des tables, chinoiseries sur les consoles ; des paravents de laque se développaient devant les fenêtres, des touffes de camélias montaient dans les cheminées ; et une musique légère vibrail, au loin, comme un bourdonnement d’abeilles.

Les quadrilles n’étaient pas nombreux, et les danseurs, à la manière nonchalante dont ils traînaient leurs escarpins, semblaient s’acquitter d’un devoir. Frédéric entendait des phrases comme celles-ci :

— “Avez-vous été à la dernière fête de charité de l’hôtel Lambert, Mademoiselle ?”

— “Non, Monsieur !”

— “Il va faire, tout à l’heure, une chaleur !”

— “Oh ! c’est vrai, étouffante”

— “De qui donc cette polka ?”

— “Mon Dieu ! je ne sais pas, Madame !”

Et, derrière lui, trois roquentins, postés dans une embrasure, chuchotaient des remarques obscènes ; d’autres causaient chemins de fer, libre-échange un sportman contait une histoire de chasse ; un légitimiste et un orléaniste. Il discutaient.

En errant de groupe en groupe, il arriva dans le salon des joueurs, où, dans un cercle de gens graves, il reconnut Martinon, “attaché maintenant au parquet de la Capitale” .

Sa grosse face couleur de cire emplissait convenablement son collier, lequel était une merveille, tant les poils noirs se trouvaient bien égalisés ; et, gardant un juste milieu entre l’élégance voulue par son âge et la dignité que réclamait sa profession, il accrochait son pouce dans son aisselle suivant l’usage des beaux, puis mettait son bras dans son gilet à la façon des doctrinaires. Bien qu'il eût des bottes extravagantes, il portait les tempes rasées, pour se faire un front de penseur.

Après quelques mots débités froidement, il se retourna vers son conciliabule. Un propriétaire disait :

— “C’est une classe d’hommes qui rêvent le bouleversement de la société !”

— “Ils demandent l’organisation du travail !” reprit un autre.
“Conçoit-on cela ?”

— “Que voulez-vous !” fit un troisième, “quand on voit M. de Genoude donner la main au Siècle !”

— “Et des conservateurs, eux-mêmes, s’intituler progressifs ! Pour nous amener, quoi ? la République ! comme si elle était possible en France !”

Tous déclarèrent que la République était impossible en France.

— “N’importe”, remarqua tout haut un monsieur. “On s’occupe trop de la Révolution ; on publie là-dessus un tas d’histoires, de livres !...”

— “Sans compter”, dit Martinon,, qu’il y a, peut-être, des sujets d’étude plus sérieux ! ”

Un ministériel s’en prit aux scandales du théâtre :

— “Ainsi, par exemple, ce nouveau drame la Reine Margot dépasse véritablement les bornes ! Où était le besoin qu’on nous parlât des Valois ? Tout cela montre la royauté sous un jour défavorable ! C’est comme votre Presse ! Les lois de septembre, on a beau dire, sont infiniment trop douces. Moi, je voudrais des cours martiales pour bâillonner les journalistes ! A la moindre insolence, traînés devant un conseil de guerre ! et allez donc !”

— “Oh ! prenez garde, Monsieur, prenez garde !” dit un professeur, “n’attaquez pas nos précieuses conquêtes de 1830 ! respectons nos libertés.” Il fallait décentraliser plutôt, répartir l’excédent des villes dans les campagnes.

— “Mais elles sont gangrenées !” s’écria un catholique. “Faites qu’on raffermisse la Religion !”

Martinon s’empressa de dire :

— “Effectivement, c’est un frein !”

Tout le mal gisait dans cette envie moderne de s’élever au-dessus de sa classe, d’avoir du luxe.

— “Cependant”, objecta un industriel, “le luxe favorise le commerce. Aussi j’approuve le duc de Nemours d’exiger la culotte courte à ses soirées.”

— “M. Thiers y est venu en pantalon. Vous connaissez son mot ?”

— “Oui, charmant ! Mais il tourne au démagogue, et son discours dans la question des incompatibilités n’a pas été sans influence sur l’attentat du 12 mai.”

— “Ah ! bah !”

— “Eh ! eh !”

Le cercle fut contraint de s’entrouvrir pour livrer passage à un domestique portant un plateau, et qui tâchait d’entrer dans le salon des joueurs.

Sous l’abat-jour vert des bougies, des rangées de cartes et de pièces d’or couvraient la table. Frédéric s’arrêta devant une d’elles, perdit les quinze napoléons qu’il avait dans sa poche, fit une pirouette, et se trouva au seuil du boudoir où était alors Mme Dambreuse.

Des femmes le remplissaient, les unes près des autres, sur des sièges sans dossier. Leurs longues jupes, bouffant autour d’elles, semblaient des flots d’où leur taille émergeait, et les seins s’offraient aux regards dans l’échancrure des corsages. Presque toutes portaient un bouquet de violettes à la main. Le ton mat de leurs gants faisaient ressortir la blancheur humaine de leurs bras ; des effilés, des herbes, leur pendaient sur les épaules, et on croyait quelquefois, à certains frissonnements, que la robe allait tomber. Mais la décence des figures tempérait les provocations du costume ; plusieurs même avaient une placidité presque bestiale, et ce rassemblement de femmes demi-nues faisait songer à un intérieur de harem ; il vint à l’esprit du jeune homme une comparaison plus grossière. En effet, toutes sortes de beautés se trouvaient là : des Anglaises à profil de keepsake, une Italienne dont les yeux noirs fulguraient comme un Vésuve, trois sœurs habillées de bleu, trois Normandes, fraîches comme des pommiers d’avril, une grande rousse avec une parure d’améthystes ; — et les blanches scintillations des diamants qui tremblaient en aigrettes dans les chevelures, les taches lumineuses des pierreries étalées sur les poitrines, et l’éclat doux des perles accompagnant les visages se mêlaient au miroitement des anneaux d’or, aux dentelles, à la poudre, aux plumes, au vermillon des petites bouches, à la nacre des dents. Le plafond, arrondi en coupole, donnait au boudoir la forme d'une corbeille ; et un courant d'air parfumé circulait sous le battement des éventails.

Frédéric, campé derrière elles avec son lorgnon dans l'oeil, ne jugeait pas toutes les épaules irréprochables ; il songeait à la Maréchale, ce qui refoulait ses tentations, ou l'en consolait.

Il regardait cependant Mme Dambreuse, et il la trouvait charmante, malgré sa bouche un peu longue et ses narines trop ouvertes. Mais sa grâce était particulière. Les boucles de sa chevelure avaient comme une langueur passionnée, et son front couleur d'agate semblait contenir beaucoup de choses et dénotait un maître.

Elle avait mis près d'elle la nièce de son mari, jeune personne assez laide. De temps à autre, elle se dérangeait pour recevoir celles qui entraient ; et le murmure des voix féminines, augmentant, faisait comme un caquetage d'oi seaux.

Il était question des ambassadeurs tunisiens et de leurs costumes. Un dame avait assisté à la dernière réception de l'Académie ; une autre parla du Don Juan de Molière, représenté nouvellement aux Français. Mais, désignant sa nièce d'un coup d'oeil, Mme Dambreuse posa un doigt contre sa bouche, et un sourire qui lui échappa démentait cette austérité.

Tout à coup, Martinon apparut, en face, sous l'autre porte. Elle se leva. Il lui offrit son bras. Frédéric, pour le voir continuer ses galanteries, traversa les tables de jeu et les rejoignit dans le grand salon ; Mme Dambreuse quitta aussitôt son cavalier, et l'entretint familièrement.

Elle comprenait qu'il ne jouât pas, ne dansât pas.

— “Dans la jeunesse on est triste !” Puis, enveloppant le bal d'un seul regard :

— “D'ailleurs, tout cela n'est pas drôle ! pour certaines natures du moins !”

Et elle s'arrêtait devant la rangée des fauteuils, distribuant çà et là des mots aimables, tandis que des vieux, qui avaient des binocles à deux branches, venaient lui faire la cour. Elle présenta Frédéric à quelques-uns. M. Dambreuse le toucha au coude légèrement, et l'emmena dehors sur la terrasse.

Il avait vu le Ministre. La chose n'était pas facile. Avant d'être présenté comme auditeur au Conseil d'Etat, on devait subir un examen ; Frédéric, pris d'une confiance inexplicable, répondit qu'il en savait les matières.

Le financier n'en était pas surpris, d'après tous les éloges que faisait de lui M. Roque.

A ce nom, Frédéric revit la petite Louise, sa maison, sa chambre ; et il se rappela des nuits pareilles, où il restait à sa fenêtre, écoutant les rouliers qui passaient. Ce souvenir de ses tristesses amena la pensée de Mme Arnoux ; et il se taisait, tout en continuant à marcher sur la terrasse. Les croisées dressaient au milieu des ténèbres de longues plaques rouges ; le bruit du bal s'affaiblissait les voitures commençaient à s'en aller.

— “Pourquoi donc”, reprit M. Dambreuse, “tenez-vous au Conseil d'Etat ?”

Et il affirma, d'un ton de libéral, que les fonctions publiques ne menaient à rien, il en savait quelque chose ; les affaires valaient mieux. Frédéric objecta la difficulté de les apprendre.

— “Ah ! bah ! en peu de temps, je vous y mettrais.” Voulait-il l'associer à ses entreprises ?

Le jeune homme aperçut, comme dans un éclair, une immense fortune qui allait venir.

— “Rentrons”, dit le banquier. “Vous soupez avec nous, n'est-ce pas ?”

Il était trois heures, on partait. Dans la salle à manger, une table servie attendait les intimes.

M. Dambreuse aperçut Martinon, et, s'approchant de sa femme, d'une voix basse :

— “C'est vous qui l'avez invité ?”

Elle répliqua sèchement :

— “Mais oui !”

La nièce n'était pas là. On but très bien, on rit très haut ; et des plaisanteries hasardeuses ne choquèrent point, tous éprouvant cet allègement qui suit les contraintes un peu longues. Seul, Martinon se montra sérieux ; il refusa de boire du vin de Champagne par bon genre, souple d'ailleurs et fort poli, car M. Dambreuse, qui avait la poitrine étroite, se plaignant d'oppression, il s'informa de sa santé à plusieurs reprises ; puis il dirigeait ses yeux bleuâtres du côté de Mme

Dambreuse.

Elle interpella Frédéric, pour savoir quelles jeunes personnes lui avaient plu. Il n'en avait remarqué aucune, et préférait, d'ailleurs, les femmes de trente ans.

— “Ce n'est peut-être pas bête !” répondit-elle.

Puis, comme on mettait les pelisses et les paletots, M. Dambreuse lui dit :

— “Venez me voir un de ces matins, nous causerons !”

Martinon, au bas de l'escalier, alluma un cigare ; et il offrait, en le suçant, un profil tellement lourd, que son compagnon lâcha cette phrase :

— “Tu as une bonne tête, ma parole”

— “Elle en a fait tourner quelques-unes !” reprit le jeune magistrat, d'un air à la fois convaincu et vexé.

Frédéric, en se couchant, résuma la soirée. D'abord, sa toilette (il s'était observé dans les glaces plusieurs fois), depuis la coupe de l'habit jusqu'au nœud des escarpins, ne laissait rien à reprendre ; il avait parlé à des hommes considérables, avait vu de près des femmes riches, M. Dambreuse s'était montré excellent et Mme Dambreuse presque engageante. Il pesa un à un ses moindres mots, ses regards, mille choses inanalysables et cependant expressives. Ce serait crânement beau d'avoir une pareille maîtresse ! Pourquoi non, après tout ? Il en valait bien un autre ! Peut-être qu'elle n'était pas si difficile ? Martinon ensuite revint à sa mémoire ; et, en s'endormant, il souriait de pitié sur ce brave garçon.

L'idée de la Maréchale le réveilla ; ces mots de son billet : “A partir de demain soir”, étaient bien un rendez-vous pour le jour même. Il attendit jusqu'à neuf heures, et courut chez elle.

Quelqu'un, devant lui, qui montait l'escalier, ferma la porte. Il tira la sonnette ; Delphine vint ouvrir, et affirma que Madame n'y était pas.

Frédéric insista, pria. Il avait à lui communiquer quelque chose de très grave, un simple mot. Enfin l'argument de la pièce de cent sous réussit, et la bonne le laissa seul dans l'antichambre.

Rosanette parut. Elle était en chemise, les cheveux dénoués ; et, tout en hochant la tête, elle fit de foin avec les deux bras, un grand geste exprimant qu'elle ne pouvait le recevoir.

Frédéric descendit l'escalier, lentement. Ce caprice-là dépassait tous les autres. Il n'y comprenait rien.

Devant la loge du portier, Mlle Vatnaz l'arrêta.

— “Elle vous a reçu ?”

— “Non !”

— “On vous a mis à la porte ?”

— “Comment le savez-vous ?”

— “Ça se voit ! Mais venez ! sortons ! j'étouffe !”

Elle l'emmena dans la rue. Elle haletait. Il sentait son bras maigre trembler sur le sien. Tout à coup elle éclata.

— “Ah ! le misérable !”

— “Qui donc ?”

— “Mais c'est lui ! lui ! Delmar !”

Cette révélation humilia Frédéric ; il reprit :

— “En êtes-vous bien sûre ?”

— “Mais quand je vous dis que je l'ai suivi !” s'écria la Vatnaz ; “je l'ai vu entrer ! Comprenez-vous maintenant ? Je devais m'y attendre, d'ailleurs c'est moi, dans ma bêtise, qui l'ai mené chez elle. Et si vous saviez, mon Dieu ! Je l'ai recueilli, je l'ai nourri, je l'ai habillé ; et toutes mes démarches dans les journaux ! Je l'aimais comme une mère !” Puis, avec un ricanement : “Ah ! c'est qu'il faut à Monsieur des robes de velours ! une spéculation de sa part, vous pensez bien ! Et elle ! Dire que je l'ai connue confectionneuse de lingerie ! Sans moi, plus de vingt fois, elle serait tombée dans la crotte. Mais je l'y plongerai ! oh oui ! Je veux qu'elle crève à l'hôpital On saura tout !”

Et, comme un torrent d'eau de vaisselle qui charrie des ordures, sa colère fit passer tumultueusement sous Frédéric les hontes de sa rivale.

— “Elle a couché avec Jumillac, avec Flacourt, avec le petit Allard, avec Bertinaux, avec Saint-Valéry, le grêlé. Non ! l'autre ! Ils sont deux frères, n'importe ! Et quand elle avait des embarras, j'arrangeais tout. Qu'est-ce que j'y gagnais ? Elle est si avare ! Et puis, vous en conviendrez, c'était une jolie complaisance que de la voir, car enfin, nous ne sommes pas du même monde ! Est-ce que je suis une fille, moi ! Est-ce que je me vends ! Sans compter qu'elle est bête comme un chou ! Elle écrit catégorie par un th. Au reste, ils vont bien ensemble ; ça fait la paire, quoiqu'il s'intitule artiste et se croie du génie ! Mais, mon Dieu ! s'il avait seulement de l'intelligence, il n'aurait pas commis une infamie pareille ! On ne quitte pas une femme supérieure pour une coquine ! Je m'en moque, après tout. Il devient laid ! Je l'exècre ! Si je la rencontrais, tenez, je lui cracherais à la figure." Elle cracha. "Oui, voilà le cas que j'en fais maintenant ! Et Arnoux, hein ? N'est-ce pas abominable ! Il lui a tant de fois pardonné ! On n'imagine pas ses sacrifices ! Elle devrait baiser ses pieds ! Il est si généreux, si bon !"

Frédéric jouissait à entendre dénigrer Delmar. Il avait accepté Arnoux. Cette perfidie de Rosanette lui semblait une chose anormale, injuste ; et, gagné par l'émotion de la vieille fille, il arrivait à sentir pour lui comme de l'attendrissement. Tout à Coup, il se trouva devant sa porte ; Mlle Vatnaz, sans qu'il s'en aperçût, lui avait fait descendre le faubourg Poissonnière.

— "Nous y voilà", dit-elle. "Moi, je ne peux pas monter. Mais vous, rien ne vous empêche ?"

— "Pour quoi faire ?"

— "Pour lui dire tout, parbleu !"

Frédéric, comme se réveillant en sursaut, comprit l'infamie où on le poussait.

— "Eh bien ?" reprit-elle.

Il leva les yeux vers le second étage. La lampe de Mme Arnoux brûlait. Rien effectivement ne l'empêchait de monter.

— "Je vous attends ici. Allez donc !"

Ce commandement acheva de le refroidir, et il dit :

— "Je serai là-haut longtemps. Vous feriez mieux de vous en retourner. J'irai demain chez vous."

— "Non, non !" répliqua la Vatnaz, en tapant du pied. "Prenez-le ! emmenez-le ? faites qu'il les surprenne" — "Mais Delmar n'y sera plus"

Elle baissa la tête.

— "Oui, c'est peut-être vrai ?"

Et elle resta sans parler, au milieu de la rue, entre les voitures ; puis, fixant sur lui ses yeux de chatte sauvage :

— "Je peux compter sur vous, n'est-ce pas ? Entre nous deux maintenant, c'est sacré ! Faites donc. A demain !"

Frédéric, en traversant le corridor, entendit deux voix qui se répondaient. Celle de Mme Arnoux disait :

— "Ne mens pas ! ne mens donc pas !"

Il entra. On se tut.

Arnoux marchait de long en large, et Madame était assise sur la petite chaise près du feu, extrêmement pâle, l'oeil fixe. Frédéric fit un mouvement pour se retirer. Arnoux lui saisit la main, heureux du secours qui lui arrivait.

— “Mais je crains...”, dit Frédéric.

— “Restez donc !” souffla Arnoux dans son oreille. Madame reprit :

— “Il faut être indulgent, monsieur Moreau ! Ce sont de ces choses que l'on rencontre parfois dans les ménages.”

— “C'est qu'on les y met”, dit gaillardement Arnoux.

— “Les femmes vous ont des lubies ! Ainsi, celle-là, par exemple, n'est pas mauvaise. Non, au contraire ! Eh bien, elle s'amuse depuis une heure à me taquiner avec un tas d'histoires.”

— “Elles sont vraies !” répliqua Mme Arnoux impatientée. “Car, enfin, tu l'as acheté.”

— “Moi ?”

— “Oui, toi-même ! au Persan !”

— “Le cachemire !” pensa Frédéric.

Il se sentait coupable et avait peur.

Elle ajouta, de suite :

— “C'était l'autre mois, un samedi, le 14.”

— “Ah ! ce jour-là, précisément, j'étais à Creil ! Ainsi, tu vois.”

— “Pas du tout ! Car nous avons dîné chez les Bertin, le 14.”

— “Le 14... ?” fit Arnoux, en levant les yeux comme pour chercher une date.

— “Et même, le commis qui t'a vendu était un blond !”

— “Est-ce que je peux me rappeler le commis !”

— “Il a cependant écrit, sous ta dictée, l'adresse : 18, rue de Laval.”

— “Comment sais-tu ?” dit Arnoux stupéfait.

Elle leva les épaules.

— “Oh ! c'est bien simple : j'ai été pour faire réparer mon cachemire, et un chef de rayon m'a appris qu'on venait d'en expédier un autre pareil chez M<sup>me</sup> Arnoux.”

— “Est-ce ma faute, à moi, s'il y a dans la même rue une dame Arnoux ?”

— “Oui ! mais pas Jacques Arnoux”, reprit-elle.

Alors, il se mit à divaguer, protestant de son innocence. C'était une méprise, un hasard, une de ces choses inexplicables comme il en arrive. On ne devait pas condamner les gens sur de simples soupçons, des indices vagues ; et il cita l'exemple de l'infortuné Lesurques.

— “Enfin, j'affirme que tu te trompes ! Veux-tu que je t'en jure ma parole ?”

— “Ce n'est point la peine.”

— “Pourquoi ?”

Elle le regarda en face, sans rien dire ; puis allongea la main, prit le coffret d'argent sur la cheminée, et lui tendit une facture grande ouverte.

Arnoux rougit jusqu'aux oreilles et ses traits décomposés s'enflèrent.

— “Eh bien ?”

— “Mais...” répondit-il, lentement, “qu'est-ce que ça prouve ?”

— “Ah” fit-elle, avec une intonation de voix singulière, où il y avait de la douleur et de l'ironie. “Ah !”

Arnoux gardait la note entre ses mains, et la retournait, n'en détachant pas les yeux comme s'il avait dû y découvrir la solution d'un grand problème.

— “Oh ! oui, oui, je me rappelle”, dit-il enfin. “C'est une commission. — Vous devez savoir cela, vous. Frédéric ?” Frédéric se taisait. “Une commission dont j'étais chargé... par... par le père Oudry.”

— “Et pour qui ?”

— “Pour sa maîtresse.”

— “Pour la vôtre !” s'écria Mme Arnoux, se levant toute droite.

— “Je te jure...”

— “Ne recommencez pas ! Je sais tout !”

— “Ah ! très bien ! Ainsi, on m'espionne !”

Elle répliqua froidement :

— “Cela blesse, peut-être, votre délicatesse ?”

— “Du moment qu'on s'emporte”, reprit Arnoux, en cherchant son chapeau, “et qu'il n'y a pas moyen de raisonner”

Puis, avec un grand soupir :

— “Ne vous mariez pas, mon pauvre ami, non, croyez-moi !”

Et il décampa, ayant besoin de prendre l'air.

Alors, il se fit un grand silence ; et tout, dans l'appartement, sembla plus immobile. Un cercle lumineux, au-dessus de la carcel, blanchissait le plafond, tandis que, dans les coins, l'ombre s'étendait comme des gazes noires superposées ; on entendait le tic-tac de la pendule avec la crépitation du feu.

Mme Arnoux venait de se rasseoir, à l'autre angle de la cheminée dans le fauteuil ; elle mordait ses lèvres en grelottant ; ses deux mains se levèrent, un sanglot lui échappa, elle pleurait.

Il se mit sur la petite chaise ; et, d'une voix caressante, comme on fait une personne malade :

— “Vous ne doutez pas que je ne partage... ?”

Elle ne répondit rien. Mais, continuant tout haut ses réflexions :

— “Je le laisse bien libre ! Il n'avait pas besoin de mentir !”

— “Certainement”, dit Frédéric.

C'était la conséquence de ses habitudes sans doute, il n'y avait pas songé, et peut-être que, dans des choses plus graves...

— “Que voyez-vous donc de plus grave ?”

— “Oh ! rien !”

Frédéric s'inclina, avec un sourire d'obéissance. Arnoux néanmoins possédait certaines qualités ; il aimait ses enfants.

— “Ah ! et il fait tout pour les ruiner !”

Cela venait de son humeur trop facile ; car, enfin, c'était un bon garçon.

Elle s'écria :

— “Mais qu'est-ce que cela veut dire, un bon garçon !”

Il le défendait ainsi, de la manière la plus vague qu'il pouvait trouver, et, tout en la plaignant, il se réjouissait, se délectait au fond de l'âme. Par vengeance ou besoin d'affection, elle se réfugierait vers lui. Son espoir, démesurément accru, renforçait son amour.

Jamais elle ne lui avait paru si captivante, si profondément belle. De temps à autre, une aspiration soulevait sa poitrine ; ses deux yeux fixes semblaient dilatés par une vision intérieure, et sa bouche demeurait entre-close comme pour donner son âme. Quelquefois, elle appuyait dessus fortement son mouchoir ; il aurait voulu être ce petit morceau de batiste tout trempé de larmes. Malgré lui, il regardait la couche, au fond de l'alcôve, en imaginant sa tête sur l'oreiller et il voyait cela si bien, qu'il se retenait pour ne pas la saisir dans ses bras. Elle ferma les paupières, apaisée, inerte. Alors, il s'approcha de plus près, et, penché sur elle, il examinait avidement sa figure. Un bruit de bottes résonna dans le couloir, c'était l'autre. Ils l'entendirent fermer la porte de sa chambre. Frédéric demanda, d'un signe, à Mme Arnoux, s'il devait y aller.

Elle répliqua "oui" de la même façon ; et ce muet échange de leurs pensées était comme un consentement, un début d'adultère.

Arnoux, près de se coucher, défaisait sa redingote.

— "Eh bien, comment va-t-elle ?"

— "Oh ! mieux !" dit Frédéric. "Cela se passera !"

Mais Arnoux était peiné.

— "Vous ne la connaissez pas ! Elle a maintenant des nerfs... !

Imbécile de commis ! Voilà ce que c'est que d'être trop bon ! Si je n'avais pas donné ce maudit châle à Rosanette !"

— "Ne regrettez rien ! Elle vous est on ne peut plus reconnaissante !"

— "Vous croyez ?"

Frédéric n'en doutait pas. La preuve, c'est qu'elle venait de congédier le père Oudry.

— "Ah ! pauvre biche !"

Et, dans l'excès de son émotion, Arnoux voulait courir chez elle.

— "Ce n'est pas la peine ! j'en viens. Elle est malade !"

— "Raison de plus !"

Il repassa vivement sa redingote et avait pris son bougeoir. Frédéric se maudit pour sa sottise, et lui représenta qu'il devait, par décence, rester ce soir auprès de sa femme. Il ne pouvait l'abandonner, ce serait très mal.

— "Franchement, vous auriez tort ! Rien ne presse, là-bas ! Vous irez demain ! Voyons faites cela pour moi." Arnoux déposa son bougeoir, et lui dit, en l'embrassant :

— "Vous êtes bon, vous !"

CHAPITRE 3

Alors commença pour Frédéric une existence misérable. Il fut le parasite de la maison.

Si quelqu'un était indisposé, il venait trois fois par jour savoir de ses nouvelles, allait chez l'accordeur de piano, inventait mille prévenances ; et il endurait d'un air content les bouderies de Mlle Marthe et les caresses du jeune Eugène, qui lui passait toujours ses mains sales sur la figure. Il assistait aux dîners où Monsieur et Madame, en face l'un de l'autre, n'échangeaient pas un mot : ou bien, Arnoux agaçait sa femme par des remarques saugrenues. Le repas terminé, il jouait dans la chambre avec son fils, se cachait derrière les meubles, ou le portait sur son dos, en marchant à quatre pattes, comme le Béarnais. Il s'en allait enfin — , et elle abordait immédiatement l'éternel sujet de plainte : Arnoux.

Ce n'était pas son inconduite qui l'indignait. Mais elle paraissait souffrir dans son orgueil, et laissait voir sa répugnance pour cet homme sans délicatesse, sans dignité, sans honneur.

— “Ou plutôt il est fou !” disait-elle.

Frédéric sollicitait adroitement ses confidences. Bientôt, il connut toute sa vie.

Ses parents étaient de petits bourgeois de Chartres. Un jour, Arnoux, dessinant au bord de la rivière (il se croyait peintre dans ce temps-là), l'avait aperçue comme elle sortait de l'église et demandée en mariage ; à cause de sa fortune, on n'avait pas hésité. D'ailleurs, il l'aimait éperdument. Elle ajouta :

— “Mon Dieu, il m'aime encore à sa manière !”

Ils avaient, les premiers mois, voyagé en Italie.

Arnoux, malgré son enthousiasme devant les paysages et les chefs-d'œuvre, n'avait fait que gémir sur le vin, et organisait des pique-nique avec des Anglais, pour se distraire. Quelques tableaux bien revendus l'avaient poussé au commerce des arts. Puis il s'était engoué d'une manufacture de faïence. D'autres spéculations, à présent, le tentaient ; et, se vulgarisant de plus en plus, il prenait des habitudes grossières et dispendieuses. Elle avait moins à lui reprocher ses vices que toutes ses actions. Aucun changement ne pouvait survenir, et son malheur à elle était irréparable.

Frédéric affirmait que son existence, de même, se trouvait manquée.

Il était bien jeune cependant. Pourquoi désespérer ? Et elle lui donnait de bons conseils : “Travaillez ! mariez-vous !”

Il répondait par des sourires amers ; car, au lieu d’exprimer le véritable motif de son chagrin, il en feignait un autre, sublime, faisant un peu l’Antony, le maudit, — langage, du reste, qui ne dénaturait pas complètement sa pensée.

L’action, pour certains hommes, est d’autant plus impraticable que le désir est plus fort. La méfiance d’eux-mêmes les embarrasse, la crainte de déplaire les épouvante ; d’ailleurs, les affections profondes ressemblent aux honnêtes femmes ; elles ont peur d’être découvertes, et passent dans la vie les yeux baissés.

Bien qu’il connût Mme Arnoux davantage (à cause de cela, peut-être), il était encore plus lâche qu’autrefois. Chaque matin, il se jurait d’être hardi. Une invincible pudeur l’en empêchait ; et il ne pouvait se guider d’après aucun exemple puisque celle-là différait des autres. Par la force de ses rêves, il l’avait posée en dehors des conditions humaines. Il se sentait, à côté d’elle, moins important sur la terre que les brindilles de soie s’échappant de ses ciseaux.

Puis il pensait à des choses monstrueuses, absurdes, telles que des surprises, la nuit, avec des narcotiques et des fausses clefs, — tout lui paraissant plus facile que d’affronter son dédain.

D’ailleurs, les enfants, les deux bonnes, la disposition des pièces faisaient d’insurmontables obstacles. Donc, il résolut de la posséder à lui seul, et d’aller vivre ensemble bien loin, au fond d’une solitude ; il cherchait même sur quel lac assez bleu, au bord de quelle plage assez douce, si ce serait l’Espagne, la Suisse ou l’Orient ; et, choisissant exprès les jours où elle semblait plus irritée, il lui disait qu’il faudrait sortir de là, imaginer un moyen, et qu’il n’en voyait pas d’autre qu’une séparation. Mais, pour l’amour de ses enfants, jamais elle n’en viendrait à une telle extrémité. Tant de vertu augmenta son respect.

Ses après-midi se passaient à se rappeler la visite de la veille, à désirer celle du soir. Quand il ne dînait pas chez eux, vers neuf heures, il se postait au coin de la rue ; et, dès qu’Arnoux avait tiré la grande porte, Frédéric montait vivement les deux étages et demandait à la bonne d'un air ingénu :

— “Monsieur est là ?”

Puis faisait l'homme surpris de ne pas le trouver.

Arnoux, souvent, rentrait à l'improviste. Alors, il fallait le suivre dans un petit café de la rue Sainte-Anne, que fréquentait maintenant Regimbart.

Le Citoyen commençait par articuler contre la Couronne quelque nouveau grief. Puis ils causaient, en se disant amicalement des injures ; car le fabricant tenait Regimbart pour un penseur de haute volée, et, chagriné de voir tant de moyens perdus, il le taquinait sur sa paresse. Le Citoyen jugeait Arnoux plein de cœur et d'imagination, mais décidément trop immoral ; aussi le traitait-il sans la moindre indulgence et refusait même de dîner chez lui, parce que “la cérémonie l'embêtait.”

Quelquefois, au moment des adieux, Arnoux était pris de fringale. Il “avait besoin” de manger une omelette ou des pommes cuites ; et, les comestibles ne se trouvant jamais dans l'établissement, il les envoyait chercher. On attendait. Regimbart ne s'en allait pas, et finissait, en grommelant, par accepter quelque chose.

Il était sombre néanmoins, car il restait pendant des heures, en face du même verre à moitié plein. La Providence ne gouvernant point les choses selon ses idées, il tournait à l'hypocondriaque, ne voulait même plus lire les journaux, et poussait des rugissements au seul nom de l'Angleterre. Il s'écria une fois, à propos d'un garçon qui le servait mal :

— “Est-ce que nous n'avons pas assez des affronts de l'Etranger !”

En dehors de ces crises, il se tenait taciturne, méditant “un coup infaillible pour faire péter toute la boutique” .

Tandis qu'il était perdu dans ses réflexions, Arnoux, d'une voix monotone et avec un regard un peu ivre, contait d'incroyables anecdotes où il avait toujours brillé, grâce à son aplomb ; et Frédéric (cela tenait sans doute à des ressemblances profondes), éprouvait un certain entraînement pour sa personne. Il se reprochait cette faiblesse, trouvant qu'il aurait dû le haïr, au contraire.

Arnoux se lamentait devant lui sur l'humeur de sa femme, son entêtement, ses préventions injustes. Elle n'était pas comme cela autrefois.

— “A votre place”, disait Frédéric, “je lui ferais une pension, et je vivrais seul.”

Arnoux ne répondait rien ; et, un moment après, entamait son éloge. Elle était bonne, dévouée, intelligente, vertueuse ; et, passant à ses qualités corporelles, il prodiguait les révélations, avec l'étourderie de ces gens qui étaient leurs trésors dans les auberges.

Une catastrophe dérangerait son équilibre.

Il était entré, comme membre du Conseil de surveillance, dans une compagnie de kaolin. Mais, se fiant à tout ce qu'on lui disait, il avait signé des rapports inexacts et approuvé, sans vérification, les inventaires annuels frauduleusement dressés par le gérant. Or, la compagnie avait croulé, et Arnoux, civilement responsable, venait d'être condamné, avec les autres, à la garantie des dommages-intérêts, ce qui lui faisait une perte d'environ trente mille francs, aggravée par les motifs du jugement.

Frédéric apprit cela dans un journal, et se précipita vers la rue Paradis.

On le reçut dans la chambre de Madame. C'était l'heure du premier déjeuner. Des bols de café au lait encombraient un guéridon auprès du feu. Des savates traînaient sur le tapis, des vêtements sur les fauteuils. Arnoux, en caleçon et en veste de tricot, avait les yeux rouges et la chevelure ébouriffée ; le petit Eugène, à cause de ses oreillons, pleurait, tout en grignotant sa tartine ; sa sœur mangeait tranquillement ; Mme Arnoux, un peu plus pâle que d'habitude, les servait tous les trois.

— “Eh bien”, dit Arnoux, en poussant un gros soupir, “vous savez !” Et Frédéric ayant fait un geste de compassion : “Voilà ! J'ai été victime de ma confiance !” Puis il se tut ; et son abattement était si fort, qu'il repoussa le déjeuner. Mme Arnoux leva les yeux, avec un haussement d'épaules. Il se passa les mains sur le front.

— “Après tout, je ne suis pas coupable. Je n'ai rien à me reprocher. C'est un malheur ! On s'en tirera ! Ah ! ma foi, tant pis !”

Et il entama une brioche, obéissant, du reste, aux sollicitations de sa femme.

Le soir, il voulut dîner seul, avec elle, dans un cabinet particulier, à la Maison d'or. Mme Arnoux ne comprit rien à ce mouvement de cœur, s'offensant même d'être traitée en lorette ; — ce qui, de la part d'Arnoux, au contraire, était une preuve d'affection. Puis, comme il s'ennuyait, il alla se distraire chez la Maréchale.

Jusqu'à présent, on lui avait passé beaucoup de choses, grâce à son caractère bonhomme. Son procès le classa parmi les gens tarés. Une solitude se fit autour de sa maison.

Frédéric, par point d'honneur, crut devoir les fréquenter plus que jamais. Il loua une baignoire aux Italiens et les y conduisit chaque semaine. Cependant, ils en étaient à cette période où, dans les unions disparates, une invincible lassitude ressort des concessions que l'on s'est faites et rend l'existence intolérable. Mme Arnoux se retenait pour ne pas éclater, Arnoux s'assombrissait ; et le spectacle de ces deux êtres malheureux attristait Frédéric.

Elle l'avait chargé, puisqu'il possédait sa confiance, de s'enquérir de ses affaires. Mais il avait honte, il souffrait de prendre ses dîners en ambitionnant sa femme. Il continuait néanmoins, se donnant pour excuse qu'il devait la défendre, et qu'une occasion pouvait se présenter de lui être utile.

Huit jours après le bal, il avait fait une visite à M. Dambreuse. Le financier lui avait offert une vingtaine d'actions dans son entreprise de houilles ; Frédéric n'y était pas retourné. Deslauriers lui écrivait des lettres ; il les laissait sans réponse. Pellerin l'avait engagé à venir voir le portrait ; il l'éconduisait toujours. Il céda cependant à Cisy, qui l'obsédait pour faire la connaissance de Rosanette.

Elle le reçut fort gentiment, mais sans lui sauter au cou, comme autrefois. Son compagnon fut heureux d'être admis chez une impure, et surtout de causer avec un acteur ; Delmar se trouvait là.

Un drame, où il avait représenté un manant qui fait la leçon à Louis XIV et prophétise 89, l'avait mis en telle évidence, qu'on lui fabriquait sans cesse le même rôle ; et sa fonction, maintenant, consistait à bafouer les monarques de tous les pays. Brasseur anglais, il invectivait Charles Ier ; étudiant de Salamanque, maudissait Philippe II ; ou, père sensible, s'indignait contre la Pompadour, c'était le plus beau ! Les gamins, pour le voir, l'attendaient à la porte des coulisses ; et sa biographie, vendue dans les entractes, le dépeignait comme soignant sa vieille mère, lisant l'Evangile, assistant les pauvres, enfin sous les couleurs d'un saint Vincent de Paul mélangé de Brutus et de Mirabeau. On disait : "Notre Delmar." Il avait une mission, il devenait Christ.

Tout cela avait fasciné Rosanette ; et elle s'était débarrassée du père Oudry, sans se soucier de rien, n'étant pas cupide.

Arnoux, qui la connaissait, en avait profité pendant longtemps pour l'entretenir à peu de frais ; le bonhomme était venu, et ils avaient eu soin, tous les trois, de ne point s'expliquer franchement. Puis, s'imaginant qu'elle congédiait l'autre pour lui seul, Arnoux avait augmenté sa pension. Mais ses demandes se renouvelaient avec une fréquence inexplicable, car elle menait un train moins dispendieux ; elle avait même vendu jusqu'au cachemire. tenant à s'acquitter de ses vieilles dettes. disait-elle ; et il donnait toujours, elle l'ensorcelait. elle abusait de lui. sans pitié. Aussi les factures. les papiers timbrés pleuvaient dans la maison. Frédéric sentait une crise prochaine.

Un jour, il se présenta pour voir Mme Arnoux. Elle était sortie. Monsieur travaillait en bas dans le magasin.

En effet, Arnoux. au milieu de ses potiches. tâchait d'enfoncer de jeunes mariés. des bourgeois de la province. Il parlait du tournage et du tournassage. du truité et du glacé ; les autres. ne voulant pas avoir l'air de n'y rien comprendre. faisaient des signes d'approbation et achetaient.

Quand les chalands furent dehors. il conta qu'il avait eu, le matin. avec sa femme une petite altercation. Pour prévenir les observations sur la dépense, il avait affirmé que la Maréchale n'était plus sa maîtresse.

— “Je lui ai même dit que c'était la vôtre.”

Frédéric fut indigné ; mais des reproches pouvaient le trahir, il balbutia :

— “Ah ! vous avez eu tort, grand tort !”

— “Qu'est-ce que ça fait ?”, dit Arnoux. “Où est le déshonneur de passer pour son amant ? Je le suis bien, moi ! Ne seriez-vous pas flatté de l'être ?”

Avait-elle parlé ? Etait-ce une allusion ? Frédéric se hâta de répondre :

— “Non ! pas du tout ! au contraire !”

— “Eh bien. alors ?”

— “Oui, c'est vrai ! cela n'y fait rien.” Arnoux reprit :

— “Pourquoi ne venez-vous plus là-bas ?”

Frédéric promit d'y retourner.

— “Ah j’oubliais ! vous devriez.... en causant de Rosanette.... lâcher à ma femme quelque chose... je ne sais quoi. mais vous trouverez... quelque chose qui la persuade que vous êtes son amant. Je vous demande cela comme un service. hein ?” Le jeune homme. pour toute réponse. fit une grimace ambiguë. Cette calomnie le perdait. Il alla le soir même chez elle, et jura que l’allégation d’Arnoux était fausse.

— “Bien vrai ?”

Il paraissait sincère ; et, quand elle eut respiré largement, elle lui dit : “Je Vous crois”, avec un beau sourire ; puis elle baissa la tête, et, sans le regarder — “Au reste, personne n’a de droit sur vous !” Elle ne devinait donc rien, et elle le méprisait, puisqu’elle ne pensait pas qu’il put assez l’aimer pour lui être fidèle ! Frédéric, oubliant ses tentatives près de l’autre, trouvait la permission outrageante.

Ensuite, elle le pria d’aller quelquefois “chez cette femme”, pour voir un peu ce qui en était.

Arnoux survint, et, cinq minutes après, voulut l’entraîner chez Rosanette.

La situation devenait intolérable.

Il en fut distrait par une lettre du notaire qui devait lui envoyer le lendemain quinze mille francs ; et, pour réparer sa négligence envers Deslauriers, il alla lui apprendre tout de suite cette bonne nouvelle.

L’avocat logeait rue des Trois-Maries, au cinquième étage, sur une cour. Son cabinet, petite pièce carrelée, froide, et tendue d’un papier grisâtre, avait pour principale décoration une médaille en or, son prix de doctorat, insérée dans un cadre d’ébène contre la glace. Une bibliothèque d’acajou enfermait sous vitres cent volumes, à peu près. Le bureau, couvert de basane, tenait le milieu de l’appartement. Quatre vieux fauteuils de velours vert en occupaient les coins ; et des copeaux flambaient dans la cheminée, où il y avait toujours un fagot prêt à allumer au coup de sonnette. C’était l’heure de ses consultations l’avocat portait une cravate blanche.

L’annonce des quinze mille francs (il n’y comptait plus, sans doute) lui causa un ricanement de plaisir.

— “ C’est bien, mon brave, c’est bien, c’est très bien Il jeta du bois dans le feu, se rassit, et parla immédiatement du Journal. La première chose à faire était de se débarrasser d’Hussonnet.

— “Ce crétin-là me fatigue ! Quant à desservir une opinion, le plus équitable, selon moi, et le plus fort, c’est de n’en avoir aucune.”

Frédéric parut étonné.

— “Mais sans doute ! il serait temps de traiter la Politique scientifiquement. Les vieux du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle commençaient, quand Rousseau, les littérateurs, y ont introduit la philanthropie, la poésie, et autres blagues, pour la plus grande joie des catholiques ; alliance naturelle, du reste, puisque les réformateurs modernes (je peux le prouver) croient tous à la Révélation. Mais, si vous chantez des messes pour la Pologne, si à la place du Dieu des dominicains, qui était un bourreau, vous prenez le Dieu des romantiques, qui est un tapissier ; si, enfin, vous n’avez pas de l’Absolu une conception plus large que vos aïeux, la monarchie percera sous vos formes républicaines, et votre bonnet rouge ne sera jamais qu’une calotte sacerdotale ! Seulement, le régime cellulaire aura remplacé la torture, l’outrage à la Religion le sacrilège, le concert européen la Sainte-Alliance ; et, dans ce bel ordre qu’on admire, fait de débris louisquatorziens, de ruines voltairiennes, avec du badigeon impérial par-dessus et des fragments de constitution anglaise, on verra les conseils municipaux tâchant de vexer le maire, les conseils généraux leur préfet, les chambres le roi, la presse le pouvoir, l’administration tout le monde ! Mais les bonnes âmes s’extasiaient sur le Code civil, œuvre fabriquée, quoi qu’on dise, dans un esprit mesquin, tyrannique ; car le législateur, au lieu de faire son état, qui est de régulariser la coutume, a prétendu modeler la société comme un Lycurgue ! Pourquoi la loi gêne-t-elle le père de famille en matière de testament ? Pourquoi entrave-t-elle la vente forcée des immeubles ? Pourquoi punit-elle comme délit le vagabondage, lequel ne devrait pas être même une contravention ! Et il y en a d’autres ! Je les connais ! aussi je vais écrire un petit roman intitulé Histoire de l’idée de justice, qui sera drôle ! Mais j’ai une soif abominable ! et toi ?”

Il se pencha par la fenêtre, et cria au portier d’aller chercher des grogs au cabaret.

— “En résumé, je vois trois partis..., non ! trois groupes, — et dont aucun ne m’intéresse : ceux qui ont, ceux qui n’ont plus, et ceux qui tâchent d’avoir. Mais tous s’accordent dans l’idolâtrie imbécile de l’Autorité ! Exemples : Mably recommande qu’on empêche les philosophes de publier leurs doctrines ; M. Wronski géomètre, appelle en son langage la censure” répression critique de la spontanéité spéculative “ ; le père Enfantin bénit les Habsbourg” d’avoir passé par-dessus les Alpes une main pesante pour comprimer l’Italie “ ; Pierre Leroux veut qu’on vous force à entendre un orateur, et Louis Blanc incline à une religion d’Etat, tant ce peuple de vassaux a la rage du gouvernement ! Pas un cependant n’est légitime, malgré leurs sempiternels principes. Mais, principe signifiant origine, il faut se reporter toujours à une révolution, à un acte de violence, à un fait transitoire. Ainsi, le principe du nôtre est la souveraineté nationale, comprise dans la forme parlementaire, quoique le parlement n’en convienne pas ! Mais en quoi la souveraineté du peuple serait-elle plus sacrée que le droit divin ? L’un et l’autre sont deux fictions ! Assez de métaphysique, plus de fantômes ! Pas n’est besoin de dogmes pour faire balayer les rues ! On dira que je renverse la société ! Eh bien, après ? où serait le mai ? Elle est propre, en effet, ta société.”

Frédéric aurait eu beaucoup de choses à lui répondre. Mais, le voyant loin des théories de Sénécals, il était plein d’indulgence. Il se contenta d’objecter qu’un pareil système les ferait haïr généralement.

— “Au contraire, comme nous aurons donné à chaque parti un gage de haine contre son voisin, tous compteront sur nous. Tu vas t’y mettre aussi, toi, et nous faire de la critique transcendante”

Il fallait attaquer les idées reçues, l’Académie, l’Ecole normale, le Conservatoire, la Comédie-Française, tout ce qui ressemblait à une institution. C’est par là qu’ils donneraient un ensemble de doctrine à leur Revue. Puis, quand elle serait bien posée, le journal tout à coup deviendrait quotidien ; alors, ils s’en prendraient aux personnes.

— “Et on nous respectera, sois-en sûr !”

Deslauriers touchait à son vieux rêve : une rédaction en chef, c’est-à-dire au bonheur inexprimable de diriger les autres, de tailler en plein dans leurs articles, d’en commander, d’en refuser. Ses yeux pétillaient sous ses lunettes, il s’exaltait et buvait des petits verres, coup sur coup, machinalement.

— “Il faudra que tu donnes un dîner une fois la semaine. C’est indispensable, quand même la moitié de ton revenu y passerait ! On voudra y venir, ce sera un centre pour les autres, un levier pour toi ; et, maniant l’opinion par les deux bouts, littérature et politique, avant six mois, tu verras, nous tiendrons le haut du pavé dans Paris.”

Frédéric, en l'écoutant, éprouvait une sensation de rajeunissement, comme un homme qui, après un long séjour dans une chambre, est transporté au grand air. Cet enthousiasme le gagnait.

— “Oui, j'ai été un paresseux, un imbécile, tu as raison !”

— “A la bonne heure !” s'écria Deslauriers ; “je retrouve mon Frédéric !”

Et, lui mettant le poing sous la mâchoire :

— “Ah ! tu m'as fait souffrir. N'importe ! je t'aime tout de même.”

Ils étaient debout et se regardaient, attendris l'un et l'autre, et près de s'embrasser.

Un bonnet de femme parut au seuil de l'antichambre.

— “Qui t'amène ?” dit Deslauriers.

C'était Mlle Clémence, sa maîtresse.

Elle répondit nue, passant devant sa maison par hasard, elle n'avait pu résister au désir de le voir ; et, pour faire une petite collation ensemble, elle lui apportait des gâteaux, qu'elle déposa sur la table.

— “Prends garde à mes papiers !” reprit aigrement l'avocat.

“D'ailleurs, c'est la troisième fois que je te défends de venir pendant mes consultations.”

Elle voulut l'embrasser.

— “Bien ! va-t'en ! file ton nœud !”

Il la repoussait, elle eut un grand sanglot.

— “Ah ! tu m'ennuies, à la fin !”

— “C'est que je t'aime !”

— “Je ne demande pas qu'on m'aime, mais qu'on m'oblige !”

Ce mot, si dur, arrêta les larmes de Clémence. Elle se planta devant la fenêtre, et y restait immobile, le front posé contre le carreau.

Son attitude et son mutisme agaçaient Deslauriers.

— “Quand tu auras fini, tu commanderas ton carrosse, n'est-ce pas !”

Elle se retourna en sursaut.

— “Tu me renvoies !”

— “Parfaitement !”

Elle fixa sur lui ses grands yeux bleus, pour une dernière prière sans doute, puis croisa les deux bouts de son tartan, attendit une minute encore et s'en alla.

— “Tu devrais la rappeler”, dit Frédéric.

— “Allons donc !”

Et, comme il avait besoin de sortir, Deslauriers passa dans sa cuisine, qui était son cabinet de toilette. Il y avait sur la dalle, près d’une paire de bottes, les débris d’un maigre déjeuner, et un matelas avec une couverture était roulé par terre dans un coin.

— “Ceci te démontre”, dit-il, “que je reçois peu de marquises ! On s’en passe aisément, va ! et des autres aussi. Celles qui ne coûtent rien prennent votre temps ; c’est de l’argent sous une autre forme ; or, je ne suis pas riche ! Et puis elles sont toutes si bêtes ! si bêtes ! Est-ce que tu peux causer avec une femme, toi ?” Ils se séparèrent à l’angle du pont Neuf.

— “Ainsi, c’est convenu ! tu m’apporteras la chose demain, dès que tu l’auras.”

— “Convenu !” dit Frédéric.

Le lendemain à son réveil, il reçut par la poste un bon de quinze mille francs sur la Banque.

Ce chiffon de papier lui représenta quinze gros sacs d’argent ; et il se dit qu’avec une somme pareille, il pourrait : d’abord garder sa voiture pendant trois ans, au lieu de la vendre comme il y serait forcé prochainement, ou s’acheter deux belles armures damasquinées qu’il avait vues sur le quai Voltaire, puis quantité de choses encore, des peintures, des livres et combien de bouquets de fleurs, de cadeaux pour Mme Arnoux ! Tout, enfin, aurait mieux valu que de risquer, que de perdre tant d’argent dans ce journal ! Deslauriers lui semblait présomptueux, son insensibilité de la veille le refroidissant à son endroit, et Frédéric s’abandonnait à ces regrets quand il fut tout surpris de voir entrer Arnoux, — lequel s’assit sur le bord de sa couche, pesamment, comme un homme accablé.

— “Qu’y a-t-il donc ?”

— “Je suis perdu !”

Il avait à verser, le jour même, en l’étude de Me Beauminet, notaire rue Sainte-Anne, dix-huit mille francs, prêtés par un certain Vanneroy.

— “C’est un désastre inexplicable ! Je lui ai donné une hypothèque qui devait le tranquilliser, pourtant ! Mais il me menace d’un commandement, s’il n’est pas payé cette après-midi, tantôt !”

— “Et alors ?”

— “Alors, c’est bien simple ! Il va faire exproprier mon immeuble.

La première affiche me ruine, voilà tout ! Ah ! si je trouvais quelqu'un pour m'avancer cette maudite somme-là, il prendrait la place de Vanneroy et je serais sauvé ! Vous ne l'auriez pas, par hasard ?”

Le mandat était resté sur la table de nuit, près d'un livre. Frédéric souleva le volume et le posa par-dessus, en répondant :

— “Mon Dieu, non, cher ami !”

Mais il lui coûtait de refuser à Arnoux.

— “Comment, vous ne trouvez personne qui veuille... ?”

— “Personne ! et songer que, d'ici à huit jours, j'aurai des rentrées ! On me doit peut-être... cinquante mille francs pour la fin du mois !”

— “Est-ce que vous ne pourriez pas prier les individus qui vous doivent d'avancer... ?”

— “Ah, bien, oui !”

— “Mais vous avez des valeurs quelconques, des billets ?”

— “Rien !”

— “Que faire ?” dit Frédéric.

— “C'est ce que je me demande”, reprit Arnoux.

Il se tut. et il marchait dans la chambre de long en large.

— “Ce n'est pas pour moi, mon Dieu ! mais pour mes enfants, pour ma pauvre femme !”

Puis, en détachant chaque mot :

— “Enfin... je serai fort.... j'emballerai tout cela... et j'irai chercher fortune... je ne sais où — ” Impossible ! ” s'écria Frédéric.

Arnoux répliqua d'un air calme :

— “Comment voulez-vous que je vive à Paris. maintenant ?”

Il y eut un long silence.

Frédéric se mit à dire :

— “Quand le rendriez-vous, cet argent ?”

Non pas qu'il l'eût ; au contraire ! Mais rien ne l'empêchait de voir des amis, de faire des démarches. Et il sonna son domestique pour s'habiller. Arnoux le remerciait.

— “C'est dix-huit mille francs qu'il vous faut, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Oh ! je me contenterais bien de seize mille ! Car j'en ferai bien deux mille cinq cents. trois mille avec mon argenterie, si Vanneroy. toutefois. m'accorde jusqu'à demain ; et, je vous le répète, vous pouvez affirmer, jurer au prêteur que. dans huit jours. peut-être même dans cinq ou six, l'argent sera remboursé. D'ailleurs, l'hypothèque en répond. Ainsi, pas de danger, vous comprenez ?”

Frédéric assura qu’il comprenait et qu’il allait sortir immédiatement.

Il resta chez lui, maudissant Deslauriers, car il voulait tenir sa parole, et cependant obliger Arnoux.

— “Si je m’adressais à M. Dambreuse ? Mais sous quel prétexte demander de l’argent ? C’est à moi, au contraire, d’en porter chez lui pour ses actions de houilles ! Ah ! qu’il aille se promener avec ses actions ! Je ne les dois pas !”

Et Frédéric s’applaudissait de son indépendance, comme s’il eût refusé un service à M. Dambreuse.

— “Eh bien”, se dit-il ensuite, “puisque je fais une perte de ce côté-là car je pourrais, avec quinze mille francs, en gagner cent mille ! A la Bourse, ça se voit quelquefois... Donc, puisque je manque à l’un, ne suis-je libre ?... D’ailleurs, quand Deslauriers attendrait ! — Non, non, c’est mal, allons-y !”

Il regarda sa pendule.

— “Ah ! rien ne presse ! la Banque ne ferme qu’à cinq heures.”

Et, à quatre heures et demie, quand il eut touché son argent :

— “C’est inutile, maintenant ! Je ne le trouverais pas j’irai ce soir !” se donnant ainsi le moyen de revenir sur sa décision, car il reste toujours dans la conscience quelque chose des sophismes qu’on y a versés ; elle en garde l’arrière-goût, comme d’une liqueur mauvaise.

Il se promena sur les boulevards, et dîna seul au restaurant. Puis il entendit un acte au Vaudeville, pour se distraire. Mais ses billets de banque le gênaient, comme s’il les eût volés. Il n’aurait pas été chagrin de les perdre.

En rentrant chez lui, il trouva une lettre contenant ces mots :

" Quoi de neuf ?

Ma femme se joint à moi, cher ami, dans l’espérance, etc.

A vous "

Et un parafe.

— “Sa femme ! elle me prie !”

Au même moment, parut Arnoux, pour savoir s’il avait trouvé la somme urgente.

— “Tenez, la voilà !” dit Frédéric.

Et, vingt-quatre heures après, il répondit à Deslauriers :

— “Je n’ai rien reçu.”

L’Avocat revint trois jours de suite. Il le pressait d’écrire au notaire. Il offrit même de faire le voyage du Havre.

— “Non c’est inutile je vais y aller !”

La semaine finie, Frédéric demanda timidement au sieur Arnoux ses quinze mille francs.

Arnoux le remit au lendemain, puis au surlendemain. Frédéric se risquait dehors à la nuit close, craignant d’être surpris par Deslauriers.

Un soir, quelqu’un le heurta au coin de la Madeleine. C’était lui.

— “Je vais les chercher”, dit-il.

Et Deslauriers J’accompagna jusqu’à la porte d’une maison, dans le faubourg Poissonnière.

— “Attends-moi.”

Il attendit. Enfin, après quarante-trois minutes, Frédéric sortit avec Arnoux, et lui fit signe de patienter encore un peu. Le marchand de faïences et son compagnon montèrent, bras dessus, bras dessous, la rue Hauteville, prirent ensuite la rue de Chabrol.

La nuit était sombre, avec des rafales de vent tiède. Arnoux marchait doucement, tout en parlant des Galeries du Commerce : une suite de passages couverts qui auraient mené du boulevard Saint-Denis au Châtelet, spéculation merveilleuse, où il avait grande envie d’entrer ; et il s’arrêtait de temps à autre, pour voir aux carreaux des boutiques la figure des grisettes, puis reprenait son discours.

Frédéric entendait les pas de Deslauriers derrière lui, comme des reproches, comme des coups frappant sur sa conscience. Mais il n’osait faire sa réclamation, par mauvaise honte, et dans la crainte qu’elle ne fût inutile. L’autre se rapprochait. Il se décida.

Arnoux, d’un ton fort dégagé, dit que, ses recouvrements n’ayant pas eu lieu, il ne pouvait rendre actuellement les quinze mille francs.

— “Vous n’en avez pas besoin, j’imagine ?”

A ce moment, Deslauriers accosta Frédéric, et, le tirant à l’écart :

— “Sois franc, les as-tu, oui ou non ?”

— “Eh bien, non !” dit Frédéric, “Je les ai perdus !”

— “Ah ! et à quoi ?”

— “Au jeu !”

Deslauriers ne répondit pas un mot, salua très bas, et partit. Arnoux avait profité de l’occasion pour allumer un cigare dans un débit de tabac. Il revint en demandant quel était ce jeune homme.

— “Rien ! un ami !”

Puis, trois minutes après, devant la porte de Rosanette :

— “Montez donc”, dit Arnoux, “elle sera contente de vous voir.

Quel sauvage vous êtes maintenant !”

Un réverbère, en face, l'éclairait ; et avec son cigare entre ses dents blanches et son air heureux, il avait quelque chose d'intolérable.

— “Ah ! à propos, mon notaire a été ce matin chez le vôtre, pour cette inscription d'hypothèque. C'est ma femme qui me l'a rappelé.”

— “Une femme de tête !” reprit machinalement Frédéric.

— “Je crois bien !”

Et Arnoux recommença son éloge. Elle n'avait pas sa pareille pour l'esprit, le cœur, l'économie ; il ajouta d'une voix basse, en roulant des yeux :

— “Et comme corps de femme !”

— “Adieu !” dit Frédéric.

Arnoux fit un mouvement.

— “Tiens ! pourquoi ?”

Et, la main à demi tendue vers lui, il l'examinait, tout décontenancé par la colère de son visage.

Frédéric répliqua sèchement :

— “Adieu !”

Il descendit la rue de Bréda comme une pierre qui déroule, furieux contre Arnoux, se faisant le serment de ne jamais plus le revoir, ni elle non plus, navré, désolé. Au lieu de la rupture qu'il attendait, voilà que l'autre, au contraire, se mettait à la chérir et complètement, depuis le bout des cheveux jusqu'au fond de l'âme. La vulgarité de cet homme exaspérait Frédéric. Tout lui appartenait donc, à celui-là ! Il le retrouvait sur le seuil de la lorette ; et la mortification d'une rupture s'ajoutait à la rage de son impuissance. D'ailleurs, l'honnêteté d'Arnoux offrant des garanties pour son argent l'humiliait ; il aurait voulu l'étrangler et par-dessus son chagrin planait dans sa conscience, comme un brouillard, le sentiment de sa lâcheté envers son ami. Des larmes l'étouffaient.

Deslauriers dévalait la rue des Martyrs, en jurant tout haut d'indignation ; car son projet, tel qu'un obélisque abattu, lui paraissait maintenant d'une hauteur extraordinaire. Il s'estimait volé, comme s'il avait subi un grand dommage. Son amitié pour Frédéric était morte, et il en éprouvait de la joie ; c'était une compensation ! Une haine l'envahit contre les riches. Il pencha vers les opinions de Sénécals et se promettait de les servir.

Arnoux, pendant ce temps-là, commodément assis dans une bergère, auprès du feu, humait sa tasse de thé, en tenant la Maréchale sur ses genoux.

Frédéric ne retourna point chez eux ; et, pour se distraire de sa passion calamiteuse, adoptant le premier sujet qui se présenta, il résolut de composer une Histoire de la Renaissance. Il entassa pêle-mêle sur sa table les humanistes, les philosophes et les poètes ; il allait au cabinet des estampes, voir les gravures de Marc-Antoine ; il tâchait d'entendre Machiavel. Peu à peu, la sérénité du travail l'apaisa. En plongeant dans la personnalité des autres, il oublia la sienne, ce qui est la seule manière peut-être de n'en pas souffrir.

Un jour qu'il prenait des notes, tranquillement, la porte s'ouvrit et le domestique annonça Mme Arnoux.

C'était bien elle ! seule ? Mais non ! car elle tenait par la main le petit Eugène, suivi de sa bonne en tablier blanc. Elle s'assit ; et, quand elle eut toussé :

— "Il y a longtemps que vous n'êtes venu à la maison."

Frédéric ne trouvant pas d'excuse, elle ajouta :

— "C'est une délicatesse de votre part !"

Il reprit :

— "Quelle délicatesse ?"

— "Ce que vous avez fait pour Arnoux !" dit-elle.

Frédéric eut un geste signifant :

— "Je m'en moque bien c'était pour vous !"

Elle envoya son enfant jouer avec la bonne, dans le salon. Ils échangèrent deux ou trois mots sur leur santé, puis l'entretien tomba.

Elle portait une robe de soie brune, de la couleur d'un vin d'Espagne, avec un paletot de velours noir, bordé de martre ; cette fourrure donnait envie de passer les mains dessus, et ses longs bandeaux, bien lissés, attiraient les lèvres. Mais une émotion la troublait, et, tournant les yeux du côté de la porte :

— "Il fait un peu chaud, ici !"

Frédéric devina l'intention prudente de son regard.

— “Pardon ! les deux battants ne sont que poussés.”

— “Ah ! c’est vrai !”

Et elle sourit, comme pour dire : “Je ne crains rien.” Il lui demanda immédiatement ce qui l’amenait. — “Mon mari”, reprit-elle avec effort, “m’a engagée à venir chez vous, n’osant faire cette démarche lui-même.”

— “Et pourquoi ?”

— “Vous connaissez M. Dambreuse, n’est-ce pas ?”

— “Oui, un peu !”

— “Ah ! un peu.”

Elle se taisait.

— “N’importe ! achevez.”

Alors, elle conta que l’avant-veille, Arnoux n’avait pu payer quatre billets de mille francs souscrits à l’ordre du banquier, et sur lesquels il lui avait fait mettre sa signature. Elle se repentait d’avoir compromis la fortune de ses enfants. Mais tout valait mieux que le déshonneur ; et, si M. Dambreuse arrêta les poursuites, on le payerait bientôt, certainement ; car elle allait vendre, à Chartres, une petite maison qu’elle avait.

— “Pauvre femme !” murmura Frédéric.

— “J’irai compter sur moi.”

— “Merci !”

Et elle se leva pour partir.

— “Oh ! rien ne vous presse encore !”

Elle resta debout, examinant le trophée de flèches mongoles suspendu au plafond, la bibliothèque, les reliures, tous les ustensiles pour écrire ; elle souleva la cuvette de bronze qui contenait les plumes ; ses talons se posèrent à des places différentes sur le tapis. Elle était venue plusieurs fois chez Frédéric, mais toujours avec Arnoux.

Ils se trouvaient seuls, maintenant, — seuls, dans sa propre maison ; — c’était un événement extraordinaire, presque une bonne fortune.

Elle voulut voir son jardinet ; il lui offrit le bras pour lui montrer ses domaines, trente pieds de terrain, enclos par des maisons, ornés d’arbustes dans les angles et d’une plate-bande au milieu.

On était aux premiers jours d’avril. Les feuilles des lilas verdoyaient déjà, un souffle pur se roulait dans l’air, et de petits oiseaux pépiaient, alternant leur chanson avec le bruit lointain que faisait la forge d'un carrossier.

Frédéric alla chercher une pelle à feu ; et, tandis qu'ils se promenaient côte à côte, l'enfant élevait des tas de sable dans l'allée.

Mme Arnoux ne croyait pas qu'il eût plus tard une grande imagination, mais il était d'humeur caressante. Sa sœur, au contraire, avait une sécheresse naturelle qui la blessait quelquefois.

— "Cela changera", dit Frédéric. "Il ne faut jamais désespérer."

Elle répliqua :

— "Il ne faut jamais désespérer."

Cette répétition machinale de sa phrase lui parut une sorte d'encouragement ; il cueillit une rose, la seule du jardin.

— "Vous rappelez-vous... un certain bouquet de roses, un soir, en voiture ?"

Elle rougit quelque peu ; et, avec un air de compassion railleuse :

— "Ah ! j'étais bien jeune !"

— "Et celle-là", reprit à voix basse Frédéric, "en sera-t-il de même ?"

Elle répondit, tout en faisant tourner la tige entre ses doigts, comme le fil d'un fuseau :

— "Non ! je la garderai !"

Elle appela d'un geste la bonne, qui prit l'enfant sur son bras : puis, au seuil de la porte, dans la rue, Mme Arnoux aspira la fleur, en inclinant la tête sur son épaule, et avec un regard aussi doux qu'un baiser.

Quand il fut remonté dans son cabinet, il contempla le fauteuil où elle s'était assise et tous les objets qu'elle avait touchés. Quelque chose d'elle circulait autour de lui. La caresse de sa présence durait encore. — "Elle est donc venue là !" se disait-il.

Et les flots d'une tendresse infinie le submergeaient.

Le lendemain, à onze heures, il se présenta chez M. Dambreuse. On le reçut dans la salle à manger. Le banquier déjeunait en face de sa femme. Sa nièce était près d'elle, et de l'autre côté l'institutrice, une Anglaise, fortement marquée de petite vérole.

M. Dambreuse invita son jeune ami à prendre place au milieu d'eux, et, sur son refus : — "A quoi puis-je vous être bon ? Je vous écoute." Frédéric avoua, en affectant de l'indifférence, qu'il venait faire une requête pour un certain Arnoux.

— “Ah ! ah ! l’ancien marchand de tableaux”, dit le banquier, avec un rire muet découvrant ses gencives.

“Oudry le garantissait, autrefois ; on s’est fâché.”

Et il se mit à parcourir les lettres et les journaux posés près de son couvert.

Deux domestiques servaient, sans faire de bruit sur le parquet — , et la hauteur de la salle, qui avait trois portières en tapisserie et deux fontaines de marbre blanc, le poli des réchauds, la disposition des hors-d’œuvre, et jusqu’aux plis raides des serviettes, tout ce bien-être luxueux établissait dans la pensée de Frédéric un contraste avec un autre déjeuner chez Arnoux. Il n’osait interrompre M. Dambreuse.

Madame remarqua son embarras.

— “Voyez-vous quelquefois notre ami Martinon ?”

— “Il viendra ce soir”, dit vivement la jeune fille.

— “Ah ! tu le sais ?” répliqua sa tante, en arrêtant sur elle un regard froid.

Puis, un des valets s’étant penché à son oreille :

— “Ta couturière, mon enfant !... miss John !”

Et l’institutrice, obéissante, disparut avec son élève.

M. Dambreuse, troublé par le dérangement des chaises, demanda ce qu’il y avait.

— “C’est Mme Regimbart.”

— “Tiens ! Regimbart ! Je connais ce nom-là. J’ai rencontré sa signature.”

Frédéric aborda enfin la question ; Arnoux méritait de l’intérêt ; il allait même, dans le seul but de remplir ses engagements, vendre une maison à sa femme.

— “Elle passe pour très jolie”, dit Mme Dambreuse.

Le banquier ajouta d’un air bonhomme :

— “Etes-vous leur ami... intime ?”

Frédéric, sans répondre nettement, dit qu’il lui serait fort obligé de prendre en considération...

— “Eh bien, puisque cela vous fait plaisir, soit ! on attendra ! J’ai du temps encore. Si nous descendions dans mon bureau, voulez-vous ?”

Le déjeuner était fini ; Mme Dambreuse s’inclina légèrement, tout en souriant d’un rire singulier, plein à la fois de politesse et d’ironie.

Frédéric n'eut pas le temps d'y réfléchir ; car M. Dambreuse, dès qu'ils furent seuls :

— “Vous n'êtes pas venu chercher vos actions.” Et, sans lui permettre de s'excuser : — “Bien ! bien ! il est juste que vous connaissiez l'affaire un peu mieux.”

Il lui offrit une cigarette et commença.

L'Union générale des Houilles françaises était constituée ; on n'attendait plus que l'ordonnance. Le fait seul de la fusion diminuait les frais de surveillance et de main-d'œuvre, augmentait les bénéfices. De plus, la Société imaginait une chose nouvelle, qui était d'intéresser les ouvriers à son entreprise. Elle leur bâtirait des maisons, des logements salubres ; enfin elle se constituait le fournisseur de ses employés, leur livrait tout à prix de revient.

— “Et ils gagneront, monsieur ; voilà du véritable progrès — , c'est répondre victorieusement à certaines criaileries républicaines ! Nous avons dans notre conseil”, il exhiba le prospectus, “un pair de France, un savant de l'Institut, un officier supérieur du génie en retraite, des noms connus ! De pareils éléments rassurent les capitaux craintifs et appellent les capitaux intelligents !” La Compagnie aurait pour elle les commandes de l'Etat, puis les chemins de fer, la marine à vapeur, les établissements métallurgiques, le gaz, les cuisines bourgeoises. “Ainsi, nous chauffons, nous éclairons, nous pénétrons jusqu'au foyer des plus humbles ménages. Mais comment, me direz-vous, pourrons-nous assurer la vente ? Grâce à des droits protecteurs, cher monsieur, et nous les obtiendrons ; cela nous regarde ! Moi, du reste, je suis franchement prohibitionniste ! le Pays avant tout !” On l'avait nommé directeur ; mais le temps lui manquait pour s'occuper de certains détails. de la rédaction entre autres. “Je suis un peu brouillé avec mes auteurs, j'ai oublié mon grec ! J'aurais besoin de quelqu'un... qui pût traduire mes idées.” Et tout à coup : “Voulez-vous être cet homme-là, avec le titre de secrétaire général ?” Frédéric ne sut que répondre.

— “Eh bien, qui vous empêche ?”

Ses fonctions se borneraient à écrire, tous les ans. un rapport pour les actionnaires. Il se trouverait en relations quotidiennes avec les hommes les plus considérables de Paris. Représentant la Compagnie près les ouvriers, il s'en ferait adorer, naturellement, ce qui lui permettrait, plus tard, de se pousser au Conseil général, à la députation.

Les oreilles de Frédéric tintaient. D'où provenait cette bienveillance ? Il se confondit en remerciements.

Mais il ne fallait point, dit le banquier, qu'il fût dépendant de personne. Le meilleur moyen, c'était de prendre des actions, "placement superbe d'ailleurs. car votre capital garantit votre position, comme votre position votre capital."

— "A combien, environ, doit-il se monter ?" dit Frédéric.

— "Mon Dieu ! ce qui vous plaira ; de quarante à soixante mille francs, je suppose."

Cette somme était si minime pour M. Dambreuse et son autorité si grande, que le jeune homme se décida immédiatement à vendre une ferme. Il acceptait. M. Dambreuse fixerait un de ces jours un rendez-vous pour terminer leurs arrangements.

— "Ainsi, je puis dire à Jacques Arnoux... ?"

— "Tout ce que vous voudrez ! le pauvre garçon ! Tout ce que vous voudrez !"

Frédéric écrivit aux Arnoux de se tranquilliser, et il fit porter la lettre par son domestique auquel on répondit :

— "Très bien !"

Sa démarche, cependant, méritait mieux. Il s'attendait à une visite, à une lettre tout au moins. Il ne reçut pas de visite. Aucune lettre n'arriva.

Y avait-il oublié de leur part ou intention ? Puisque Mme Arnoux était venue une fois, qui l'empêchait de revenir ? L'espèce de sous-entendu, d'aveu qu'elle lui avait fait, n'était donc qu'une manœuvre exécutée par intérêt ? "Se sont-ils joués de moi ? est-elle complice ?" Une sorte de pudeur, malgré son envie, l'empêchait de retourner chez eux.

Un matin (trois semaines après leur entrevue), M. Dambreuse lui écrivit qu'il l'attendait le jour même, dans une heure.

En route, l'idée des Arnoux l'assaillit de nouveau ; et, ne découvrant point de raison à leur conduite, il fut pris par une angoisse, un pressentiment funèbre. Pour s'en débarrasser, il appela un cabriolet et se fit conduire rue Paradis.

Arnoux était en voyage.

— "Et Madame ?"

— “A la campagne, à la fabrique !”

— “Quand revient Monsieur ?”

— “Demain, sans faute !”

Il la trouverait seule ; c’était le moment. Quelque chose d’impérieux criait dans sa conscience : “Vas-y donc !” Mais M. Dambreuse ? “Eh bien, tant pis ! Je dirai que j’étais malade.” Il courut à la gare ; puis, dans le wagon “J’ai eu tort, peut-être ? Ah bah ! qu’importe.”

A droite et à gauche, des plaines vertes s’étendaient le convoi roulait ; les maisonnettes des stations glissaient comme des décors, et la fumée de la locomotive versait toujours du même côté ses gros flocons qui dansaient sur l’herbe quelque temps, puis se dispersaient.

Frédéric, seul sur sa banquette, regardait cela, par ennui, perdu dans cette langueur que donne l’excès même de l’impatience. Mais des grues, des magasins, parurent.

C’était Creil.

La ville, construite au versant de deux collines basses (dont la première est nue et la seconde couronnée par un bois), avec la tour de son église, ses maisons inégales et son pont de pierre, lui semblait avoir quelque chose de gai, de discret et de bon. Un grand bateau plat descendait au fil de l’eau, qui clapotait fouettée par le vent ; des poules, au pied du calvaire, picoraient dans la paille ; une femme passa, portant du linge mouillé sur la tête.

Après le pont, il se trouva dans une île, où l’on voit sur la droite les ruines d’une abbaye. Un moulin tournait, barrant dans toute sa largeur le second bras de l’Oise, que surplombe la manufacture. L’importance de cette construction étonna grandement Frédéric. Il en conçut plus de respect pour Arnoux. Trois pas plus loin, il prit une ruelle, terminée au fond par une grille.

Il était entré. La concierge le rappela en lui criant :

— “Avez-vous une permission ?”

— “Pourquoi ?”

— “Pour visiter l’établissement !”

Frédéric, d’un ton brutal, dit qu’il venait voir M. Arnoux.

— “Qu’est-ce que c’est que M. Arnoux ?”

— “Mais le chef, le maître, le propriétaire, enfin !”

— “Non, monsieur, c’est ici la fabrique de MM. Lebœuf et Milliet !”

La bonne femme plaisait sans doute. Des ouvriers arrivaient ; il en aborda deux ou trois — , leur réponse fut la même.

Frédéric sortit de la cour, en chancelant comme un homme ivre ; et il avait l’air tellement ahuri que, sur le pont de la Boucherie, un bourgeois en train de fumer sa pipe lui demanda s’il cherchait quelque chose. Celui-là connaissait la manufacture d’Arnoux. Elle était située à Montataire.

Frédéric s’enquit d’une voiture, on n’en trouvait qu’à la gare. Il y retourna. Une calèche disloquée, attelée d’un vieux cheval dont les harnais décousus pendaient dans les brancards, stationnait devant le bureau des bagages, solitairement.

Un gamin s’offrit à découvrir “le père Pilon” . Il revint au bout de dix minutes ; le père Pilon déjeunait. Frédéric, n’y tenant plus, partit. Mais la barrière du passage était close. Il fallut attendre que deux convois eussent défilé, Enfin il se précipita dans la campagne.

La verdure monotone la faisait ressembler à un immense tapis de billard. Des scories de fer étaient rangées, sur les deux bords de la route, comme des mètres de cailloux. Un peu plus loin, des cheminées d’usine fumaient les unes près des autres. En face de lui se dressait sur une colline ronde, un petit château à tourelles, avec le clocher quadrangulaire d’une église. De longs murs, en dessous, formaient des lignes irrégulières parmi les arbres ; et, tout en bas, les maisons du village s’étendaient.

Elles sont à un seul étage, avec des escaliers de trois marches, faites de blocs sans ciment. On entendait, par intervalles, la sonnette d’un épicier. Des pas lourds s’enfonçaient dans la boue noire, et une pluie fine tombait, coupant de mille hachures le ciel pâle.

Frédéric suivit le milieu du pavé ; puis il rencontra sur sa gauche, à l’entrée d’un chemin, un grand arc de bois qui portait écrit en lettres d’or : FAIENCES.

Ce n’était pas sans but que Jacques Arnoux avait choisi le voisinage de Creil ; en plaçant sa manufacture le plus près possible de l’autre (accréditée depuis longtemps), il provoquait dans le public une confusion favorable à ses intérêts.

Le principal corps de bâtiment s’appuyait sur le bord même d’une rivière qui traverse la prairie. La maison de maître, entourée d’un jardin, se distinguait par son perron, orné de quatre vases où se hérissaient des cactus. Des amas de terre blanche séchaient sous des hangars ; il y en avait d'autres à l'air libre ; et au milieu de la cour se tenait Sénécal, avec son éternel paletot bleu, doublé de rouge.

L'ancien répétiteur tendit sa main froide.

— “Vous venez pour le patron ? Il n'est pas là.”

Frédéric, décontenancé, répondit bêtement :

— “Je le savais.” Mais, se reprenant aussitôt : “C' est pour une affaire qui concerne Mme Arnoux. Peut-elle me recevoir ?”

— “Ah ! je ne l'ai pas vue depuis trois jours”, dit Sénécal.

Et il entama une kyrielle de plaintes. En acceptant les conditions du fabricant, il avait entendu demeurer à Paris, et non s'enfouir dans cette campagne, loin de ses amis, privé de journaux. N'importe ! il avait passé par là-dessus ! Mais Arnoux ne paraissait faire nulle attention à son mérite. Il était borné d'ailleurs, et rétrograde, ignorant comme pas un. Au lieu de chercher des perfectionnements artistiques, mieux aurait valu introduire des chauffages à la houille et au gaz. Le bourgeois s'enfonçait ; Sénécal appuya sur le mot. Bref, ses occupations lui déplaisaient ; et il somma presque Frédéric de parier en sa faveur, afin qu'on augmentât ses émoluments.

— “Soyez tranquille !” dit l'autre.

Il ne rencontra personne dans l'escalier. Au premier étage, il avança la tête dans une pièce vide ; c'était le salon. Il appela très haut. On ne répondit pas ; sans doute, la cuisinière était sortie, la bonne aussi ; enfin, parvenu au second étage, il poussa une porte. Mme Arnoux était seule, devant une armoire à glace. La ceinture de sa robe de chambre entrouverte pendait le long de ses hanches. Tout un côté de ses cheveux lui faisait un flot noir sur l'épaule droite ; et elle avait les deux bras levés, retenant d'une main son chignon, tandis que l'autre y enfonçait une épingle. Elle jeta un cri, et disparut.

Puis elle revint correctement habillée. Sa taille, ses yeux, le bruit de sa robe, tout l'enchantait. Frédéric se retenait pour ne pas la couvrir de baisers.

— “Je vous demande pardon”, dit-elle, “mais je ne pouvais...”

Il eut la hardiesse de l'interrompre :

— “Cependant.... vous étiez très bien... tout à l'heure.”

Elle trouva sans doute le compliment un peu grossier, car ses pommettes se colorèrent. Il craignait de l'avoir offensée. Elle reprit :

— “Par quel bon hasard êtes-vous venu ?”

ne sut que répondre ; et, après un petit ricanement qui lui donna le temps de réfléchir :

— “Si je vous le disais, me croiriez-vous ?”

— “Pourquoi pas ?”

Frédéric conta qu'il avait eu, l'autre nuit un songe affreux :

— “J'ai rêvé que vous étiez gravement malade, près de mourir.”

— “Oh ! ni moi, ni mon mari ne sommes jamais malades !”

— “Je n'ai rêvé que de vous”, dit-il.

Elle le regarda d'un air calme.

— “Les rêves ne se réalisent pas toujours.”

Frédéric balbutia. chercha ses mots, et se lança enfin dans une longue période sur l'affinité des âmes. Une force existait qui peut, à travers les espaces, mettre en rapport deux personnes, les avertir de ce qu'elles éprouvent et les faire se rejoindre.

Elle l'écoutait la tête basse, tout en souriant de son beau sourire. Il l'observait du coin de l'oeil, avec joie, et épanchait son amour plus librement sous la facilité d'un lieu commun. Elle proposa de lui montrer la fabrique ; et, comme elle insistait, il accepta.

Pour le distraire d'abord par quelque chose d'amusant, elle lui fit voir l'espèce de musée qui décorait l'escalier. Les spécimens accrochés contre les murs ou posés sur des planchettes attestaient les efforts et les engouements successifs d'Arnoux. Après avoir cherché le rouge de cuivre des Chinois, il avait voulu faire des majoliques, des faënza, de l'étrusque, de l'oriental, tenté enfin quelques-uns des perfectionnements réalisés plus tard. Aussi remarquait-on, dans la série, de gros vases couverts de mandarins, des écuelles d'un mordoré chatoyant, des pots rehaussés d'écritures arabes, des buires dans le goût de la Renaissance, et de larges assiettes avec deux personnages, qui étaient comme dessinés à la sanguine, d'une façon mignarde et vaporeuse. Il fabriquait maintenant des lettres d'enseigne. des étiquettes à vin ; mais son intelligence n'était pas assez haute pour atteindre jusqu'à l'Art. ni assez bourgeoise non plus pour viser exclusivement au profit, si bien que, sans contenter personne. il se ruinait. Tous deux considéraient ces choses. quand Mlle Marthe passa.

— “Tu ne le reconnais donc pas ?” lui dit sa mère.

— “Si fait !” reprit-elle en le saluant, tandis que son regard limpide et soupçonneux. son regard de vierge semblait murmurer : “Que viens-tu faire ici, toi ?” et elle montait les marches, la tête un peu tournée sur l’épaule.

Mme Arnoux emmena Frédéric dans la cour. puis elle expliqua d’un ton sérieux comment on broie les terres. on les nettoie, on les tamisé.

— “L’important, c’est la préparation des pâtes.”

Et elle l’introduisit dans une salle que remplissaient des cuves, où virait sur lui-même un axe vertical armé de bras horizontaux. Frédéric s’en voulait de n’avoir pas refusé nettement sa proposition, tout à l’heure.

— “Ce sont les patouillards”, dit-elle.

Il trouva le mot grotesque, et comme inconvenant dans sa bouche.

De larges courroies filaient d’un bout à l’autre du plafond, pour s’enrouler sur des tambours, et tout s’agitait d’une façon continue, mathématique, agaçante.

Ils sortirent de là, et passèrent près d’une cabane en ruines, qui avait autrefois servi à mettre des instruments de jardinage.

— “Elle n’est plus utile”, dit Mme Arnoux.

Il répliqua d’une voix tremblante — “Le bonheur peut y tenir !” Le tintamarre de la pompe à feu couvrit ses paroles, et ils entrèrent dans l’atelier des ébauchages.

Des hommes, assis à une table étroite, posaient devant eux, sur un disque tournant, une masse de pâte ; leur main gauche en raclait l’intérieur, leur droite en caressait la surface, et l’on voyait s’élever des vases, comme des fleurs qui s’épanouissent.

Mme Arnoux fit exhiber les moules pour les ouvrages plus difficiles.

Dans une autre pièce, on pratiquait les filets, les gorges, les lignes saillantes. A l’étage supérieur, on enlevait les coutures, et l’on bouchait avec du plâtre les petits trous que les opérations précédentes avaient laissés.

Sur des claires-voies, dans des coins, au milieu des corridors, partout s’alignaient des poteries.

Frédéric commençait à s’ennuyer.

— “Cela vous fatigue peut-être ?” dit-elle.

Craignant qu'il ne fallût borner là sa visite, il affecta, au contraire, beaucoup d'enthousiasme. Il regrettait même de ne s'être pas voué à cette industrie.

Elle parut surprise.

— “Certainement ! j'aurais pu vivre près de vous” Et, comme il cherchait son regard, Mme Arnoux, afin de l'éviter, prit sur une console des boulettes de pâte, provenant des rajustages manqués, les aplatit en une galette, et imprima dessus sa main.

— “Puis-je emporter cela ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Etes-vous assez enfant, mon Dieu” Il allait répondre, Sénécals entra.

M. le sous-directeur, dès le seuil, s'aperçut d'une infraction au règlement. Les ateliers devaient être balayés toutes les semaines ; on était au samedi, et, comme les ouvriers n'en avaient rien fait, Sénécals leur déclara qu'ils auraient à rester une heure de plus. “Tant pis pour vous !”

Ils se penchèrent sur leurs pièces, sans murmurer ; mais on devinait leur colère au souffle rauque de leur poitrine. Ils étaient, d'ailleurs, peu faciles à conduire, tous ayant été chassés de la grande fabrique. Le républicain les gouvernait durement. Homme de théories, il ne considérait que les masses et se montrait impitoyable pour les individus.

Frédéric, gêné par sa présence, demanda bas à Mme Arnoux s'il n'y avait pas moyen de voir les fours. Ils descendirent au rez-de-chaussée ; et elle était en train d'expliquer l'usage des cassettes, quand Sénécals, qui les avait suivis, s'interposa entre eux.

Il continua de lui-même la démonstration, s'étendit sur les différentes sortes de combustibles, l'enfournement, les pyroscopes, les alandiers, les engobes, les lustres et les métaux, prodiguant les termes de chimie, chlorure, sulfure, borax, carbonate. Frédéric n'y comprenait rien, et à chaque minute se retournait vers Mme Arnoux.

— “Vous n'écoutez pas”, dit-elle. “M. Sénécals pourtant est très clair. Il sait toutes ces choses beaucoup mieux que moi.”

Le mathématicien flatté de cet éloge, proposa de faire voir le posage des couleurs. Frédéric interrogea d'un regard anxieux Mme Arnoux. Elle demeura impassible, ne voulant sans doute ni être seule avec lui, ni le quitter cependant. Il lui offrit son bras.

— “Non ! merci bien ! l’escalier est trop étroit”

Et, quand ils furent en haut, Sénécal ouvrit la porte d’un appartement rempli de femmes.

Elles maniaient des pinceaux, des fioles, des coquilles, des plaques de verre. Le long de la corniche, contre le mur, s’alignaient des planches gravées ; des bribes de papier fin voltigeaient ; et un poêle de fonte exhalait une température écœurante, où se mêlait l’odeur de la térébenthine.

Les ouvrières, presque toutes, avaient des costumes sordides. On en remarquait une, cependant, qui portait un madras et de longues boucles d’oreilles. Tout à la fois mince et potelée, elle avait de gros yeux noirs et les lèvres charnues d’une négresse. Sa poitrine abondante saillissait sous sa chemise, tenue autour de sa taille par le cordon de sa jupe ; et, un coude sur l’établi, tandis que l’autre bras pendait, elle regardait vaguement, au loin dans la campagne. A côté d’elle traînaient une bouteille de vin et de la charcuterie.

Le règlement interdisait de manger dans les ateliers, mesure de propreté pour la besogne et d’hygiène pour les travailleurs.

Sénécal, par sentiment du devoir ou besoin de despotisme, s’écria de loin, en indiquant une affiche dans un cadre :

— “Hé ! là-bas, la Bordelaise ! lisez-moi tout haut l’article 9.”

— “Eh bien, après ?”

— “Après, mademoiselle ? C’est trois francs d’amende que vous payerez !”

Elle le regarda en face, impudemment.

— “Qu’est-ce que ça me fait ? Le patron à son retour, la lèvera votre amende ! Je me fiche de vous, mon bonhomme !”

Sénécal, qui se promenait les mains derrière le dos, comme un pion dans une salle d’études se contenta de sourire.

— “Article 13, insubordination, dix francs.”

La Bordelaise se remit à sa besogne. Mme Arnoux par convenance, ne disait rien, mais ses sourcils se froncèrent. Frédéric murmura :

— “Ah ! pour un démocrate, vous êtes bien dur !”

L’autre répondit magistralement :

— “La Démocratie n’est pas le dévergondage de l’individualisme. C’est le niveau commun sous la loi, la répartition du travail, l’ordre !”

— “Vous oubliez l’humanité !” dit Frédéric.

Mme Arnoux prit son bras ; Sénécal, offensé peut-être de cette approbation silencieuse, s'en alla.

Frédéric en ressentit un immense soulagement. Depuis le matin, il cherchait l'occasion de se déclarer ; elle était venue. D'ailleurs le mouvement spontané de Mme Arnoux lui semblait contenir des promesses ; et il demanda, comme pour se réchauffer les pieds, à monter dans sa chambre. Mais, quand il fut assis près d'elle, son embarras commença ; le point de départ lui manquait. Sénécal, heureusement, vint à sa pensée.

— “Rien de plus sot”, dit-il, “que cette punition”

Mme Arnoux reprit :

— “Il y a des sévérités indispensables.”

— “Comment, vous qui êtes si bonne ! Oh ! je me trompe car vous vous plaisez quelquefois à faire souffrir !”

— “Je ne comprends pas les énigmes, mon ami.”

Et son regard austère, plus encore que le mot, l'arrêta. Frédéric était déterminé à poursuivre. Un volume de Musset se trouvait par hasard sur la commode. Il en tourna quelques pages, puis se mit à parier de l'amour, de ses désespoirs et de ses emportements.

Tout cela, suivant Mme Arnoux, était criminel ou factice.

Le jeune homme se sentit blessé par cette négation et, pour la combattre, il cita en preuve les suicides qu'on voit dans les journaux, exalta les grands types littéraires, Phèdre, Didon, Roméo, Des Grieux. Il s'enfermait.

Le feu dans la cheminée ne brûlait plus, la pluie fouettait contre les vitres. Mme Arnoux, sans bouger, restait les deux mains sur les bras de son fauteuil ; les pattes de son bonnet tombaient comme les bandelettes d'un sphinx ; son profil pur se découpait en pâleur au milieu de l'ombre.

Il avait envie de se jeter à ses genoux. Un craquement se fit dans le couloir, il n'osa.

Il était empêché, d'ailleurs, par une sorte de crainte religieuse. Cette robe, se confondant avec les ténèbres, lui paraissait démesurée, infinie, insoulevable ; et précisément à cause de cela son désir redoublait. Mais, la peur de faire trop et de ne pas faire assez lui ôtait tout discernement.

— “Si je lui déplais”, pensait-il, — qu'elle me chasse ! Si elle veut de moi, qu'elle m'encourage ! "

Il dit en soupirant :

— "Donc, vous n'admettez pas qu'on puisse aimer...une femme ?"

M<sup>me</sup> Arnoux répliqua :

— "Quant elle est à marier, on l'épouse ; lorsqu'elle appartient à un autre, on s'éloigne."

— "Ainsi le bonheur est impossible ?"

— "Non ! Mais on ne le trouve jamais dans le mensonge, les inquiétudes et le remords."

— "Qu'importe ! s'il est payé par des joies sublimes."

— L'expérience est trop coûteuse. "

Il voulut l'attaquer par l'ironie.

— "La vertu ne serait donc que de la lâcheté ?"

— "Dites de la clairvoyance, plutôt. Pour celles même qui oublieraient le devoir ou la religion, le simple bon sens peut suffire. L'égoïsme fait une base Solide à la sagesse."

— "Ah quelles maximes bourgeoises vous avez !"

— "Mais je ne me vante pas d'être une grande dame !"

A ce moment-là, le petit garçon accourut.

— "Maman, viens-tu dîner ?"

— "Oui, tout à l'heure !"

Frédéric se leva ; en même temps Marthe parut.

Il ne pouvait se résoudre à s'en aller ; et, avec un regard tout plein de supplications :

— "Ces femmes dont vous parlez sont donc bien insensibles ?"

— "Non ! mais sourdes quand il le faut."

Et elle se tenait debout, sur le seuil de sa chambre, avec ses deux enfants à ses côtés. Il s'inclina sans dire un mot. Elle répondit silencieusement à son salut.

Ce qu'il éprouva d'abord, ce fut une stupéfaction infinie. Cette manière de lui faire comprendre l'vanité de son espoir l'écrasait. Il se sentait perdu comme un homme tombé au fond d'un abîme, qui sait qu'on ne le secourra pas et qu'il doit mourir.

Il marchait cependant, mais sans rien voir, au hasard il se heurtait contre les pierres ; il se trompa de chemin.

Un bruit de sabots retentit près de son oreille ; c'étaient les ouvriers qui sortaient de la fonderie. Alors il se reconnut.

A l'horizon les lanternes du chemin de fer traçaient une ligne de feux. Il arriva comme un convoi partait, se laissa pousser dans un wagon, et s'endormit.

Une heure après, sur les boulevards, la gaieté de Paris le soir recula tout à coup son voyage dans un passé déjà loin. Il voulut être fort, et allégea son cœur en dénigrant Mme Arnoux par des épithètes injurieuses :

— “C’est une imbécile, une dinde, une brute, n’y pensons plus !”

Rentré chez lui, il trouva dans son cabinet une lettre de huit pages sur papier à glaçure bleue et initiales R. A.

Cela commençait par des reproches amicaux :

“Que devenez-vous, mon cher ? je m’ennuie.”

Mais l’écriture était si abominable, que Frédéric allait rejeter tout le paquet quand il aperçut, en post-scriptum : “Je compte sur vous demain pour me conduire aux courses.”

Que signifiait cette invitation ? était-ce encore un tour de la Maréchale ? Mais on ne se moque pas deux fois du même homme à propos de rien ; et pris de curiosité, il relut la lettre attentivement.

Frédéric distingua : “Malentendu... avoir fait fausse route... désillusions... Pauvres enfants que nous sommes !... Pareils à deux fleuves qui se rejoignent ! etc.”

Ce style contrastait avec le langage ordinaire de la lorette. Quel changement était donc survenu ?

Il garda longtemps les feuilles entre ses doigts. Elles sentaient l’iris ; et il y avait, dans la forme des caractères et l’espacement irrégulier des lignes, comme un désordre de toilette qui le troubla.

— “Pourquoi n’irais-je pas ?” se dit-il enfin. “Mais si Mme Arnoux le savait ? Ah ! qu’elle le sache ! Tant mieux et qu’elle en soit jalouse ça me vengera !”

IV

La Maréchale était prête et l’attendait.

— “C’est gentil, cela !” dit-elle, en fixant sur lui ses jolis yeux, à la fois tendres et gais.

Quand elle eut fait le nœud de sa capote, elle s’assit sur le divan et resta silencieuse.

— “Partons-nous ?” dit Frédéric.

Elle regarda la pendule.

— “Oh ! non ! pas avant une heure et demie”, comme si elle eût posé en elle-même cette limite à son incertitude.

Enfin l’heure ayant sonné :

— “Eh bien, andiamo, caro mio !”

Et elle donna un dernier tour à ses bandeaux, fit des recommandations à Delphine.

— “Madame revient dîner ?”

— “Pourquoi donc ? Nous dînerons ensemble quelque part, au café Anglais, où vous voudrez !”

— “Soit !”

Ses petits chiens jappaient autour d’elle.

— “On peut les emmener, n’est-ce pas ?”

Frédéric les porta, lui-même, jusqu’à la voiture. C’était une berline de louage avec deux chevaux de poste et un postillon ; il avait mis sur le siège de derrière son domestique. La Maréchale parut satisfaite de ses prévenances ; puis, dès qu’elle fut assise, lui demanda s’il avait été chez Arnoux, dernièrement.

— “Pas depuis un mois”, dit Frédéric.

La Maréchale était prête et l'attendait.

Frédéric les porta, lui-même, jusqu’à la voiture. C’était une berline de louage avec deux chevaux de poste et un postillon ; il avait mis sur le siège de derrière son domestique. La Maréchale parut satisfaite de ses prévenances ; puis, dès qu’elle fut assise, lui demanda s’il avait été chez Arnoux, dernièrement.

— “Pas depuis un mois”, dit Frédéric.

— “Moi, je l’ai rencontré avant-hier, il serait même venu aujourd’hui. Mais il a toutes sortes d’embarras, encore un procès, je ne sais quoi. Quel drôle d’homme !”

— “Oui ! très drôle !”

Frédéric ajouta d’un air indifférent :

— “A propos, voyez-vous toujours... comment donc l’appellez-vous ?... cet ancien chanteur... Delmar ?”

Elle répliqua sèchement :

— “Non ! c’est fini.”

Ainsi, leur rupture était certaine. Frédéric en conçut de l’espoir.

Ils descendirent au pas le quartier Bréda ; les rues, à cause du dimanche, étaient désertes, et des figures de bourgeois apparaissaient derrière des fenêtres. La voiture prit un train plus rapide ; le bruit des roues faisait se retourner les passants, le cuir de la capote rabattue brillait, le domestique se cambrait la taille, et les deux havanais l’un près de l’autre semblaient deux manchons d’hermine, posés sur les coussins. Frédéric se laissait aller au bercement des soupentes. La Maréchale tournait la tête, à droite et à gauche, en souriant.

Son chapeau de paille nacrée avait une garniture de dentelle noire. Le capuchon de son burnous flottait au vent ; et elle s’abritait du soleil, sous une ombrelle de satin lilas, pointue par le haut comme une pagode.

— “Quels amours de petits doigts !” dit Frédéric, en lui prenant doucement l’autre main, la gauche ornée d’un bracelet d’or, en forme de gourmette. “Tiens, c’est mignon ; d’où cela vient-il ?”

— “Oh ! il y a longtemps que je l’ai”, dit la Maréchale.

Le jeune homme n’objecta rien à cette réponse hypocrite. Il aimait mieux “profiter de la circonstance”. Et, lui tenant toujours le poignet, il appuya dessus ses lèvres. entre le gant et la manchette.

— “Finissez, on va nous voir !”

— “Bah ! qu’est-ce que cela fait !”

Après la place de la Concorde, ils prirent par le quai de la Conférence et le quai de Billy, où l’on remarque un cèdre dans un jardin. Rosanette croyait le Liban situé en Chine ; elle rit elle-même de son ignorance et pria Frédéric de lui donner des leçons de géographie. Puis, laissant à droite le Trocadéro ils traversèrent le pont d’Iéna, et s’arrêtèrent enfin, au milieu du Champ de Mars, près des autres voitures, déjà rangées dans l’Hippodrome.

Les tertres de gazon étaient couverts de menu peuple. On apercevait des curieux sur le balcon de l’Ecole Militaire ; et les deux pavillons en dehors du pesage, les deux tribunes comprises dans son enceinte, et une troisième devant celle du Roi se trouvaient remplies d’une foule en toilette qui témoignait, par son maintien, de la révérence pour ce divertissement encore nouveau. Le public des courses, plus spécial dans ce temps-là, avait un aspect moins vulgaire ; c’était l’époque des sous-pieds, des collets de velours et des gants blancs. Les femmes, vêtues de couleurs brillantes, portaient des robes à taille longue, et assises sur les gradins des estrades, elles faisaient comme de grands massifs de fleurs, tachetés de noir, çà et là, par les sombres costumes des hommes. Mais tous les regards se tournaient vers le célèbre Algérien Bou-Maza, qui se tenait impassible, entre deux officiers d'état-major, dans une des tribunes particulières. Celle du Jockey — Club contenait exclusivement des messieurs graves.

Les plus enthousiastes s'étaient placés, en bas, contre la piste, défendue par deux lignes de bâtons supportant des cordes ; dans l'ovale immense que décrivait cette allée, des marchands de coco agitaient leur crécelle, d'autres vendaient le programme des courses, d'autres criaient des cigares, un vaste bourdonnement s'élevait ; les gardes municipaux passaient et repassaient ; une cloche, suspendue à un poteau couvert de chiffres, tinta. Cinq chevaux parurent, et on rentra dans les tribunes.

Cependant, de gros nuages effleuraient de leurs volutes la cime des ormes, en face. Rosanette avait peur de la pluie.

— “J’ai des riflards”, dit Frédéric, “et tout ce qu’il faut pour se distraire”, ajouta-t-il en soulevant le coffre, où il y avait des provisions de bouche dans un panier.

— “Bravo ! nous nous comprenons !”

— “Et on se comprendra encore mieux, n’est-ce pas ?”

— “Cela se pourrait !” fit-elle en rougissant.

Les jockeys, en casaque de soie, tâchaient d’aligner leurs chevaux et les retenaient à deux mains. Quelqu’un abaissa un drapeau rouge. Alors, tous les cinq, se penchant sur les crinières, partirent. Ils restèrent d’abord serrés en une seule masse, bientôt elle s’allongea, se coupa ; celui qui portait la casaque jaune, au milieu du premier tour, faillit tomber longtemps il y eut de l’incertitude entre Filly et Tibi puis Tom Pouce parut en tête ; mais Culbstick, en arrière depuis le départ, les rejoignit et arriva premier, battant Sir Charles de deux longueurs ; ce fut une surprise ; on criait ; les baraques de planches vibraient sous les trépignements.

— “Nous nous amusons !” dit la Maréchale. “Je t’aime, mon chéri !”

Frédéric ne douta plus de son bonheur ; ce dernier mot de Rosanette le confirmait.

A cent pas de lui, dans un cabriolet milord, une dame parut. Elle se penchait en dehors de la portière, puis se Frédéric ne pouvait distinguer sa figure. Un soupçon le renfonçait vivement ; cela recommença plusieurs fois, saisit, il lui sembla que c'était Mme Arnoux. Impossible, cependant ! Pourquoi serait-elle venue ?

Il descendit de voiture, sous prétexte de flâner au pesage.

— “Vous n’êtes guère galant !” dit Rosanette.

Il n’écoula rien et s’avança. Le milord, tournant bride, se mit au trot.

Frédéric, au même moment ; fut happé par Cisy.

— “Bonjour, cher ! comment allez-vous ? Hussonnet est là-bas ! Ecoutez donc ?”

Frédéric tâchait de se dégager pour rejoindre le milord. La Maréchale lui faisait signe de retourner près d’elle. Cisy l’aperçut, et voulait obstinément lui dire bonjour.

Depuis que le deuil de sa grand-mère était fini, il réalisait son idéal, parvenait à avoir du cachet. Gilet écossais, habit court, larges bouffettes sur l’escarpin et carte d’entrée dans la ganse du chapeau, rien ne manquait effectivement à ce qu’il appelait lui-même son “chic”, un chic anglo-man et mousquetaire. Il commença par se plaindre du Champ de Mars, turf exécration, parla ensuite des courses de Chantilly et des farces qu’on y faisait, jura qu’il pouvait boire douze verres de vin de Champagne pendant les douze coups de minuit, proposa à la Maréchale de parier, caressait doucement ses deux bichons ; et de l’autre coude s’appuyant sur la portière, il continuait à débiter des sottises, le pommeau de son stick dans la bouche, les jambes écartées, les reins tendus. Frédéric, à côté de lui, fumait, tout en cherchant à découvrir ce que le milord était devenu.

La cloche ayant tinté, Cisy s’en alla, au grand plaisir de Rosanette, qu’il ennuyait beaucoup, disait-elle.

La seconde épreuve n’eut rien de particulier, la troisième non plus, sauf un homme qu’on emporta sur un brancard. La quatrième, où huit chevaux disputèrent le prix de la ville, fut plus intéressante.

Les spectateurs des tribunes avaient grimpé sur les bancs. Les autres, debout dans les voitures, suivaient avec des lorgnettes à la main l’évolution des jockeys ; on les voyait filer comme des taches rouges, jaunes, blanches et bleues sur toute la longueur de la foule, qui bordait le tour de l'Hippodrome. De loin, leur vitesse n'avait pas l'air excessive ; à l'autre bout du Champ de Mars, ils semblaient même se ralentir, et ne plus avancer que par une sorte de glissement, où les ventres des chevaux touchaient la terre sans que leurs jambes étendues pliassent. Mais, revenant bien vite, ils grandissaient ; leur passage coupait le vent, le sol tremblait, les cailloux volaient ; l'air, s'engouffrant dans les casaques des jockeys, les faisait palpiter comme des voiles ; à grands coups de cravache, ils fouaillaient leurs bêtes pour atteindre le poteau, c'était le but. On enlevait les chiffres. un autre était hissé ; et, au milieu des applaudissements, le cheval victorieux se traînait jusqu'au pesage, tout couvert de sueur, les genoux raidis, l'encolure basse, tandis que son cavalier, comme agonisant sur sa selle, se tenait les côtes.

Une contestation retarda le dernier départ. La foule qui s'ennuyait se répandit. Des groupes d'hommes causaient au bas des tribunes. Les propos étaient libres ; des femmes du monde partirent, scandalisées par le voisinage des lorettes.

Il y avait aussi des illustrations de bals publics, des comédiennes du boulevard ; — et ce n'était pas les plus belles qui recevaient le plus d'hommages. La vieille Georgine Aubert, celle qu'un vaudevilliste appelait le Louis XI de la prostitution, horriblement maquillée et poussant de temps à autre une espèce de rire pareil à un grognement, restait tout étendue dans sa longue calèche, sous une palatine de martre comme en plein hiver. Mme de Remoussot, mise à la mode par son procès, trônait sur le siège d'un break en compagnie d'Américains ; et Thérèse Bachelu, avec son air de vierge gothique, emplissait de ses douze falbalas l'intérieur d'un escargot qui avait, à la place du tablier, une jardinière pleine de roses. La Maréchale fut jalouse de ces gloires ; pour qu'on la remarquât, elle se mit à faire de grands gestes et à parler très haut.

Des gentlemen la reconnurent, lui envoyèrent des saluts. Elle y répondait en disant leurs noms à Frédéric. C'étaient tous comtes, vicomtes, ducs et marquis ; et il se rengorgeait, car tous les yeux exprimaient un certain respect pour sa bonne fortune.

Cisy n'avait pas l'air moins heureux dans le cercle d'hommes mûrs qui l'entourait. Ils souriaient du haut de leurs cravates, comme se moquant de lui ; enfin il tapa dans la main du plus vieux et s'avança vers la Maréchale.

Elle mangeait avec une gloutonnerie affectée une tranche de foie gras ; Frédéric, par obéissance, l'imitait, en tenant une bouteille de vin sur ses genoux.

Le milord reparut, c'était Mme Arnoux. Elle pâlit extraordinairement.

— “Donne-moi du champagne !” dit Rosanette.

Et, levant le plus haut possible son verre rempli, elle s'écria :

— “Ohé là-bas ! les femmes honnêtes, l'épouse de mon protecteur, ohé !”

Des rires éclatèrent autour d'elle, le milord disparut.

Frédéric la tirait par sa robe, il allait s'emporter. Mais Cisy était là, dans la même attitude que tout à l'heure ; et, avec un surcroît d'aplomb, il invita Rosanette à dîner pour le soir même.

— “Impossible !” répondit-elle. “Nous allons ensemble au café Anglais.”

Frédéric, comme s'il n'eût rien entendu, demeura muet ; et Cisy quitta la Maréchale d'un air désappointé.

Tandis qu'il lui parlait, debout contre la portière de droite, Hussonnet était survenu du côté gauche, et, relevant ce mot de café Anglais :

— “C'est un joli établissement ! si l'on y cassait une croûte, hein ?”

— “Comme vous voudrez”, dit Frédéric, qui, affaissé dans le coin de la berline, regardait à l'horizon le milord disparaître, sentant qu'une chose irréparable venait de se faire et qu'il avait perdu son grand amour. Et l'autre était là, près de lui, l'amour joyeux et facile ! Mais, lassé, plein de désirs contradictoires et ne sachant même plus ce qu'il voulait, il éprouvait une tristesse démesurée, une envie de mourir.

Un grand bruit de pas et de voix lui fit relever la tête les gamins, enjambant les cordes de la piste, venaient regarder les tribunes ; on s'en allait. Quelques gouttes de pluie tombèrent. L'embarras des voitures augmenta. Hussonnet était perdu.

— “Eh bien, tant mieux !” dit Frédéric.

— “On préfère être seul ?” reprit la Maréchale, en posant la main sur la sienne.

Alors passa devant eux, avec des miroitements de cuivre et d'acier, un splendide landau attelé de quatre chevaux, conduits à la Daumont par deux jockeys en veste de velours, à crépines d'or. Mme Dambreuse était près de son mari, Martinon sur l'autre banquette en face tous les trois avaient des figures étonnées.

— "Ils m'ont reconnu !" se dit Frédéric.

Rosanette voulut qu'on arrêât, pour mieux voir le défilé. Mme Arnoux pouvait reparaître. Il cria au postillon :

— "Va donc ! va donc ! en avant !"

Et la berline se lança vers les Champs-Élysées au milieu des autres voitures, calèches, briskas, wursts, tandems, tilburys, dog-carts, tapissières à rideaux de cuir où chantaient des ouvriers en goguette, demi-fortune que dirigeaient avec prudence des pères de famille eux-mêmes. Dans des victorias bourrées de monde, quelque garçon, assis sur les pieds des autres, laissait pendre en dehors ses deux jambes. De grands coupés à siège de drap promenaient des douairières qui sommeillaient ; ou bien un stepper magnifique passait, emportant une chaise, simple et coquette comme l'habit noir d'un dandy. L'averse cependant redoublait. On tirait les parapluies, les parasols, les mackintosh ; on se criait de loin : "Bonjour ! — Ça va bien ? — Oui ! — Non ! — À tantôt !" et les figures se succédaient avec une vitesse d'ombres chinoises. Frédéric et Rosanette ne se parlaient pas, éprouvant une sorte d'hébéture à voir auprès d'eux continuellement, toutes ces roues tourner.

Par moments, les files de voitures, trop pressées, s'arrêtaient toutes à la fois sur plusieurs lignes. Alors, on restait les uns près des autres, et l'on s'examinait. Du bord des panneaux armoriés, des regards indifférents tombaient sur la foule ; des yeux pleins d'envie brillaient au fond des fiacres ; des sourires de dénigrement répondaient aux ports de tête orgueilleux ; des bouches grandes ouvertes exprimaient des admirations imbéciles ; et, çà et là, quelque flâneur, au milieu de la voie, se rejetait en arrière d'un bond pour éviter un cavalier qui galopait entre les voitures et parvenait à en sortir. Puis tout se remettait en mouvement ; les cochers lâchaient les rênes, abaissaient leurs longs fouets ; les chevaux, animés, secouant leur gourmette, jetaient de l'écume autour d'eux ; et les croupes et les harnais humides fumaient, dans la vapeur d'eau que le soleil couchant traversait. Passant sous l'Arc de triomphe, il allongeait à hauteur d'homme une lumière roussâtre, qui faisait étinceler les moyeux des roues, les poignées des portières, le bout des timons, les anneaux des sellettes ; et, sur les deux côtés de la grande avenue, — pareille à un fleuve où ondulaient des crinières, des vêtements, des têtes humaines — les arbres tout reluisants de pluie se dressaient, comme deux murailles vertes. Le bleu du ciel, au-dessus, reparaissant à de certaines places, avait des douceurs de satin.

Alors, Frédéric se rappela les jours déjà loin où il envoyait l'inexprimable bonheur de se trouver dans une de ces voitures, à côté d'une de ces femmes. Il le possédait, ce bonheur-là, et n'en était pas plus joyeux.

La pluie avait fini de tomber. Les passants, réfugiés entre les colonnes du Garde-Meubles, s'en allaient. Des promeneurs, dans la rue Royale, remontaient vers le boulevard. Devant l'hôtel des Affaires Étrangères, une file de badauds stationnait sur les marches.

A la hauteur des Bains-Chinois, comme il y avait des trous dans le pavé, la berline se ralentit. Un homme en paletot noisette marchait au bord du trottoir. Une éclaboussure, jaillissant de dessous les ressorts, s'étala dans son dos. L'homme se retourna, furieux. Frédéric devint pâle ; il avait reconnu Deslauriers.

A la porte du café Anglais, il renvoya la voiture. Rosanette était montée devant lui, pendant qu'il payait le postillon.

Il la retrouva dans l'escalier, causant avec un monsieur. Frédéric prit son bras. Mais, au milieu du corridor, un deuxième seigneur l'arrêta.

— “Va toujours !” dit-elle, “je suis à toi !”

Et il entra seul dans le cabinet. Par les deux fenêtres ouvertes, on apercevait du monde aux croisées des autres maisons, vis-à-vis. De larges moires frissonnaient sur l'asphalte qui séchait, et un magnolia posé au bord du balcon embaumait l'appartement. Ce parfum et cette fraîcheur détendirent ses nerfs ; il s'affaissa sur le divan rouge, au-dessous de la glace.

La Maréchale revint ; et, le baisant au front :

— “On a des chagrins, pauvre mimi ?”

— “Peut-être !” répliqua-t-il.

— “Tu n'es pas le seul, va !” ce qui voulait dire : “Oublions chacun les nôtres dans une félicité commune !”

Puis elle posa un pétale de fleur entre ses lèvres, et la lui tendit à becqueter. Ce mouvement, d'une grâce et presque d'une mansuétude lascive, attendrit Frédéric.

— "Pourquoi me fais-tu de la peine ?" dit-il, en songeant à Mme Arnoux.

— "Moi, de la peine ?"

Et, debout devant lui, elle le regardait, les cils rapprochés et les deux mains sur les épaules.

Toute sa vertu, toute sa rancune sombra dans une lâcheté sans fond.

Il reprit :

— "Puisque tu ne veux pas m'aimer !" en l'attirant sur ses genoux.

Elle se laissait faire ; il lui entourait la taille à deux bras ; le pétilllement de sa robe de soie l'enflammait.

— "Où sont-ils ?" dit la voix d'Hussonnet dans le corridor.

La Maréchale se leva brusquement, et alla se mettre à l'autre bout du cabinet, tournant le dos à la porte.

Elle demanda des huîtres ; et ils s'attablèrent.

Hussonnet ne fut pas drôle. A force d'écrire quotidiennement sur toutes sortes de sujets, de lire beaucoup de journaux, d'entendre beaucoup de discussions et d'émettre des paradoxes pour éblouir, il avait fini par perdre la notion exacte des choses, s'aveuglant lui-même avec ses faibles pétards. Les embarras d'une vie légère autrefois, mais à présent difficile, l'entretenaient dans une agitation perpétuelle ; et son impuissance, qu'il ne voulait pas s'avouer, le rendait hargneux, sarcastique. A propos d'Ozai, un ballet nouveau, il fit une sortie à fond contre la danse, et, à propos de la danse, contre l'Opéra ; puis, à propos de l'Opéra, contre les Italiens, remplacés, maintenant, par une troupe d'acteurs espagnols, "comme si l'on n'était pas rassasié des Castilles !" Frédéric fut choqué dans son amour romantique de l'Espagne ; et, afin de rompre la conversation, il s'informa du Collège de France, d'où l'on venait d'exclure Edgar Quinet et Mickiewicz. Mais Hussonnet, admirateur de M. De Maistre, se déclara pour l'Autorité et le Spiritualisme. Il doutait, cependant, des faits les mieux prouvés, niait l'histoire, et contestait les choses les plus positives, jusqu'à s'écrier au mot géométrie : "Quelle blague que la géométrie !" Le tout entremêlé d'imitations d'acteurs. Sainville était particulièrement son modèle.

Ces calembredaines assommaient Frédéric. Dans un mouvement d'impatience, il attrapa, avec sa botte, un des bichons sous la table.

Tous deux se mirent à aboyer d'une façon odieuse.

— “Vous devriez les faire reconduire !” dit-il brusquement.

Rosanette n'avait confiance en personne.

Alors, il se tourna vers le bohème.

— “Voyons, Hussonnet, dévouez-vous !”

— “Oh ! oui, mon petit ! Ce serait bien aimable !”

Hussonnet s'en alla, sans se faire prier.

De quelle manière payait-on sa complaisance ? Frédéric n'y pensa pas. Il commençait même à se réjouir du tête-à-tête, lorsqu'un garçon entra.

— “Madame, quelqu'un vous demande.”

— “Comment ! encore ?”

— “Il faut pourtant que je voie !” dit Rosanette.

Il en avait soif, besoin. Cette disparition lui semblait une forfaiture, presque une grossièreté. Que voulait-elle donc ? n'était-ce pas assez d'avoir outragé Mme Arnoux ? Tant pis pour celle-là, du reste ! Maintenant, il haïssait toutes les femmes ; et des pleurs l'étouffaient, car son amour était méconnu et sa concupiscence trompée.

La Maréchale rentra, et, lui présentant Cisy :

— “J'ai invité monsieur. J'ai bien fait, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Comment donc ! certainement !” Frédéric, avec un sourire de supplicé, fit signe au gentilhomme de s'asseoir.

La Maréchale se mit à parcourir la carte, en s'arrêtant aux noms bizarres.

— “Si nous mangions, je suppose, un turban de lapins à la Richelieu et un pudding à la d'Orléans ?”

— “Oh ! pas d'Orléans !” s'écria Cisy, lequel était légitimiste et crut faire un mot.

— “Aimez-vous mieux un turbot à la Chambord reprit-elle.

Cette politesse choqua Frédéric.

La Maréchale se décida pour un simple tournedos, des écrevisses, des truffes, une salade d'ananas, des sorbets à la vanille.

— “Nous verrons ensuite. Allez toujours. Ah ! j'oubliais !

Apportez-moi un saucisson ! pas à l'ail !”

Et elle appelait le garçon “jeune homme”, frappait son verre avec son couteau, jetai au plafond la mie de son pain. Elle voulut boire tout de suite du vin de Bourgogne. — “On n’en prend pas dès le commencement”, dit Frédéric.

Cela se faisait quelquefois, suivant le Vicomte.

— “Eh non ! Jamais !”

— “Si fait, je vous assure !”

— “Ah ! tu vois !”

Le regard dont elle accompagna cette phrase signifiait :

“C’est un homme riche, celui-là, écoute-le !”

Cependant, la porte s’ouvrait à chaque minute, les garçons glapissaient, et, sur un infernal piano, dans le cabinet à côté, quelqu’un tapait une valse. Puis les courses amenèrent à parler d’équitation et des deux systèmes rivaux. Cisy défendait Baucher, Frédéric le comte d’Aure, quand Rosanette haussa les épaules.

— “Assez, mon Dieu ! il s’y connaît mieux que toi, va !”

Elle mordait dans une grenade, le coude posé sur la table ; les bougies du candélabre devant elle tremblaient au vent, cette lumière blanche pénétrait sa peau de tons nacrés, mettait du rose à ses paupières, faisait briller les globes de ses yeux ; la rougeur du fruit se confondait avec la pourpre de ses lèvres, ses narines minces battaient ; et toute sa personne avait quelque chose d’insolent, d’ivre et de noyé qui exaspérait Frédéric, et pourtant lui jetait au cœur des désirs fous.

Puis elle demanda, d’une voix calme, à qui appartenait ce grand landau avec une livrée marron.

— “A la comtesse Dambreuse”, répliqua Cisy.

— “Ils sont très riches, n’est-ce pas ?”

— “Oh ! très riches ! bien que Mme Dambreuse, qui est, tout simplement, une demoiselle Boutron, la fille d’un préfet, ait une fortune médiocre.”

Son mari, au contraire, devait recueillir plusieurs héritages, Cisy les énuméra ; fréquentant les Dambreuse, il savait leur histoire.

Frédéric, pour lui être désagréable, s’entêta à le contredire. Il soutint que Mme Dambreuse s’appelait de Boutron, certifiait sa noblesse.

— “N’importe ! je voudrais bien avoir son équipage dit la Maréchale, en se renversant sur le fauteuil.”

Et la manche de sa robe, glissant un peu, découvrit, à son poignet gauche, un bracelet orné de trois opales.

Frédéric l'aperçut.

Ils se considérèrent tous les trois, et rougirent.

La porte s'entrebâilla discrètement, le bord d'un chapeau parut, puis le profil d'Hussonnet.

— “Excusez, si je vous dérange, les amoureux !” Mais il s'arrêta, étonné de voir Cisy et de ce que Cisy avait pris sa place.

On apporta un autre couvert ; et, comme il avait grand faim, il empoignait au hasard, parmi les restes du dîner, de la viande dans un plat, un fruit dans une corbeille, buvait d'une main, se servait de l'autre, tout en racontant sa mission. Les deux toutous étaient reconduits. Rien de neuf au domicile. Il avait trouvé la cuisinière avec un soldat, histoire fausse, uniquement inventée pour produire de l'effet.

La Maréchale décrocha de la patère sa capote. Frédéric se précipita sur la sonnette en criant de loin au garçon :

— “Une voiture”

— “J'ai la mienne”, dit le Vicomte.

— “Mais, monsieur !”

— “Cependant, monsieur...”

Et ils se regardaient dans les prunelles, pâles tous les deux et les mains tremblantes.

Enfin, la Maréchale prit le bras de Cisy, et, en montrant le bohème attablé :

— “Soignez-le donc ! il s'étouffe. Je ne voudrais pas que son dévouement pour mes roquets le fît mourir !”

La porte retomba.

— “Eh bien ?” dit Hussonnet.

— “Eh bien, quoi ?”

— “Je croyais...”

— “Qu'est-ce que vous croyiez ?”

— “Est-ce que vous ne... ?”

Il compléta sa phrase par un geste.

“Eh non ! jamais de la vie !”

Hussonnet n'insista pas davantage.

Il avait eu un but en s'invitant à dîner. Son journal, qui ne s'appelait plus l'Art, mais le Flambard, avec cette épigraphe : “Canonniers, à vos pièces !" ne prospérant nullement, il avait envie de le transformer en une revue hebdomadaire, seul, sans le secours de Deslauriers. Il reparla de l'ancien projet, et exposa son plan nouveau.

Frédéric, ne comprenant pas sans doute, répondit par des choses vagues. Hussonnet empoigna plusieurs cigares sur la table, dit : "Adieu, mon bon", et disparut.

Frédéric demanda la note. Elle était longue ; et le garçon, la serviette sous le bras, attendait son argent, quand un autre, un individu blafard qui ressemblait à Martinon, vint lui dire :

— "Faites excuse, on a oublié au comptoir de porter le fiacre."

— "Quel fiacre ?"

— "Celui que ce monsieur a pris tantôt, pour les petits chiens."

Et la figure du garçon s'allongea, comme s'il eût plaint le pauvre jeune homme. Frédéric eut envie de le gifler.

Il donna de pourboire les vingt francs qu'on lui rendait.

— "Merci, Monseigneur !" dit l'homme à la serviette, avec un grand salut.

Frédéric passa la journée du lendemain à ruminer sa colère et son humiliation. il se reprochait de n'avoir pas souffleté Cisy. Quant à la Maréchale, il se jura de ne plus la revoir ; d'autres aussi belles ne manquaient pas ; et, puisqu'il fallait de l'argent pour posséder ces femmes-là, il jouerait à la Bourse le prix de sa ferme, il serait riche, il écraserait de son luxe la Maréchale et tout le monde. Le soir venu, il s'étonna de n'avoir pas songé à Mme Arnoux.

— "Tant mieux ! à quoi bon ?"

Le surlendemain, dès huit heures, Pellerin vint lui faire visite. Il commença par des admirations sur le mobilier, des cajoleries. Puis, brusquement :

— "Vous étiez aux courses, dimanche ?"

— "Oui, hélas !"

Alors, le peintre déclama contre l'anatomie des chevaux anglais, vanta les chevaux de Géricault, les chevaux du Parthénon. "Rosanette était avec vous ?" Et il entama son éloge, adroitement.

La froideur de Frédéric le décontenança. Il ne savait comment en venir au portrait.

Sa première intention avait été de faire un Titien. Mais, peu à peu, la coloration variée de son modèle l'avait séduit ; et il avait travaillé franchement, accumulant pâte sur pâte et lumière sur lumière. Rosanette fut enchantée d'abord ; ses rendez-vous avec Delmar avaient interrompu les séances et laissé à Pellerin tout le temps de s'éblouir. Puis, l'admiration s'apaisant, il s'était demandé si sa peinture ne manquait point de grandeur. Il avait été revoir les Titien, avait compris la distance, reconnu sa faute ; et il s'était mis à repasser ses contours simplement. Ensuite il avait cherché, en les rongéant, à y perdre, à y mêler les tons de la tête et ceux des fonds ; et la figure avait pris de la consistance, les ombres de la vigueur ; tout paraissait plus ferme. Enfin la Maréchale était revenue. Elle s'était même permis des objections ; l'artiste, naturellement, avait persévéré. Après de grandes fureurs contre sa sottise, il s'était dit qu'elle pouvait avoir raison. Alors avait commencé l'ère des doutes, tiraillements de la pensée qui provoquent les crampes d'estomac, les insomnies, la fièvre, le dégoût de soi-même ; il avait eu le courage de faire des retouches, mais sans cœur et sentant que sa besogne était mauvaise.

Il se plaignit seulement d'avoir été refusé au Salon, puis reprocha à Frédéric de ne pas être venu voir le portrait de la Maréchale.

— “Je me moque bien de la Maréchale !”

Une déclaration pareille l'enhardit.

— “Croiriez-vous que cette bête-là n'en veut plus, maintenant ?”

Ce qu'il ne disait point, c'est qu'il avait réclamé d'elle mille écus. Or, la Maréchale s'était peu souciée de savoir qui payerait, et, préférant tirer d'Arnoux des choses plus urgentes, ne lui en avait même pas parlé.

— “Eh bien, et Arnoux ?” dit Frédéric.

Elle l'avait relancé vers lui. L'ancien marchand de tableaux n'avait que faire du portrait.

— “Il soutient que ça appartient à Rosanette.”

— “En effet, c'est à elle.”

— “Comment ! c'est elle qui m'envoie vers vous !” répliqua Pellerin.

S'il eût cru à l'excellence de son œuvre, il n'eût pas songé, peut-être, à l'exploiter. Mais une somme (et une somme considérable) serait un démenti à la critique, un raffermissement pour lui-même. Frédéric, afin de s'en délivrer, s'enquit de ses conditions, courtoisement.

L'extravagance du chiffre le révolta, il répondit :

— “Non, ah ! non !”

— “Vous êtes pourtant son amant, c’est vous qui m’avez fait la commande !”

— “J’ai été l’intermédiaire, permettez !”

— “Mais je ne peux pas rester avec ça sur les bras !”

L’artiste s’emportait.

— “Ah ! je ne vous croyais pas si cupide.”

— “Ni vous si avare ! Serviteur !”

Il venait de partir que Sénécal se présenta.

Frédéric, troublé, eut un mouvement d’inquiétude.

— “Qu’y a-t-il ?”

Sénécal conta son histoire.

— “Samedi, vers neuf heures, Mme Arnoux a reçu une lettre qui l’appelait à Paris ; comme personne, par hasard, ne se trouvait là pour aller à Creil chercher une voiture, elle avait envie de m’y faire aller moi-même. J’ai refusé, car ça ne rentre pas dans mes fonctions. Elle est partie, et revenue dimanche soir. Hier matin, Arnoux tombe à la fabrique. La Bordelaise s’est plainte. Je ne sais pas ce qui se passe entre eux, mais il a levé son amende devant tout le monde. Nous avons échangé des paroles vives. Bref, il m’a donné mon compte, et me voilà !”

Puis, détachant ses paroles :

— “Au reste, je ne me repens pas, j’ai fait mon devoir. N’importe, c’est à cause de vous.”

— “Comment ?” S’écria Frédéric, ayant peur que Sénécal ne l’eût deviné.

Sénécal n’avait rien deviné, car il reprit :

— “ C’est-à-dire que, sans vous, j’aurais peut-être trouvé mieux.

Frédéric fut saisi d’une espèce de remords.

— “En quoi puis-je vous servir, maintenant ?” Sénécal demandait un emploi quelconque, une place.

— “Cela vous est facile. Vous connaissez tant de monde, M. Dambreuse entre autres, à ce que m’a dit Deslauriers.”

Ce rappel de Deslauriers fut désagréable à son ami. il ne se souciait guère de retourner chez les Dambreuse depuis la rencontre du Champ de Mars.

— “Je ne suis pas suffisamment intime dans la maison pour recommander quelqu'un."

Le démocrate essuya ce refus stoïquement, et, après une minute de silence :

— "Tout cela, j'en suis sûr, vient de la Bordelaise et aussi de votre Mme Arnoux."

Ce votre ôta du cœur de Frédéric le peu de bon vouloir qu'il gardait. Par délicatesse, cependant, il atteignit la clef de son secrétaire. Sénécals le prévint.

— "Merci !"

Puis, oubliant ses misères, il parla des choses de la patrie, les croix d'honneur prodiguées à la fête du Roi, un changement de cabinet, les affaires Drouillard et Bénier, scandales de l'époque, déclama contre les bourgeois et prédit une révolution.

Un cri japonais suspendu contre le mur arrêta ses yeux. Il le prit, en essaya le manche, puis le rejeta sur le canapé, avec un air de dégoût.

— "Allons, adieu ! Il faut que j'aille à Notre-Dame de Lorette.

— "Tiens ! pourquoi ?"

— "C'est aujourd'hui le service anniversaire de Godefroy Cavaignac. Il est mort à l'œuvre, celui-là ! Mais tout n'est pas fini !... Qui sait ?"

Et Sénécals tendit sa main, bravement.

— "Nous ne nous reverrons peut-être jamais ! adieu !" Cet adieu, répété deux fois, son froncement de sourcils en contemplant le poignard, sa résignation et son air solennel, surtout, firent rêver Frédéric, qui bientôt n'y pensa plus.

Dans la même semaine, son notaire du Havre lui envoya le prix de sa ferme, cent soixante-quatorze mille francs. Il en fit deux parts, plaça la première sur l'Etat, et alla porter la seconde chez un agent de change pour la risquer à la Bourse.

Il mangeait dans les cabarets à la mode, fréquentait les théâtres et tâchait de se distraire, quand Hussonnet lui adressa une lettre, où il narrait gaiement que la Maréchale, dès le lendemain des courses, avait congédié Cisy. Frédéric en fut heureux, sans chercher pourquoi le bohème lui apprenait cette aventure.

Le hasard voulut qu'il rencontrât Cisy, trois jours après. Le gentilhomme fit bonne contenance, et l'invita même à dîner pour le mercredi suivant.

Frédéric, le matin de ce jour-là, reçut une notification d'huissier, où M. Charles-Jean-Baptiste Oudry lui apprenait qu'aux termes d'un jugement du tribunal, il s'était rendu acquéreur d'une propriété sise à Belleville appartenant au sieur Jacques Arnoux, et qu'il était prêt à payer les deux cent vingt-trois mille francs montant du prix de la vente. Mais il résultait du même acte que, la somme des hypothèques dont l'immeuble était grevé dépassant le prix de l'acquisition, la créance de Frédéric se trouvait complètement perdue.

Tout le mal venait de n'avoir pas renouvelé en temps utile une inscription hypothécaire. Arnoux s'était chargé de cette démarche, et l'avait ensuite oubliée. Frédéric s'emporta contre lui, et, quand sa colère fut passée :

— “Eh bien après.... quoi ? si cela peut le sauver, tant mieux ! je n'en mourrai pas ! n'y pensons plus !”

Mais, en remuant ses paperasses sur sa table, il rencontra la lettre d'Hussonnet, et aperçut le post-scriptum, qu'il n'avait point remarqué la première fois. Le bohème demandait cinq mille francs, tout juste, pour mettre l'affaire du journal en train.

— “Ah ! celui-là m'embête !”

Et il le refusa brutalement dans un billet laconique. Après quoi, il s'habilla pour se rendre à la Maison d'or.

Cisy présenta ses convives, en commençant par le plus respectable, un gros monsieur à cheveux blancs :

— “Le marquis Gilbert des Aulnays, mon parrain. M. Anselme de Forchambeaux”, dit-il ensuite (c'était un jeune homme blond et fluet, déjà chauve) ; puis, désignant un quadragénaire d'allures simples : “Joseph Boffreu, mon cousin ; et voici mon ancien professeur M. Vezou”, personnage moitié charretier, moitié séminariste, avec de gros favoris et une longue redingote boutonnée dans le bas par un seul bouton, de manière à faire châte sur la poitrine.

Cisy attendait encore quelqu'un, le baron de Comaing, “qui peut-être viendra, ce n'est pas sûr”. Il sortait à chaque minute, paraissait inquiet ; enfin, à huit heures, on passa dans une salle éclairée magnifiquement et trop spacieuse pour le nombre des convives. Cisy l'avait choisie par pompe, tout exprès.

Un surtout de vermeil, chargé de fleurs et de fruits, occupait le milieu de la table, couverte de plats d'argent, suivant la vieille mode française ; des rapiers, pleins de salaisons et d'épices, formaient bordure tout autour ; des cruches de vin rosat frappé de glace se dressaient de distance en distance ; cinq verres de hauteur différente étaient alignés devant chaque assiette avec des choses dont on ne savait pas l'usage, mille ustensiles de bouche ingénieux ; — et il y avait, rien que pour le premier service : une hure d'esturgeon mouillée de champagne, un jambon d'York au tokay, des grives au gratin, des caillies rôties, un vol-au-vent Béchamel, un sauté de perdrix rouges, et, aux deux bouts de tout cela, des effilés de Pommes de terre qui étaient mêlés à des truffes. Un lustre et des girandoles illuminaient l'appartement, tendu de damas rouge. Quatre domestiques en habit noir se tenaient derrière les fauteuils de maroquin. A ce spectacle, les convives se récrièrent, le Précepteur surtout.

— “Notre amphitryon, ma parole, a fait de véritables folies ! C'est trop beau !”

— “Ça ?” dit le vicomte de Cisy, “allons donc !”

Et, dès la première cuillerée :

— “Eh bien, mon vieux des Aulnays, avez-vous été au Palais-Royal, voir Père et Portier ?”

— “Tu sais bien que je n'ai pas le temps !” répliqua le marquis.

Ses matinées étaient prises par un cours d'arboriculture, ses soirées par le Cercle agricole, et toutes ses après-midi par des études dans les fabriques d'instruments aratoires. Habitant la Saintonge les trois quarts de l'année, il profitait de ses voyages dans la Capitale pour s'instruire ; et son chapeau à larges bords, posé sur une console, était plein de brochures.

Mais Cisy, s'apercevant que M. de Forchambeaux refusait du vin :

— “Buvez donc, saprelotte ! Vous n'êtes pas crâne pour votre dernier repas de garçon !”

A ce mot, tous s'inclinèrent, on le congratulait.

— “Et la jeune personne”, dit le Précepteur, “est charmante, j'en suis sûr ?”

“Parbleu !” s'écria Cisy. “N'importe, il a tort c'est si bête, le mariage !”

— “ Tu parles légèrement, mon ami répliqua M. des Aulnays, tandis qu'une larme roulait dans ses yeux, au souvenir de sa défunte.

Et Forchambeaux répéta plusieurs fois de suite, en ricanant :

— “Vous y viendrez vous-même, vous y viendrez !” Cisy protesta. Il aimait mieux se divertir, “être régence” . Il voulait apprendre la savate, pour visiter les tapis-francs de la Cité, comme le prince Rodolphe des Mystères de Paris tira de sa poche un brûle-gueule, rudoyait les domestiques, buvait extrêmement ; et, afin de donner de lui bonne opinion, dénigrait tous les plats.

Il renvoya même les truffes, et le Précepteur, qui s’en délectait, dit par bassesse :

— “Cela ne vaut pas les œufs à la neige de madame votre grand-mère”

Puis il se remit à causer avec son voisin l’agronome, lequel trouvait au séjour de la campagne beaucoup d’avantages, ne serait-ce que de pouvoir élever ses filles dans des goûts simples. Le Précepteur applaudissait à ses idées et le flagornait, lui supposant de l’influence sur son élève, dont il désirait secrètement être l’homme d’affaires.

Frédéric était venu plein d’humeur contre Cisy ; sa sottise l’avait désarmé. Mais ses gestes, sa figure, toute sa personne lui rappelant le dîner du café Anglais, l’agaçait de plus en plus ; et il écoutait les remarques désobligeantes que faisait à demi-voix le cousin Joseph, un brave garçon sans fortune, amateur de chasse, et boursier. Cisy, par manière de rire, l’appela “voleur” plusieurs fois ; puis, tout à coup :

— “Ah ! le baron !”

Alors entra un gaillard de trente ans, qui avait quelque chose de rude dans la physionomie, de souple dans les membres, le chapeau sur l’oreille, et une fleur à la boutonnière. C’était l’idéal du Vicomte. Il fut ravi de le posséder ; et, sa présence l’excitant, il tenta même un calembour, car il dit, comme on passait un coq de bruyère :

— “Voilà le meilleur des caractères de La Bruyère”

Ensuite, il adressa à M. de Comaing une foule de questions sur des personnes inconnues à la société ; puis, comme saisi d’une idée :

— “Dites donc ! avez-vous pensé à moi ?”

L’autre haussa les épaules.

— “Vous n’avez pas l’âge, mon petiot ! Impossible”

Cisy l’avait prié de le faire admettre à son club. Mais le baron, ayant sans doute pitié de son amour-propre :

— “Ah ! j’oubliais ! Mille félicitations pour votre pari, mon cher !”

— “Quel pari ?”

— “Celui que vous avez fait, aux courses, d’aller le soir même chez cette dame.”

Frédéric éprouva comme la sensation d’un coup de fouet. Il fut calmé tout de suite, par la figure décontenancée de Cisy.

En effet, la Maréchale, dès le lendemain, en était aux regrets, quand Arnoux, son premier amant, son homme, s’était présenté ce jour-là même. Tous deux avaient fait comprendre au Vicomte qu’il “gênait”, et on l’avait flanqué dehors, avec peu de cérémonie.

Il eut l’air de ne pas entendre. Le Baron ajouta :

— “Que devient-elle, cette brave Rose ?... a-t-elle toujours d’aussi jolies jambes ?” prouvant par ce mot qu’il la connaissait intimement.

Frédéric fut contrarié de la découverte.

— “Il n’y a pas de quoi rougir”, reprit le Baron “c’est une bonne affaire !”

Cisy claqua de la langue.

— “Peuh ! pas si bonne !”

— “Ah !”

— “Mon Dieu, oui ! D’abord, moi, je ne lui trouve rien d’extraordinaire, et puis on en récolte de pareilles tant qu’on veut, car enfin... elle est à vendre !”

— “Pas pour tout le monde !” reprit aigrement Frédéric.

— “il se croit différent des autres !” répliqua Cisy, “quelle farce !”

Et un rire parcourut la table.

Frédéric sentait les battements de son cœur l’étouffer. Il avala deux verres d’eau, coup sur coup.

Mais le Baron avait gardé bon souvenir de Rosanette.

— “Est-ce qu’elle est toujours avec un certain Arnoux ?”

— “Je n’en sais rien”, dit Cisy. “Je ne connais pas ce monsieur !”

Il avança, néanmoins, que c’était une manière d’escroc.

— “Un moment !”, s’écria Frédéric.

— “Cependant, la chose est certaine ! Il a même eu un procès.”

— “Ce n’est pas vrai”

Frédéric se mit à défendre Arnoux. Il garantissait sa probité, finissait par y croire, inventait des chiffres, des preuves. Le Vicomte, plein de rancune, et qui était gris d’ailleurs, s’entêta dans ses assertions, si bien que Frédéric lui dit gravement :

— “Est-ce pour m’offenser, monsieur ?”

Et il le regardait, avec des prunelles ardentes comme son cigare.

— “Oh ! pas du tout ! je vous accorde même qu’il a quelque chose de très bien : sa femme.”

— “Vous la connaissez ?”

— “Parbleu ! Sophie Arnoux, tout le monde connaît ça !”

— “Vous dites ?”

Cisy, qui s’était levé, répéta en balbutiant :

— “Tout le monde connaît ça !”

— “Taisez-vous ! Ce ne sont pas celles-là que vous fréquentez !”

— “Je m’en flatte.”

Frédéric lui lança son assiette au visage.

Elle passa comme un éclair par-dessus la table, renversa deux bouteilles, démolit un compotier, et, se brisant contre le surtout en trois morceaux, frappa le ventre du Vicomte.

Tous se levèrent pour le retenir. Il se débattait, en criant, pris d’une sorte de frénésie ; M. des Aulnays répétait :

— “Calmez-vous ! voyons ! cher enfant !”

— “Mais c’est épouvantable !” vociférait le Précepteur.

Forchambeaux, livide comme les prunes, tremblait Joseph riait aux éclats ; les garçons épongeaient le vin, ramassaient par terre les débris ; et le Baron alla fermer la fenêtre, car le tapage, malgré le bruit des voitures, aurait pu s’entendre du boulevard.

Comme tout le monde, au moment où l’assiette avait été lancée, parlait à la fois, il fut impossible de découvrir la raison de cette offense, si c’était à cause d’Arnoux, de Mme Arnoux, de Rosanette ou d’un autre. Ce qu’il y avait de certain, c’était la brutalité inqualifiable de Frédéric ; il se refusa positivement à en témoigner le moindre regret.

M. des Aulnays tâcha de l’adoucir, le cousin Joseph, le Précepteur, Forchambeaux lui-même. Le Baron pendant ce temps-là, reconfortait Cisy, qui, cédant à une faiblesse nerveuse, versait des larmes. Frédéric, au contraire, s’irritait de plus en plus ; et l’on serait resté là jusqu’au jour si le Baron n’avait dit pour en finir :

— “Le Vicomte, Monsieur, enverra demain chez vous ses témoins.”

— “Votre heure ?”

— “A midi, s’il vous plaît.”

— “Parfaitement, Monsieur.”

Frédéric, une fois dehors, respira à pleins poumons. Depuis trop longtemps, il contenait son cœur. Il venait de le satisfaire enfin ; il éprouvait comme un orgueil de virilité, une surabondance de forces intimes qui l’enivraient. Il avait besoin de deux témoins. Le premier auquel il songea fut Regimbart ; et il se dirigea tout de suite vers un estaminet de la rue Saint-Denis. La devanture était close. Mais de la lumière brillait à un carreau, au-dessus de la porte. Elle s’ouvrit, et il entra, en se courbant très bas sous l’auvent.

Une chandelle, au bord du comptoir, éclairait la salle déserte. Tous les tabourets, les pieds en l’air, étaient posés sur les tables. Le maître et la maîtresse avec leur garçon soupaient dans l’angle près de la cuisine ; — et Regimbart, le chapeau sur la tête, partageait leur repas, et même gênait le garçon, qui était contraint à chaque bouchée de se tourner de côté, quelque peu. Frédéric, lui ayant conté la chose brièvement, réclama son assistance. Le Citoyen commença par ne rien répondre ; il roulait des yeux, avait l’air de réfléchir, fit plusieurs tours dans la salle, et dit enfin :

— “Oui, volontiers !”

Et un sourire homicide le dérida, en apprenant que l’adversaire était un noble.

— “Nous le ferons marcher tambour battant, soyez tranquille ! D’abord.... avec l’épée...”

— “Mais peut-être”, objecta Frédéric, “que je n’ai pas le droit...”

— “Je vous dis qu’il faut prendre l’épée !” répliqua brutalement le Citoyen. “Savez-vous tirer ?”

— “Un peu !”

— “Ah ! un peu ! voilà comme ils sont tous ! Et ils ont la rage de faire assaut ! Qu’est-ce que ça prouve, la salle d’armes ! Ecoutez-moi : tenez-vous bien à distance en vous enfermant toujours dans des cercles, et rompez ! rompez ! C’est permis. Fatiguez-le ! Puis fendez-vous dessus, franchement ! Et surtout pas de malice, pas de coups à la La Fougère non ! de simples une-deux, des dégagements. Tenez, voyez-vous ? en tournant le poignet comme pour ouvrir une serrure. — Père Vauthier, donnez-moi votre canne ! Ah ! cela suffit.”

Il empoigna la baguette qui servait à allumer le gaz, arrondit le bras gauche, plia le droit, et se mit à pousser des bottes contre la cloison. Il frappait du pied, s'animait, feignait même de rencontrer des difficultés, tout en criant : "Y es-tu, là ? y es-tu ?" et sa silhouette énorme se projetait sur la muraille, avec son chapeau qui semblait toucher au plafond. Le limonadier disait de temps en temps : "Bravo ! très bien !" Son épouse également l'admirait, quoique émue ; et Théodore, un ancien soldat, en restait cloué d'ébahissement, étant, du reste, fanatique de M. Regimbart.

Le lendemain, de bonne heure, Frédéric courut au magasin de Dussardier. Après une suite de pièces, toutes remplies d'étoffes garnissant des rayons, ou étendues en travers sur des tables, tandis, que, çà et là, des champignons de bois supportaient des châles, il l'aperçut dans une espèce de cage grillée, au milieu de registres, et écrivant debout sur un pupitre. Le brave garçon lâcha immédiatement sa besogne.

Les témoins arrivèrent avant midi. Frédéric, par bon goût, crut devoir ne pas assister à la conférence.

Le Baron et M. Joseph déclarèrent qu'ils se contenteraient des excuses les plus simples. Mais Regimbart, ayant pour principe de ne céder jamais, et qui tenait à défendre l'honneur d'Arnoux (Frédéric ne lui avait point parlé d'autre chose), demanda que le Vicomte fît des excuses. M. de Comaing fut révolté de l'outrecuidance. Le Citoyen n'en voulut pas démordre. Toute conciliation devenant impossible, on se battrait.

D'autres difficultés surgirent — , car le choix des armes légalement, appartenait à Cisy, l'offensé. Mais Regimbart soutint que, par l'envoi du cartel, il se constituait l'offenseur. Ses témoins se récrièrent qu'un soufflet, cependant, était la plus cruelle des offenses. Le Citoyen épilogua sur les mots, un coup n'étant pas un soufflet. Enfin, on décida qu'on s'en rapporterait à des militaires ; et les quatre témoins sortirent, pour aller consulter des officiers dans une caserne quelconque.

Ils s'arrêtèrent à celle du quai d'Orsay. M. de Comaing, ayant abordé deux capitaines, leur exposa la contestation.

Les capitaines n'y comprirent goutte, embrouillée qu'elle fut par les phrases incidentes du Citoyen. Bref, ils conseillèrent à ces messieurs d'écrire un procès-verbal ; après quoi, ils décideraient. Alors, on se transporta dans un café ; et même, pour faire les choses plus discrètement, on désigna Cisy par H et Frédéric par un K.

Puis on retourna à la caserne. Les officiers étaient sortis. Ils reparurent, et déclarèrent qu'évidemment le choix des armes appartenait à M. H. Tous s'en revinrent chez Cisy. Regimbart et Dussardier restèrent sur le trottoir.

Le Vicomte, en apprenant la solution, fut pris d'un si grand trouble, qu'il se la fit répéter plusieurs fois ; et, quand M. de Comaing en vint aux prétentions de Regimbart, il murmura "cependant", n'étant pas loin, en lui-même, d'y obtempérer. Puis il se laissa choir dans un fauteuil, et déclara qu'il ne se battrait pas.

— "Hein ? comment ?" dit le Baron.

Alors, Cisy s'abandonna à un flux labial désordonné.

Il voulait se battre au tromblon, à bout portant, avec un seul pistolet.

— "Ou bien on mettra de l'arsenic dans un verre, qui sera tiré au sort. Ça se fait quelquefois ; je l'ai lu !"

Le Baron, peu endurant naturellement, le rudoya.

— "Ces messieurs attendent votre réponse. C'est indécent, à la fin ! Que prenez-vous ? voyons ! Est-ce l'épée ?"

Le Vicomte répliqua "oui", par un signe de tête ; et le rendez-vous fut fixé pour le lendemain, à la porte Maillot, à sept heures juste.

Dussardier étant contraint de s'en retourner à ses affaires, Regimbart alla prévenir Frédéric.

On l'avait laissé toute la journée sans nouvelles ; son impatience était devenue intolérable.

— "Tant mieux !" s'écria-t-il.

Le Citoyen fut satisfait de sa contenance.

— "On réclamait de nous des excuses, croiriez-vous ? Ce n'était rien, un simple mot ! Mais je les ai envoyés joliment bouler ! Comme je le devais, n'est-ce pas ?"

— "Sans doute", dit Frédéric tout en songeant qu'il eût mieux fait de choisir un autre témoin.

Puis, quand il fut seul, il se répéta tout haut, plusieurs fois :

— "Je vais me battre. Tiens, je vais me battre ! C'est drôle"

Et, comme il marchait dans sa chambre, en passant devant sa glace, il s'aperçut qu'il était pâle.

— "Est-ce que j'aurais peur ?"

Une angoisse abominable le saisit à l'idée d'avoir peur sur le terrain.

— “Si j’étais tué, cependant ? Mon père est mort de la même façon. Oui, je serai tué”

Et, tout à coup, il aperçut sa mère, en robe noire ; des images incohérentes se déroulèrent dans sa tête. Sa propre lâcheté l’exaspéra. Il fut pris d’un paroxysme de bravoure, d’une soif carnassière. Un bataillon ne l’eût pas fait reculer. Cette fièvre calmée, il se sentit, avec joie, inébranlable. Pour se distraire, il se rendit à l’Opéra, où l’on donnait un ballet. Il écouta la musique, lorgna les danseuses, et but un verre de punch, pendant l’entracte. Mais, en rentrant chez lui, la vue de son cabinet, de ses meubles, où il se retrouvait peut-être pour la dernière fois, lui causa une faiblesse.

Il descendit dans son jardin. Les étoiles brillaient ; il les contempla. L’idée de se battre pour une femme le grandissait à ses yeux, l’ennoblissait. Puis il alla se coucher tranquillement.

Il n’en fut pas de même de Cisy. Après le départ du Baron, Joseph avait tâché de remonter son moral, et, comme le Vicomte demeurerait froid :

— “Pourtant, mon brave, si tu préfères en rester là, j’irai le dire.”

Cisy n’osa répondre “certainement”, mais il en voulut à son cousin de ne pas lui rendre ce service sans en parler.

Il souhaita que Frédéric, pendant la nuit, mourût d’une attaque d’apoplexie, ou qu’une émeute survenant, il y eût le lendemain assez de barricades pour fermer tous les abords du bois de Boulogne. ou qu’un événement empêchât un des témoins de s’y rendre ; car le duel faute de témoins manquerait. Il avait envie de se sauver par un train express n’importe où. Il regretta de ne pas savoir la médecine pour prendre quelque chose qui, sans exposer ses jours, ferait croire à sa mort. Il arriva jusqu’à désirer être malade, gravement.

Afin d’avoir un conseil, un secours, il envoya chercher M. des Aulnays. L’excellent homme était retourné en Saintonge, sur une dépêche lui apprenant l’indisposition d’une de ses filles. Cela parut de mauvais augure à Cisy. Heureusement que M. Vezou, son précepteur, vint le voir. Alors il s’épancha.

— “Comment faire, mon Dieu ! comment faire ?”

— “Moi, à votre place, monsieur le Comte, je payerais un fort de la halle pour lui flanquer une raclée.”

— “Il saurait toujours de qui ça vient !” reprit Cisy.

Et, de temps à autre, il poussait un gémissement — , puis : “Mais est-ce qu’on a le droit de se battre en duel ?”

— “C’est un reste de barbarie ! Que voulez-vous !”

Par complaisance, le pédagogue s’invita lui-même à dîner. Son élève ne mangea rien, et, après le repas, sentit le besoin de faire un tour.

Il dit en passant devant une église :

— “Si nous entrions un peu... pour voir ?”

M. Vezou ne demanda pas mieux, et même lui présenta de l’eau bénite.

C’était le mois de Marie, des fleurs couvraient l’autel, des voix chantaient, l’orgue résonnait. Mais il lui fut impossible de prier, les pompes de la religion lui inspirant des idées de funérailles ; il entendait comme des bourdonnements de De profundis.

— “Allons-nous-en ! Je ne me sens pas bien !”

Ils employèrent toute la nuit à jouer aux cartes. Le Vicomte s’efforça de perdre, afin de conjurer la mauvaise chance, ce dont M. Vezou profita. Enfin, au petit jour, Cisy, qui n’en pouvait plus, s’affaissa sur le tapis vert, et eut un sommeil plein de songes désagréables.

Si le courage, pourtant, consiste à vouloir dominer sa faiblesse, le Vicomte fut courageux, car, à la vue de ses témoins qui venaient le chercher, il se roidit de toutes ses forces, la vanité lui faisant comprendre qu’une reculade le perdrait. M. de Comaing le complimenta sur sa bonne mine.

Mais, en route, le bercement du fiacre et la chaleur du soleil matinal l’énervèrent. Son énergie était retombée. Il ne distinguait même plus où l’on était.

Le Baron se divertit à augmenter sa frayeur, en parlant du “cadavre”, et de la manière de le rentrer en ville, clandestinement. Joseph donnait la réplique ; tous deux, jugeant l’affaire ridicule, étaient persuadés qu’elle s’arrangerait.

Cisy gardait sa tête sur sa poitrine ; il la releva doucement et fit observer qu’on n’avait pas pris de médecin.

— “C’est inutile”, dit le Baron.

— “Il n’y a pas de danger, alors ?”

Joseph répliqua d’un ton grave :

— “Espérons-le !”

Et personne dans la voiture ne paria plus.

A sept heures dix minutes, on arriva devant la porte Maillot. Frédéric et ses témoins s’y trouvaient, habillés de noir tous les trois. Regimbart, au lieu de cravate, avait un col de crin comme un troupier ; et il portait une espèce de longue boîte à violon, spéciale pour ce genre d’aventures. On échangea froidement un salut. Puis tous s’enfoncèrent dans le bois de Boulogne, par la route de Madrid, afin d’y trouver une place convenable.

Regimbart dit à Frédéric, qui marchait entre lui et Dussardier :

— “Eh bien, et cette venette, qu’en fait-on ? Si vous avez besoin de quelque chose, ne vous gênez pas, je connais ça ! La crainte est naturelle à l’homme.” Puis, à voix basse :

“Ne fumez plus, ça amollit !”

Frédéric jeta son cigare qui le gênait, et continua d’un pied ferme. Le Vicomte avançait par derrière, appuyé sur le bras de ses deux témoins.

De rares passants les croisaient. Le ciel était bleu, et on entendait, par moments, des lapins bondir. Au détour d’un sentier, une femme en madras causait avec un homme en blouse, et, dans la grande avenue sous les marronniers, des domestiques en veste de toile promenaient leurs chevaux. Cisy se rappelait les jours heureux où, monté sur son alezan et le lorgnon dans l’oeil, il chevauchait à la portière des calèches ; ces souvenirs renforçaient son angoisse ; une soif intolérable le brûlait — la susurration des mouches se confondait avec le battement de ses artères ; ses pieds enfonçaient dans le sable ; il lui semblait qu’il était en train de marcher depuis un temps infini.

Les témoins, sans s’arrêter, fouillaient de l’oeil les deux bords de la route. On délibéra si l’on irait à la croix Catelan ou sous les murs de Bagatelle. Enfin, on prit à droite ; et on s’arrêta dans une espèce de quinconce, entre des pins.

L’endroit fut choisi de manière à répartir également le niveau du terrain. On marqua les deux places où les adversaires devaient se poser. Puis Regimbart ouvrit sa boîte. Elle contenait, sur un capitonnage de basane rouge, quatre épées charmantes, creuses au milieu, avec des poignées garnies de filigrane. Un rayon lumineux, traversant les feuilles, tomba dessus ; et elles parurent à Cisy briller comme des vipères d'argent sur une mare de sang.

Le Citoyen fit voir qu'elles étaient de longueur pareille ; il prit la troisième pour lui-même, afin de séparer les combattants, en cas de besoin. M. de Comaing tenait une canne. Il y eut un silence. On se regarda. Toutes les figures avaient quelque chose d'effaré ou de cruel.

Frédéric avait mis bas sa redingote et son gilet. Joseph aida Cisy à faire de même ; sa cravate étant retirée, on aperçut à son cou une médaille bénite. Cela fit sourire de pitié Regimbart.

Alors, M. de Comaing (pour laisser à Frédéric encore un moment de réflexion) tâcha d'élever des chicanes. Il réclama le droit de mettre un gant, celui de saisir l'épée de son adversaire avec la main gauche ; Regimbart, qui était pressé, ne s'y refusa pas. Enfin le Baron, s'adressant à Frédéric :

— “Tout dépend de vous, Monsieur ! Il n'y a jamais de déshonneur à reconnaître ses fautes.”

Dussardier l'approuvait du geste. Le Citoyen s'indigna. — “Croyez-vous que nous sommes ici pour plumer les canards, fichtre ?... En garde !”

Les adversaires étaient l'un devant l'autre, leurs témoins de chaque côté. Il cria le signal :

— “Allons !”

Cisy devint effroyablement pâle. Sa lame tremblait par le bout, comme une cravache. Sa tête se renversait, ses bras s'écartèrent, il tomba sur le dos, évanoui. Joseph le releva ; et, tout en lui poussant sous les narines un flacon, il le secouait fortement. Le Vicomte rouvrit les yeux, puis tout à coup, bondit comme un furieux sur son épée. Frédéric avait gardé la sienne ; et il l'attendait, l'oeil fixe. la main haute.

— “Arrêtez, arrêtez !” cria une voix qui venait de la route, en même temps que le bruit d'un cheval au galop ; et la capote d'un cabriolet cassait les branches ! Un homme penché en dehors agitait un mouchoir, et criait toujours : “Arrêtez, arrêtez !”

M. de Comaing, croyant à une intervention de la police, leva sa canne.

— “Finissez donc ! le Vicomte saigne !”

— “Moi ?” dit Cisy.

En effet, il s'était, dans sa chute, écorché le pouce de la main gauche.

— “Mais c’est en tombant”, ajouta le Citoyen.

Le Baron feignit de ne pas entendre.

Arnoux avait sauté du cabriolet.

— “J’arrive trop tard ! Non ! Dieu soit loué !”

Il tenait Frédéric à pleins bras, le palpait, lui couvrait le visage de baisers.

— “Je sais le motif : vous avez voulu défendre votre vieil ami ! C’est bien, cela, c’est bien ! Jamais je ne l’oublierai ! Comme vous êtes bon ! Ah ! cher enfant !” Il le contemplait et versait des larmes, tout en ricanant de bonheur. Le Baron se tourna vers Joseph.

— “Je crois que nous sommes de trop dans cette petite fête de famille. C’est fini, n’est-ce pas, Messieurs ? — Vicomte mettez votre bras en écharpe ; tenez, voilà mon foulard.” Puis, avec un geste impérieux : “Allons ! pas de rancune ! Cela se doit !”

Les deux combattants se serrèrent la main, mollement. Le Vicomte, M. de Comaing et Joseph disparurent d’un côté, et Frédéric s’en alla de l’autre avec ses amis.

Comme le restaurant de Madrid n’était pas loin, Arnoux proposa de s’y rendre pour boire un verre de bière.

— “On pourrait même déjeuner”, dit Regimbart.

Mais, Dussardier n’en ayant pas le loisir, ils se bornèrent à un rafraîchissement, dans le jardin. Tous éprouvaient cette béatitude qui suit les dénouements heureux. Le Citoyen, cependant, était fâché qu’on eût interrompu le duel au bon moment.

Arnoux en avait eu connaissance par un nommé Compain, ami de Regimbart ; et dans un élan de cœur, il était accouru pour l’empêcher, croyant, du reste, en être la cause. Il pria Frédéric de lui fournir là-dessus quelques détails. Frédéric, ému par les preuves de sa tendresse, se fit scrupule d’augmenter son illusion — “De grâce, n’en parlons plus !”

Arnoux trouva cette réserve fort délicate. Puis, avec sa légèreté ordinaire, passant à une autre idée : “Quoi de neuf, Citoyen ?”

Et ils se mirent à causer traites, échéances. Afin d’être plus commodément, ils allèrent même chuchoter à l’écart sur une autre table.

Frédéric distingua ces mots : “Vous allez me souscrire. — Oui !

mais, vous, bien entendu... — Je l'ai négocié enfin pour trois cents ! — Jolie commission, ma foi !" Bref, il était clair qu'Arnoux tripotait avec le Citoyen beaucoup de choses.

Frédéric songea à lui rappeler ses quinze mille francs. Mais sa démarche récente interdisait les reproches, même les plus doux. D'ailleurs, il se sentait fatigué. L'endroit n'était pas convenable. Il remit cela à un autre jour.

Arnoux, assis à l'ombre d'un troène, fumait d'un air hilare. Il leva les yeux vers les portes des cabinets donnant toutes sur le jardin, et dit qu'il était venu là, autrefois, bien souvent.

— "Pas seul, sans doute ?" répliqua le Citoyen.

— "Parbleu !"

— "Quel polisson vous faites ! un homme marié !"

— "Eh bien, et vous donc !" reprit Arnoux ; et, avec un sourire indulgent : "Je suis même sûr que ce gremlin-là possède quelque part, une chambre, où il reçoit des petites filles !"

Le Citoyen confessa que c'était vrai, par un simple haussement de sourcils. Alors, ces deux messieurs exposèrent leurs goûts : Arnoux préférait maintenant la jeunesse, les ouvrières ; Regimbart détestait "les mijaurées" et tenait avant tout au positif. La conclusion, fournie par le marchand de faïence fut qu'on ne devait pas traiter les femmes sérieusement.

— "Cependant, il aime la sienne !" songeait Frédéric, en s'en retournant ; et il le trouvait un malhonnête homme. Il lui en voulait de ce duel, comme si c'eût été pour lui qu'il avait, tout à l'heure, risqué sa vie.

Mais il était reconnaissant à Dussardier de son dévouement ; le commis, sur ses instances, arriva bientôt à lui faire une visite tous les jours.

Frédéric lui prêtait des livres : Thiers, Dulaure, Barante, les Girondins de Lamartine. Le brave garçon l'écoutait avec recueillement et acceptait ses opinions comme celles d'un maître.

Il arriva un soir tout effaré.

Le matin, sur le boulevard, un homme qui courait à perdre haleine s'était heurté contre lui ; et, l'ayant reconnu pour un ami de Sénécals, lui avait dit — "On vient de le prendre, je me sauve !" Rien de plus vrai. Dussardier avait passé la journée aux informations. Sénécals était sous les verrous, comme prévenu d'attentat politique.

Fils d'un contremaître, né à Lyon et ayant eu pour professeur un ancien disciple de Chaliar, dès son arrivée à Paris, il s'était fait recevoir de la Société des Familles ; ses habitudes étaient connues ; la police le surveillait. Il s'était battu dans l'affaire de mai 1839, et, depuis lors se tenait à l'ombre, mais s'exaltant de plus en plus, fanatique d'Alibaud, mêlant ses griefs contre la société à ceux du peuple contre la monarchie, et s'éveillant chaque matin avec l'espoir d'une révolution qui, en quinze jours ou un mois, changerait le monde. Enfin, écœuré par la mollesse de ses frères, furieux des retards qu'on opposait à ses rêves et désespérant de la patrie, il était entré comme chimiste dans le complot des bombes incendiaires ; et on l'avait surpris portant de la poudre qu'il allait essayer à Montmartre, tentative suprême pour établir la République.

Dussardier ne la chérissait pas moins, car elle signifiait, croyait-il, affranchissement et bonheur universel. Un jour, — à quinze ans, — dans la rue Transnonain, devant la boutique d'un épicier, il avait vu des soldats la baïonnette rouge de sang, avec des cheveux collés à la crosse de leur fusil ; depuis ce temps-là, le Gouvernement l'exaspérait comme l'incarnation même de l'Injustice. Il confondait un peu les assassins et les gendarmes ; un mouchard valait à ses yeux un parricide. Tout le mal répandu sur la terre, il l'attribuait naïvement au Pouvoir ; et il le haïssait d'une haine essentielle, permanente, qui lui tenait tout le cœur et raffina sa sensibilité. Les déclamations de Sénécals l'avaient ébloui. Qu'il fût coupable ou non, et sa tentative odieuse, peu importait ! Du moment qu'il était la victime de l'Autorité, on devait le servir.

— "Les Pairs le condamneront, certainement ! Puis il sera emmené dans une voiture cellulaire, comme un galérien et on l'enfermera au Mont-Saint-Michel, où le Gouvernement les fait mourir ! Austen est devenu fou ! Steuben s'est tué ! Pour transférer Barbès dans un cachot, on l'a tiré par les jambes, par les cheveux ! On lui piétinait le corps, et sa tête rebondissait à chaque marche tout le long de l'escalier. Quelle abomination ! les Misérables !"

Des sanglots de colère l'étouffaient, et il tournait dans la chambre, comme pris d'une grande angoisse.

— "Il faudrait faire quelque chose, cependant Voyons ! moi, je ne sais pas ! Si nous tâchions de le délivrer, hein ? Pendant qu'on le mènera au Luxembourg, on peut se jeter sur l'escorte dans le couloir ! Une douzaine d'hommes déterminés, ça passe partout."

Il y avait tant de flamme dans ses yeux, que Frédéric en tressaillit.

Sénécald lui apparut plus grand qu'il ne croyait. Il se rappela ses souffrances, sa vie austère ; sans avoir pour lui l'enthousiasme de Dussardier, il éprouvait néanmoins cette admiration qu'inspire tout homme se sacrifiant à une idée. Il se disait que, s'il l'eût secouru, Sénécald n'en serait pas là ; et les deux amis cherchèrent laborieusement quelque combinaison pour le sauver.

Il leur fut impossible de parvenir jusqu'à lui.

Frédéric s'enquêrait de son sort dans les journaux, et pendant trois semaines fréquenta les cabinets de lecture.

Un jour, plusieurs numéros du Flambarb lui tombèrent sous la main. L'article de fond, invariablement, était consacré à démolir un homme illustre. Venaient ensuite les nouvelles du monde, les cancans. Puis, on blaguait l'Odéon, Carpentras, la pisciculture, et les condamnés à mort quand il y en avait. La disparition d'un paquebot fournit matière à plaisanteries pendant un an. Dans la troisième colonne, un courrier des arts donnait, sous forme d'anecdote ou de conseil, des réclames de tailleurs, avec des comptes rendus de soirées, des annonces de ventes, des analyses d'ouvrages, traitant de la même encre un volume de vers et une paire de bottes. La seule partie sérieuse était la critique des petits théâtres, où l'on s'acharnait sur deux ou trois directeurs ; et les intérêts de l'Art étaient invoqués à propos des décors des Funambules ou d'une amoureuse des Délassements.

Frédéric allait rejeter tout cela quand ses yeux rencontrèrent un article intitulé : Une poulette entre trois cocos. C'était l'histoire de son duel, narrée en style sémillant, gaulois. Il se reconnut sans peine, car il était désigné par cette plaisanterie, laquelle revenait souvent : "Un jeune homme du collège de Sens et qui en manque.", On le représentait même comme un pauvre diable de provincial, un obscur nigaud tâchant de frayer avec les grands seigneurs. Quant au Vicomte, il avait le beau rôle, d'abord dans le souper, où il s'introduisait de force, ensuite dans le pari, puisqu'il emmenait la demoiselle, et finalement sur le terrain, où il se comportait en gentilhomme. La bravoure de Frédéric n'était pas niée, précisément, mais on faisait comprendre qu'un intermédiaire, le protecteur lui-même, était survenu juste à temps. Le tout se terminait par cette phrase, grosse peut-être de perfidies :

“D'où vient leur tendresse ? Problème ! et, comme dit Bazile, qui diable est-ce qu'on trompe ici”

C'était, sans le moindre doute, une vengeance d'Hussonnet contre Frédéric, pour son refus des cinq mille francs.

Que faire ? S'il lui en demandait raison, le bohème protesterait de son innocence, et il n'y gagnerait rien. Le mieux était d'avaler la chose silencieusement. Personne, après tout, ne lisait le Flambar.

En sortant du cabinet de lecture, il aperçut du monde devant la boutique d'un marchand de tableaux. On regardait un portrait de femme, avec cette ligne écrite au bas en lettres noires : “Mlle Rose-Annette Bron, appartenant à M. Frédéric Moreau, de Nogent.”

C'était bien elle, — ou à peu près, — vue de face, les seins découverts, les cheveux dénoués, et tenant dans ses mains une bourse de velours rouge, tandis que, par derrière, un paon avançait son bec sur son épaule, en couvrant la muraille de ses grandes plumes en éventail.

Pellerin avait fait cette exhibition pour contraindre Frédéric au paiement, persuadé qu'il était célèbre et que tout Paris, s'animant en sa faveur, allait s'occuper de cette misère.

Etait-ce une conjuration ? Le peintre et le journaliste avaient-ils monté leur coup ensemble ?

Son duel n'avait rien empêché. Il devenait ridicule, tout le monde se moquait de lui.

Trois jours après, à la fin de juin, les actions du Nord ayant fait quinze francs de hausse, comme il en avait acheté deux mille l'autre mois, il se trouva gagner trente mille francs. Cette caresse de la fortune lui redonna confiance. Il se dit qu'il n'avait besoin de personne, que tous ses embarras venaient de sa timidité, de ses hésitations. Il aurait dû commencer avec la Maréchale brutalement, refuser Hussonnet dès le premier jour, ne pas se compromettre avec Pellerin ; et, pour montrer que rien ne le gênait, il se rendit chez Mme Dambreuse, à une de ses soirées ordinaires.

Au milieu de l'antichambre, Martinon, qui arrivait en même temps que lui, se retourna.

— “Comment, tu viens ici, toi ?” avec l'air surpris et même contrarié de le voir.

— “Pourquoi pas ?”

Et, tout en cherchant la cause d’un tel abord, Frédéric s’avança dans le salon.

La lumière était faible. malgré les lampes posées dans les coins ; car les trois fenêtres, grandes ouvertes, dressaient parallèlement trois larges carrés d’ombre noire. Des jardinières, sous les tableaux, occupaient jusqu’à hauteur d’homme les intervalles de la muraille ; et une théière d’argent avec un samovar se mirait au fond, dans une glace. Un murmure de voix discrètes s’élevait. On entendait des escarpins craquer sur le tapis.

Il distingua des habits noirs, puis une table ronde éclairée par un grand abat-jour, sept ou huit femmes en toilettes d’été, et, un peu plus loin, Mme Dambreuse dans un fauteuil à bascule. Sa robe de taffetas lilas avait des manches à crevés, d’où s’échappaient des bouillons de mousseline, le ton doux de l’étoffe se mariant à la nuance de ses cheveux ; et elle se tenait quelque peu renversée en arrière, avec le bout de son pied sur un coussin, — tranquille comme une œuvre d’art pleine de délicatesse, une fleur de haute culture.

M. Dambreuse et un vieillard à chevelure blanche se promenaient dans toute la longueur du salon. Quelques-uns s’entretenaient au bord des petits divans, çà et là les autres, debout, formaient un cercle au milieu.

Ils causaient de votes, d’amendements, de sous-amendements, du discours de M. Grandin, de la réplique de M. Benoist. Le tiers parti décidément allait trop loin ! Le centre gauche aurait dû se souvenir un peu mieux de ses origines ! Le ministère avait reçu de graves atteintes ! Ce qui devait rassurer pourtant, c’est qu’on ne lui voyait point de successeur. Bref, la situation était complètement analogue à celle de 1834.

Comme ces choses ennuyaient Frédéric, il se rapprocha des femmes. Martinon était près d’elles, debout, le chapeau sous le bras, la figure de trois quarts, et si convenable, qu’il ressemblait à de la porcelaine de Sèvres. Il prit une Revue des Deux Mondes traînant sur la table, entre une Imitation et un Annuaire de Gotha, et jugea de haut un poète illustre, dit qu’il allait aux conférences de Saint-François, se plaignit de son larynx, avalait de temps à autre une boule de gomme ; et cependant, parlait musique, faisait le léger. Mlle Cécile, la nièce de M. Dambreuse, qui se brodait une paire de manchettes, le regardait, en dessous, avec ses prunelles d'un bleu pâle ; et miss John, l'institutrice à nez camus, en avait lâché sa tapisserie ; toutes deux paraissaient s'écrier intérieurement

— “Qu'il est beau !”

Mme Dambreuse se tourna vers lui — “Donnez-moi donc mon éventail, qui est sur cette console, là-bas. Vous vous trompez ! l'autre !”

Elle se leva ; et, comme il revenait, ils se rencontrèrent au milieu du salon, face à face ; elle lui adressa quelques mots, vivement, des reproches sans doute, à en juger par l'expression altière de sa figure ; Martinon tâchait de sourire ; puis il alla se mêler au conciliabule des hommes sérieux. Mme Dambreuse reprit sa place, et, se penchant sur le bras de son fauteuil, elle dit à Frédéric :

— “J'ai vu quelqu'un, avant-hier, qui m'a parlé de vous, M. de Cisy ; vous le connaissez, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Oui... un peu.”

Tout à coup Mme Dambreuse s'écria :

— “Duchesse, ah ! quel bonheur !”

Et elle s'avança jusqu'à la porte, au-devant d'une vieille petite dame, qui avait une robe de taffetas carmélite et un bonnet de guipure, à longues pattes. Fille d'un compagnon d'exil du comte d'Artois et veuve d'un maréchal de l'Empire créé pair de France en 1830, elle tenait à l'ancienne cour comme à la nouvelle et pouvait obtenir beaucoup de choses. Ceux qui causaient debout s'écartèrent, puis reprirent leur discussion.

Maintenant, elle roulait sur le paupérisme, dont toutes les peintures, d'après ces messieurs, étaient fort exagérées.

— “Cependant”, objecta Martinon, “la misère existe, avouons-le ! Mais le remède ne dépend ni de la Science ni du Pouvoir. C'est une question purement individuelle. Quand les basses classes voudront se débarrasser de leurs vices, elles s'affranchiront de leurs besoins. Que le peuple soit plus moral, et il sera moins pauvre !”

Suivant M. Dambreuse, on n'arriverait à rien de bien sans une surabondance du capital. Donc, le seul moyen possible était de confier, “comme le voulaient, du reste, les saint-simoniens (mon Dieu, ils avaient du bon ! soyons justes envers tout le monde), de confier, dis-je, la cause du Progrès à ceux qui peuvent accroître la fortune publique” . Insensiblement on aborda les grandes exploitations industrielles, les chemins de fer, la houille. Et M. Dambreuse, s’adressant à Frédéric, lui dit tout bas :

— “Vous n’êtes pas venu pour notre affaire.” Frédéric alléguait une maladie ; mais, sentant que l’excuse était trop bête :

— “D’ailleurs, j’ai eu besoin de mes fonds.”

— “Pour acheter une voiture ?” reprit Mme Dambreuse, qui passait près de lui, une tasse de thé à la main ; et elle le considéra pendant une minute, la tête un peu tournée sur son épaule.

Elle le croyait l’amant de Rosanette l’allusion était claire. Il sembla même à Frédéric que toutes les dames le regardaient de loin, en chuchotant. Pour mieux voir ce qu’elles pensaient, il se rapprocha d’elles, encore une fois.

De l’autre côté de la table, Martinon, auprès de Mlle Cécile, feuilletait un album. C’étaient des lithographies représentant des costumes espagnols. Il lisait tout haut les légendes : — Femme de Séville, — Jardinier de Valence, — Picador andalou ” ; et, descendant une fois jusqu’au bas de la page, il continua d’une haleine :

— “Jacques Arnoux, éditeur. — Un de tes amis, hein ?”

— “C’est vrai”, dit Frédéric, blessé par son air.

M<sup>me</sup> Dambreuse reprit :

— “En effet, vous êtes venu, un matin... pour... une maison, je crois ? oui, une maison appartenant à sa femme.” (Cela signifiait : “C’est votre maîtresse.” )

Il rougit jusqu’aux oreilles ; et M. Dambreuse, qui arrivait au même moment, ajouta :

— “Vous paraissiez même vous intéresser beaucoup à eux.” Ces derniers mots achevèrent de déconter Frédéric.

Son trouble, que l’on voyait, pensait-il, allait confirmer les soupçons, quand M. Dambreuse lui dit de plus près, d’un ton grave :

— “Vous ne faites pas d’affaires ensemble, je suppose ?”

Il protesta par des secousses de tête multipliées, sans comprendre l’intention du capitaliste, qui voulait lui donner un conseil de sembler lâche. Il avait envie de partir. La peur le retint. Un domestique enlevait les tasses de thé ; M<sup>me</sup> Dambreuse causait avec un diplomate en habit bleu, deux jeunes filles, rapprochant leurs fronts, se faisaient voir une bague ; les autres, assises en demi-cercle sur des fauteuils, remuaient doucement leurs blancs visages, bordés de chevelures noires ou blondes ; personne enfin ne s'occupait de lui. Frédéric tourna les talons ; et, par une suite de longs zigzags, il avait presque gagné la porte, quand, passant près d'une console, il remarqua dessus, entre un vase de Chine et la boiserie, un journal plié en deux. Il le tira quelque peu, et lut ces mots : le Flambard.

Qui l'avait apporté ? Cisy ! Pas un autre évidemment. Qu'importait, du reste ! Ils allaient croire, tous déjà croyaient peut-être à l'article. Pourquoi cet acharnement ? Une ironie silencieuse l'enveloppait. Il se sentait comme perdu dans un désert. Mais la voix de Martinon s'éleva :

— " A propos d'Arnoux, j'ai lu parmi les prévenus des bombes incendiaires, le nom d'un de ses employés. Sénecal. Est-ce le nôtre ?

— "Lui-même", dit Frédéric.

Martinon répéta, en criant très haut :

— "Comment, notre Sénecal ! notre Sénecal" Alors, on le questionna sur le complot ; sa place d'attaché au parquet devait lui fournir des renseignements.

Il confessa n'en pas avoir. Du reste, il connaissait fort peu le personnage, l'ayant vu deux ou trois fois seulement, et le tenait en définitive pour un assez mauvais drôle. Frédéric, indigné, s'écria :

— "Pas du tout ! c'est un très honnête garçon !"

— "Cependant, monsieur", dit un propriétaire, "on n'est pas honnête quand on conspire !"

La plupart des hommes qui étaient là avaient servi, au moins, quatre gouvernements ; et ils auraient vendu la France ou le genre humain, pour garantir leur fortune, s'épargner un malaise, un embarras, ou même par simple bassesse, adoration instinctive de la force. Tous déclarèrent les crimes politiques inexcusables. Il fallait plutôt pardonner à ceux qui provenaient du besoin ! Et on ne manqua pas de mettre en avant l'éternel exemple du père de famille, volant l'éternel morceau de pain chez l'éternel boulanger.

Un administrateur s'écria même :

— "Moi, monsieur, si j'apprenais que mon frère conspire, je le dénoncerais !"

Frédéric invoqua le droit de résistance ; et. se rappelant quelques phrases que lui avait dites Deslauriers, il cita Desolmes, Blackstone, le bill des droits en Angleterre, et l'article 2 de la Constitution de 91. C'était même en vertu de ce droit-là qu'on avait proclamé la déchéance de Napoléon ; il avait été reconnu en 1830, inscrit en tête de la Charte.

— “D’ailleurs, quand le souverain manque au contrat, la justice veut qu’on le renverse.”

— “Mais c’est abominable !” exclama la femme d’un préfet.

Toutes les autres se taisaient, vaguement épouvantées, comme si elles eussent entendu le bruit des balles. Mme Dambreuse se balançait dans son fauteuil, et l’écoutait parler en souriant.

Un industriel, ancien carbonaro tâcha de lui démontrer que les d’Orléans étaient une belle famille sans doute, il y avait des abus...

— “Eh bien, alors ?”

— “Mais on ne doit pas les dire, cher monsieur ! Si vous saviez comme toutes ces criailleries de l’opposition nuisent aux affaires !”

— “Je me moque des affaires !” reprit Frédéric.

La pourriture de ces vieux l’exaspérait ; et, emporté par la bravoure qui saisit quelquefois les plus timides, il attaqua les financiers, les députés, le Gouvernement, le Roi, prit la défense des Arabes, débitait beaucoup de sottises. Quelques-uns l’encourageaient ironiquement : “Allez donc ! continuez !” tandis que d’autres murmuraient : “Diable ! quelle exaltation !” Enfin, il jugea convenable de se retirer ; et, comme il s’en allait, M. Dambreuse lui dit, faisant allusion à la place de secrétaire :

— “Rien n’est terminé encore ! Mais dépêchez-vous !” Et Mme Dambreuse :

— “A bientôt, n’est-ce pas ?”

Frédéric jugea leur adieu une dernière moquerie. était déterminé à ne jamais revenir dans cette maison, à ne plus fréquenter tous ces gens-là. Il croyait les avoir blessés, ne sachant pas quel large fonds d’indifférence le monde possède ! Ces femmes surtout l’indignaient. Pas une qui l’eût soutenu, même du regard. Il leur en voulait de ne pas les avoir émues. Quant à Mme Dambreuse, il lui trouvait quelque chose à la fois de langoureux et de sec, qui empêchait de la définir par une formule. Avait-elle un amant ? Quel amant ? Était-ce le diplomate ou un autre ? Martinon, peut-être ? Impossible ! Cependant, il éprouvait une espèce de jalousie contre lui, et envers elle une malveillance inexplicable.

Dussardier, venu ce soir-là comme d'habitude, l'attendait. Frédéric avait le cœur gonflé ; il le dégorgea, et ses griefs, bien que vagues et difficiles à comprendre, attristèrent le brave commis ; il se plaignait même de son isolement. Dussardier, en hésitant un peu, proposa de se rendre chez Deslauriers.

Frédéric, au nom de l'avocat, fut pris par un besoin extrême de le revoir. Sa solitude intellectuelle était profonde, et la compagnie de Dussardier insuffisante. Il lui répondit d'arranger les choses comme il voudrait.

Deslauriers, également, sentait depuis leur brouille une privation dans sa vie. Il céda sans peine à des avances cordiales.

Tous deux s'embrassèrent, puis se mirent à causer de choses indifférentes.

La réserve de Deslauriers attendrit Frédéric ; et, pour lui faire une sorte de réparation, il lui conta le lendemain sa perte de quinze mille francs, sans dire que ces quinze mille francs lui étaient primitivement destinés. L'avocat n'en douta pas, néanmoins. Cette mésaventure, qui lui donnait raison dans ses préjugés contre Arnoux, désarma tout à fait sa rancune ; et il ne paria point de l'ancienne promesse.

Frédéric, trompé par son silence, crut qu'il l'avait oubliée. Quelques jours après, il lui demanda s'il n'existait pas de moyens de rentrer dans ses fonds, on pouvait discuter les hypothèques précédentes, attaques Arnoux comme stellionataire, faire des poursuites au domicile contre la femme.

— “Non ! non ! pas contre elle !” s'écria Frédéric ; et, cédant aux questions de l'ancien clerc, il avoua la vérité.

Deslauriers fut convaincu qu'il ne la disait pas complètement, par délicatesse sans doute. Ce défaut de confiance le blessa.

Ils étaient, cependant, aussi liés qu'autrefois, et même ils avaient tant de plaisir à se trouver ensemble, que la présence de Dussardier les gênait. Sous prétexte de rendez-vous, ils arrivèrent à s'en débarrasser peu à peu. Il y a des hommes n'ayant pour mission parmi les autres que de servir d'intermédiaires ; on les franchit comme des ponts, et l'on va plus loin.

Frédéric ne cachait rien à son ancien ami. Il lui dit l'affaire des houilles, avec la proposition de M. Dambreuse. L'avocat devint rêveur.

— “C'est drôle ! il faudrait pour cette place quelqu'un d'assez fort en droit !”

— “Mais tu pourras m'aider”, reprit Frédéric. — “Oui.... tiens.... parbleu ! certainement.” Dans la même semaine, il lui montra une lettre de sa mère.

Mme Moreau s'accusait d'avoir mal jugé M. Roque, lequel avait donné de sa conduite des explications satisfaisantes. Puis elle parlait de sa fortune, et de la possibilité, pour plus tard, d'un mariage avec Louise.

— “Ce ne serait peut-être pas bête !” dit Deslauriers Frédéric s'en rejeta loin ; le père Roque, d'ailleurs, était un vieux filou. Cela n'y faisait rien, selon l'avocat.

A la fin de juillet, une baisse inexplicable fit tomber les actions du Nord. Frédéric n'avait pas vendu les siennes ; il perdit d'un seul coup soixante mille francs. Ses revenus se trouvaient sensiblement diminués. Il devait ou restreindre sa dépense, ou prendre un état, ou faire un beau mariage.

Alors, Deslauriers lui parla de Mlle Roque. Rien ne l'empêchait d'aller voir un peu les choses par lui-même. Frédéric était un peu fatigué ; la province et la maison maternelle le délasseraient. Il partit.

L'aspect des rues de Nogent, qu'il monta sous le clair de la lune, le reporta dans de vieux souvenirs ; et il éprouvait une sorte d'angoisse, comme ceux qui reviennent après de longs voyages.

Il y avait chez sa mère tous les habitués d'autrefois : MM. Gamblin, Heudras et Chambrion, la famille Lebrun, “ces demoiselles Auger” ; de plus, le père Roque, et, en face de Mme Moreau, devant une table de jeu, Mlle Louise. C'était une femme, à présent. Elle se leva, en poussant un cri. Tous s'agitèrent. Elle était restée immobile, debout ; et les quatre flambeaux d'argent posés sur la table augmentaient sa pâleur. Quand elle se remit à jouer, sa main tremblait. Cette émotion flatta démesurément Frédéric, dont l'orgueil était malade ; il se dit : “Tu m'aimeras, toi !” et, prenant sa revanche des déboires qu'il avait essuyés là-bas, il se mit à faire le Parisien, le lion, donna des nouvelles des théâtres, rapporta des anecdotes du monde, puisées dans les petits journaux, enfin éblouit ses compatriotes.

Le lendemain, Mme Moreau s'étendit sur les qualités de Louise ; puis énuméra les bois, les fermes qu'elle posséderait. La fortune de M. Roque était considérable.

Il l'avait acquise en faisant des placements pour M. Dambreuse ; car il prêtait à des personnes pouvant offrir de bonnes garanties hypothécaires, ce qui lui permettait de demander des suppléments ou des commissions. Le capital, grâce à une surveillance active, ne risquait rien. D'ailleurs, le père Roque n'hésitait jamais devant une saisie ; puis il rachetait à bas prix les biens hypothéqués, et M. Dambreuse, voyant ainsi rentrer ses fonds, trouvait ses affaires très bien faites.

Mais cette manipulation extra-légale le compromettait vis-à-vis de son régisseur. Il n'avait rien à lui refuser. C'était sur ses instances qu'il avait si bien accueilli Frédéric.

En effet, le père Roque couvait au fond de son âme une ambition. Il voulait que sa fille fût comtesse ; et, pour y parvenir, sans mettre en jeu le bonheur de son enfant, il ne connaissait pas d'autre jeune homme que celui-là.

Par la protection de M. Dambreuse, on lui ferait avoir le titre de son aïeul, Mme Moreau étant la fille d'un comte de Fouvens, apparentée, d'ailleurs, aux plus vieilles familles champenoises, les Lavernade, les d'Etrigny. Quant aux Moreau, une inscription gothique, près des moulins de Villeneuve-l'Archevêque, parlait d'un Jacob Moreau qui les avait réédifiés en 1596 ; et la tombe de son fils, Pierre Moreau, premier écuyer du roi sous Louis XIV, se voyait dans la chapelle Saint-Nicolas.

Tant d'honorabilité fascinait M. Roque, fils d'un ancien domestique. Si la couronne comtale ne venait pas, il s'en consolait sur autre chose ; car Frédéric pouvait parvenir à la députation quand M. Dambreuse serait élevé à la pairie, et alors l'aider dans ses affaires, lui obtenir des fournitures, des concessions. Le jeune homme lui plaisait, personnellement. Enfin il le voulait pour gendre, parce que, depuis longtemps, il s'était féru de cette idée, qui ne faisait que s'accroître.

Maintenant, il fréquentait l'église et il avait séduit Mme Moreau par l'espoir du titre, surtout. Elle s'était gardée cependant de faire une réponse décisive.

Donc, huit jours après, sans qu'aucun engagement eut été pris, Frédéric passait pour “le futur” de Mlle Louise ; et le père Roque, peu scrupuleux, les laissait ensemble quelquefois.

CHAPITRE 5

Deslauriers avait emporté de chez Frédéric la copie de l'acte de subrogation 188, avec une procuration en bonne forme lui conférant de pleins pouvoirs ; mais, quand il eut remonté ses cinq étages, et qu'il fut seul, au milieu de son triste cabinet, dans son fauteuil de basane, la vue du papier timbré l'écœura.

Il était las de ces choses, et des restaurants à trente-deux sous, des voyages en omnibus, de sa misère, de ses efforts. Il reprit les paperasses ; d'autres se trouvaient à côté ; c'étaient les prospectus de la compagnie houillère avec la liste des mines et le détail de leur contenance, Frédéric lui ayant laissé tout cela pour avoir dessus son opinion.

Une idée lui vint : celle de se présenter chez M. Dambreuse, et de demander la place de secrétaire. Cette Place, bien sûr, n'allait pas sans l'achat d'un certain nombre d'actions. Il reconnut la folie de son projet et se dit :

— “Oh non ! ce serait mal.”

Alors, il chercha comment s'y prendre pour recouvrer les quinze mille francs. Une pareille somme n'était rien pour Frédéric ! Mais, s'il l'avait eue, lui, quel levier ! Et l'ancien clerc s'indigna que la fortune de l'autre fût grande.

— “Il en fait un usage pitoyable. C'est un égoïste. Eh je me moque bien de ses quinze mille francs !”

Pourquoi les avait-il Prêtés ? Pour les beaux yeux de Mme Arnoux. Elle était sa maîtresse ! Deslauriers n'en doutait pas. “Voilà une chose de plus à quoi sert l'argent !” Des pensées haineuses l'envahirent.

Puis, il songea à la personne même de Frédéric. Elle avait toujours exercé sur lui un charme presque féminin ; et il arriva bientôt à l'admirer pour un succès dont il se reconnaissait incapable.

Cependant, est-ce que la volonté n'était pas l'élément capital des entreprises ? et, puisque avec elle on triomphe de tout...

— “Ah ! ce serait drôle !”

Mais il eut honte de cette perfidie, et, une minute après :

— “Bah ! est-ce que j'ai peur ?”

Mme Arnoux (à force d'en entendre parler) avait fini par se peindre dans son imagination extraordinairement. La persistance de cet amour l'irritait comme un problème. Son austérité un peu théâtrale l'ennuyait maintenant. D'ailleurs, la femme du monde (ou ce qu'il jugeait telle) éblouissait l'avocat comme le symbole et le résumé de mille plaisirs inconnus. Pauvre, il convoitait le luxe sous sa forme la plus claire.

— “Après tout, quand il se fâcherait, tant pis ! Il s'est trop mal comporté envers moi, pour que je me gêne ! Rien ne m'assure qu'elle est sa maîtresse ! Il me l'a nié. Donc, je suis libre !”

Le désir de cette démarche ne le quitta plus. C'était une épreuve de ses forces qu'il voulait faire ; — si bien qu'un jour, tout à coup, il vernit lui-même ses bottes, acheta des gants blancs, et se mit en route, se substituant à Frédéric et s'imaginant presque être lui, par une singulière évolution intellectuelle, où il y avait à la fois de la vengeance et de la sympathie, de l'imitation et de l'audace.

Il fit annoncer “le docteur Deslauriers.”

Mme Arnoux fut surprise, n'ayant réclamé aucun médecin.

Ah ! mille excuses ! c'est docteur en droit. Je viens pour les intérêts de M. Moreau.”

Ce nom parut la troubler.

— “Tant mieux !” pensa l'ancien clerc ; “puisqu'elle a bien voulu de lui, elle voudra de moi !” s'encourageant par l'idée reçue qu'il est plus facile de supplanter un amant qu'un mari.

Il avait eu le plaisir de la rencontrer, une fois, au Palais ; il cita même la date. Tant de mémoire étonna Mme Arnoux. Il reprit d'un ton doux :

— “Vous aviez déjà... quelques embarras... dans vos affaires !”

Elle ne répondit rien ; donc, c'était vrai.

Il se mit à causer de choses et d'autres, de son logement, de la fabrique ; puis, apercevant, aux bords de la glace, des médaillons :

— “Ah ! des portraits de famille, sans doute ?”

Il remarqua celui d'une vieille femme, la mère de Mme Arnoux.

— “Elle a l'air d'une excellente personne, un type méridional.”

Et, sur l'objection qu'elle était de Chartres.

— “Chartres ! jolie ville.”

Il en vanta la cathédrale et les pâtés ; puis, revenant au portrait, y trouva des ressemblances avec Mme Arnoux, et lui lançait des flatteries indirectement. Elle n'en fut pas choquée. Il prit confiance et dit qu'il connaissait Arnoux depuis longtemps.

— "C'est un brave garçon ! mais qui se compromet ! Pour cette hypothèque, par exemple, on n'imagine pas..."

— "Oui ! je sais", dit-elle, en haussant les épaules.

Ce témoignage involontaire de mépris engagea Deslauriers à poursuivre.

— "Son histoire de kaolin, vous l'ignorez peut-être, a failli tourner très mal, et même sa réputation..."

Un froncement de sourcils l'arrêta.

Alors se rabattant sur les généralités, il plaignit les pauvres femmes dont les époux gaspillent la fortune...

— "Mais elle est à lui, monsieur ; moi, je n'ai rien !" N'importe ! On ne savait pas... Une personne d'expérience pouvait servir. Il fit des offres de dévouement, exalta ses propres mérites — , et il la regardait en face, à travers ses lunettes qui miroitaient.

Une torpeur vague la prenait ; mais, tout à coup :

— "Voyons l'affaire, je vous prie !"

Il exhiba le dossier.

— "Ceci est la procuration de Frédéric. Avec un titre pareil aux mains d'un huissier qui fera un commandement, rien n'est plus simple : dans les vingt-quatre heures..." (Elle restait impassible, il changea de manœuvre.) "Moi, du reste, je ne comprends pas ce qui le pousse à réclamer cette somme ; car enfin il n'en a aucun besoin !"

— "Comment ! M. Moreau s'est montré assez bon..."

— "Oh ! d'accord !"

Et Deslauriers entama son éloge, puis vint à le dénigrer, tout doucement, le donnant pour oublieux, personnel, avare.

— "Je le croyais votre ami, monsieur ?"

— "Cela ne m'empêche pas de voir ses défauts. Ainsi, il reconnaît bien peu... comment dirais-je ? la sympathie..."

Mme Arnoux tournait les feuilles du gros cahier. Elle l'interrompit, pour avoir l'explication d'un mot.

Il se pencha sur son épaule, et si près d'elle, qu'il effleura sa joue. Elle rougit ; cette rougeur enflamma Deslauriers ; il lui baisa la main voracement.

— “Que faites-vous, monsieur !”

Et, debout contre la muraille, elle le maintenait immobile, sous ses grands yeux noirs irrités.

Elle partit d'un éclat de rire, un rire aigu, désespérant, atroce. Deslauriers sentit une colère à l'étrangler. Il se contint ; et, avec la mine d'un vaincu, demandant grâce :

— “Ah ! vous avez tort ! Moi, je n'irais pas comme lui...”

— “De qui donc parlez-vous ?”

— “De Frédéric !”

— “Eh ! M. Moreau m'inquiète peu, je vous l'ai dit !”

— “Oh ! pardon !... pardon !”

Puis, d'une voix mordante, et faisant traîner ses phrases :

— “Je croyais même que vous vous intéressiez suffisamment à sa personne, pour apprendre avec plaisir...”

Elle devint toute pâle. L'ancien clerc ajouta :

— “Il va se marier.”

— “Lui !”

— “Dans un mois, au plus tard, avec Mlle Roque, la fille du régisseur de M. Dambreuse. Il est même parti à Nogent, rien que pour cela.”

Elle porta la main sur son cœur, comme au choc d'un grand coup ; mais tout de suite elle tira la sonnette, Deslauriers n'attendit pas qu'on le mît dehors. Quand elle se retourna, il avait disparu.

Mme Arnoux suffoquait un peu. Elle s'approcha de la fenêtre pour respirer.

De l'autre côté de la rue, sur le trottoir, un emballer en manches de chemise clouait une caisse. Des fiacres passaient. Elle ferma la croisée et vint se rasseoir. Les hautes maisons voisines interceptant le soleil, un jour froid tombait dans l'appartement. Ses enfants étaient sortis, rien ne bougeait autour d'elle. C'était comme une désertion immense.

— “Il va se marier ! est-ce possible ?”

Et un tremblement nerveux la saisit.

— “Pourquoi cela ? est-ce que je l'aime ?”

Puis, tout à coup :

— “Mais oui, je l'aime !... je l'aime !”

Il lui semblait descendre dans quelque chose de profond, qui n'en finissait plus. La pendule sonna trois heures. Elle écouta les vibrations du timbre mourir. Et elle restait au bord de son fauteuil, les prunelles fixes, et souriant toujours.

La même après-midi, au même moment, Frédéric et Mlle Louise se promenaient dans le jardin que M. Roque possédait au bout de l'île. La vieille Catherine les surveillait, de loin ; ils marchaient côte à côte, et Frédéric disait :

— “Vous souvenez-vous quand je vous emmenais dans la campagne ?”

— “Comme vous étiez bon pour moi !” répondit-elle. “Vous m’aidiez à faire des gâteaux avec du sable, à remplir mon arrosoir, à me balancer sur l’escarpolette !”

— “Toutes vos poupées, qui avaient des noms de reines ou de marquises, que sont-elles devenues ?”

— “Ma foi, je n’en sais rien !”

— “Et votre roquet Moricaud !”

— “Il s’est noyé, le pauvre chéri !”

— “Et le Don Quichotte, dont nous colorions ensemble les gravures”

— “Je l’ai encore !”

Il lui rappela le jour de sa première communion, et comme elle était gentille aux vêpres, avec son voile blanc et son grand cierge, pendant qu’elles défilaient toutes autour du chœur, et que la cloche tintait.

Ces souvenirs, sans doute, avaient peu de charme pour Mlle Roque elle ne trouva rien à répondre ; et, une minute après :

— “Méchant ! qui ne m’a pas donné une seule fois de ses nouvelles !”

Frédéric objecta ses nombreux travaux.

— “Qu’est-ce donc que vous faites ?”

Il fut embarrassé de la question, puis dit qu’il étudiait la politique.

— “Ah !”

Et, sans en demander davantage :

— “Cela vous occupe, mais moi !...”

Alors, elle lui conta l’aridité de son existence, n’ayant personne à voir, pas le moindre plaisir, la moindre distraction ! Elle désirait monter à cheval.

— “Le Vicaire prétend que c’est inconvenant pour une jeune fille ; est-ce bête, les convenances ! Autrefois, on me laissait faire tout ce que je voulais ; à présent, rien !”

— “Votre père vous aime, pourtant !”

— “Oui ; mais...”

Et elle poussa un soupir, qui signifiait : “Cela ne suffit pas à mon bonheur.”

Puis, il y eut un silence. Ils n’entendaient que le craquement du sable sous leurs pieds avec le murmure de la chute d’eau ; car la Seine, au-dessus de Nogent, est coupée en deux bras. Celui qui fait tourner les moulins dégorge en cet endroit la surabondance de ses ondes, pour rejoindre plus bas le cours naturel du fleuve ; et, lorsqu’on vient des ponts, on aperçoit, à droite sur l’autre berge, un talus de gazon que domine une maison blanche. A gauche, dans la prairie, des peupliers s’étendent, et l’horizon, en face, est borné par une courbe de la rivière ; elle était plate comme un miroir ; de grands insectes patinaient sur l’eau tranquille. Des touffes de roseaux et des joncs la bordent inégalement ; toutes sortes de plantes venues là s’épanouissaient en boutons d’or, laissaient pendre des grappes jaunes, dressaient des quenouilles de fleurs amarantes, faisaient au hasard des fusées vertes. Dans une anse du rivage, des nymphéas s’étaient étalés ; et un rang de vieux saules cachant des pièges à loup était, de ce côté de l’île, toute la défense du jardin.

En deçà, dans l’intérieur, quatre murs à chaperon d’ardoises enfermaient le potager, où les carrés de terre, labourés nouvellement, formaient des plaques brunes. Les cloches des melons brillaient à la file sur leur couche étroite ; les artichauts, les haricots, les épinards, les carottes et les tomates alternaient jusqu’à un plant d’asperges, qui semblait un petit bois de plumes.

Tout ce terrain avait été, sous le Directoire, ce qu’on appelait une folie. Les arbres, depuis lors, avaient démesurément grandi. De la clématite embarrassait les charmilles, les allées étaient couvertes de mousse, partout les ronces foisonnaient. Des tronçons de statue émiettaient leur plâtre sous les herbes. On se prenait en marchant dans quelques débris d’ouvrage en fil de fer. Il ne restait plus du pavillon que deux chambres au rez-de-chaussée avec des lambeaux de papier bleu. Devant la façade s’allongeait une treille à l’italienne, où, sur des piliers en brique, un grillage de bâtons supportait une vigne.

Ils vinrent là-dessous tous les deux, et, comme la lumière tombait par les trous inégaux de la verdure, Frédéric, en parlant à Louise de côté, observait l'ombre des feuilles sur son visage.

Elle avait dans ses cheveux rouges, à son chignon, une aiguille terminée par une boule de verre imitant l'émeraude ; et elle portait, malgré son deuil (tant son mauvais goût était naïf), des pantoufles en paille garnies de satin rose, curiosité vulgaire, achetées sans doute dans quelque foire.

Il s'en aperçut, et l'en complimenta ironiquement.

— “Ne vous moquez pas de moi !” reprit-elle.

Puis, le considérant tout entier, depuis son chapeau de feutre gris jusqu'à ses chaussettes de soie :

— “Comme vous êtes coquet !”

Ensuite, elle le pria de lui indiquer des ouvrages à lire. Il en nomma plusieurs ; et elle dit :

— “Oh ! comme vous êtes savant !”

Toute petite, elle s'était prise d'un de ces amours d'enfant qui ont à la fois la pureté d'une religion et la violence d'un besoin. Il avait été son camarade, son frère, son maître, avait amusé son esprit, fait battre son cœur et versé involontairement jusqu'au fond d'elle-même une ivresse latente et continue. Puis il l'avait quittée en pleine crise tragique, sa mère à peine morte, les deux désespoirs se confondant. L'absence l'avait idéalisé dans son souvenir ; il revenait avec une sorte d'auréole, et elle se livrait ingénument au bonheur de le voir.

Pour la première fois de sa vie, Frédéric se sentait aimé ; et ce plaisir nouveau, qui n'excédait pas l'ordre des sentiments agréables, lui causait comme un gonflement intime ; si bien qu'il écarta les deux bras, en se renversant la tête.

Un gros nuage passait alors sur le ciel.

— “Il va du côté de Paris”, dit Louise ; “vous voudriez le suivre, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Moi ! pourquoi ?”

— “Qui sait ?”

Et, le fouillant d'un regard aigu :

— “Peut-être que vous avez là-bas... (elle chercha le mot), quelque affection.”

— “Eh ! je n'ai pas d'affection !”

— “Bien sûr ?”

— “Mais oui, mademoiselle, bien sûr !”

En moins d’un an, il s’était fait dans la jeune fille une transformation extraordinaire qui étonnait Frédéric.

Après une minute de silence, il ajouta :

— “Nous devrions nous tutoyer, comme autrefois ; voulez-vous ?”

— “Non.”

— “Pourquoi ?”

— “Parce que.”

Il insistait. Elle répondit, en baissant la tête :

— “Je n’ose pas.”

Ils étaient arrivés au bout du jardin, sur la grève du Livon. Frédéric, par gaminerie, se mit à faire des ricochets avec un caillou. Elle lui ordonna de s’asseoir. Il obéit ; puis, en regardant la chute d’eau :

— “C’est comme le Niagara !”

Il vint à parier des contrées lointaines et de grands voyages. L’idée d’en faire la charmait. Elle n’aurait eu peur de rien, ni des tempêtes, ni des lions.

Assis, l’un près de l’autre, ils ramassaient devant eux des poignées de sable, puis les faisaient couler de leurs mains tout en causant ; — et le vent chaud qui arrivait des plaines leur apportait par bouffées des senteurs de lavande, avec le parfum du goudron s’échappant d’une barque, derrière l’écluse. Le soleil frappait la cascade ; les blocs verdâtres du petit mur où l’eau coulait apparaissaient comme sous une gaze d’argent se déroulant toujours. Une longue barre d’écume rejaillissait au pied, en cadence. Cela formait ensuite des bouillonnements, des tourbillons, mille courants opposés, et qui finissaient par se confondre en une seule nappe limpide.

Louise murmura qu’elle enviait l’existence des poissons.

— “Ça doit être si doux de se rouler là-dedans, à son aise, de se sentir caressé partout.”

Et elle frémissait, avec des mouvements d’une câlinerie sensuelle.

Mais une voix cria :

— “Où es-tu ?”

— “Votre bonne vous appelle”, dit Frédéric.

— “Bien ! bien !”

Louise ne se dérangeait pas.

— “Elle va se fâcher”, reprit-il.

— “Cela m’est égal ! et d’ailleurs...”, Mlle Roque faisant comprendre, par un geste, qu’elle la tenait à sa discrétion.

Elle se leva pourtant, puis se plaignit de mal de tête. Et, comme ils passaient devant un vaste hangar qui contenait des bourrées :

— “Si nous nous mettions dessous, à l’égaud ?”

Il feignit de ne pas comprendre ce mot de patois, et même la taquina sur son accent. Peu à peu, les coins de sa bouche se pincèrent, elle mordait ses lèvres ; elle s’écarta pour boudier.

Frédéric la rejoignit, jura qu’il n’avait pas voulu lui faire de mal et qu’il l’aimait beaucoup.

— “Est-ce vrai ?” s’écria-t-elle, en le regardant avec un sourire qui éclairait tout son visage, un peu semé de taches de son.

Il ne résista pas à cette bravoure de sentiment, à la fraîcheur de sa jeunesse, et il reprit :

— “Pourquoi te mentirais-je ?... tu en doutes... hein ?” en lui passant le bras gauche autour de la taille.

Un cri, suave comme un roucoulement, jaillit de sa gorge ; sa tête se renversa, elle défaillait, il la soutint. Et les scrupules de sa probité furent inutiles ; devant cette vierge qui s’offrait, une peur l’avait saisi. Il l’aïda ensuite à faire quelques pas, doucement. Ses caresses de langage avaient cessé, et ne voulant plus dire que des choses insignifiantes, il lui parlait des personnes de la société nogentaise.

Tout à coup elle le repoussa, et, d’un ton amer :

— “Tu n’aurais pas le courage de m’emmener !”

Il resta immobile avec un grand air d’ébahissement. Elle éclata en sanglots, et s’enfonçant la tête dans sa poitrine :

— “Est-ce que je peux vivre sans toi !”

Il tâchait de la calmer. Elle lui mit ses deux mains sur les épaules pour le mieux voir en face, et, dardant contre les siennes ses prunelles vertes, d’une humidité presque féroce :

— “Veux-tu être mon mari ?”

— “Mais...”, répliqua Frédéric, cherchant quelque réponse. “Sans doute... Je ne demande pas mieux.”

A ce moment la casquette de M. Roque apparut derrière un lilas.

Il emmena son “jeune ami” pendant deux jours faire un petit voyage aux environs, dans ses propriétés ; et Frédéric, lorsqu’il revint, trouva chez sa mère trois lettres.

La première était un billet de M. Dambreuse l'invitant à dîner pour le mardi précédent. A propos de quoi cette politesse ? On lui avait donc pardonné son incartade ?

La seconde était de Rosanette. Elle le remerciait d'avoir risqué sa vie pour elle ; Frédéric ne comprit pas d'abord ce qu'elle voulait dire ; enfin, après beaucoup d'ambages, elle implorait de lui, en invoquant son amitié, se fiant à sa délicatesse, à deux genoux, disait-elle, vu la nécessité pressante, et comme on demande du pain, un petit secours de cinq cents francs. Il se décida tout de suite à les fournir.

La troisième lettre, venant de Deslauriers, parlait de la subrogation, et était longue, obscure. L'avocat n'avait pris encore aucun parti. Il l'engageait à ne pas se déranger : "C'est inutile que tu reviennes !" appuyant même là-dessus avec une insistance bizarre.

Frédéric se perdit dans toutes sortes de conjectures, et il eut envie de s'en retourner là-bas ; cette prétention au gouvernement de sa conduite le révoltait.

D'ailleurs, la nostalgie du boulevard commençait à le prendre ; et puis sa mère le pressait tellement, M. Roque tournait si bien autour de lui et Mlle Louise l'aimait si fort, qu'il ne pouvait rester plus longtemps sans se déclarer. Il avait besoin de réfléchir, et jugerait mieux les choses dans l'éloignement.

Pour motiver son voyage, Frédéric inventa une histoire ; et il partit, en disant à tout le monde et croyant lui-même qu'il reviendrait bientôt.

CHAPITRE 6

Son retour à Paris ne lui causa point de plaisir ; c'était le soir, à la fin du mois d'août, le boulevard semblait vide, les passants se succédaient avec des mines refrognées, çà et là une chaudière d'asphalte fumait, beaucoup de maisons avaient leurs persiennes entièrement closes ; il arriva chez lui ; de la poussière couvrait les tentures ; et, en dînant tout seul, Frédéric fut pris par un étrange sentiment d'abandon ; alors il songea à Mlle Roque.

L'idée de se marier ne lui paraissait plus exorbitante. Ils voyageraient, ils iraient en Italie, en Orient Et il l'apercevait debout sur un monticule, contemplant un paysage, ou bien appuyée à son bras dans une galerie florentine, s'arrêtant devant les tableaux. Quelle joie ce serait que de voir ce bon petit être s'épanouir aux splendeurs de l'Art et de la Nature ! Sortie de son milieu, en peu de temps, elle ferait une compagne charmante. La fortune de M. Roque le tentait, d'ailleurs. Cependant, une pareille détermination lui répugnait comme une faiblesse, un avilissement.

Mais il était bien résolu (quoi qu'il dût faire) à changer d'existence, c'est-à-dire à ne plus perdre son cœur dans des passions infructueuses, et même il hésitait à remplir la commission dont Louise l'avait chargé. C'était d'acheter pour elle, chez Jacques Arnoux, deux grandes statuettes polychromes représentant des nègres, comme ceux qui étaient à la préfecture de Troyes. Elle connaissait le chiffre du fabricant, n'en voulait pas d'un autre. Frédéric avait peur, s'il retournait chez eux, de tomber encore une fois dans son vieil amour.

Ces réflexions l'occupèrent toute la soirée ; et il allait se coucher quand une femme entra.

— “C'est moi”, dit en riant Mlle Vatnaz. “Je viens de la part de Rosanette.”

Elles s'étaient donc réconciliées ?

— “Mon Dieu, oui ! Je ne suis pas méchante, vous savez bien. Au surplus, la pauvre fille... Ce serait trop long à vous conter.”

Bref, la Maréchale désirait le voir, elle attendait une réponse, sa lettre s'étant proménée de Paris à Nogent Mlle Vatnaz ne savait point ce qu'elle contenait. Alors, Frédéric s'informa de la Maréchale.

Elle était, maintenant, avec un homme très riche, un Russe, le prince Tzernoukoff, qui l'avait vue aux courses du Champ de Mars, l'été dernier.

— “On a trois voitures, cheval de selle, livrée, groom dans le chic anglais, maison de campagne, loge aux Italiens, un tas de choses encore. Voilà, mon cher.”

Et la Vatnaz, comme si elle eût profité à ce changement de fortune, paraissait plus gaie, tout heureuse. Elle retira ses gants et examina dans la chambre les meubles et les bibelots. Elle les cotait à leur prix juste, comme un brocanteur. Il aurait dû la consulter pour les obtenir à meilleur compte ; et elle le félicitait de son bon goût :

— “Ah ! c'est mignon, extrêmement bien ! Il n'y a que vous pour ces idées.”

Puis, apercevant au chevet de l'alcôve une porte :

— “C'est par là qu'on fait sortir les petites femmes, hein ?”

Et, amicalement, elle lui prit le menton. Il tressaillit au contact de ses longues mains, tout à la fois maigres et douces. Elle avait autour des poignets une bordure de dentelle et sur le corsage de sa robe verte des passementeries, comme un hussard. Son chapeau de tulle noir, à bords descendants, lui cachait un peu le front ; ses yeux brillaient là-dessous ; une odeur de patchouli s'échappait de ses bandeaux ; la carcel posée sur un guéridon, en l'éclairant d'en bas comme une rampe de théâtre, faisait saillir sa mâchoire et tout à coup, devant cette femme laide qui avait dans la taille des ondulations de panthère, Frédéric sentit une convoitise énorme, un désir de volupté bestiale.

Elle lui dit d'une voix onctueuse, en tirant de son porte-monnaie trois carrés de papier :

— “Vous allez me prendre ça !”

C'était trois places pour une représentation au bénéfice de Delmar.

— “Comment ! lui ?”

— “Certainement !”

Mlle Vatnaz, sans s'expliquer davantage, ajouta qu'elle l'adorait plus que jamais. Le comédien, à l'en croire, se classait définitivement parmi “les sommités de l'époque”. Et ce n'était pas tel ou tel personnage qu'il représentait, mais le génie même de la France, le Peuple ! Il avait “l'âme humanitaire ; il comprenait le sacerdoce de l'Art" Frédéric, pour se délivrer de ces éloges, lui donna l'argent des trois places.

— "Inutile que vous en parliez là-bas ! — Comme il est tard, mon Dieu ! Il faut que je vous quitte. Ah ! j'oubliais l'adresse : c'est rue Grange-Batelière, 14."

Et, sur le seuil :

— "Adieu, homme aimé !"

— "Aimé de qui ?" se demanda Frédéric. "Quelle singulière personne !"

Et il se ressouvint que Dussardier lui avait dit un jour, à propos d'elle : "Oh ! ce n'est pas grand-chose !" comme faisant allusion à des histoires peu honorables.

Le lendemain, il se rendit chez la Maréchale. Elle habitait une maison neuve, dont les stores avançaient sur la rue. Il y avait à chaque palier une glace contre le mur, une jardinière rustique devant les fenêtres, tout le long des marches un tapis de toile ; et, quand on arrivait du dehors, la fraîcheur de l'escalier délassait.

Ce fut un domestique mâle qui vint ouvrir, un valet en gilet rouge. Dans l'antichambre, sur la banquette, une femme et deux hommes, des fournisseurs sans doute attendaient, comme dans un vestibule de ministre. A gauche, la porte de la salle à manger, entrebâillée, laissait apercevoir des bouteilles vides sur les buffets, des serviettes au dos des chaises ; et parallèlement s'étendait une galerie, où des bâtons couleur d'or soutenaient un espalier de roses. En bas, dans la cour, deux garçons, les bras nus, frottaient un landau. Leur voix montait jusque-là, avec le bruit intermittent d'une étrille que l'on heurtait contre une pierre.

Le domestique revint. "Madame allait recevoir monsieur" ; et il lui fit traverser une deuxième antichambre, puis un grand salon, tendu de brocatelle jaune, avec des torsades dans les coins qui se rejoignaient sur le plafond et semblaient continuées par les rinceaux du lustre ayant la forme de câbles. On avait sans doute festoyé la nuit dernière. De la cendre de cigare était restée sur les consoles.

Enfin, il entra dans une espèce de boudoir qu'éclairaient confusément des vitraux de couleur. Des trèfles en bois découpé ornaient le dessus des portes ; derrière une balustrade, trois matelas de pourpre formaient divan, et le tuyau d'un narghilé de platine traînait dessus. La cheminée, au lieu de miroir, avait une étagère pyramidale, offrant sur ses gradins toute une collection de curiosités : de vieilles montres d'argent, des cornets de Bohême, des agrafes en pierreries, des boutons de jade, des émaux, des magots, une petite vierge byzantine à chape de vermeil ; et tout cela se fondait dans un crépuscule doré, avec la couleur bleuâtre du tapis, le reflet de nacre des tabourets, le ton fauve des murs couverts de cuir marron. Aux angles, sur des piédouches, des vases de bronze contenaient des touffes de fleurs qui alourdisaient l'atmosphère.

Rosanette parut, habillée d'une veste de satin rose, avec un pantalon de cachemire blanc, un collier de piastres, et une calotte rouge entourée d'une branche de jasmin.

Frédéric fit un mouvement de surprise ; puis dit qu'il apportait "la chose en question", en lui présentant le billet de banque.

Elle le regarda fort ébahie ; et, comme il avait toujours le billet à la main, sans savoir où le poser :

— "Prenez-le donc"

Elle le saisit ; puis, l'ayant jeté sur le divan :

— "Vous êtes bien aimable."

C'était pour solder un terrain à Bellevue, qu'elle payait ainsi par annuités. Un tel sans-façon blessa Frédéric. Du reste, tant mieux ! cela le vengeait du passé.

— "Asseyez-vous !" dit-elle, "là, plus près." Et, d'un ton grave : "D'abord, j'ai à vous remercier, mon cher, d'avoir risqué votre vie."

— "Oh ! ce n'est rien !"

— "Comment, mais c'est très beau !"

Et la Maréchale lui témoigna une gratitude embarrassante ; car elle devait penser qu'il s'était battu exclusivement pour Arnoux, celui-ci, qui se l'imaginait, ayant dû céder au besoin de le dire.

— "Elle se moque de moi, peut-être", songeait Frédéric.

il n'avait plus rien à faire, et, alléguant un rendez-vous, il se leva.

— "Eh non ! Restez !"

Il se rassit et la complimenta sur son costume.

Elle répondit, avec un air d'accablement :

— "C'est le Prince qui m'aime comme ça ! Et il faut fumer des machines pareilles", ajouta Rosanette, en montrant le narghilé. "Si nous en goûtions ? voulez-vous ?"

On apporta du feu, le tombac s'allumant difficilement, elle se mit à trépigner d'impatience. Puis une langueur la saisit ; et elle restait immobile sur le divan, un coussin sous l'aisselle, le corps un peu tordu, un genou plié, l'autre jambe toute droite. Le long serpent de maroquin rouge, qui formait des anneaux par terre, s'enroulait à son bras. Elle en appuyait le bec d'ambre sur ses lèvres et regardait Frédéric, en clignant les yeux, à travers la fumée dont les volutes l'enveloppaient. L'aspiration de sa poitrine faisait gargouiller l'eau, et elle murmurait de temps à autre :

— “Ce pauvre mignon ! ce pauvre chéri !”

Il tâchait de trouver un sujet de conversation agréable l'idée de la Vatnaz lui revint.

Il dit qu'elle lui avait semblé fort élégante.

— “Parbleu !” reprit la Maréchale. “Elle est bienheureuse de m'avoir, celle-là !” sans ajouter un mot de plus, tant il y avait de restriction dans leurs propos.

Tous les deux sentaient une contrainte, un obstacle. En effet, le duel dont Rosanette se croyait la cause avait flatté son amour-propre. Puis elle s'était fort étonnée qu'il n'accourût pas se prévaloir de son action ; et, pour le contraindre à revenir, elle avait imaginé ce besoin de cinq cents francs. Comment se faisait-il que Frédéric ne demandait pas en retour un peu de tendresse ! C'était un raffinement qui l'émerveillait, et, dans un élan de cœur, elle lui dit :

— “Voulez-vous venir avec nous aux bains de mer ?”

— “Qui cela, nous ?”

— “Moi et mon oiseau ; je vous ferais passer pour mon cousin, comme dans les vieilles comédies.”

— “Mille grâces !”

— “Eh bien, alors, vous prendrez un logement près du nôtre.”

L'idée de se cacher d'un homme riche l'humiliait.

— “Non ! cela est impossible.”

— “A votre aise !”

Rosanette se détourna, ayant une larme aux paupières. Frédéric l'aperçut ; et, pour lui marquer de l'intérêt, il se dit heureux de la voir, enfin, dans Une excellente position.

Elle fit un haussement d'épaules. Qui donc l'affligeait ? Etait-ce, par hasard, qu'on ne l'aimait pas ? — “Oh ! moi, on m'aime toujours !”

Elle ajouta :

— “Reste à savoir de quelle manière.”

Se plaignant, d'étouffer de chaleur ", la Maréchale défit sa veste ; et, sans autre vêtement autour des reins que sa chemise de soie, elle inclinait la tête sur son épaule, avec un air d'esclave plein de provocations.

Un homme d'un égoïsme moins réfléchi n'eût pas songé que le Vicomte, M. de Comaing ou un autre pouvait survenir. Mais Frédéric avait été trop de fois la dupe de ces mêmes regards pour se compromettre dans une humiliation nouvelle.

Elle voulut connaître ses relations, ses amusements ; elle arriva même à s'informer de ses affaires, et à offrir de lui prêter de l'argent, s'il en avait besoin. Frédéric, n'y tenant plus, prit son chapeau.

— “Allons, ma chère, bien du plaisir là-bas ; au revoir !”

Elle écarquilla les yeux ; puis, d'un ton sec :

— “Au revoir !”

Il repassa par le salon jaune et par la seconde antichambre. Il y avait sur la table, entre un vase plein de cartes de visite et une écritoire, un coffret d'argent ciselé. C'était celui de Mme Arnoux ! Alors, il éprouva un attendrissement, et en même temps comme le scandale d'une profanation. Il avait envie d'y porter les mains, de l'ouvrir. Il eut peur d'être aperçu, et s'en alla.

Frédéric fut vertueux. Il ne retourna point chez Arnoux.

Il envoya son domestique acheter les deux nègres, lui ayant fait toutes les recommandations indispensables ; et la caisse partit, le soir même, pour Nogent. Le lendemain, comme il se rendait chez Deslauriers, au détour de la rue Vivienne et du boulevard, Mme Arnoux se montra devant lui, face à face.

Leur premier mouvement fut de reculer ; puis, le même sourire leur vint aux lèvres, et ils s'abordèrent. Pendant une minute, aucun des deux ne parla.

Le soleil l'entourait ; — et sa figure ovale, ses longs sourcils, son châle de dentelle noire, moulant la forme de ses épaules, sa robe de soie gorge-de-pigeon, le bouquet de violettes au coin de sa capote, tout lui parut d'une splendeur extraordinaire. Une suavité infinie s'épanchait de ses beaux yeux ; et, balbutiant, au hasard, les premières paroles venues :

— “Comment se porte Arnoux ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Je vous remercie.”

— “Et vos enfants ?”

— “Ils vont très bien.”

— “Ah !... ah... Quel beau temps nous avons, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Magnifique, c'est vrai.”

— “Vous faites des courses ?”

— “Oui.”

Et avec une lente inclination de tête :

— “Adieu !”

Elle ne lui avait pas tendu la main, n'avait pas dit un seul mot affectueux, ne l'avait même pas invité à venir chez elle, n'importe ! il n'eût point donné cette rencontre pour la plus belle des aventures ; et il en ruminait la douceur tout en continuant sa route.

Deslauriers, surpris de le voir, dissimula son dépit, — car il conservait par obstination quelque espérance encore du côté de Mme Arnoux ; et il avait écrit à Frédéric de rester là-bas, pour être plus libre dans ses manœuvres.

Il dit cependant qu'il s'était présenté chez elle, afin de savoir si leur contrat stipulait la communauté ; alors, on aurait pu recourir contre la femme ; “et elle a fait une drôle de mine quand je lui ai appris ton mariage.”

— “Tiens ! quelle invention !”

— “Il le fallait, pour montrer que tu avais besoin de tes capitaux ! Une personne indifférente n'aurait pas eu l'espèce de syncope qui l'a prise.”

— “Vraiment ?” s'écria Frédéric.

— “Ah ! mon gaillard, tu te trahis ! Sois franc, voyons !”

Une lâcheté immense envahit l'amoureux de Mme Arnoux.

— “Mais non !... je t'assure !... ma parole d'honneur”

Ces molles dénégations achevèrent de convaincre Deslauriers. Il lui fit des compliments. Il lui demanda “des détails” . Frédéric n'en donna pas, et même résista à l'envie d'en inventer.

Quant à l'hypothèque, il lui dit de ne rien faire, d'attendre. Deslauriers trouva qu'il avait tort, et même fut brutal dans ses remontrances.

Il était d'ailleurs plus sombre, malveillant et irascible que jamais. Dans un an, si la fortune ne changeait pas, il s'embarquerait pour l'Amérique ou se ferait sauter la cervelle. Enfin il paraissait si furieux contre tout et d'un radicalisme tellement absolu que Frédéric ne put s'empêcher de lui dire :

— “Te voilà comme Sénécal.”

Deslauriers, à ce propos, lui apprit qu'il était sorti de Sainte-Pélagie, l'instruction n'ayant point fourni assez de preuves, sans doute, pour le mettre en jugement.

Dans la joie de cette délivrance, Dussardier voulut “offrir un punch”, et pria Frédéric “d'en être”, en l'avertissant toutefois qu'il se trouverait avec Hussonnet, lequel s'était montré excellent pour Sénécal.

En effet, le Flambard venait de s'adjoindre un cabinet d'affaires, portant sur ses prospectus : “Comptoir des vignobles. — Office de publicité. — Bureau de recouvrements et renseignements, etc.” Mais le bohème craignait que son industrie ne fît du tort à sa considération littéraire, et il avait pris le mathématicien pour tenir les comptes. Bien que la place fût médiocre, Sénécal, sans elle, serait mort de faim. Frédéric ne voulant point affliger le brave commis, accepta son invitation.

Dussardier, trois jours d'avance, avait ciré lui-même les pavés rouges de sa mansarde, battu le fauteuil et épousseté la cheminée, où l'on voyait sous un globe une pendule d'albâtre entre une stalactite et un coco. Comme ses deux chandeliers et son bougeoir n'étaient pas suffisants, il avait emprunté au concierge deux flambeaux ; et ces cinq luminaires brillaient sur la commode, que recouvraient trois serviettes, afin de supporter plus décentement des macarons, des biscuits, une brioche et douze bouteilles de bière. En face, contre la muraille tendue d'un papier jaune, une petite bibliothèque en acajou contenait les Fables de Lachambeaudie, les Mystères de Paris, le Napoléon, de Norvins — et, au milieu de l'alcôve, souriait, dans un cadre de palissandre, le visage de Béranger !

Les convives étaient (outre Deslauriers et Sénécal) un pharmacien nouvellement reçu, mais qui n'avait pas les fonds nécessaires pour s'établir ; un jeune homme de sa maison, un placeur de vins, un architecte et un monsieur employé dans les assurances. Regimbart n'avait pu venir. On le regretta.

Ils accueillirent Frédéric avec de grandes marques de sympathie, tous connaissant par Dussardier son langage chez M. Dambreuse. Sénecal se contenta de lui offrir la main, d'un air digne.

Il se tenait debout contre la cheminée. Les autres, assis et la pipe aux lèvres, l'écoutaient discourir sur le suffrage universel, d'où devait résulter le triomphe de la Démocratie, l'application des principes de l'Evangile. Du reste, le moment approchait ; les banquets réformistes se multipliaient dans les provinces ; le Piémont, Naples, la Toscane...

— “C'est vrai”, dit Deslauriers, lui coupant net la parole, “ça ne peut pas durer plus longtemps !” Et il se mit à faire un tableau de la situation.

Nous avons sacrifié la Hollande pour obtenir de l'Angleterre la reconnaissance de Louis-Philippe ; et cette fameuse alliance anglaise, elle était perdue, grâce aux mariages espagnols ! En Suisse, M. Guizot, à la remorque de l'Autrichien, soutenait les traités de 1815. La Prusse avec son Zollverein nous préparait des embarras. La question d'Orient restait pendante.

— “Ce n'est pas une raison parce que le grand-duc Constantin envoie des présents à M. d'Aumale Il pour se fier à la Russie. Quant à l'intérieur, jamais on n'a vu tant d'aveuglement, de bêtise ! Leur majorité même ne se tient plus Partout, enfin, c'est, selon le mot connu, rien ! rien ! rien Et, devant tant de hontes”, poursuivit l'avocat en mettant ses poings sur ses hanches, “ils se déclarent satisfaits”

Cette allusion à un vote célèbre provoqua des applaudissements. Dussardier déboucha une bouteille de bière la mousse éclaboussa les rideaux, il n'y prit garde ; il chargeait les pipes, coupait la brioche, en offrait, était descendu plusieurs fois pour voir si le punch allait venir ; et on ne tarda pas à s'exalter, tous ayant contre le Pouvoir la même exaspération. Elle était violente, sans autre cause que la haine de l'injustice ; et ils mêlaient aux griefs légitimes les reproches les plus bêtes.

Le pharmacien gémit sur l'état pitoyable de notre flotte. Le courtier d'assurances ne tolérait pas les deux flotte. Le courtier d'assurances ne tolérait pas les deux sentinelles du maréchal Soult. Deslauriers dénonça les jésuites, qui venaient de s'installer à Lille, publiquement. Sénecal exérait bien plus M. Cousin ; car l'éclectisme enseignant à tirer la certitude de la raison, développait l'égoïsme, détruisait la solidarité ; le placeur de vins, comprenant peu ces matières, remarqua tout haut qu'il oubliait bien des infamies :

— “Le wagon royal de la ligne du Nord doit coûter quatre-vingt mille francs ! Qui le payera ?”

— “Oui, qui le payera ?” reprit l'employé de commerce, furieux comme si on eût puisé cet argent dans sa poche.

Il s'ensuivit des récriminations contre les loups-cerviers de la Bourse et la corruption des fonctionnaires. On devait remonter plus haut, selon Sénécals, et accuser, tout d'abord, les princes, qui ressuscitaient les mœurs de la Régence.

— “N'avez-vous pas vu, dernièrement, les amis du duc de Montpensier revenir de Vincennes, ivres sans doute, et troubler par leurs chansons les ouvriers du faubourg Saint-Antoine”

— “On a même crié : A bas les voleurs !” dit le pharmacien. “J'y étais, j'ai crié !”

— “Tant mieux ! le Peuple enfin se réveille depuis le procès Teste-Cubières !”

— “Moi, ce procès-là m'a fait de la peine”, dit Dussardier, “parce que ça déshonore un vieux soldat !”

— “Savez-vous”, continua Sénécals, “qu'on a découvert chez la duchesse de Praslin ?”

Mais un coup de pied ouvrit la porte. Hussonnet entra.

— “Salut, messeigneurs !”, dit-il en s'asseyant sur le lit. Aucune allusion ne fut faite à son article, qu'il regrettait, du reste. la Maréchale l'en ayant tancé vertement. Il venait de voir, au théâtre de Dumas, le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, et “trouvait ça embêtant”.

Un jugement pareil étonna les démocrates, — ce drame, par ses tendances, ses décors plutôt, caressant leurs passions. Ils protestèrent. Sénécals, pour en finir, demanda si la pièce servait la Démocratie.

— “Oui... peut-être ; mais c'est d'un style...”

— “Eh bien, elle est bonne, alors ; qu'est-ce que le style ? c'est l'idée !”

Et, sans permettre à Frédéric de parler :

— “J'avais donc que, dans l'affaire Praslin...” Hussonnet l'interrompt.

— “Ah ! voilà encore une rengaine, celle-là ! M'embête-t-elle !”

— “Et d’autres que vous !” répliqua Deslauriers. “Elle a fait saisir rien que cinq journaux ! Ecoutez-moi cette note.”

Et, ayant tiré son calepin, il lut :

— “Nous avons subi, depuis l’établissement de la meilleure des républiques, douze cent vingt-neuf procès de presse, d’où il est résulté pour les écrivains : trois mille cent quarante et un ans de prison, avec la légère somme de sept millions cent dix mille cinq cents francs d’amende. — C’est coquet, hein ?”

Tous ricanèrent amèrement. Frédéric, animé comme les autres, reprit :

— “La Démocratie pacifique a un procès pour son feuilleton, un roman intitulé la Part des Femmes.”

— “Allons ! bon !” dit Hussonnet. “Si on nous défend notre part des femmes !”

— “Mais qu’est-ce qui n’est pas défendu ?” s’écria Deslauriers. “Il est défendu de fumer dans le Luxembourg, défendu de chanter l’hymne à Pie IX !”

— “Et on interdit le banquet des typographes !” articula une voix sourde.

C’était celle de l’architecte, caché par l’ombre de l’alcôve, et silencieux jusqu’à présent. Il ajouta que, la semaine dernière, on avait condamné pour outrages au Roi, un nommé Rouget.

— “Rouget est frit !” dit Hussonnet.

Cette plaisanterie parut tellement inconvenante à Sénécals, qu’il lui reprocha de défendre “le jongleur de l’hôtel de ville, l’ami du traître Dumouriez.”

— “Moi ? au contraire !”

Il trouvait Louis-Philippe poncif, garde national, tout ce qu’il y avait de plus épiciier et bonnet de coton ! Et, mettant la main sur son cœur, le bohème débita les phrases sacramentelles : — “C’est toujours avec un nouveau plaisir... — La nationalité polonaise ne périra pas... — Nos grands travaux seront poursuivis... — Donnez-moi de l’argent pour ma petite famille...” Tous riaient beaucoup, le proclamant un gaillard délicieux, plein d’esprit ; la joie redoubla à la vue du bol de punch qu’un limonadier apportait.

Les flammes de l’alcool et celles des bougies échauffèrent vite l’appartement ; et la lumière de la mansarde, traversant la cour, éclairait en face le bord d'un toit, avec le tuyau d'une cheminée qui se dressait en noir sur la nuit. Ils parlaient très haut, tous à la fois ; ils avaient retiré leurs redingotes, ils heurtaient les meubles, ils choquaient les verres.

Hussonnet s'écria :

— “Faites monter des grandes dames, pour que ce soit plus Tour de Nesle couleur locale, et rembranesque, palsambleu !”

Et le pharmacien, qui tournait le punch indéfiniment, entonna à pleine poitrine :

J'ai deux grands bœufs dans mon étable,

Deux grands bœufs blancs...

Sénécal lui mit la main sur la bouche, il n'aimait pas le désordre ; et les locataires apparaissaient à leurs carreaux, surpris du tapage insolite qui se faisait dans le logement de Dussardier.

Le brave garçon était heureux, et dit que ça lui rappelait leurs petites séances d'autrefois, au quai Napoléon ; plusieurs manquaient cependant, “ainsi Pellerin...”

— “On peut s'en passer”, reprit Frédéric.

Et Deslauriers s'informa de Martinon.

— “Que devient-il, cet intéressant Monsieur ?” Aussitôt Frédéric, épanchant le mauvais vouloir qu'il lui portait, attaqua son esprit, son caractère, sa fausse élégance, l'homme tout entier. C'était bien un spécimen de paysan parvenu ! L'aristocratie nouvelle, la bourgeoisie, ne valait pas l'ancienne, la noblesse. Il soutenait cela ; et les démocrates approuvaient, — comme s'il avait fait partie de l'une et qu'ils eussent fréquenté l'autre. On fut enchanté de lui. Le pharmacien le compara même à M. d'Alton-Shée qui, bien que pair de France, défendait la cause du Peuple.

L'heure de s'en aller était venue. Tous se séparèrent avec de grandes poignées de main ; Dussardier, par tendresse, reconduisit Frédéric et Deslauriers. Dès qu'ils furent dans la rue, l'avocat eut l'air de réfléchir, et, après un moment de silence :

— “Tu lui en veux donc beaucoup, à Pellerin ?” Frédéric ne cacha pas sa rancune.

Le peintre, cependant, avait retiré de la montre le fameux tableau. On ne devait pas se brouiller pour des vétilles ! A quoi bon se faire un ennemi ?

— “Il a cédé à un mouvement d’humeur, excusable dans un homme qui n’a pas le sou. Tu ne peux pas comprendre ça, toi !”

Et, Deslauriers remonta chez lui, le commis ne lâcha point Frédéric ; il l’engagea même à acheter le portrait. En effet, Pellerin, désespérant de l’intimider, les avait circonvenus pour que, grâce à eux, il prît la chose.

Deslauriers en reparla, insista. Les prétentions de l’artiste étaient raisonnables.

— “Je suis sûr que, moyennant, peut-être, cinq cents francs...”

— “Ah ! donne-les ! tiens, les voici”, dit Frédéric.

Le soir même, le tableau fut apporté. Il lui parut plus abominable encore que la première fois. Les demi-teintes et les ombres s’étaient plombées sous les retouches trop nombreuses, et elles semblaient obscurcies par rapport aux lumières, qui, demeurées brillantes çà et là, détonnaient dans l’ensemble.

Frédéric se vengea de l’avoir payé, en le dénigrant amèrement. Deslauriers le crut sur parole et approuva sa conduite, car il ambitionnait toujours de constituer une phalange dont il serait le chef ; certains hommes se réjouissent de faire faire à leurs amis des choses qui leur sont désagréables.

Cependant, Frédéric n’était pas retourné chez les Dambreuse. Les capitaux lui manquaient. Ce seraient des explications à n’en plus finir ; il balançait à se décider. Peut-être avait-il raison ? Rien n’était sûr, maintenant, l’affaire des houilles pas plus qu’une autre ; il fallait abandonner un pareil monde ; enfin, Deslauriers le détourna de l’entreprise. A force de haine il devenait vertueux ; et puis il aimait mieux Frédéric dans la médiocrité. De cette manière, il restait son égal, et en communion plus intime avec lui.

La commission de Mlle Roque avait été fort mal exécutée. Son père l’écrivit, en fournissant les explications les plus précises, et terminait sa lettre par cette badinerie : “Au risque de vous donner un mal de nègre.” Frédéric ne pouvait faire autrement que de retourner chez Arnoux. Il monta dans le magasin, et ne vit personne. La maison de commerce croulant, les employés imitaient l’incurie de leur patron.

Il côtoya la longue étagère, chargée de faïences, qui occupait d’un bout à l’autre le milieu de l’appartement ; puis, arrivé au fond, devant le comptoir, il marcha plus fort pour se faire entendre.

La portière se relevant, Mme Arnoux parut.

— “Comment, vous ici ! vous !”

— “Oui”, balbutia-t-elle, un peu troublée. “Je cherchais...”

Il aperçut son mouchoir près du pupitre, et devina qu’elle était descendue chez son mari pour se rendre compte, éclaircir sans doute une inquiétude.

— “Mais... vous avez peut-être besoin de quelque chose ?” dit-elle.

— “Un rien, madame.”

— “Ces commis sont intolérables ils s’absentent toujours.”

On ne devait pas les blâmer. Au contraire, il se félicitait de la circonstance.

Elle le regarda ironiquement.

— “Eh bien, et ce mariage ?”

— “Quel mariage ?”

— “Le vôtre !”

— “Moi ? Jamais de la vie !”

Elle fit un geste de dénégation.

— “Quand cela serait, après tout ? On se réfugie dans le médiocre, par désespoir du beau qu’on a rêvé !”

— “Tous vos rêves, pourtant, n’étaient pas si... candides !”

— “Que voulez-vous dire ?”

— “Quand vous vous promenez aux courses avec... des personnes !”

Il maudit la Maréchale. Un souvenir lui revint.

— “Mais c’est vous-même, autrefois, qui m’avez prié de la voir, dans l’intérêt d’Arnoux”

Elle répliqua en hochant la tête :

— “Et vous en profitez pour vous distraire.”

— “Mon Dieu ! oublions toutes ces sottises”

— “C’est juste, puisque vous allez vous marier”

Et elle retenait son soupir, en mordant ses lèvres.

Alors, il s’écria :

— “Mais je vous répète que non ! Pouvez-vous croire que, moi, avec mes besoins d’intelligence, mes habitudes, j’aie m’enfuir en province pour jouer aux cartes, surveiller des maçons, et me promener en sabots ! Dans quel but, alors ? On vous a conté qu’elle était riche, n’est-ce pas ? Ah ! je me moque bien de l’argent ! Est-ce qu’après avoir désiré tout ce qu'il y a de plus beau, de plus tendre, de plus enchanteur, une sorte de paradis sous forme humaine, et quand je l'ai trouvé enfin, cet idéal, quand cette vision me cache toutes les autres..." Et, lui prenant la tête à deux mains, il se mit à la baiser sur les paupières, en répétant :

— "Non ! non ! non ! jamais je ne me marierai jamais ! jamais !"

Elle acceptait ces caresses, figée par la surprise et par le ravissement.

La porte du magasin sur l'escalier retomba. Elle fit un bond ; et elle restait la main étendue, comme pour lui commandé le silence. Des pas se rapprochèrent. Puis quelqu'un dit au-dehors :

— "Madame est-elle là ?"

— "Entrez !"

Mme Arnoux avait le coude sur le comptoir et roulait une plume entre ses doigts, tranquillement, quand le teneur de livres ouvrit la portière.

Frédéric se leva.

— "Madame, j'ai bien l'honneur de vous saluer. Le service, n'est-ce pas, sera prêt ? je puis compter dessus ?"

Elle ne répondit rien. Mais cette complicité silencieuse enflamma son visage de toutes les rougeurs de l'adultère.

Le lendemain, il retourna chez elle, on le reçut ; et, afin de poursuivre ses avantages, immédiatement, sans préambule, Frédéric commença par se justifier de la rencontre au Champ de Mars. Le hasard seul l'avait fait se trouver avec cette femme. En admettant qu'elle fût jolie (ce qui n'était pas vrai), comment pourrait-elle arrêter sa pensée, même une minute, puisqu'il en aimait une autre !

— "Vous le savez bien, je vous l'ai dit."

Mme Arnoux baissa la tête.

— "Je suis fâchée que vous me l'ayez dit."

— "Pourquoi ?"

— "Les convenances les plus simples exigent maintenant que je ne vous revoie plus !"

Il protesta de l'innocence de son amour. Le passé devait lui répondre de l'avenir ; il s'était promis à lui-même de ne pas troubler son existence, de ne pas l'étourdir de ses plaintes.

— "Mais, hier, mon cœur débordait."

— “Nous ne devons plus songer à ce moment-là, mon ami !”

Cependant, où serait le mal quand deux pauvres êtres confondraient leur tristesse ?

— “Car vous n’êtes pas heureuse non plus ! Oh ! je vous connais, vous n’avez personne qui réponde à vos besoins d’affection, de dévouement ; je ferai tout ce que vous voudrez ! Je ne vous offenserai pas !... je vous le jure.”

Et il se laissa tomber sur les genoux, malgré lui, s’affaissant sous un poids intérieur trop lourd.

— “Levez-vous !” dit-elle, “je le veux !”

Et elle lui déclara impérieusement que. s’il n’obéissait pas. il ne la reverrait jamais.

— “Ah ! je vous en défie bien reprit Frédéric.”

— “Qu’est-ce que j’ai à faire dans le monde ? Les autres s’évertuent pour la richesse, la célébrité. le pouvoir ! Moi. je n’ai pas d’état, vous êtes mon occupation exclusive. toute ma fortune, le but, le centre de mon existence, de mes pensées. Je ne peux pas plus vivre sans vous que sans l’air du ciel ! Est-ce que vous ne sentez pas l’aspiration de mon âme monter vers la vôtre. et qu’elles doivent se confondre. et que j’en meurs ?”

Mme Arnoux se mit à trembler de tous ses membres.

— “Oh ! allez-vous-en ? je vous en prie !” L’expression bouleversée de sa figure l’arrêta. Puis il fit un pas. Mais elle se reculait, en joignant les deux mains.

— “Laissez-moi ! au nom du ciel ! de grâce” Et Frédéric l’aimait tellement, qu’il sortit.

Bientôt, il fut pris de colère contre lui-même, se déclara un imbécile, et, vingt-quatre heures après, il revint.

Madame n’y était pas. Il resta sur le palier, étourdi de fureur et d’indignation. Arnoux parut, et lui apprit que sa femme. le matin même, était partie s’installer dans une petite maison de campagne qu’ils louaient à Auteuil, ne possédant plus celle de Saint-Cloud.

— “C’est encore une de ses lubies ! Enfin, puisque ça l’arrange ! et moi aussi du reste ; tant mieux ! Dînons-nous ensemble ce soir ?”

Frédéric alléguait une affaire urgente, puis courut à Auteuil.

Mme Arnoux laissa échapper un cri de joie. Alors, toute sa rancune s’évanouit.

Il ne parla point de son amour. Pour lui inspirer plus de confiance. il exagéra même sa réserve ; et, lorsqu'il demanda s'il pouvait revenir, elle répondit : "Mais sans doute", en offrant sa main, qu'elle retira presque aussitôt.

Frédéric, dès lors, multiplia ses visites. Il promettait au cocher de gros pourboires. Mais souvent, la lenteur du cheval l'impatientant, il descendait ; puis, hors d'haleine, grimpait dans un omnibus ; et comme il examinait dédaigneusement les figures des gens assis devant lui, et qui n'allaient pas chez elle !

Il reconnaissait de loin sa maison, à un chèvrefeuille énorme couvrant, d'un seul côté, les planches du toit ; c'était une manière de chalet suisse peint en rouge, avec un balcon extérieur. Il y avait dans le jardin trois vieux marronniers, et au milieu, sur un tertre, un parasol en chaume que soutenait un tronc d'arbre. Sous l'ardoise des murs, une grosse vigne mal attachée pendait de place en place, comme un câble pourri. La sonnette de la grille, un peu rude à tirer, prolongeait son carillon, et on était toujours longtemps avant de venir. Chaque fois, il éprouvait une angoisse, une peur indéterminée.

Puis il entendait claquer, sur le sable, les pantoufles de la bonne ; ou bien Mme Arnoux elle-même se présentait. Il arriva, un jour, derrière son dos, comme elle était accroupie, devant le gazon, à chercher de la violette.

L'humeur de sa fille l'avait forcée de la mettre au couvent. Son gamin passait l'après-midi dans une école, Arnoux faisait de longs déjeuners au Palais-Royal, avec Regimbart et l'ami Compain. Aucun fâcheux ne pouvait les surprendre.

Il était bien entendu qu'ils ne devaient pas s'appartenir. Cette convention qui les garantissait du péril, facilitait leurs épanchements.

Elle lui dit son existence d'autrefois, à Chartres, chez sa mère ; sa dévotion vers douze ans, puis sa fureur de musique, lorsqu'elle chantait jusqu'à la nuit, dans sa petite chambre, d'où l'on découvrait les remparts. Il lui conta ses mélancolies au collège, et comment dans son ciel poétique resplendissait un visage de femme, si bien qu'en la voyant pour la première fois, il l'avait reconnue.

Ces discours n'embrassaient, d'habitude, que les années de leur fréquentation. Il lui rappelait d'insignifiants détails, la couleur de sa robe à telle époque, quelle personne un jour était survenue, ce qu'elle avait dit une autre fois ; et elle répondait tout émerveillée “Oui, je me rappelle !”

Leurs goûts, leurs jugements étaient les mêmes.

Souvent celui des deux qui écoutait l'autre s'écriait :

— “Moi aussi !”

Et l'autre à son tour reprenait : — “Moi aussi !”

Puis c'étaient d'interminables plaintes sur la Providence :

— “Pourquoi le ciel ne l'a-t-il pas voulu ! Si nous nous étions rencontrés !...”

— “Ah ! si j'avais été plus jeune !” soupirait-elle.

— “Non ! moi, un peu plus vieux.”

Et ils s'imaginaient une vie exclusivement amoureuse, assez féconde pour remplir les plus vastes solitudes, excédant toutes joies, défiant toutes les misères, où les heures auraient disparu dans un continuel épanchement d'eux-mêmes, et qui aurait fait quelque chose de resplendissant et d'élévé comme la palpitation des étoiles.

Presque toujours, ils se tenaient en plein air au haut de l'escalier ; des cimes d'arbres jaunies par l'automne se mamelonnaient devant eux, inégalement jusqu'au bord du ciel pâle ; ou bien ils allaient au bout de l'avenue, dans un pavillon ayant pour tout meuble un canapé de toile grise. Des points noirs tachaient la glace ; les murailles exhalaient une odeur de moisi ; — et ils restaient là, causant d'eux-mêmes, des autres, de n'importe quoi, avec ravissement. Quelquefois, les rayons du soleil, traversant la jalousie, tendaient depuis le plafond jusque sur les dalles comme les cordes d'une lyre, des brins de poussière tourbillonnaient dans ces barres lumineuses. Elle s'amusait à les fendre avec sa main ; — Frédéric la saisissait, doucement ; et il contemplait l'entrelacs de ses veines, les grains de sa peau, la forme de ses doigts. Chacun de ses doigts était, pour lui, plus qu'une chose, presque une personne.

Elle lui donna ses gants, la semaine d'après son mouchoir. Elle l'appelait “Frédéric”, il l'appelait “Marie”, adorant ce nom-là, fait exprès, disait-il, pour être soupiré dans l'extase, et qui semblait contenir des nuages d'encens, des jonchées de roses.

Ils arrivèrent à fixer d'avance le jour de ses visites et sortant comme par hasard, elle allait au-devant de lui, sur la route.

Elle ne faisait rien pour exciter son amour, perdue dans cette insouciance qui caractérise les grands bonheurs. Pendant toute la saison, elle porta une robe de chambre en soie brune, bordée de velours pareil, vêtement large convenant à la mollesse de ses attitudes et de sa physionomie sérieuse. D'ailleurs, elle touchait au mois d'août des femmes, époque tout à la fois de réflexion et de tendresse, où la maturité qui commence colore le regard d'une flamme plus profonde, quand la force du cœur se mêle à l'expérience de la vie, et que, sur la fin de ses épanouissements, l'être complet déborde de richesses dans l'harmonie de sa beauté. Jamais elle n'avait eu plus de douceur, d'indulgence. Sûre de ne pas faillir, elle s'abandonnait à un sentiment qui lui semblait un droit conquis par ses chagrins. Cela était si bon, du reste, et si nouveau ! Quel abîme entre la grossièreté d'Arnoux et les adorations de Frédéric !

Il tremblait de perdre par un mot tout ce qu'il croyait avoir gagné, se disant qu'on peut ressaisir une occasion et qu'on ne rattrape jamais une sottise. Il voulait qu'elle se donnât, et non la prendre. L'assurance de son amour le délectait comme un avant-goût de la possession, et puis le charme de sa personne lui troublait le cœur plus que les sens. C'était une béatitude indéfinie, un tel enivrement, qu'il en oubliait jusqu'à la possibilité d'un bonheur absolu. Loin d'elle, des convoitises furieuses le dévoraient.

Bientôt il y eut dans leurs dialogues de grands intervalles de silence. Quelquefois, une sorte de pudeur sexuelle les faisait rougir l'un devant l'autre. Toutes les précautions pour cacher leur amour le dévoilaient ; plus il devenait fort, plus leurs manières étaient contenues. Par l'exercice d'un tel mensonge, leur sensibilité s'exaspéra. Ils jouissaient délicieusement de la senteur des feuilles humides, ils souffraient du vent d'est, ils avaient des irritations sans cause, des pressentiments funèbres ; un bruit de pas, le craquement d'une boiserie leur causaient des épouvantes comme s'ils avaient été coupables ; ils se sentaient poussés vers un abîme ; une atmosphère orageuse les enveloppait ; et, quand des doléances échappaient à Frédéric, elle s'accusait elle-même.

— “Oui ! je fais mal ! j'ai l'air d'une coquette ! Ne venez donc plus !”

Alors, il répétait les mêmes serments, — qu'elle écoutait chaque fois avec plaisir.

Son retour à Paris et les embarras du jour de l'an suspendirent un peu leurs entrevues. Quand il revint, il avait, dans les allures, quelque chose de plus hardi. Elle sortait à chaque minute pour donner des ordres, et recevait, malgré ses prières, tous les bourgeois qui venaient la voir. On se livrait alors, à des conversations sur Léotade, M. Guizot, le Pape, l'insurrection de Palerme et le banquet du XII<sup>e</sup> arrondissement lequel inspirait des inquiétudes. Frédéric se soulageait en déblatérant contre le Pouvoir ; car il souhaitait, comme Deslauriers, un bouleversement universel, tant il était maintenant aigri. Mme Arnoux, de son côté, devenait sombre.

Son mari, prodiguant les extravagances, entretenait une ouvrière de la manufacture, celle qu'on appelait la Bordelaise. Mme Arnoux l'apprit elle-même à Frédéric. Il voulait tirer de là un argument "puisqu'on la trahissait."

— "Oh ! je ne m'en trouble guère !" dit-elle.

Cette déclaration lui parut affermir complètement leur intimité. Arnoux s'en méfiait-il ?

— "Non ! pas maintenant !"

Elle lui conta qu'un soir, il les avait laissés en tête-à-tête, puis était revenu, avait écouté derrière la porte, et, comme tous deux parlaient de choses indifférentes, il vivait, depuis ce temps-là, dans une entière sécurité :

— "Avec raison, n'est-ce pas ?" dit amèrement Frédéric.

— "Oui, sans doute"

Elle aurait fait mieux de ne pas risquer un pareil mot.

Un jour, elle ne se trouva point chez elle, à l'heure où il avait coutume d'y venir. Ce fut, pour lui, comme une trahison.

Il se fâcha ensuite de voir les fleurs qu'il apportait toujours plantées dans un verre d'eau.

— "Où voulez-vous donc qu'elles soient ?"

— "Oh ! pas là ! Du reste, elles y sont moins froidement que sur votre cœur."

Quelque temps après, il lui reprocha d'avoir été la veille aux Italiens, sans le prévenir. D'autres l'avaient vue, admirée, aimée peut-être ; Frédéric s'attachait à ses soupçons uniquement pour la quereller, la tourmenter ; car il commençait à la haïr, et c'était bien le moins qu'elle eût une part de ses souffrances !

Une après-midi (vers le milieu de février), il la surprit fort émue. Eugène se plaignait de mal à la gorge. Le docteur avait dit pourtant que ce n'était rien, un gros rhume, la grippe. Frédéric fut étonné par l'air ivre de l'enfant. Il rassura sa mère néanmoins, cita en exemple plusieurs bambins de son âge qui venaient d'avoir des affections semblables et s'étaient vite guéris.

— “Vraiment ?”

— “Mais oui, bien sûr !”

— “Oh ! comme vous êtes bon !”

Et elle lui prit la main. Il l'étreignit dans la sienne.

— “Oh ! laissez-la.”

— “Qu'est-ce que cela fait, puisque c'est au consolateur que vous l'offrez !... Vous me croyez bien pour ces choses, et vous doutez de moi... quand je vous parle de mon amour !”

— “Je n'en doute pas, mon pauvre ami !”

— “Pourquoi cette défiance, comme si j'étais un misérable capable d'abuser !...”

— “Oh ! non !...”

— “Si j'avais seulement une preuve”

— “Quelle Preuve ?”

— “Celle qu'on donnerait au premier venu, celle que vous m'avez accordée à moi-même.”

Et il lui rappela qu'une fois ils étaient sortis ensemble, par un crépuscule d'hiver, un temps de brouillard. Tout cela était bien loin, maintenant ! Qui donc l'empêchait de se montrer à son bras, devant tout le monde, sans crainte de sa part, sans arrière-pensée de la sienne, n'ayant personne autour d'eux pour les importuner ?

— “Soit !” dit-elle, avec une bravoure de décision qui stupéfia d'abord Frédéric.

Mais il reprit vivement :

— “Voulez-vous que je vous attende au coin de la rue Tronchet et de la rue de la Ferme ?”

— “Mon Dieu ! mon ami...”, balbutiait Mme Arnoux.

Sans lui donner le temps de réfléchir, il ajouta :

— “Mardi prochain, je suppose ?”

— “Mardi ?”

— “Oui, entre deux et trois heures.”

— “J’y serai !”

Et elle détourna son visage, par un mouvement de honte. Frédéric lui posa ses lèvres sur la nuque.

— “Oh ! ce n’est pas bien”, dit-elle. “Vous me feriez repentir.”

Il s’écarta, redoutant la mobilité ordinaire des femmes. Puis, sur le seuil, murmura, doucement, comme une chose bien convenue

— “A mardi !”

Elle baissa ses beaux yeux d’une façon discrète et résignée.

Frédéric avait un plan.

Il espérait que, grâce à la pluie ou au soleil, il pourrait la faire s’arrêter sous une porte, et qu’une fois sous la porte, elle entrerait dans la maison. Le difficile était d’en découvrir une convenable.

Il se mit donc en recherche, et, vers le milieu de la rue Tronchet, il lut de loin, sur une enseigne : Appartements meublés.

Le garçon, comprenant son intention, lui montra tout de suite, à l’entresol, une chambre et un cabinet avec deux sorties. Frédéric la retint pour un mois et paya d’avance.

Puis il alla dans trois magasins acheter la parfumerie la plus rare ; il se procura un morceau de fausse guipure pour remplacer l’affreux couvre-pieds de coton rouge, il choisit une paire de pantoufles en satin bleu ; la crainte seule de paraître grossier le modéra dans ses emplettes ; il revint avec elles et plus dévotement que ceux qui font des reposoirs, il changea les meubles de place, drapa lui-même les rideaux, mit des bruyères sur la cheminée, des violettes sur la commode ; il aurait voulu paver la chambre tout en or. “C’est demain”, se disait-il, “oui demain ! je ne rêve pas.” Et il sentait battre son cœur à grands coups sous le délire de son espérance ; puis, quand tout fut prêt, il emporta la clef dans sa poche, comme si le bonheur, qui dormait là, avait pu s’en envoler.

Une lettre de sa mère l’attendait chez lui.

“Pourquoi une si longue absence ? Ta conduite commence à paraître ridicule. Je comprends que, dans une certaine mesure, tu aies d’abord hésité devant cette union ; cependant, réfléchis !”

Et elle précisait les choses : quarante-cinq mille livres de rente. Du reste, “on en causait” ; et M. Roque attendait une réponse définitive. Quant à la jeune personne, sa position véritablement était embarrassante. “Elle t’aime beaucoup.”

Frédéric rejeta la lettre sans la finir, et en ouvrit une autre, un billet de Deslauriers.

“Mon vieux,

“La poire est mûre. Selon ta promesse, nous comptons sur toi. On se réunit demain au petit jour, place du Panthéon. Entre au café Soufflot. Il faut que je te parle avant la manifestation.”

Et, le lendemain, dès onze heures, Frédéric était sorti. Il voulait donner un dernier coup d’œil aux préparatifs ; puis, qui sait, elle pouvait, par un hasard quelconque, être en avance ? En débouchant de la rue Tronchet, il entendit derrière la Madeleine une grande clameur ; il s’avança ; et il aperçut au fond de la place, à gauche, des gens en blouse et des bourgeois.

En effet, un manifeste publié dans les journaux avait convoqué à cet endroit tous les souscripteurs du banquet réformiste. Le Ministère, presque immédiatement, avait affiché une proclamation l’interdisant. La veille au soir, l’opposition parlementaire y avait renoncé ; mais les patriotes, qui ignoraient cette résolution des chefs, étaient venus au rendez-vous, suivis par un grand nombre de curieux. Une députation des écoles s’était portée tout à l’heure chez Odilon Barrot. Elle était maintenant aux Affaires-Etrangères ; et on ne savait pas si le banquet aurait lieu, si le Gouvernement exécuterait sa menace, si les gardes nationaux se présenteraient. On en voulait aux Députés comme au Pouvoir. La foule augmentait de plus en plus, quand tout à coup vibra dans les airs le refrain de la Marseillaise.

C’était la colonne des étudiants qui arrivait. Ils marchaient au pas, sur deux files, en bon ordre, l’aspect irrité, les mains nues, et tous criant par intervalles — “Vive la Réforme ! à bas Guizot !”

Les amis de Frédéric étaient là, bien sûr. Ils allaient l’apercevoir et l’entraîner. Il se réfugia vivement dans la rue de l’Arcade.

Quand les étudiants eurent fait deux fois le tour de la Madeleine, ils descendirent vers la place de la Concorde. Elle était remplie de monde ; et la foule tassée semblait, de loin, un champ d’épis noirs qui oscillaient.

Au même moment, des soldats de la ligne se rangèrent en bataille, à gauche de l'église.

Les groupes stationnaient, cependant. Pour en finir, des agents de police en bourgeois saisissaient les plus mutins et les emmenaient au poste, brutalement. Frédéric, malgré son indignation, resta muet ; on aurait pu le prendre avec les autres, et il aurait manqué Mme Arnoux.

Peu de temps après, parurent les casques des municipaux. Ils frappaient autour d'eux, à coups de plat de sabre. Un cheval s'abattit ; on courut lui porter secours et, dès que le cavalier fut en selle, tous s'enfuirent.

Alors, il y eut un grand silence. La pluie fine, qui avait mouillé l'asphalte, ne tombait plus. Des nuages s'en allaient, balayés mollement par le vent d'ouest.

Frédéric se mit à parcourir la rue Tronchet, en regardant devant lui et derrière lui.

Deux heures enfin sonnèrent. "Ah ! c'est maintenant !" se dit-il, "elle sort de sa maison, elle approche" ; et, une minute après : "Elle aurait eu le temps de venir." Jusqu'à trois heures, il tâcha de se calmer. "Non, elle n'est pas en retard ; un peu de patience !"

Et, par désœuvrement, il examinait les rares boutiques : un libraire, un sellier, un magasin de deuil. Bientôt il connut tous les noms des ouvrages, tous les harnais, toutes les étoffes. Les marchands, à force de le voir passer et repasser continuellement, furent étonnés d'abord, puis effrayés, et ils fermèrent leur devanture.

Sans doute, elle avait un empêchement, et elle en souffrait aussi. Mais quelle joie tout à l'heure ! — Car elle allait venir, cela était certain ! "Elle me l'a bien promis !" Cependant, une angoisse intolérable le gagnait.

Par un mouvement absurde, il rentra dans l'hôtel, comme si elle avait pu s'y trouver. A l'instant même, elle arrivait peut-être dans la rue. Il s'y jeta. Personne ? Et il se remit à battre le trottoir.

Il considérait les fentes des pavés, la gueule des gouttières, les candélabres, les numéros au-dessus des portes. Les objets les plus minimes devenaient pour lui des compagnons, ou plutôt des spectateurs ironiques ; et les façades régulières des maisons lui semblaient impitoyables. Il souffrait du froid aux pieds. Il se sentait dissoudre d'accablement. La répercussion de ses pas lui secouait la cervelle.

Quand il vit quatre heures à sa montre, il éprouva comme un vertige, une épouvante. Il tâcha de se répéter des vers, de calculer n'importe quoi, d'inventer une histoire. Impossible ! l'image de Mme Arnoux l'obsédait. Il avait envie de courir à sa rencontre. Mais quelle route prendre pour ne pas se croiser ?

Il aborda un commissionnaire, lui mit dans la main cinq francs, et le chargea d'aller rue Paradis, chez Jacques Arnoux, pour s'enquérir près du portier "si Madame était chez elle". Puis il se planta au coin de la rue de la Ferme et de la rue Tronchet, de manière à voir simultanément dans toutes les deux. Au fond de la perspective, sur le boulevard, des masses confuses glissaient. Il distinguait parfois l'aigrette d'un dragon, un chapeau de femme ; et il tendait ses prunelles pour la reconnaître. Un enfant déguenillé qui montrait une marmotte, dans une boîte, lui demanda l'aumône, en souriant.

L'homme à la veste de velours reparut. "Le portier ne l'avait pas vue sortir." Qui la retenait ? Si elle était malade, on l'aurait dit ! Était-ce une visite ? Rien de plus facile que de ne pas recevoir. Il se frappa le front.

"Ah ! je suis bête ! C'est l'émeute !" Cette explication naturelle le soulagea. Puis, tout à coup : "Mais son quartier est tranquille." Et un doute abominable l'assaillit. "Si elle allait ne pas venir ? si sa promesse n'était qu'une parole pour m'évincer ? Non ! non !" Ce qui l'empêchait sans doute, c'était un hasard extraordinaire, un de ces événements qui déjouent toute prévoyance. Dans ce cas-là, elle aurait écrit. Et il envoya le garçon d'hôtel à son domicile, rue Rumford, pour savoir s'il n'y avait point de lettre ?

On n'avait apporté aucune lettre. Cette absence de nouvelles le rassura.

Du nombre des pièces de monnaie prises au hasard dans sa main, de la physionomie des passants, de la couleur des chevaux, il tirait des présages ; et, quand l'augure était contraire, il s'efforçait de ne pas y croire. Dans ses accès de fureur contre Mme Arnoux, il l'injuriait à demi-voix. Puis c'étaient des faiblesses à s'évanouir, et tout à coup des rebondissements d'espérance. Elle allait paraître. Elle était là, derrière son dos. Il se retournait : rien ! Une fois, il aperçut, à trente pas environ, une femme de même taille, avec la même robe. Il la rejoignit ; ce n'était pas elle ! Cinq heures arrivèrent ! cinq heures et demie ! six heures ! Le gaz s'allumait. Mme Arnoux n'était pas venue.

Elle avait rêvé, la nuit précédente, qu'elle était sur le trottoir de la rue Tronchet depuis longtemps. Elle y attendait quelque chose d'indéterminé, de considérable néanmoins, et, sans savoir pourquoi, elle avait peur d'être aperçue. Mais un maudit petit chien, acharné contre elle, mordillait le bas de sa robe. Il revenait obstinément et aboyait toujours plus fort. Mme Arnoux se réveilla. L'aboiement du chien continuait. Elle tendit l'oreille. Cela partait de la chambre de son fils. Elle s'y précipita pieds nus. C'était l'enfant lui-même qui toussait. Il avait les mains brûlantes, la face rouge et la voix singulièrement rauque. L'embarras de sa respiration augmentait de minute en minute. Elle resta jusqu'au jour, penchée sur sa couverture, à l'observer.

A huit heures, le tambour de la garde nationale vint prévenir M. Arnoux que ses camarades l'attendaient. Il s'habilla vivement et s'en alla, en promettant de passer tout de suite chez leur médecin, M. Colot. A dix heures, M. Colot n'étant pas venu, Mme Arnoux expédia sa femme de chambre. Le docteur était en voyage, à la campagne, et le jeune homme qui le remplaçait faisait des courses.

Eugène tenait sa tête de côté, sur le traversin, en fronçant toujours ses sourcils, en dilatant ses narines ; sa pauvre petite figure devenait plus blême que ses draps ; et il s'échappait de son larynx un sifflement produit par chaque inspiration, de plus en plus courte, sèche, et comme métallique. Sa toux ressemblait au bruit de ces mécaniques barbares qui font japper les chiens de carton.

Mme Arnoux fut saisie d'épouvante. Elle se jeta sur les sonnettes, en appelant au secours, en criant :

— “Un médecin ! un médecin !”

Dix minutes après, arriva un vieux monsieur en cravate blanche et à favoris gris, bien taillés. Il fit beaucoup de questions sur les habitudes, l'âge et le tempérament du jeune malade, puis examina sa gorge, s'appliqua la tête dans son dos et écrivit une ordonnance. L'air tranquille de ce bonhomme était odieux. Il sentait l'embaumement. Elle aurait voulu le battre. Il dit qu'il reviendrait dans la soirée.

Bientôt les horribles quintes recommencèrent. Quelquefois, l'enfant se dressait tout à coup. Des mouvements convulsifs lui secouaient les muscles de la poitrine, et, dans ses aspirations, son ventre se creusait comme s'il eût suffoqué d'avoir couru. Puis il retombait la tête en arrière et la bouche grande ouverte. Avec des précautions infinies, Mme Arnoux tâchait de lui faire avaler le contenu des fioles, du sirop d'ipécacuana, une potion kermétisée. Mais il repoussait la cuiller, en gémissant d'une voix faible. On aurait dit qu'il soufflait ses paroles.

De temps à autre, elle relisait l'ordonnance. Les observations du formulaire l'effrayaient ; peut-être que le pharmacien s'était trompé ! Son impuissance la désespérait. L'élève de M. Colot arriva.

C'était un jeune homme d'allures modestes, neuf dans le métier, et qui ne cacha point son impression. Il resta d'abord indécis, par peur de se compromettre, et enfin prescrivit l'application de morceaux de glace. On fut longtemps à trouver de la glace. La vessie qui contenait les morceaux creva. Il fallut changer la chemise. Tout ce dérangement provoqua un nouvel accès plus terrible.

L'enfant se mit à arracher les linges de son cou, comme s'il avait voulu retirer l'obstacle qui l'étouffait, et il égratignait le mur, saisissait les rideaux de sa couchette, cherchant un point d'appui pour respirer. Son visage était bleuâtre maintenant, et tout son corps, trempé d'une sueur froide, paraissait maigrir. Ses yeux hagards s'attachaient sur sa mère avec terreur. Il lui jetait les bras autour du cou, s'y suspendait d'une façon désespérée ; et, en repoussant ses sanglots, elle balbutiait des paroles tendres.

— "Oui, mon amour, mon ange, mon trésor !" Puis, des moments de calme survenaient.

Elle alla chercher des joujoux, un polichinelle, une collection d'images, et les étala sur son lit, pour le distraire. Elle essaya même de chanter.

Elle commença une chanson qu'elle lui disait autrefois, quand elle le berçait en l'emmaillottant sur cette même petite chaise de tapisserie. Mais il frissonna dans la longueur entière de son corps, comme une onde sous un coup de vent ; les globes de ses yeux saillaient : elle crut qu'il allait mourir, et se détourna pour ne pas le voir.

Un instant après, elle eut la force de le regarder. Il vivait encore. Les heures se succédèrent, lourdes, mornes, interminables, désespérantes ; et elle n'en comptait plus les minutes qu'à la progression de cette agonie. Les secousses de sa poitrine le jetaient en avant comme pour le briser ; à la fin, il vomit quelque chose d'étrange, qui ressemblait à un tube de parchemin. Qu'était-ce ? Elle s'imagina qu'il avait rendu un bout de ses entrailles. Mais il respirait largement, régulièrement. Cette apparence de bien-être l'effraya plus que tout le reste ; elle se tenait comme pétrifiée, les bras pendants, les yeux fixes, quand M. Colot survint. L'enfant, selon lui, était sauvé.

Elle ne comprit pas d'abord, et se fit répéter la phrase.

N'était-ce pas une de ces consolations propres aux médecins ? Le docteur s'en alla d'un air tranquille. Alors, ce fut pour elle comme si les cordes qui serraient son cœur se fussent dénouées.

— “Sauvé ! Est-ce possible !”

Tout à coup l'idée de Frédéric lui apparut d'une façon nette et inexorable. C'était un avertissement de la Providence. Mais le Seigneur, dans sa miséricorde, n'avait pas voulu la punir tout à fait ! Quelle expiation, plus tard, si elle persévérait dans cet amour ! Sans doute, on insulterait son fils à cause d'elle ; et Mme Arnoux l'aperçut jeune homme, blessé dans une rencontre, rapporté sur un brancard, mourant. D'un bond, elle se précipita sur la petite chaise ; et de toutes ses forces, lançant son âme dans les hauteurs, elle offrit à Dieu, comme un holocauste, le sacrifice de sa première passion, de sa seule faiblesse.

Frédéric était revenu chez lui. Il restait dans son fauteuil, sans même avoir la force de la maudire. Une espèce de sommeil le gagna ; et, à travers son cauchemar, il entendait la pluie tomber, en croyant toujours qu'il était là-bas, sur le trottoir.

Le lendemain, par une dernière lâcheté, il envoya encore un commissionnaire chez Mme Arnoux.

Soit que le Savoyard ne fît pas la commission, ou qu'elle eût trop de choses à dire pour s'expliquer d'un mot, la même réponse fut rapportée. L'insolence était trop forte ! Une colère d'orgueil le saisit. Il se jura de n'avoir plus même un désir ; et, comme un feuillage emporté par un ouragan, son amour disparut. Il en ressentit un soulagement, une joie stoïque, puis un besoin d'actions violentes ; et il s'en alla au hasard, par les rues.

Des hommes des faubourgs passaient, armés de fusils, de vieux sabres, quelques-uns portant des bonnets rouges, et tous chantant la Marseillaise ou les Girondins. Ça et là, un garde national se hâtait pour rejoindre sa mairie. Des tambours, au loin, résonnaient. On se battait à la porte Saint-Martin. Il y avait dans l'air quelque chose de gaillard et de belliqueux. Frédéric marchait toujours. L'agitation de la grande ville le rendait gai.

A la hauteur de Frascati, il aperçut les fenêtres de la Maréchale ; une idée folle lui vint, une réaction de jeunesse. Il traversa le boulevard.

On fermait la porte cochère ; et Delphine, la femme de chambre, en train d'écrire dessus avec un charbon "Armes données", lui dit vivement :

— "Ah ! Madame est dans un bel état ! Elle a renvoyé ce matin son groom qui l'insultait. Elle croit qu'on va piller partout ! Elle crève de peur ! d'autant plus que Monsieur est parti !"

— "Quel monsieur ?"

— "Le Prince !"

Frédéric entra dans le boudoir. La Maréchale parut, en jupon, les cheveux sur le dos, bouleversée.

— "Ah ! merci ! tu viens me sauver ! c'est la seconde fois ! tu n'en demandes jamais le prix, toi !"

— "Mille pardons !" dit Frédéric, en lui saisissant la taille dans les deux mains.

— "Comment ? que fais-tu ?" balbutia la Maréchale, à la fois surprise et égayée par ces manières.

Il répondit :

— "Je suis la mode, je me réforme."

Elle se laissa renverser sur le divan, et continuait à rire sous ses baisers.

Ils passèrent l'après-midi à regarder, de leur fenêtre, le peuple dans la rue. Puis il l'emmena dîner aux Trois Frères Provençaux. Le repas fut long, délicat. ils s'en revinrent à pied, faute de voiture.

A la nouvelle d'un changement de ministère, Paris avait changé. Tout le monde était en joie ; des promeneurs circulaient, et des lampions à chaque étage faisaient une clarté comme en plein jour. Les soldats regagnaient lentement leurs casernes, harassés, l'air triste. On les saluait, en criant : "Vive la ligne !" Ils continuaient sans répondre. Dans la garde nationale, au contraire, les officiers, rouges d'enthousiasme, brandissaient leur sabre en vociférant : "Vive la réforme !" et ce mot-là, chaque fois, faisait rire les deux amants. Frédéric blaguait, était très gai.

Par la rue Duphot, ils atteignirent les boulevards. Des lanternes vénitiennes, suspendues aux maisons, formaient des guirlandes de feux. Un fourmillement confus s'agitait en dessous ; au milieu de cette ombre, par endroits, brillaient des blancheurs de baïonnettes. Un grand brouhaha s'élevait. La foule était trop compacte, le retour direct impossible ; et ils entraient dans la rue Caumartin, quand, tout à coup, éclata derrière eux un bruit, pareil au craquement d'une immense pièce de soie que l'on déchire. C'était la fusillade du boulevard des Capucines.

— “Ah ! on casse quelques bourgeois”, dit Frédéric tranquillement, car il y a des situations où l'homme le moins cruel est si détaché des autres, qu'il verrait périr le genre humain sans un battement de cœur.

La Maréchale, cramponnée à son bras, claquait des dents. Elle se déclara incapable de faire vingt pas de plus. Alors, par un raffinement de haine, pour mieux outrager en son âme Mme Arnoux, il l'emmena jusqu'à l'hôtel de la rue Tronchet, dans le logement préparé pour l'autre.

Les fleurs n'étaient pas flétries. La guipure s'étalait sur le lit. Il tira de l'armoire les petites pantoufles. Rosanette trouva ces prévenances fort délicates.

Vers une heure, elle fut réveillée par des roulements lointains ; et elle le vit qui sanglotait, la tête enfoncée dans l'oreiller.

— “Qu'as-tu donc, cher amour ?”

— “C'est excès de bonheur”, dit Frédéric. “Il y avait trop longtemps que je te désirais !”

TROISIÈME PARTIE

CHAPITRE 1

Le bruit d'une fusillade le tira brusquement de son sommeil ; et, malgré les instances de Rosanette, Frédéric, à toute force, voulut aller voir ce qui se passait. Il descendait vers les Champs-Élysées, d'où les coups de feu étaient partis. A l'angle de la rue Saint-Honoré, des hommes en blouse le croisèrent en criant :

— “Non ! pas par là ! au Palais-Royal !”

Frédéric les suivit. On avait arraché les grilles de l'Assomption. Plus loin, il remarqua trois pavés au milieu de la voie, le commencement d'une barricade, sans doute, puis des tessons de bouteilles, et des paquets de fil de fer pour embarrasser la cavalerie ; quand tout à coup s'élança d'une ruelle un grand jeune homme pâle, dont les cheveux noirs flottaient sur les épaules, prises dans une espèce de maillot à pois de couleur. Il tenait un long fusil de soldat, et courait sur la pointe de ses pantoufles, avec l'air d'un somnambule et lesté comme un tigre. On entendait, par intervalles, une détonation.

La veille au soir, le spectacle du chariot contenant cinq cadavres recueillis parmi ceux du boulevard des Capucines avait changé les dispositions du peuple ; et, pendant qu'aux Tuileries les aides de camp se succédaient, et que M. Molé, en train de faire un cabinet nouveau, ne revenait pas, et que M. Thiers tâchait d'en composer un autre, et que le Roi chicanait, hésitait, puis donnait à Bugeaud le commandement général pour l'empêcher de s'en servir, l'insurrection, comme dirigée par un seul bras, s'organisait formidablement. Des hommes d'une éloquence frénétique haranguaient la foule au coin des rues ; d'autres dans les églises sonnaient le tocsin à pleine volée ; on coulait du plomb, on roulait des cartouches ; les arbres des boulevards, les vespasiennes, les bancs, les grilles, les becs de gaz, tout fut arraché, renversé ; Paris, le matin, était couvert de barricades. La résistance ne dura pas ; partout la garde nationale s'interposait ; — si bien qu'à huit heures, le peuple, de bon gré ou de force, possédait cinq casernes, presque toutes les mairies, les points stratégiques les plus sûrs. D'elle-même, sans secousses, la monarchie se fondait dans une dissolution rapide ; et on attaquait maintenant le poste du Château-d'Eau pour délivrer cinquante prisonniers, qui n'y étaient pas.

Frédéric s'arrêta forcément à l'entrée de la place. Des groupes en armes l'emplissaient. Des compagnies de la ligne occupaient les rues Saint-Thomas et Fromanteau. Une barricade énorme bouchait la rue de Valois. La fumée qui se balançait à sa crête s'entrouvrit, des hommes couraient dessus en faisant de grands gestes, ils disparurent ; puis la fusillade recommença. Le poste y répondait, sans qu'on vît personne à l'intérieur ; ses fenêtres, défendues par des volets de chêne, étaient percées de meurtrières ; et le monument avec ses deux étages, ses deux ailes, sa fontaine au premier et sa petite porte au milieu, commençait à se moucheter de taches blanches sous le heurt des balles. Son perron de trois marches restait vide.

A côté de Frédéric, un homme en bonnet grec et portant une giberne par-dessus sa veste de tricot se disputait avec une femme coiffée d'un madras. Elle lui disait :

— “Mais reviens donc ! reviens donc !”

— “Laisse-moi tranquille !” répondait le mari. “Tu peux bien surveiller la loge toute seule. Citoyen, je vous le demande, est-ce juste ? J'ai fait mon devoir partout, en 1830, en 32, en 34, en 39 ! Aujourd'hui, on se bat ! Il faut que je me batte Va-t'en !”

Et la portière finit par céder à ses remontrances et celles d'un garde national près d'eux, quadragénaire dont la figure bonasse était ornée d'un collier de barbe blonde.

Il chargeait son arme et tirait, tout en conversant avec Frédéric, aussi tranquille au milieu de l'émeute qu'un horticulteur dans son jardin. Un jeune garçon en serpillière le cajolait pour obtenir des capsules, afin d'utiliser son fusil, une belle carabine de chasse que lui avait donnée “un monsieur” .

— “Empoigne dans mon dos”, dit le bourgeois “et efface-toi ! tu vas te faire tuer !”

Les tambours battaient la charge. Des cris aigus, des hourras de triomphe s'élevaient. Un remous continu faisait osciller la multitude. Frédéric, pris entre deux masses profondes, ne bougeait pas, fasciné d'ailleurs et s'amusant extrêmement. Les blessés qui tombaient, les morts étendus n'avaient pas l'air de vrais blessés, de vrais morts. Il lui semblait assister à un spectacle.

Au milieu de la houle, par-dessus des têtes, on aperçut un vieillard en habit noir sur un cheval blanc, à selle de velours. D'une main, il tenait un rameau vert, de l'autre un papier, et les secouait avec obstination. Enfin, désespérant de se faire entendre, il se retira.

La troupe de ligne avait disparu et les municipaux restaient seuls à défendre le poste. Un flot d'intrépides se rua sur le perron ; ils s'abattirent, d'autres survinrent ; et la porte, ébranlée sous des coups de barre de fer, retentissait ; les municipaux ne cédaient pas. Mais une calèche bourrée de foin, et qui brûlait comme une torche géante, fut traînée contre les murs. On apporta vite des fagots, de la paille, un baril d'esprit-de-vin. Le feu monta le long des pierres ; l'édifice se mit à fumer partout comme un solfatare ; et de larges flammes, au sommet, entre les balustres de la terrasse, s'échappaient avec un bruit strident. Le premier étage du Palais-Royal s'était peuplé de gardes nationaux. De toutes les fenêtres de la place, on tirait ; les balles sifflaient ; l'eau de la fontaine crevée se mêlait avec le sang, faisait des flaques par terre ; on glissait dans la boue sur des vêtements, des shakos, des armes ; Frédéric sentit sous son pied quelque chose de mou ; c'était la main d'un sergent en capote grise, couché la face dans le ruisseau. Des bandes nouvelles de peuple arrivaient toujours, poussant les combattants sur le poste. La fusillade devenait plus pressée. Les marchands de vins étaient ouverts ; on allait de temps à autre y fumer une pipe, boire une chope, puis on retournait se battre. Un chien perdu hurlait. Cela faisait rire.

Frédéric fut ébranlé par le choc d'un homme qui, une balle dans les reins, tomba sur son épaule, en râlant. A ce coup, dirigé peut-être contre lui, il se sentit furieux et il se jetait en avant quand un garde national l'arrêta.

— "C'est inutile ! le Roi vient de partir. Ah ! si vous ne me croyez pas, allez-y voir !"

Une pareille assertion calma Frédéric. La place du Carrousel avait un aspect tranquille. L'hôtel de Nantes s'y dressait toujours solitairement ; et les maisons par derrière, le dôme du Louvre en face, la longue galerie de bois à droite et le vague terrain qui ondulait jusqu'aux baraques des étalagistes, étaient comme noyés dans la couleur grise de l'air, où de lointains murmures semblaient se confondre avec la brume, — tandis qu'à l'autre bout de la place, un jour cru, tombant par un écartement des nuages sur la façade des Tuileries, découpait en blancheur toutes ses fenêtres. Il y avait près de l'Arc de triomphe un cheval mort, étendu. Derrière les grilles, des groupes de cinq à six personnes causaient. Les portes du château étaient ouvertes ; les domestiques sur le seuil laissaient entrer.

En bas, dans une petite salle, des bois de café au lait étaient servis. Quelques-uns des curieux s'attablèrent en plaisantant ; les autres restaient debout, et, parmi ceux-là, un cocher de fiacre. Il saisit à deux mains un bocal plein de sucre en poudre, jeta un regard inquiet de droite et de gauche, puis se mit à manger voracement, son nez plongeant dans le goulot. Au bas du grand escalier, un homme écrivait son nom sur un registre. Frédéric le reconnut par derrière.

— “Tiens, Hussonnet !”

— “Mais oui”, répondit le bohème. “Je m'introduis à la Cour. Voilà une bonne farce, hein ?”

— “Si nous montions ?”

Et ils arrivèrent dans la salle des Maréchaux. Les portraits de ces illustres, sauf celui de Bugeaud percé au ventre, étaient tous intacts. Ils se trouvaient appuyés sur leur sabre, un affût de canon derrière eux, et dans des attitudes formidables jurant avec la circonstance. Une grosse pendule marquait une heure vingt minutes.

Tout à coup la Marseillaise retentit. Hussonnet et Frédéric se penchèrent sur la rampe. C'était le peuple. Il se précipita dans l'escalier, en secouant à flots vertigineux des têtes nues, des casques, des bonnets rouges, des baïonnettes et des épaules, si impétueusement, que des gens disparaissaient dans cette masse grouillante qui montait toujours, comme un fleuve refoulé par une marée d'équinoxe, avec un long mugissement, sous une impulsion irrésistible. En haut, elle se répandit, et le chant tomba.

On n'entendait plus que les piétinements de tous les souliers, avec le clapotement des voix. La foule inoffensive se contentait de regarder. Mais, de temps à autre, un coude trop à l'étroit enfonçait une vitre ; ou bien un vase, une statuette déroulait d'une console, par terre. Les boiseries pressées craquaient. Tous les visages étaient rouges, la sueur en coulait à larges gouttes ; Hussonnet fit cette remarque :

— “Les héros ne sentent pas bon !”

— “Ah ! vous êtes agaçant”, reprit Frédéric.

Et poussés malgré eux, ils entrèrent dans un appartement où s'étendait, au plafond, un dais de velours rouge. Sur le trône, en dessous, était assis un prolétaire à barbe noire, la chemise entrouverte, l'air hilare et stupide comme un magot. D'autres gravissaient l'estrade pour s'asseoir à sa place.

— “Quel mythe !” dit Hussonnet. “Voilà le peuple souverain !”

Le fauteuil fut enlevé à bout de bras, et traversa toute la salle en se balançant.

— “Saprelotte ! comme il chaloupe ! Le vaisseau de l'Etat est ballotté sur une mer orageuse ! Cancane-t-il ! cancanne-t-il !”

On l'avait approché d'une fenêtre, et, au milieu des sifflets, on le lança.

— “Pauvre vieux !” dit Hussonnet en le voyant tomber dans le jardin, où il fut repris vivement pour être promené ensuite jusqu'à la Bastille, et brûlé.

Alors, une joie frénétique éclata, comme si, à la place du trône, un avenir de bonheur illimité avait paru ; et le peuple, moins par vengeance que pour affirmer sa possession, brisa, lacéra les glaces et les rideaux, les lustres, les flambeaux, les tables, les chaises, les tabourets, tous les meubles, jusqu'à des albums de dessins, jusqu'à des corbeilles de tapisserie. Puisqu'on était victorieux, ne fallait-il pas s'amuser ! La canaille s'affubla ironiquement de dentelles et de cachemires. Des crépines d'or s'enroulèrent aux manches des blouses, des chapeaux à plumes d'autruche ornaient la tête des forgerons, des rubans de la Légion d'honneur firent des ceintures aux prostituées. Chacun satisfaisait son caprice ; les uns dansaient, d'autres buvaient. Dans la chambre de la reine, une femme lustrait ses bandeaux avec de la pommade derrière un paravent, deux amateurs jouaient aux cartes Hussonnet montra à Frédéric un individu qui fumait son brûle-gueule accoudé sur un balcon ; et le délire redoublait au tintamarre continu des porcelaines brisées et des morceaux de cristal qui sonnaient, en rebondissant, comme des lames d'harmonica.

Puis la fureur s'assombrit. Une curiosité obscène fit fouiller tous les cabinets, tous les recoins, ouvrir tous les tiroirs. Des galériens enfoncèrent leurs bras dans la couche des princesses, et se roulaient dessus par consolation de ne pouvoir les violer. D'autres, à figures plus sinistres, erraient silencieusement, cherchant à voler quelque chose ; mais la multitude était trop nombreuse. Par les baies des portes, on n'apercevait dans l'enfilade des appartements que la sombre masse du peuple entre les dorures, sous un nuage de poussière. Toutes les poitrines haletaient ; la chaleur de plus en plus devenait suffocante ; les deux amis, craignant d'être étouffés, sortirent.

Dans l'antichambre, debout sur un tas de vêtements, se tenait une fille publique, en statue de la Liberté, — immobile, les yeux grands ouverts, effrayante.

Ils avaient fait trois pas dehors, quand un peloton de gardes municipaux en capotes s'avança vers eux, et qui, retirant leurs bonnets de police, et découvrant à la fois leurs crânes un peu chauves, saluèrent le peuple très bas. A ce témoignage de respect, les vainqueurs déguenillés se rengorgèrent. Hussonnet et Frédéric ne furent pas, non plus, sans en éprouver un certain plaisir.

Une ardeur les animait. Ils s'en retournèrent au Palais-Royal. Devant la rue Fromanteau, des cadavres de soldats étaient entassés sur de la paille. Ils passèrent auprès impassiblement, étant même fiers de sentir qu'ils faisaient bonne contenance.

Le palais regorgeait de monde. Dans la cour intérieure, sept bûchers flambaient. On lançait par les fenêtres des pianos, des commodes et des pendules. Des pompes à incendie crachaient de l'eau jusqu'aux toits. Des chenapans tâchaient de couper des tuyaux avec leurs sabres. Frédéric engagea un polytechnicien à s'interposer. Le polytechnicien ne comprit pas, semblait imbécile, d'ailleurs. Tout autour, dans les deux galeries, la populace, maîtresse des caves, se livrait à une horrible godaillerie. Le vin coulait en ruisseaux, mouillait les pieds, les voyous buvaient dans des culs de bouteille, et vociféraient en titubant.

— “Sortons de là”, dit Hussonnet, “ce peuple me dégoûte.”

Tout le long de la galerie d'Orléans, des blessés gisaient par terre sur des matelas, ayant pour couvertures des rideaux de pourpre ; et de petites bourgeoises du quartier leur apportaient des bouillons, du linge.

— “N'importe !” dit Frédéric, “moi, je trouve le peuple sublime.”

Le grand vestibule était rempli par un tourbillon de gens furieux, des hommes voulaient monter aux étages supérieurs pour achever de détruire tout ; des gardes nationaux sur les marches s'efforçaient de les retenir. Le plus intrépide était un chasseur, nu-tête, la chevelure hérissée, les buffleteries en pièces. Sa chemise faisait un bourrelet entre son pantalon et son habit, et il se débattait au milieu des autres avec acharnement. Hussonnet, qui avait la vue perçante, reconnut de loin Arnoux.

Puis ils gagnèrent le jardin des Tuileries, pour respirer plus à l'aise. Ils s'assirent sur un banc ; et ils restèrent pendant quelques minutes les paupières closes, tellement étourdis, qu'ils n'avaient pas la force de parler. Les passants autour d'eux, s'abordaient. La duchesse d'Orléans était nommée régente ; tout était fini ; et on éprouvait cette sorte de bien-être qui suit les dénouements rapides, quand à chacune des mansardes du château parurent des domestiques déchirant leurs habits de livrée. Ils les jetaient dans le jardin, en signe d'abjuration. Le peuple les hua. Ils se retirèrent.

L'attention de Frédéric et d'Hussonnet fut distraite par un grand gaillard qui marchait vivement entre les arbres, avec un fusil sur l'épaule. Une cartouchière lui serrait à la taille sa vareuse rouge, un mouchoir s'enroulait à son front sous sa casquette. Il tourna la tête. C'était Dussardier ; et, se jetant dans leurs bras :

— "Ah ! quel bonheur, mes pauvres vieux !" sans pouvoir dire autre chose, tant il haletait de joie et de fatigue.

Depuis quarante-huit heures, il était debout. Il avait travaillé aux barricades du quartier Latin, s'était battu rue Rambuteau, avait sauvé trois dragons, était entré aux Tuileries avec la colonne Dunoyer, s'était porté ensuite à la Chambre, puis à l'hôtel de ville.

— "J'en arrive ! tout va bien ! le peuple triomphe ! les ouvriers et les bourgeois s'embrassent ! ah ! si vous saviez ce que j'ai vu ! quels braves gens comme c'est beau !"

Et, sans s'apercevoir qu'ils n'avaient pas d'armes :

— "J'étais bien sûr de vous trouver là ! Ç'a été rude un moment, n'importe !"

Une goutte de sang lui coulait sur la joue, et, aux questions des deux autres :

— "Oh ! rien ! l'éraflure d'une baïonnette !"

— "Il faudrait vous soigner, pourtant."

— "Bah ! je suis solide ! qu'est-ce que ça fait ? La République est proclamée ! on sera heureux maintenant !"

Des journalistes qui causaient tout à l'heure devant moi, disaient qu'on va affranchir la Pologne et l'Italie ! Plus de rois ! comprenez-vous ! Toute la terre libre ! toute la terre libre ! "

Et, embrassant l'horizon d'un seul regard, il écarta les bras dans une attitude triomphante. Mais une longue file d'hommes couraient sur la terrasse, au bord de l'eau.

— “Ah ! saprelotte ! j'oubliais ! Les forts sont occupés. Il faut que j'y aille ! adieu !”

Il se retourna pour leur crier, tout en brandissant son fusil :

— “Vive la République !”

Des cheminées du château, il s'échappait d'énormes tourbillons de fumée noire, qui emportaient des étincelles. La sonnerie des cloches faisait, au loin, comme des bêlements effarés. De droite et de gauche, partout, les vainqueurs déchargeaient leurs armes. Frédéric, bien qu'il ne fût pas guerrier, sentit bondir son sang gaulois. Le magnétisme des foules enthousiastes l'avait pris. Il humait voluptueusement l'air orageux, plein des senteurs de la poudre ; et cependant il frissonnait sous les effluves d'un immense amour, d'un attendrissement suprême et universel, comme si le cœur de l'humanité tout entière avait battu dans sa poitrine.

Hussonnet dit, en bâillant :

— “Il serait temps, peut-être, d'aller instruire les populations !”

Frédéric le suivit à son bureau de correspondance, place de la Bourse ; et il se mit à composer pour le journal de Troyes un compte rendu des événements en style lyrique, un véritable morceau, — qu'il signa. Puis ils dînèrent ensemble dans une taverne. Hussonnet était pensif ; les excentricités de la Révolution dépassaient les siennes.

Après le café, quand ils se rendirent à l'hôtel de ville, pour savoir du nouveau, son naturel gamin avait repris le dessus. Il escaladait les barricades, comme un chamois, et répondait aux sentinelles des gaudrioles patriotiques.

Ils entendirent, à la lueur des torches, proclamer le Gouvernement provisoire. Enfin, à minuit, Frédéric, brisé de fatigue, regagna sa maison.

— “Eh bien”, dit-il à son domestique en train de le déshabiller, “es-tu content ?”

— “Oui, sans doute, monsieur ! Mais ce que je n'aime pas, c'est ce peuple en cadence !”

Le lendemain, à son réveil, Frédéric pensa à Deslauriers. Il courut chez lui. L'avocat venait de partir, étant nommé commissaire en province. Dans la soirée de la veille, il était parvenu jusqu'à Ledru-Rollin et, l'obsédant au nom des Ecoles, en avait arraché une place, une mission. Du reste, disait le portier, il devait écrire la semaine prochaine, pour donner son adresse.

Après quoi, Frédéric s'en alla voir la Maréchale. Elle le reçut aigrement, car elle lui en voulait de son abandon. Sa rancune s'évanouit sous des assurances de paix réitérées. Tout était tranquille, maintenant, aucune raison d'avoir peur ; il l'embrassait ; et elle se déclara pour la République, — comme avait déjà fait Monseigneur l'Archevêque de Paris, et comme devaient faire avec une prestesse de zèle merveilleuse : la Magistrature, le Conseil d'Etat, l'Institut, les Maréchaux de France, Changarnier, M. de Falloux tous les bonapartistes, tous les légitimistes, et un nombre considérable d'orléanistes.

La chute de la Monarchie avait été si prompte, que, la première stupéfaction passée, il y eut chez les bourgeois comme un étonnement de vivre encore. L'exécution sommaire de quelques voleurs, fusillés sans jugements, parut une chose très juste. On se redit, pendant un mois, la phrase de Lamartine sur le drapeau rouge, "qui n'avait fait que le tour du Champ de Mars, tandis que le drapeau tricolore", etc ; et tous se rangèrent sous son ombre, chaque parti ne voyant des trois couleurs que la sienne — et se promettant bien, dès qu'il serait le plus fort, d'arracher les deux autres.

Comme les affaires étaient suspendues, l'inquiétude et la badauderie poussaient tout le monde hors de chez soi. Le négligé des costumes atténuait la différence des rangs sociaux, la haine se cachait, les espérances s'étaient étalées, la foule était pleine de douceur. L'orgueil d'un droit conquis éclatait sur les visages. On avait une gaieté de carnaval, des allures de bivac ; rien ne fut amusant comme l'aspect de Paris, les premiers jours.

Frédéric prenait la Maréchale à son bras ; et ils flânaient ensemble dans les rues. Elle se divertissait des rosettes décorant toutes les boutonnières, des étendards suspendus à toutes les fenêtres, des affiches de toute couleur placardées contre les murailles, et jetait çà et là quelque monnaie dans le tronc pour les blessés, établi sur une chaise, au milieu de la voie. Puis elle s'arrêtait devant des caricatures qui représentaient Louis-Philippe en pâtissier, en saltimbanque, en chien, en sangsue. Mais les hommes de Caussidière avec leur sabre et leur écharpe, l’effrayaient un peu. D’autres fois, c’était un arbre de la Liberté qu’on plantait. MM. les ecclésiastiques concouraient à la cérémonie, bénissant la République, escortés par des serviteurs à galons d’or ; et la multitude trouvait cela très bien. Le spectacle le plus fréquent était celui des députations de n’importe quoi, allant réclamer quelque chose à l’hôtel de ville, — car chaque métier, chaque industrie attendait du Gouvernement la fin radicale de sa misère. Quelques-uns, il est vrai, se rendaient près de lui pour le conseiller, ou le féliciter, ou tout simplement pour lui faire une petite visite, et voir fonctionner la machine.

Vers le milieu du mois de mars, un jour qu’il traversait le pont d’Arcole, ayant à faire une commission pour Rosanette dans le quartier Latin, Frédéric vit s’avancer une colonne d’individus à chapeaux bizarres, à longues barbes. En tête et battant du tambour marchait un nègre, un ancien modèle d’atelier, et l’homme qui portait la bannière sur laquelle flottait au vent cette inscription “Artistes peintres”, n’était autre que Pellerin.

Il fit signe à Frédéric de l’attendre, puis reparut cinq minutes après, ayant du temps devant lui, car le Gouvernement recevait à ce moment-là les tailleurs de pierre. Il allait avec ses collègues réclamer la création d’un Forum de l’Art, une espèce de Bourse où l’on débattrait les intérêts de l’esthétique ; des œuvres sublimes se produiraient puisque les travailleurs mettraient en commun leur génie. Paris, bientôt, serait couvert de monuments gigantesques ; il les décorerait ; il avait même commencé une figure de la République. Un de ses camarades vint le prendre, car ils étaient talonnés par la députation du commerce de la volaille.

— “Quelle bêtise !” grommela une voix dans la foule. “Toujours des blagues ! Rien de fort !”

C’était Regimbart. Il ne salua pas Frédéric, mais profita de l’occasion pour épandre son amertume.

Le Citoyen employait ses jours à vagabonder dans les rues, tirant sa moustache, roulant des yeux, acceptant et propageant des nouvelles lugubres ; et il n’avait que deux phrases : “Prenez garde, nous allons être débordés !” ou bien : “Mais, sacrebleu ! on escamote la République !” Il était mécontent de tout, et particulièrement de ce que nous n'avions pas repris nos frontières naturelles. Le nom seul de Lamartine lui faisait hausser les épaules. Il ne trouvait pas Ledru-Rollin, suffisant pour le problème ", traita Dupont (de l'Eure) de vieille ganache ; Albert, d'idiot ; Louis Blanc, d'utopiste, Blanqui, d'homme extrêmement dangereux ; et, quand Frédéric lui demanda ce qu'il aurait fallu faire, il répondit en lui serrant le bras à le broyer :

— "Prendre le Rhin, je vous dis, prendre le Rhin ! fichtre !"

Puis il accusa la réaction.

Elle se démasquait. Le sac des châteaux de Neuilly et de Suresne, l'incendie des Batignolles, les troubles de Lyon tous les excès, tous les griefs, on les exagérait à présent, en y ajoutant la circulaire de Ledru-Rollin le cours forcé des billets de Banque, la rente tombée à soixante francs, enfin, comme iniquité suprême, comme dernier coup, comme surcroît d'horreur, l'impôt des quarante-cinq centimes ! — Et, par-dessus tout cela, il y avait encore le Socialisme ! Bien que ces théories, aussi neuves que le jeu d'oie, eussent été depuis quarante ans suffisamment débattues pour emplir des bibliothèques, elles épouvantèrent les bourgeois, comme une grêle d'aérolithes ; et on fut indigné, en vertu de cette haine que provoque l'avènement de toute idée parce que c'est une idée, exécution dont elle tire plus tard sa gloire, et qui fait que ses ennemis sont toujours au-dessous d'elle, si médiocre qu'elle puisse être.

Alors, la Propriété monta dans les respects au niveau de la Religion et se confondit avec Dieu. Les attaques qu'on lui portait parurent du sacrilège, presque de l'anthropophagie. Malgré la législation la plus humaine qui fut jamais, le spectre de 93 reparut, et le couperet de la guillotine vibra dans toutes les syllabes du mot République ; — ce qui n'empêchait pas qu'on la méprisait pour sa faiblesse. La France, ne sentant plus de maître, se mit à crier d'effarement, comme un aveugle sans bâton, comme un marmot qui a perdu sa bonne.

De tous les Français, celui qui tremblait le plus fort était M. Dambreuse. L'état nouveau des choses menaçait sa fortune, mais surtout dupait son expérience. Un système si bon, un roi si sage ! était-ce possible ! La terre allait crouler ! Dès le lendemain, il congédia trois domestiques, vendit ses chevaux, s'acheta, pour sortir dans les rues, un chapeau mou, pensa même à laisser croître sa barbe ; et il restait chez lui, prostré, se repaissant amèrement des journaux les plus hostiles à ses idées, et devenu tellement sombre, que les plaisanteries sur la pipe de Flocon n'avaient pas même la force de le faire sourire.

Comme soutien du dernier règne, il redoutait les vengeances du peuple sur ses propriétés de la Champagne, quand l'élucubration de Frédéric lui tomba dans les mains. Alors il s'imagina que son jeune ami é tait un personnage très influent et qu'il pourrait sinon le servir, du moins le défendre ; de sorte qu'un matin, M. Dambreuse se présenta chez lui, accompagné de Martinon.

Cette visite n'avait pour but, dit-il, que de le voir un peu et de causer. Somme toute, il se réjouissait des événements, et il adoptait de grand cœur "notre sublime devise : Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité, ayant toujours été républicain, au fond". S'il votait, sous l'autre régime, avec le ministère, c'était simplement pour accélérer une chute inévitable. Il s'emporta même contre M. Guizot, "qui nous a mis dans un joli pétrin, convenons-en !" En revanche, il admirait beaucoup Lamartine, lequel s'était montré "magnifique, ma parole d'honneur, quand, à propos du drapeau rouge..."

— "Oui ! je sais", dit Frédéric.

Après quoi, il déclara sa sympathie pour les ouvriers. — "Car enfin, plus ou moins, nous sommes tous ouvriers !" Et il poussait l'impartialité jusqu'à reconnaître que Proudhon avait de la logique. "Oh ! beaucoup de logique ! diable !" Puis, avec le détachement d'une intelligence supérieure, il causa de l'exposition de peinture, où il avait vu le tableau de Pellerin. Il trouvait cela original, bien touché.

Martinon appuyait tous ses mots par des remarques approbatives ; lui aussi pensait qu'il fallait — se rallier franchement à la République ", et il parla de son père laboureur, faisait le paysan, l'homme du peuple. On arriva bientôt aux élections pour l'Assemblée nationale, et aux candidats dans l'arrondissement de la Fortelle. Celui de l'opposition n'avait pas de chances.

— "Vous devriez prendre sa place !" dit M. Dambreuse.

Frédéric se récria.

— "Eh ! pourquoi donc ?" car il obtiendrait les suffrages des ultras, vu ses opinions personnelles, celui des conservateurs, à cause de sa famille.

— "Et peut-être aussi", ajouta le banquier en souriant, "grâce un peu à mon influence."

Frédéric objecta qu'il ne saurait comment s'y prendre. Rien de plus facile, en se faisant recommander aux patriotes de l'Aube par un club de la capitale. Il s'agissait de lire, non une profession de foi comme on en voyait quotidiennement, mais une exposition de principes sérieuse.

— "Apportez-moi cela ; je sais ce qui convient dans la localité ! Et vous pourriez, je vous le répète, rendre de grands services au pays, à nous tous, à moi-même."

Par des temps pareils, on devait s'entraider, et, si Frédéric avait besoin de quelque chose, lui, ou ses amis...

— "Oh ! mille grâce, cher monsieur !"

— "A charge de revanche, bien entendu !"

Le banquier était un brave homme, décidément.

Frédéric ne put s'empêcher de réfléchir à son conseil et bientôt, une sorte de vertige l'éblouit.

Les grandes figures de la Convention passèrent devant ses yeux. Il lui sembla qu'une aurore magnifique allait se lever. Rome, Vienne, Berlin, étaient en insurrection, les Autrichiens chassés de Venise ; toute l'Europe s'agitait. C'était l'heure de se précipiter dans le mouvement, de l'accélérer peut-être ; et puis il était séduit par le costume que les députés, disait-on, porteraient. Déjà, il se voyait en gilet à revers avec une ceinture tricolore ; et ce prurit, cette hallucination devint si forte, qu'il s'en ouvrit à Dussardier.

L'enthousiasme du brave garçon ne faiblissait pas.

— "Certainement, bien sûr ! Présentez-vous !" Frédéric, néanmoins, consulta Deslauriers. L'opposition idiote qui entravait le commissaire dans sa province avait augmenté son libéralisme. Il lui envoya immédiatement des exhortations violentes.

Cependant, Frédéric avait besoin d'être approuvé par un plus grand nombre ; et il confia la chose à Rosanette, un jour que Mlle Vatnaz se trouvait là.

Elle était une de ces célibataires parisiennes qui, chaque soir, quand elles ont donné leurs leçons, ou tâché de vendre de petits dessins, de placer de pauvres manuscrits, rentrent chez elles avec de la crotte à leurs jupons, font leur dîner, le mangent toutes seules, puis, les pieds sur une chaufferette, à la lueur d'une lampe malpropre, rêvent un amour, une famille, un foyer, la fortune, tout ce qui leur manque. Aussi, comme beaucoup d'autres, avait-elle salué dans la Révolution l'avènement de la vengeance ; — et elle se livrait à une propagande socialiste, effrénée.

L'affranchissement du prolétaire, selon la Vatnaz, n'était possible que par l'affranchissement de la femme. Elle voulait son admissibilité à tous les emplois, la recherche de la paternité, un autre code, l'abolition, ou tout au moins "une réglementation du mariage plus intelligente". Alors, chaque Française serait tenue d'épouser un Français ou d'adopter un vieillard.

Il fallait que les nourrices et les accoucheuses fussent des fonctionnaires salariés par l'Etat ; qu'il y eût un jury pour examiner les œuvres de femmes, des éditeurs spéciaux pour les femmes, une école polytechnique pour les femmes, une garde nationale pour les femmes, tout pour les femmes ! Et, puisque le Gouvernement méconnaissait leurs droits, elles devaient vaincre la force par la force. Dix mille citoyennes, avec de bons fusils, pouvaient faire trembler l'hôtel de ville !

La candidature de Frédéric lui parut favorable à ses idées. Elle l'encouragea, en lui montrant la gloire à l'horizon. Rosanette se réjouit d'avoir un homme qui parlerait à la Chambre.

— "Et puis on te donnera, peut-être, une bonne place."

Frédéric, homme de toutes les faiblesses, fut gagné par la démente universelle. Il écrivit un discours, et alla le faire voir à M. Dambreuse.

Au bruit de la grande porte qui retombait, un rideau s'entrouvrit derrière une croisée ; une femme y parut. Il n'eut pas le temps de la reconnaître ; mais, dans l'antichambre, un tableau l'arrêta, le tableau de Pellerin, posé sur une chaise, provisoirement sans doute.

Cela représentait la République, ou le Progrès, ou la Civilisation, sous la figure de Jésus-Christ conduisant une locomotive, laquelle traversait une forêt vierge. Frédéric, après une minute de contemplation, s'écria :

— "Quelle turpitude !"

— "N'est-ce pas, hein ?" dit M. Dambreuse, survenu sur cette parole et s'imaginant qu'elle concernait non la peinture, mais la doctrine glorifiée par le tableau.

Martinon arriva au même moment. Ils passèrent dans le cabinet ; et Frédéric tirait un papier de sa poche, quand Mlle Cécile, entrant tout à coup, articula d'un air ingénu :

— “Ma tante est-elle ici ?”

— “Tu sais bien que non”, répliqua le banquier. “N’importe ! faites comme chez vous, mademoiselle.”

— “Oh ! merci ! je m’en vais.”

A peine sortie, Martinon eut l’air de chercher son mouchoir.

— “Je l’ai oublié dans mon paletot, excusez-moi !”

— “Bien !” dit M. Dambreuse.

Evidemment, il n’était pas dupe de cette manœuvre, et même semblait la favoriser. Pourquoi ? Mais bientôt Martinon reparut, et Frédéric entama son discours. Dès la seconde page, qui signalait comme une honte la prépondérance des intérêts pécuniaires, le banquier fit la grimace. Puis, abordant les réformes, Frédéric demandait la liberté du commerce.

— “Comment... ? mais permettez !”

L’autre n’entendait pas, et continua. Il réclamait l’impôt sur la rente, l’impôt progressif, une fédération européenne, et l’instruction du peuple, des encouragements aux beaux-arts les plus larges.

— “Quand le pays fournirait à des hommes comme Delacroix ou Hugo cent mille francs de rente, où serait le mal ?”

Le tout finissait par des conseils aux classes supérieures.

— “N’épargnez rien, ô riches ! donnez ! donnez !”

Il s’arrêta, et resta debout. Ses deux auditeurs assis ne parlaient pas ; Martinon écarquillait les yeux, M. Dambreuse était tout pâle. Enfin dissimulant son émotion sous un aigre sourire :

— “C’est parfait, votre discours !” Et il en vanta beaucoup la forme, pour n’avoir pas à s’exprimer sur le fond.

Cette virulence de la part d’un jeune homme inoffensif l’effrayait, surtout comme symptôme. Martinon tâcha de le rassurer. Le parti conservateur, d’ici peu, prendrait sa revanche, certainement ; dans plusieurs villes on avait chassé les commissaires du gouvernement provisoire : les élections n’étaient fixées qu’au 23 avril, on avait du temps ; bref, il fallait que M. Dambreuse, lui-même, se présentât dans l’Aube ; et, dès lors, Martinon ne le quitta plus, devint son secrétaire et l’entoura de soins filiaux.

Frédéric arriva fort content de sa personne chez Rosanette. Delmar y était, et lui apprit que “définitivement” il se portait comme candidat aux élections de la Seine. Dans une affiche adressée “au Peuple” et où il le tutoyait, l'acteur se vantait de le comprendre, "lui", et des êtres fait, pour son salut, "crucifier par l'Art", si bien qu'il était son incarnation, son idéal ; — croyant effectivement avoir sur les masses une influence énorme, jusqu'à proposer plus tard dans un bureau de ministère de réduire une émeute à lui seul ; et, quant aux moyens qu'il emploierait, il fit cette réponse :

— "N'ayez pas peur ! Je leur montrerai ma tête" Frédéric, pour le mortifier, lui notifia sa propre candidature. Le cabotin, du moment que son futur collègue visait la province, se déclara son serviteur et offrit de le piloter dans les clubs.

Ils les visitèrent tous, ou presque tous, les rouges et les bleus, les furibonds et les tranquilles, les puritains, les débraillés, les mystiques et les pochards, ceux où l'on décrétait la mort des Rois, ceux où l'on dénonçait les fraudes de l'Épicerie ; et, partout, les locataires maudissaient les propriétaires, la blouse s'en prenait à l'habit, et les riches conspiraient contre les pauvres. Plusieurs voulaient des indemnités comme anciens martyrs de la police, d'autres imploraient de l'argent pour mettre en jeu des inventions, ou bien c'étaient des plans de phalanstères, des projets de bazars cantonaux, des systèmes de félicité publique ; — puis, çà et là, un éclair d'esprit dans ces nuages de sottise, des apostrophes, soudaines comme des éclaboussures, le droit formulé par un juron, et des fleurs d'éloquence aux lèvres d'un goujat, portant à cru le baudrier d'un sabre sur sa poitrine sans chemise. Quelquefois aussi, figurait un monsieur, aristocrate humble d'allures, disant des choses plébéiennes, et qui ne s'était pas lavé les mains pour les faire paraître calleuses. Un patriote le reconnaissait, les plus vertueux le houspillaient ; et il sortait la rage dans l'âme. On devait, par affectation de bon sens, dénigrer toujours les avocats, et servir le plus souvent possible ces locutions : "apporter sa pierre à l'édifice, — problème social, — atelier."

Delmar ne ratait pas les occasions d'empoigner la parole ; et, quand il ne trouvait plus rien à dire, sa ressource était de se camper le poing sur la hanche, l'autre bras dans le gilet, en se tournant de profil, brusquement, de manière à bien montrer sa tête. Alors, des applaudissements éclataient, ceux de Mlle Vatnaz au fond de la salle.

Frédéric, malgré la faiblesse des orateurs, n'osait se risquer. Tous ces gens lui semblaient trop incultes ou trop hostiles.

Mais Dussardier se mit en recherche, et lui annonça qu'il existait, rue Saint-Jacques, un club intitulé le Club de l'Intelligence. Un nom pareil donnait bon espoir. D'ailleurs, il amènerait des amis.

Il amena ceux qu'il avait invités à son punch : le teneur de livres, le placeur de vins, l'architecte ; Pellerin même était venu, peut-être qu'Hussonnet allait venir ; et sur le trottoir, devant la porte, stationnait Regimbart avec deux individus, dont le premier était son fidèle Compain, homme un peu courtaud, marqué de petite vérole, les yeux rouges ; et le second, une espèce de singe-nègre, extrêmement chevelu, et qu'il connaissait seulement pour être "un patriote de Barcelone."

Ils passèrent par une allée, puis furent introduits dans une grande pièce, à usage de menuisier sans doute, et dont les murs encore neufs sentaient le plâtre. Quatre quinquets accrochés parallèlement y faisaient une lumière désagréable. Sur une estrade, au fond, il y avait un bureau avec une sonnette, en dessous une table figurant la tribune, et de chaque côté deux autres plus basses, pour les secrétaires. L'auditoire qui garnissait les bancs était composé de vieux rapins, de pions, d'hommes de lettres inédits. Sur ces lignes de paletots à collets gras, on voyait de place en place le bonnet d'une femme ou le bourgeron d'un ouvrier. Le fond de la salle était même plein d'ouvriers, venus là sans doute par désœuvrement, ou qu'avaient introduits des orateurs pour se faire applaudir.

Frédéric eut soin de se mettre entre Dussardier et Regimbart, qui, à peine assis, posa ses deux mains sur sa canne, son menton sur ses deux mains et ferma les paupières, tandis qu'à l'autre extrémité de la salle, Delmar, debout, dominait l'assemblée.

Au bureau du président, Sénécals parut.

Cette surprise, avait pensé le bon commis, plairait à Frédéric. Elle le contraria.

La foule témoignait à son président une grande déférence. Il était de ceux qui, le 25 février, avaient voulu l'organisation immédiate du travail ; le lendemain, au Prado, il s'était prononcé pour qu'on attaquât l'Hôtel de ville ; et, comme chaque personnage se réglait alors sur un modèle, l'un copiant Saint-Just, l'autre Danton, l'autre Marat, lui, il tâchait de ressembler à Blanqui, lequel imitait Robespierre. Ses gants noirs et ses cheveux en brosse lui donnaient un aspect rigide, extrêmement convenable.

Il ouvrit la séance par la déclaration des Droits de l'homme et du citoyen, acte de foi habituel. Puis une voix vigoureuse entonna les Souvenirs du peuple de Béranger.

D'autres voix s'élevèrent.

— “Non ! non ! pas ça !”

— “La Casquette !” se mirent à hurler, au fond, les patriotes.

Et ils chantèrent en chœur la poésie du jour :

Chapeau bas devant ma casquette,
À genoux devant l'ouvrier !

Sur un mot du président, l'auditoire se tut. Un des secrétaires procéda au dépouillement des lettres.

— “Des jeunes gens annoncent qu'ils brûlent chaque soir devant le Panthéon un numéro de l'Assemblée nationale, et ils engagent tous les patriotes à suivre leur exemple.”

— “Bravo ! adopté !” répondit la foule.

— “Le citoyen Jean-Jacques Langreneux, typographe, rue Dauphine, voudrait qu'on élevât un monument à la mémoire des martyrs de thermidor.”

— “Michel-Evariste-Népomucène Vincent, ex-professeur, émet le vœu que la démocratie européenne adopte l'unité de langage. On pourrait se servir d'une langue morte, comme par exemple du latin perfectionné.”

— “Non ! pas de latin !” s'écria l'architecte.

— “Pourquoi ?” reprit un maître d'études.

Et ces deux messieurs engagèrent une discussion, où d'autres se mêlèrent, chacun jetant son mot pour éblouir, et qui ne tarda pas à devenir tellement fastidieuse, que beaucoup s'en allaient.

Mais un petit vieillard, portant au bas de son front prodigieusement haut des lunettes vertes, réclama la parole pour une communication urgente.

C'était un mémoire sur la répartition des impôts. Les chiffres découlaient, cela n'en finissait plus ! L'impatience éclata d'abord en murmures, en conversations ; rien ne le troublait. Puis on se mit à siffler, on appelait “Azor” ; Sénécal gourmanda le public ; l'orateur continuait comme une machine. Il fallut, pour l'arrêter, le prendre par le coude. Le bonhomme eut l'air de sortir d'un songe, et, levant tranquillement ses lunettes :

— “Pardon ! citoyens ! pardon ! Je me retire ! mille excuses !”

L'insuccès de cette lecture déconcerta Frédéric. Il avait son discours dans sa poche, mais une improvisation eût mieux valu.

Enfin, le président annonça qu'ils allaient passer à l'affaire importante, la question électorale. On ne discuterait pas les grandes listes républicaines. Cependant, le Club de l'Intelligence avait bien le droit, comme un autre, d'en former une, “n'en déplaie à MM. les pachas de l'hôtel de ville”, et les citoyens qui briguaient le mandat populaire pouvaient exposer leurs titres.

— “Allez-y donc !” dit Dussardier.

Un homme en soutane, crépu, et de physionomie pétulante, avait déjà levé la main. Il déclara, en bredouillant, s'appeler Ducretot, prêtre et agronome auteur d'un ouvrage intitulé Des engrais. On le renvoya vers un cercle horticole.

Puis un patriote en blouse gravit la tribune. Celui-là était un plébéien, large d'épaules, une grosse figure très douce et de longs cheveux noirs. Il parcourut l'assemblée d'un regard presque voluptueux, se renversa la tête, et enfin, écartant les bras :

— “Vous avez repoussé Ducretot, O mes frères ! et vous avez bien fait, mais ce n'est pas par irréligion, car nous sommes tous religieux.”

Plusieurs écoutaient la bouche ouverte, avec des airs de catéchumènes, des poses extatiques.

— “Ce n'est pas, non plus, parce qu'il est prêtre, car, nous aussi, nous sommes prêtres ! L'ouvrier est prêtre, comme l'était le fondateur du socialisme, notre Maître à tous, Jésus-Christ !”

Le moment était venu d'inaugurer le règne de Dieu. L'Evangile conduisait tout droit à 89 ! Après l'abolition de l'esclavage, l'abolition du prolétariat. On avait eu l'âge de haine, allait commencer l'âge d'amour.

— “Le christianisme est la clef de voûte et le fondement de l'édifice nouveau...”

— “Vous fichez-vous de nous ?” s'écria le placeur d'alcools. “Qu'est-ce qui m'a donné un calotin pareil !” Cette interruption causa un grand scandale. Presque tous montèrent sur les bancs, et, le poing tendu, vociféraient : “Athée ! aristocrate ! canaille !” pendant que la sonnette du président tintait sans discontinuer et que les cris “A l’ordre ! à l’ordre !” redoublaient. Mais, intrépide, et soutenu d’ailleurs par “trois cafés” pris avant de venir, il se débattait au milieu des autres.

— “Comment, moi ! un aristocrate ? allons donc !” Admis enfin à s’expliquer, il déclara qu’on ne serait jamais tranquille avec les prêtres, et, puisqu’on avait parlé tout à l’heure d’économies, c’en serait une fameuse que de supprimer les églises, les saints ciboires, et finalement tous les cultes.

Quelqu’un lui objecta qu’il allait loin.

— “Oui ! je vais loin ! Mais, quand un vaisseau est surpris par la tempête...”

Sans attendre la fin de la comparaison, un autre lui répondit :

— “D’accord ! mais c’est démolir d’un seul coup, comme un maçon sans discernement...”

— “Vous insultez les maçons !” hurla un citoyen couvert de plâtre ; et, s’obstinant à croire qu’on l’avait provoqué, il vomit des injures, voulait se battre, se cramponnait à son banc. Trois hommes ne furent pas de trop pour le mettre dehors.

Cependant, l’ouvrier se tenait toujours à la tribune. Les deux secrétaires l’avertirent d’en descendre. Il protesta contre le passe-droit qu’on lui faisait.

— “Vous ne m’empêcherez pas de crier : amour éternel à notre chère France ! amour éternel aussi à la République !”

— “Citoyens !” dit alors Compain, “citoyens !”

Et, à force de répéter : “Citoyens”, ayant obtenu un peu de silence, il appuya sur la tribune ses deux mains rouges, pareilles à des moignons, se porta le corps en avant, et, clignant des yeux :

— “Je crois qu’il faudrait donner une plus large extension à la tête de veau.”

Tous se taisaient, croyant avoir mal entendu.

— “Oui ! la tête de veau !”

Trois cents rires éclatèrent d’un seul coup. Le plafond trembla. Devant toutes ces faces bouleversées par la joie, Compain se reculait. Il reprit d’un ton furieux :

— “Comment ! vous ne connaissez pas la tête de veau”

Ce fut un paroxysme, un délire. On se pressait les côtes. Quelques-uns même tombaient par terre, sous les bancs. Compain n’y tenant plus, se réfugia près de Regimbart et il voulait l'entraîner.

— “Non ! je reste jusqu'au bout !” dit le Citoyen.

Cette réponse détermina Frédéric ; et, comme il cherchait de droite et de gauche ses amis pour le soutenir, il aperçut, devant lui, Pellerin à la tribune. L'artiste le prit de haut avec la foule.

— “Je voudrais savoir un peu où est le candidat de l'Art dans tout cela ? Moi, j'ai fait un tableau...”

— “Nous n'avons que faire des tableaux !” dit brutalement un homme maigre, ayant des plaques rouges aux pommettes.

Pellerin se récria qu'on l'interrompait.

Mais l'autre, d'un ton tragique :

— “Est-ce que le Gouvernement n'aurait pas dû déjà abolir, par un décret, la prostitution et la misère ?”

Et, cette parole lui ayant livré tout de suite la faveur du peuple, il tonna contre la corruption des grandes villes.

— “Honte et infamie ! On devrait happer les bourgeois au sortir de la Maison d'or et leur cracher à la figure ! Au moins, si le Gouvernement ne favorisait pas la débauche ! Mais les employés de l'octroi sont envers nos filles et nos sœurs d'une indécence...”

Une voix proféra de loin :

— “C'est rigolo !”

— “A la porte !”

— “On tire de nous des contributions pour solder le libertinage ! Ainsi, les forts appointements d'acteur...”

— “A moi !” s'écria Delmar.

Il bondit à la tribune, écarta tout le monde, prit sa pose ; et, déclarant qu'il méprisait d'aussi plates accusations, s'étendit sur la mission civilisatrice du comédien. Puisque le théâtre était le foyer de l'instruction nationale, il votait pour la réforme du théâtre ; et, d'abord, plus de directions, plus de privilèges !

— “Oui ! d'aucune sorte !”

Le jeu de l'acteur échauffait la multitude, et des motions subversives se croisaient.

— “Plus d'académies ! plus d'Institut”

— “Plus de missions !”

— “Plus de baccalauréat !”

— “A bas les grades universitaires !”

— “Conservons-les”, dit Sénecal, “mais qu’ils soient conférés par le suffrage universel, par le Peuple, seul vrai juge !”

Le plus utile, d’ailleurs, n’était pas cela. Il fallait d’abord passer le niveau sur la tête des riches ! Et il les représenta se gorgeant de crimes sous leurs plafonds dorés, tandis que les pauvres, se tordant de faim dans leurs galetas, cultivaient toutes les vertus. Les applaudissements devinrent si forts, qu’il s’interrompit. Pendant quelques minutes, il resta les paupières closes, la tête renversée et comme se berçant sur cette colère qu’il soulevait.

Puis, il se remit à parler d’une façon dogmatique, en phrases impérieuses comme des lois. L’Etat devait s’emparer de la Banque et des Assurances. Les héritages seraient abolis. On établirait un fond social pour les travailleurs. Bien d’autres mesures étaient bonnes dans l’avenir. Celles-là, pour le moment, suffisaient ; et, revenant aux élections :

— “Il nous faut des citoyens purs, des hommes entièrement neufs ! Quelqu’un se présente-t-il ?”

Frédéric se leva. Il y eut un bourdonnement d’approbation causé par ses amis. Mais Sénecal, prenant une figure à la Fouquier-Tinville, se mit à l’interroger sur ses nom, prénoms, antécédents, vie et mœurs.

Frédéric lui répondait sommairement et se mordait les lèvres. Sénecal demanda si quelqu’un voyait un empêchement à cette candidature.

— “Non ! non !”

Mais lui, il en voyait. Tous se penchèrent et tendirent les oreilles. Le citoyen postulant n’avait pas livré une certaine somme promise pour une fondation démocratique, un journal. De plus, le 22 février, bien que suffisamment averti, il avait manqué au rendez-vous, place du Panthéon.

— “Je jure qu’il était aux Tuileries !” s’écria Dussardier.

— “Pouvez-vous jurer l’avoir vu au Panthéon ?” Dussardier baissa la tête. Frédéric se taisait ; ses amis scandalisés le regardaient avec inquiétude.

— “Au moins”, reprit Sénecal, “connaissez-vous un patriote qui nous réponde de vos principes ?”

— “Moi !” dit Dussardier.

— “Oh ! cela ne suffit pas ! un autre !”

Frédéric se tourna vers Pellerin. L'artiste lui répondit par une abondance de gestes qui signifiait :

— “Ah ! mon cher, ils m'ont repoussé ! Diable ! que voulez-vous !”

Alors, Frédéric poussa du coude Regimbart.

— “Oui ! c'est vrai ! il est temps ! j'y vais !”

Et Regimbart enjamba l'estrade ; puis, montrant l'Espagnol qui l'avait suivi :

— “Permettez-moi, citoyens, de vous présenter un patriote de Barcelone.”

Le patriote fit un grand salut, roula comme un automate ses yeux d'argent, et, la main sur le cœur :

— “Ciudadanos ! mucho aprecio el honor que me dispensáis, y si grande es vuestra bondad mayor es vuestro atención.”

— “Je réclame la parole !” cria Frédéric.

— “Desde que se proclamó la constitución de Cadiz, ese pacto fundamental de las libertades españolas, hasta la última revolución, nuestra patria cuenta numerosos y heroicos mártires.”

Frédéric encore une fois voulut se faire entendre :

— “Mais citoyens !...”

L'Espagnol continuait :

— “El martes próximo tendrá lugar en la iglesia de la Magdalena un servicio fúnebre.”

— “C'est absurde à la fin ! personne ne comprend !”

Cette observation exaspéra la foule.

— “A la porte ! à la porte !”

— “Qui ? moi ?” demanda Frédéric.

— “Vous-même !” dit majestueusement Sénécail.

— “Sortez !”

Il se leva pour sortir ; et la voix de libérien le poursuivait :

— “Y todos los españoles desearían ver allí reunidas las deputaciones de los clubs y de la milicia nacional. Una oración fúnebre en honor de la libertad española y del mundo entero, será pronunciada por un miembro del clero de Paris en la sala Bonne-Nouvelle. Honor al pueblo francés, que llamaría yo el primero pueblo del mundo, si no fuese ciudadano de otra nación” — “Aristo !” glapit un voyou, en montrant le poing à Frédéric, qui s'élançait dans la cour, indigné.

Il se reprocha son dévouement, sans réfléchir que les accusations portées contre lui étaient justes, après tout. Quelle fatale idée que cette candidature ! Mais quels ânes, quels crétins ! Il se comparait à ces hommes, et soulageait avec leur sottise la blessure de son orgueil. Puis il éprouva le besoin de voir Rosanette. Après tant de laideurs et d'emphase, sa gentille personne serait un délassement. Elle savait qu'il avait dû, le soir, se présenter dans un club. Cependant, lorsqu'il entra, elle ne lui fit pas même une question.

Elle se tenait près du feu, décousant la doublure d'une robe. Un pareil ouvrage le surprit.

— “Tiens ? qu'est-ce que tu fais ?”

— “Tu le vois”, dit-elle sèchement. “Je raccommode mes hardes ! C'est ta République.”

— “Pourquoi ma République ?”

— “C'est la mienne, peut-être ?”

Et elle se mit à lui reprocher tout ce qui se passait en France depuis deux mois, l'accusant d'avoir fait la révolution, d'être cause qu'on était ruiné, que les gens riches abandonnaient Paris, et qu'elle mourrait plus tard à l'hôpital.

— “Tu en parles à ton aise, toi, avec tes rentes ! Du reste, au train dont ça va, tu ne les auras pas longtemps, tes rentes.”

— “Cela se peut”, dit Frédéric, “les plus dévoués sont toujours méconnus ; et, si l'on n'avait pour soi sa conscience, les brutes avec qui l'on se compromet vous dégoûteraient de l'abnégation !”

Rosanette le regarda, les cils rapprochés.

— “Hein ? Quoi ? Quelle abnégation ? Monsieur n'a pas réussi, à ce qu'il paraît ? Tant mieux ! ça t'apprendra à faire des dons patriotiques. Oh ! ne mens pas ! Je sais que tu leur as donné trois cents francs, car elle se fait entretenir, ta République ! Eh bien, amuse-toi avec elle, mon bonhomme !”

Sous cette avalanche de sottises, Frédéric passait de son autre désappointement à une déception plus lourde.

Il s'était retiré au fond de la chambre. Elle vint à lui.

— “Voyons ! raisonne un peu ! Dans un pays comme dans une maison, il faut un maître ; autrement, chacun fait danser l'anse du panier. D'abord, tout le monde sait que Ledru-Rollin est couvert de dettes ! Quant à Lamartine, comment veux-tu qu'un poète s'entende à la politique ? Ah ! tu as beau hocher la tête et te croire plus d'esprit que les autres, c'est pourtant vrai ! Mais tu ergotes toujours ; on ne peut pas placer un mot avec toi ! Voilà par exemple Fournier-Fontaine, des magasins de Saint-Roch : sais-tu de combien il manque ? De huit cent mille francs ! Et Gomer, l'emballer d'en face, un autre républicain celui-là, il cassait les pincettes sur la tête de sa femme, et il a bu tant d'absinthe, qu'on va le mettre dans une maison de santé. C'est comme ça qu'ils sont tous, les républicains ! Une République à vingt-cinq pour cent ! Ah oui ! vante-toi !"

Frédéric s'en alla. L'ineptie de cette fille, se dévoilant tout à coup dans un langage populacier, le dégoûtait. Il se sentit même un peu redevenu patriote.

La mauvaise humeur de Rosanette ne fit que s'accroître. Mlle Vatnaz l'irritait par son enthousiasme. Se croyant une mission, elle avait la rage de pérorer, de catéchiser, et, plus forte que son amie dans ces matières, l'accablait d'arguments.

Un jour, elle arriva tout indignée contre Hussonnet, qui venait de se permettre des polissonneries, au club des femmes. Rosanette approuva cette conduite, déclarant même qu'elle prendrait des habits d'homme pour aller "leur dire leur fait, à toutes, et les fouetter". Frédéric entraît au même moment.

— "Tu m'accompagneras, n'est-ce pas ?"

Et, malgré sa présence, elles se chamaillèrent, l'une faisant la bourgeoise, l'autre la philosophe.

Les femmes, selon Rosanette, étaient nées exclusivement pour l'amour ou pour élever des enfants, pour tenir un ménage.

D'après Mlle Vatnaz, la femme devait avoir sa place dans l'Etat. Autrefois, les Gauloises légiféraient, les Anglo-Saxonnes aussi, les épouses des Hurons faisaient partie du Conseil. L'œuvre civilisatrice était commune. Il fallait toutes y concourir, et substituer enfin à l'égoïsme la fraternité, à l'individualisme l'association, au morcellement la grande culture.

— "Allons, bon ! tu te connais en culture, à présent" Pourquoi pas ? D'ailleurs, il s'agit de l'humanité, de son avenir ! "

— "Mêle-toi du tien !"

— "Ça me regarde !"

Elles se fâchaient. Frédéric s'interposa. La Vatnaz s'échauffait, et arriva même à soutenir le Communisme.

— “Quelle bêtise !” dit Rosanette. “Est-ce que jamais ça pourra se faire ?”

L’autre cita en preuve les Esséniens, les frères Moraves, les Jésuites du Paraguay, la famille des Pingons, près de Thiers en Auvergne ; et, comme elle gesticulait beaucoup, sa chaîne de montre se prit dans son paquet de breloques, à un petit mouton d’or suspendu.

Tout à coup, Rosanette pâlit extraordinairement. Mlle Vatnaz continuait à dégager son bibelot. — “Ne te donne pas tant de mal”, dit Rosanette “maintenant, je connais tes opinions politiques.”

— “Quoi ?” reprit la Vatnaz, devenue rouge comme une vierge.

— “Oh ! oh ! tu me comprends !”

Frédéric ne comprenait pas. Entre elles, évidemment, il était survenu quelque chose de plus capital et de plus intime que le socialisme.

— “Et quand cela serait”, répliqua la Vatnaz, se redressant intrépidement.

— “C’est un emprunt, ma chère, dette pour dette !”

— “Parbleu, je ne nie pas les miennes ! Pour quelques mille francs, belle histoire ! J’emprunte au moins ; je ne vole personne !”

Mlle Vatnaz s’efforça de rire.

— “Oh ! j’en mettrais ma main au feu.”

— “Prends garde ! Elle est assez sèche pour brûler.”

La vieille fille lui présenta sa main droite, et, la gardant levée juste en face d’elle :

— “Mais il y a de tes amis qui la trouvent à leur convenance !”

— “Des Andalous, alors ? comme castagnettes !”

— “Gueuse !”

La Maréchale fit un grand salut.

— “On n’est pas plus ravissante !”

Mlle Vatnaz ne répondit rien. Des gouttes de sueur parurent à ses tempes. Ses yeux se fixaient sur le tapis.

Elle haletait. Enfin, elle gagna la porte, et, la faisant claquer vigoureusement :

— “Bonsoir ! Vous aurez de mes nouvelles !”

— “A l’avantage !” dit Rosanette.

Sa contrainte l’avait brisée. Elle tomba sur le divan, toute tremblante, balbutiant des injures, versant des larmes. Était-ce cette menace de la Vatnaz qui la tourmentait ? Eh non ! elle s'en moquait bien ! A tout compter, l'autre lui devait de l'argent, peut-être ? C'était le mouton d'or, un cadeau ; et, au milieu de ses pleurs, le nom de Delmar lui échappa. Donc, elle aimait le cabotin !

— “Alors, pourquoi m'a-t-elle pris ?” se demanda Frédéric. “D'où vient qu'il est revenu ? Qui la force à me garder ? Quel est le sens de tout cela ?”

Les petits sanglots de Rosanette continuaient. Elle était toujours au bord du divan, étendue de côté, la joue droite sur ses deux mains, — et semblait un être si délicat, inconscient et endolori, qu'il se rapprocha d'elle, et la baisa au front, doucement.

Alors, elle lui fit des assurances de tendresse ; le Prince venait de partir, ils seraient libres. Mais elle se trouvait pour le moment... gênée. “Tu l'as vu toi-même l'autre jour, quand j'utilisais mes vieilles doublures.” Plus d'équipages à présent ! Et ce n'était pas tout ; le tapissier menaçait de reprendre les meubles de la chambre et du grand salon. Elle ne savait que faire.

Frédéric eut envie de répondre : “Ne t'inquiète pas ! je payerai !” Mais la dame pouvait mentir. L'expérience l'avait instruit. Il se borna simplement à des consolations.

Les craintes de Rosanette n'étaient pas vaines ; il fallut rendre les meubles et quitter le bel appartement de la rue Drouot. Elle en prit un autre, sur le boulevard Poissonnière, au quatrième. Les curiosités de son ancien boudoir furent suffisantes pour donner aux trois pièces un air coquet. On eut des stores chinois, une tente sur la terrasse, dans le salon un tapis de hasard encore tout neuf, avec des poufs de soie rose. Frédéric avait contribué largement à ces acquisitions ; il éprouvait la joie d'un nouveau marié qui possède enfin une maison à lui, une femme à lui ; et, se plaisant là beaucoup, il venait y coucher presque tous les soirs.

Un matin, comme il sortait de l'antichambre, il aperçut au troisième étage, dans l'escalier, le shako d'un garde national qui montait. Où allait-il donc ? Frédéric attendit. L'homme montait toujours, la tête un peu baissée : il leva les yeux. C'était le sieur Arnoux. La situation était claire. Ils rougirent en même temps, saisis par le même embarras.

Arnoux, le premier, trouva moyen d'en sortir.

— “Elle va mieux, n’est-il pas vrai ?” comme si, Rosanette étant malade, il se fût présenté pour avoir de ses nouvelles.

Frédéric profita de cette ouverture.

— “Oui, certainement ! Sa bonne me l’a dit, du moins”, voulant faire entendre qu’on ne l’avait pas reçu.

Puis ils restèrent face à face, irrésolus l’un et l’autre, et s’observant. C’était à qui des deux ne s’en irait pas. Arnoux, encore une fois, trancha la question.

— “Ah ! bah ! je reviendrai plus tard ! Où vouliez-vous aller ? Je vous accompagne !”

Et, quand ils furent dans la rue, il causa aussi naturellement que d’habitude. Sans doute, il n’avait point le caractère jaloux, ou bien il était trop bonhomme pour se fâcher.

D’ailleurs, la patrie le préoccupait. Maintenant il ne quittait plus l’uniforme. Le 29 mars, il avait défendu les bureaux de la Presse. Quand on envahit la Chambre il se signala par son courage, et il fut du banquet offert à la garde nationale d’Amiens.

Hussonnet, toujours de service avec lui, profitait, plus que personne, de sa gourde et de ses cigares ; mais, irrévérencieux par nature, il se plaisait à le contredire, dénigrant le style peu correct des décrets, les conférences du Luxembourg, les vésuviennes, les tyroliens, tout, jusqu’au char de l’Agriculture, traîné par des chevaux à la place de bœufs et escorté de jeunes filles laides. Arnoux, au contraire, défendait le Pouvoir et rêvait la fusion des partis. Cependant, ses affaires prenaient une tournure mauvaise. Il s’en inquiétait médiocrement.

Les relations de Frédéric et de la Maréchale ne l’avaient point attristé ; car cette découverte l’autorisa (dans sa conscience) à supprimer la pension qu’il lui refaisait depuis le départ du Prince. Il allégua l’embarras des circonstances, gémit beaucoup, et Rosanette fut généreuse. Alors M. Arnoux se considéra comme l’amant de cœur, ce qui le rehaussait dans son estime, et le rajeunit. Ne doutant pas que Frédéric ne payât la Maréchale, il s’imaginait “faire une bonne farce”, arriva même à s’en cacher, et lui laissait le champ libre quand ils se rencontraient.

Ce partage blessait Frédéric ; et les politesses de son rival lui semblaient une gouaillerie trop prolongée. Mais, en se fâchant, il se fût ôté toute chance d’un retour vers l’autre, et puis c’était le seul moyen d'en entendre parler. Le marchand de faïences, suivant son usage, ou, par malice peut-être, la rappelait volontiers dans sa conversation, et lui demandait même pourquoi il ne venait plus la voir.

Frédéric, ayant épuisé tous les prétextes, assura qu'il avait été chez madame Arnoux plusieurs fois, inutilement. Arnoux en demeura convaincu, car souvent il s'extasiait devant elle sur l'absence de leur ami ; et toujours elle répondait avoir manqué sa visite ; de sorte que ces deux mensonges, au lieu de se couper se corroboraient.

La douceur du jeune homme et la joie de l'avoir pour dupe faisaient qu'Arnoux le chérissait davantage. Il poussait la familiarité jusqu'aux dernières bornes, non par dédain, mais par confiance. Un jour, il lui écrivit qu'une affaire urgente l'attirait pour vingt-quatre heures en province — , il le pria de monter la garde à sa place. Frédéric n'osa le refuser, et se rendit au poste du Carrousel.

Il eut à subir la société des gardes nationaux ! et, sauf un épurateur, homme facétieux qui buvait d'une manière exorbitante, tous lui parurent plus bêtes que leur giberne. L'entretien capital fut sur le remplacement des buffleteries par le ceinturon. D'autres s'emportaient contre les ateliers nationaux. On disait : "Où allons-nous ?" Celui qui avait reçu l'apostrophe répondait en ouvrant les yeux, comme au bord d'un abîme : "Où allons-nous ?" Alors un plus hardi s'écriait : "Ça ne peut pas durer ! il faut en finir !" Et, les mêmes discours se répétant jusqu'au soir, Frédéric s'ennuya mortellement.

La surprise fut grande, quand, à onze heures, il vit paraître Arnoux, lequel, tout de suite, dit qu'il accourait pour le libérer, son affaire étant finie.

Il n'avait pas eu d'affaire. C'était une invention pour passer vingt-quatre heures, seul, avec Rosanette. Mais le brave Arnoux avait trop présumé de lui-même, si bien que, dans sa lassitude, un remords l'avait pris. Il venait faire des remerciements à Frédéric et lui offrir à souper.

— "Mille grâces ! je n'ai pas faim ! je ne demande que mon lit !"

— "Raison de plus pour déjeuner ensemble, tantôt !"

Quel mollasse vous êtes ! On ne rentre pas chez soi maintenant ! Il est trop tard ! Ce serait dangereux ! " Frédéric, encore une fois, céda. Arnoux, qu'on ne s'attendait pas à voir, fut choyé de ses frères d'armes, principalement de l'épurateur. Tous l'aimaient ; et il était si bon garçon, qu'il regretta la présence d'Hussonnet. Mais il avait besoin de fermer l'oeil une minute, pas davantage.

— “Mettez-vous près de moi”, dit-il à Frédéric, tout en s'allongeant sur le lit de camp, sans ôter ses buffleteries. Par peur d'une alerte, en dépit du règlement, il garda même son fusil ; puis balbutia quelques mots : “Ma chérie ! mon petit ange !” et ne tarda pas à s'endormir.

Ceux qui parlaient se turent ; et peu à peu il se fit dans le poste un grand silence. Frédéric, tourmenté par les puces, regardait autour de lui. La muraille, peinte en jaune, avait à moitié de sa hauteur une longue planche où les sacs formaient une suite de petites bosses, tandis qu'au-dessous, les fusils couleur de plomb étaient dressés les uns près des autres — , et il s'élevait des ronflements, produits par les gardes nationaux, dont les ventres se dessinaient d'une manière confuse, dans l'ombre. Une bouteille vide et des assiettes couvraient le poêle. Trois chaises de paille entouraient la table, où s'étalait un jeu de cartes. Un tambour, au milieu du banc, laissait pendre sa bricole. Le vent chaud arrivant par la porte, faisait fumer le quinquet. Arnoux dormait les deux bras ouverts ; et comme son fusil était posé la crosse en bas un peu obliquement, la gueule du canon lui arrivait sous l'aisselle. Frédéric le remarqua et fut effrayé.

— “Mais non ! j'ai tort ! il n'y a rien à craindre ! S'il mourait cependant...”

Et, tout de suite, des tableaux à n'en plus finir se déroulèrent. Il s'aperçut avec elle, la nuit, dans une chaise de poste ; puis au bord d'un fleuve par un soir d'été, et sous le reflet d'une lampe, chez eux, dans leur maison. Il s'arrêtait même à des calculs de ménage, des dispositions domestiques, contemplant, palpant déjà son bonheur ; — et, pour le réaliser, il aurait fallu seulement que le chien du fusil se levât ! On pouvait le pousser du bout de l'orteil ; le coup partirait, ce serait un hasard, rien de plus !

Frédéric s'étendit sur cette idée, comme un dramaturge qui compose. Tout à coup, il lui sembla qu'elle n'était pas loin de se résoudre en action, et qu'il allait y contribuer, qu'il en avait envie ; alors, une grande peur le saisit. Au milieu de cette angoisse, il éprouvait un plaisir, et s'y enfonçait de plus en plus, sentant avec effroi ses scrupules disparaître ; dans la fureur de sa rêverie, le reste du monde s'effaçait ; et il n'avait conscience de lui-même que par un intolérable serrement à la poitrine.

— “Prenons-nous le vin blanc ?” dit l’épurateur qui s’éveillait.

Arnoux sauta par terre ; et le vin blanc étant pris, voulut monter la faction de Frédéric.

Puis il l’emmena déjeuner rue de Chartres, chez Parly et, comme il avait besoin de se refaire, il se commanda deux plats de viande, un homard, une omelette au rhum, une salade, etc., le tout arrosé d’un Sauterne 1819, avec un romanée, sans compter le champagne au dessert, et les liqueurs.

Frédéric ne le contraria nullement. Il était gêné, comme si l’autre avait pu découvrir, sur son visage, les traces de sa pensée.

Les deux coudes au bord de la table, et penché très bas, Arnoux, en le fatiguant de son regard, lui confiait ses imaginations.

Il avait envie de prendre à ferme tous les remblais de la ligne du Nord pour y semer des pommes de terre, ou bien d’organiser sur les boulevards une cavalcade monstre, où les “célébrités de l’époque” figureraient. Il louerait toutes les fenêtres, ce qui, à raison de trois francs, en moyenne, produirait un joli bénéfice. Bref, il rêvait un grand coup de fortune par un accaparement. Il était moral, cependant, blâmait les excès, l’inconduite, parlait de son “pauvre père”, et, tous les soirs, disait-il, faisait son examen de conscience, avant d’offrir son âme à Dieu.

— “Un peu de curaçao, hein ?”

— “Comme vous voudrez.”

Quant à la République, les choses s’arrangeraient ; enfin, il se trouvait l’homme le plus heureux de la terre ; et, s’oubliant, il vanta les qualités de Rosanette, la compara même à sa femme. C’était bien autre chose ! On n’imaginait pas d’aussi belles cuisses.

— “A votre santé !”

Frédéric trinqua. Il avait, par complaisance, un peu trop bu ; d’ailleurs, le grand soleil l’éblouissait ; et, quand ils remontèrent ensemble la rue Vivienne, leurs épaulettes se touchaient fraternellement.

Rentré chez lui, Frédéric dormit jusqu’à sept heures. Ensuite, il s’en alla chez la Maréchale. Elle était sortie avec quelqu’un. Avec Arnoux, peut-être ? Ne sachant que faire, il continua sa promenade sur le boulevard, mais ne put dépasser la porte Saint-Martin, tant il y avait de monde.

La misère abandonnait à eux-mêmes un nombre considérable d'ouvriers ; et ils venaient là, tous les soirs, se passer en revue sans doute, et attendre un signal. Malgré la loi contre les attroupements, ces clubs du désespoir augmentaient d'une manière effrayante, et beaucoup de bourgeois s'y rendaient quotidiennement, par bravade, par mode.

Tout à coup, Frédéric aperçut, à trois pas de distance, M. Dambreuse avec Martinon ; il tourna la tête, car M. Dambreuse s'étant fait nommer représentant, il lui gardait rancune. Mais le capitaliste l'arrêta.

— “Un mot, cher monsieur ! J'ai des explications à vous fournir.”

— “Je n'en demande pas.”

— “De grâce ! écoutez-moi.”

Ce n'était nullement sa faute. On l'avait prié, contraint en quelque sorte. Martinon, tout de suite, appuya ses paroles : des Nogentais en députation s'étaient présentés chez lui.

— “D'ailleurs, j'ai cru être libre, du moment...”

Une poussée de monde sur le trottoir força M. Dambreuse à s'écarter. Une minute après, il reparut, en disant à Martinon :

— “C'est un vrai service, cela ! Vous n'aurez pas à vous repentir...”

Tous les trois s'adossèrent contre une boutique, afin de causer plus à l'aise.

On criait de temps en temps : “Vive Napoléon ! vive Barbès ! à bas Marie !” La foule innombrable parlait très haut ; — et toutes ces voix, répercutées par les maisons, faisaient comme le bruit continu des vagues dans un port. A de certains moments, elles se taisaient ; alors, la Marseillaise s'élevait. Sous les portes cochères, des hommes d'allures mystérieuses proposaient des cannes à dard. Quelquefois, deux individus, passant l'un devant l'autre, clignaient de l'oeil, et s'éloignaient prestement. Des groupes de badauds occupaient les trottoirs ; une multitude compacte s'agitait sur le pavé. Des bandes entières d'agents de police, sortant des ruelles, y disparaissaient à peine entrés. De petits drapeaux rouges, çà et là, semblaient des flammes ; les cochers, du haut de leur siège, faisaient de grands gestes, puis s'en retournaient. C'était un mouvement, un spectacle des plus drôles.

— “Comme tout cela”, dit Martinon, “aurait amusé Mlle Cécile !”

— “Ma femme, vous savez bien, n’aime pas que ma nièce vienne avec nous”, reprit en souriant M. Dambreuse.

On ne l’aurait pas reconnu. Depuis trois mois il criait “Vive la République !” et même il avait voté le bannissement des d’Orléans. Mais les concessions devaient finir. Il se montrait furieux jusqu’à porter un casse-tête dans sa poche.

Martinon, aussi, en avait un. La magistrature n’étant plus inamovible, il s’était retiré du Parquet, si bien qu’il dépassait en violences M. Dambreuse.

Le banquier haïssait particulièrement Lamartine (pour avoir soutenu Ledru-Rollin), et avec lui Pierre Leroux, Proudhon, Considérant, Lamennais tous les cerveaux brûlés, tous les socialistes.

— “Car enfin, que veulent-ils ? On a supprimé l’octroi sur la viande et la contrainte par corps ; maintenant, on étudie le projet d’une banque hypothécaire ; l’autre jour, c’était une banque nationale ! et voilà cinq millions au budget pour les ouvriers ! Mais heureusement c’est fini, grâce à M. de Falloux ! Bon voyage ! qu’ils s’en aillent !”

En effet, ne sachant comment nourrir les cent trente mille hommes des ateliers nationaux, le ministre des travaux publics avait, ce jour-là même, signé un arrêté qui invitait tous les citoyens entre dix-huit et vingt ans à prendre du service comme soldats, ou bien à partir vers les provinces, pour y remuer la terre.

Cette alternative les indigna, persuadés qu’on voulait détruire la République. L’existence loin de la Capitale les affligeait comme un exil ; ils se voyaient mourants par les fièvres, dans des régions farouches. Pour beaucoup, d’ailleurs, accoutumés à des travaux délicats, l’agriculture semblait un avilissement ; c’était un leurre enfin, une dérision, le déni formel de toutes les promesses. S’ils résistaient, on emploierait la force ; ils n’en doutaient pas et se disposaient à la prévenir.

Vers neuf heures, les attroupements formés à la Bastille et au Châtelet refluèrent sur le boulevard. De la porte Saint-Denis à la porte Saint-Martin, cela ne faisait plus qu’un grouillement énorme, une seule masse d’un bleu sombre, presque noir. Les hommes que l’on entrevoyait avaient tous les prunelles ardentes, le teint pâle, des figures amaigries par la faim, exaltées par l’injustice. Cependant, des nuages s'amoncelaient ; le ciel orageux chauffant l'électricité de la multitude, elle tourbillonnait sur elle-même, indécise, avec un large balancement de houle ; et l'on sentait dans ses profondeurs une force incalculable, et comme l'énergie d'un élément. Puis tous se mirent à chanter : — Des lampions ! des lampions ! ".

Plusieurs fenêtres ne s'éclairaient pas ; des cailloux furent lancés dans leurs carreaux. M. Dambreuse jugea prudent de s'en aller. Les deux jeunes gens le reconduisirent.

Il prévoyait de grands désastres. Le peuple, encore une fois, pouvait envahir la Chambre ; et, à ce propos, il raconta comment il serait mort le 15 mai, sans le dévouement d'un garde national.

— "Mais c'est votre ami, j'oubliais ! votre ami, le fabricant de faïences, Jacques Arnoux !"

Les gens de l'émeute l'étouffaient ; ce brave citoyen l'avait pris dans ses bras et déposé à l'écart. Aussi, depuis lors, une sorte de liaison s'était faite.

— "Il faudra un de ces jours dîner ensemble, et, puisque vous le voyez souvent, assurez-le que je l'aime beaucoup. C'est un excellent homme, calomnié, selon moi — , et il a de l'esprit, le matin ! Mes compliments encore une fois ! bien le bonsoir !..."

Frédéric, après avoir quitté M. Dambreuse, retourna chez la Maréchale ; et, d'un air très sombre, dit qu'elle devait opter entre lui et Arnoux. Elle répondit avec douceur qu'elle ne comprenait goutte à des "ragots pareils", n'aimait pas Arnoux, n'y tenait aucunement. Frédéric avait soif d'abandonner Paris. Elle ne repoussa pas cette fantaisie, et ils partirent pour Fontainebleau dès le lendemain.

L'hôtel où ils logèrent se distinguait des autres par un jet d'eau clapotant au milieu de sa cour. Les portes des chambres s'ouvraient sur un corridor, comme dans les monastères. Celle qu'on leur donna était grande, fournie de bons meubles, tendue d'indienne, et silencieuse, vu a rareté des voyageurs. Le long des maisons, des bourgeois inoccupés passaient ; puis, sous leurs fenêtres, quand le jour tomba, des enfants dans la rue firent une partie de barres ; — et cette tranquillité, succédant pour eux au tumulte de Paris, leur causait une surprise, un apaisement.

Le matin de bonne heure, ils allèrent visiter le château. Comme ils entraient par la grille, ils aperçurent sa façade tout entière, avec les cinq pavillons à toits aigus et son escalier en fer à cheval se déployant au fond de la cour, que bordent de droite et de gauche deux corps de bâtiments plus bas. Des lichens sur les pavés se mêlent de loin au ton fauve des briques ; et l'ensemble du palais, couleur de rouille comme une vieille armure, avait quelque chose de royalement impassible, une sorte de grandeur militaire et triste.

Enfin, un domestique, portant un trousseau de clefs, parut. Il leur montra d'abord les appartements des reines, l'oratoire du Pape, la galerie de François Ier, la petite table d'acajou sur laquelle l'Empereur signa son abdication, et, dans une des pièces qui divisaient l'ancienne galerie des Cerfs, l'endroit où Christine fit assassiner Monaldeschi. Rosanette écouta cette histoire attentivement ; puis, se tournant vers Frédéric :

— “C’était par jalousie, sans doute ? Prends garde à toi !”

Ensuite, ils traversèrent la salle du Conseil, la salle des Gardes, la salle du Trône, le salon de Louis XIII. Les hautes croisées, sans rideaux, épanchaient une lumière blanche ; de la poussière ternissait légèrement les poignées des espagnolettes, le pied de cuivre des consoles ; des nappes de grosses toiles cachaient partout les fauteuils ; on voyait au-dessus des portes des chasses Louis XV, et çà et là des tapisseries représentant les dieux de l'Olympe, Psyché ou les batailles d'Alexandre.

Quand elle passait devant les glaces, Rosanette s'arrêtait une minute pour lisser ses bandeaux.

Après la cour du donjon et la chapelle Saint-Saturnin, ils arrivèrent dans la salle des fêtes.

Ils furent éblouis par la splendeur du plafond, divisé en compartiments octogones, rehaussé d'or et d'argent, plus ciselé qu'un bijou, et par l'abondance des peintures qui couvrent les murailles depuis la gigantesque cheminée où des croissants et des carquois entourent les armes de France, jusqu'à la tribune pour les musiciens, construite à l'autre bout, dans la largeur de la salle. Les dix fenêtres en arcades étaient grandes ouvertes ; le soleil faisait briller les peintures, le ciel bleu continuait indéfiniment l'outremer des cintres ; et, du fond des bois, dont les cimes vaporeuses emplissaient l'horizon, il semblait venir un écho des hallalis poussés dans les trompes d'ivoire, et des ballets mythologiques, assemblant sous le feuillage des princesses et des seigneurs travestis en nymphes et en sylvains, — époque de science ingénue, de passions violentes et d'art somptueux, quand l'idéal était d'emporter le monde dans un rêve des Hespérides, et que les maîtresses des rois se confondaient avec les astres. La plus belle de ces fameuses s'était fait peindre, à droite, sous la figure de Diane Chasseresse, et même en Diane Infernale, sans doute pour marquer sa puissance jusque par-delà le tombeau. Tous ces symboles confirment sa gloire ; et il reste là quelque chose d'elle, une voix indistincte, un rayonnement qui se prolonge.

Frédéric fut pris par une concupiscence rétrospective et inexprimable. Afin de distraire son désir, il se mit à considérer tendrement Rosanette, en lui demandant si elle n'aurait pas voulu être cette femme.

— “Quelle femme ?”

— “Diane de Poitiers !”

Il répéta :

— “Diane de Poitiers, la maîtresse d'Henri II.”

Elle fit un petit : “Ah !” Ce fut tout.

Son mutisme prouvait clairement qu'elle ne savait rien, ne comprenait pas, si bien que par complaisance il lui dit :

— “Tu t'ennuies peut-être ?”

— “Non, non, au contraire !”

Et, le menton levé, tout en promenant à l'entour un regard des plus vagues, Rosanette lâcha ce mot “Ça rappelle des souvenirs !”

Cependant, on apercevait sur sa mine un effort, une intention de respect ; et, comme cet air sérieux la rendait plus jolie, Frédéric l'excusa.

L'étang des carpes la divertit davantage. Pendant un quart d'heure, elle jeta des morceaux de pain dans l'eau, pour voir les poissons bondir.

Frédéric s'était assis près d'elle, sous les tilleuls. Il songeait à tous les personnages qui avaient hanté ces murs, Charles-Quint, les Valois, Henri IV, Pierre le Grand, Jean-Jacques Rousseau et “les belles pleureuses des premières loges”, Voltaire, Napoléon, Pie VII, Louis-Philippe — , il se sentait environné, coudoyé par ces morts tumultueux ; une telle confusion d'images l'étourdissait, bien qu'il y trouvât du charme pourtant.

Enfin ils descendirent dans le parterre.

C'est un vaste rectangle, laissant voir d'un seul coup d'oeil ses larges allées jaunes, ses carrés de gazon, ses rubans de buis, ses ifs en pyramide, ses verdure basses et ses étroites plates-bandes, où des fleurs clairsemées font des taches sur la terre grise. Au bout du jardin, un parc se déploie, traversé dans toute son étendue par un long canal.

Les résidences royales ont en elles une mélancolie particulière, qui tient sans doute à leurs dimensions trop considérables pour le petit nombre de leurs hôtes, au silence qu'on est surpris d'y trouver après tant de fanfares, à leur luxe immobile prouvant par sa vieillesse la fugacité des dynasties, l'éternelle misère de tout ; — et cette exhalaison des siècles, engourdissante et funèbre comme un parfum de momie, se fait sentir même aux têtes naïves. Rosanette bâillait démesurément. Ils s'en retournèrent à l'hôtel.

Après leur déjeuner, on leur amena une voiture découverte. Ils sortirent de Fontainebleau par un large rond-point, puis montèrent au pas une route sablonneuse dans un bois de petits pins. Les arbres devinrent plus grands ; et le cocher, de temps à autre, disait : “Voici les Frères-Siamois, le Pharamond, le Bouquet-du-Roi...”, n'oubliant aucun des sites célèbres, parfois même s'arrêtant pour les faire admirer.

Ils entrèrent dans la futaie de Franchard. La voiture glissait comme un traîneau sur le gazon ; des pigeons qu'on ne voyait pas roucoulaient ; tout à coup, un garçon de café parut ; et ils descendirent devant la barrière d'un jardin où il y avait des tables rondes. Puis, laissant à gauche les murailles d'une abbaye en ruines, ils marchèrent sur de grosses roches, et atteignirent bientôt le fond de la gorge.

Elle est couverte, d'un côté, par un entremêlement de grès et de genévriers, tandis que, de l'autre, le terrain presque nu s'incline vers le creux du vallon, où, dans la couleur des bruyères, un sentier fait une ligne pâle ; et on aperçoit tout au loin un sommet en cône aplati, avec la tour d'un télégraphe par derrière.

Une demi-heure après, ils mirent pied à terre encore une fois pour gravir les hauteurs d'Aspremont.

Le chemin fait des zigzags entre les pins trapus sous des rochers à profils anguleux ; tout ce coin de la forêt a quelque chose d'étouffé, d'un peu sauvage et de recueilli. On pense aux ermites, compagnons des grands cerfs portant une croix de feu entre leurs cornes, et qui recevaient avec de paternels sourires les bons rois de France, agenouillés devant leur grotte. Une odeur résineuse emplissait l'air chaud, des racines à ras du sol s'entrecroisaient comme des veines. Rosanette trébuchait dessus, était désespérée, avait envie de pleurer.

Mais, tout au haut, la joie lui revint, en trouvant sous un toit de branchages une manière de cabaret, où l'on vend des bois sculptés. Elle but une bouteille de limonade, s'acheta un bâton de houx ; et, sans donner un coup d'oeil au paysage que l'on découvre du plateau, elle entra dans la Caverne-des-Brigands, précédée d'un gamin portant une torche.

Leur voiture les attendait dans le Bas-Bréau.

Un peintre en blouse bleue travaillait au pied d'un chêne, avec sa boîte à couleurs sur les genoux. Il leva la tête et les regarda passer.

Au milieu de la côte de Chailly, un nuage, crevant tout à coup, leur fit rabattre la capote. Presque aussitôt la pluie s'arrêta ; et les pavés des rues brillaient sous le soleil quand ils rentrèrent dans la ville.

Des voyageurs, arrivés nouvellement, leur apprirent qu'une bataille épouvantable ensanglantait Paris. Rosanette et son amant n'en furent pas surpris. Puis tout le monde s'en alla, l'hôtel redevint paisible, le gaz s'éteignit, et ils s'endormirent au murmure du jet d'eau dans la cour.

Le lendemain, ils allèrent voir la Gorge-au-Loup, la Marc-aux-Fées, le Long-Rocher, la Mariotte ; le surlendemain, ils recommencèrent au hasard, comme leur cocher voulait, sans demander où ils étaient, et souvent même négligeant les sites fameux.

Ils se trouvaient si bien dans leur vieux landau, bas comme un sofa et couvert d'une toile à raies déteintes ! Les fossés pleins de broussailles filaient sous leurs yeux, avec un mouvement doux et continu. Des rayons blancs traversaient comme des flèches les hautes fougères ; quelquefois, un chemin, qui ne servait plus, se présentait devant eux, en ligne droite ; et des herbes s'y dressaient çà et là, mollement. Au centre des carrefours, une croix étendait ses quatre bras ; ailleurs, des poteaux se penchaient comme des arbres morts, et de petits sentiers courbes, en se perdant sous les feuilles, donnaient envie de les suivre ; au même moment, le cheval tournait, ils y entraient, on enfonçait dans la boue ; plus loin, de la mousse avait poussé au bord des ornières profondes.

Ils se croyaient loin des autres, bien seuls. Mais tout à coup passait un garde-chasse avec son fusil, ou une bande de femmes en haillons, traînant sur leur dos de longues bourrées.

Quand la voiture s'arrêtait, il se faisait un silence universel ; seulement, on entendait le souffle du cheval dans les brancards, avec un cri d'oiseau très faible, répété.

La lumière, à de certaines places éclairant la lisière du bois, laissait les fonds dans l'ombre ; ou bien, atténuée sur les premiers plans par une sorte de crépuscule, elle étalait dans les lointains des vapeurs violettes, une clarté blanche. Au milieu du jour, le soleil, tombant d'aplomb sur les larges verdure, les éclaboussait, suspendait des gouttes argentines à la pointe des branches, rayait le gazon de traînées d'émeraude, jetait des taches d'or sur les couches de feuilles mortes ; en se renversant la tête, on apercevait le ciel, entre les cimes des arbres. Quelques-uns, d'une altitude démesurée, avaient des airs de patriarches et d'empereurs, ou se touchant par le bout, formaient avec leurs longs fûts comme des arcs de triomphe ; d'autres, poussés dès le bas obliquement, semblaient des colonnes près de tomber.

Cette foule de grosses lignes verticales s'entrouvrait. Alors, d'énormes flots verts se déroulaient en bosselages inégaux jusqu'à la surface des vallées où s'avancait la croupe d'autres collines dominant des plaines blondes, qui finissaient par se perdre dans une pâleur indécise.

Debout, l'un près de l'autre, sur quelque éminence du terrain, ils sentaient, tout en humant le vent, leur entrer dans l'âme comme l'orgueil d'une vie plus libre, avec une surabondance de forces, une joie sans cause.

La diversité des arbres faisait un spectacle changeant. Les hêtres à l'écorce blanche et lisse entremêlaient leurs couronnes ; des frênes courbaient mollement leurs glauques ramures ; dans les cépées de charmes, des houx pareils à du bronze se hérissaient ; puis venait une file de minces bouleaux, inclinés dans des attitudes élégiaques ; et les pins, symétriques comme des tuyaux d'orgue, en se balançant continuellement, semblaient chanter. Il y avait des chênes rugueux, énormes, qui se convulsaient, s'étiraient du sol, s'étreignaient les uns les autres, et, fermes sur leurs troncs, pareils à des torses, se lançaient avec leurs bras nus des appels de désespoir, des menaces furibondes, comme un groupe de Titans immobilisés dans leur colère. Quelque chose de plus lourd, une langueur fiévreuse planait au-dessus des mares, découpant la nappe de leurs eaux entre des buissons d'épines ; les lichens de leur berge, où les loups viennent boire, sont couleur de soufre, brûlés comme par le pas des sorcières, et le coassement ininterrompu des grenouilles répond au cri des corneilles qui tournoient. Ensuite, ils traversaient des clairières monotones, plantées d'un baliveau çà et là.

Un bruit de fer, des coups drus et nombreux sonnaient : c'était, au flanc d'une colline, une compagnie de carriers battant les roches. Elles se multipliaient de plus en plus, et finissaient par emplir tout le paysage, cubiques comme des maisons, plates comme des dalles, s'étayant, se surplombant, se confondant, telles que les ruines méconnaissables et monstrueuses de quelque cité disparue. Mais la furie même de leur chaos fait plutôt rêver à des volcans, à des déluges, aux grands cataclysmes ignorés. Frédéric disait qu'ils étaient là depuis le commencement du monde et resteraient ainsi jusqu'à la fin ; Rosanette détournait la tête, en affirmant que "ça la rendrait folle", et s'en allait cueillir des bruyères. Leurs petites fleurs violettes, tassées les unes près des autres, formaient des plaques inégales, et la terre qui s'écroulait de dessous mettait comme des franges noires au bord des sables pailletés de mica.

Ils arrivèrent un jour à mi-hauteur d'une colline tout en sable. Sa surface, vierge de pas, était rayée en ondulations symétriques ; çà et là, telles que des promontoires sur le lit desséché d'un océan, se levaient des roches ayant de vagues formes d'animaux, tortues avançant la tête, phoques qui rampent, hippopotames et ours. Personne. Aucun bruit. Les sables, frappés par le soleil, éblouissaient ; — et tout à coup, dans cette vibration de la lumière, les bêtes parurent remuer. Ils s'en retournèrent vite, fuyant le vertige, presque effrayés.

Le sérieux de la forêt les gagnait ; et ils avaient des heures de silence où, se laissant aller au bercement des ressorts, ils demeuraient comme engourdis dans une ivresse tranquille. Le bras sous la taille, il l'écoutait parier pendant que les oiseaux gazouillaient, observait presque du même coup d'oeil les raisins noirs de sa capote et les baies des genévriers, les draperies de son voile, les volutes des nuages ; et, quand il se penchait vers elle, la fraîcheur de sa peau se mêlait au grand parfum des bois. Ils s'amusaient de tout ; ils se montraient, comme une curiosité, des fils de la Vierge suspendus aux buissons, des trous pleins d'eau au milieu des pierres, un écureuil sur les branches, le vol de deux papillons qui les suivaient ; ou bien, à vingt pas d'eux, sous les arbres, une biche marchait, tranquillement, d'un air noble et doux, avec son faon côte à côte. Rosanette aurait voulu courir après, pour l'embrasser.

Elle eut bien peur une fois, quand un homme, se présentant tout à coup, lui montra dans une boîte trois vipères. Elle se jeta vivement contre Frédéric ; — il fut heureux de ce qu'elle était faible et de se sentir assez fort pour la défendre.

Ce soir-là, ils dînèrent dans une auberge, au bord de la Seine. La table était près de la fenêtre, Rosanette en face de lui ; et il contemplait son petit nez fin et blanc, ses lèvres retroussées, ses yeux clairs, ses bandeaux châains qui bouffaient, sa jolie figure ovale. Sa robe de foulard écru collait à ses épaules un peu tombantes ; et, sortant de leurs manchettes tout unies, ses deux mains découpaient, versaient à boire, s'avançaient sur la nappe. On leur servit un poulet avec les quatre membres étendus, une matelote d'anguilles dans un compotier en terre de pipe, du vin râpeux, du pain trop dur, des couteaux ébréchés. Tout cela augmentait le plaisir, l'illusion. Ils se croyaient presque au milieu d'un voyage, en Italie, dans leur lune de miel.

Avant de repartir, ils allèrent se promener le long de la berge.

Le ciel d'un bleu tendre, arrondi comme un dôme, s'appuyait à l'horizon sur la dentelure des bois. En face, au bout de la prairie, il y avait un clocher dans un village ; et, plus loin, à gauche, le toit d'une maison faisait une tache rouge sur la rivière, qui semblait immobile dans toute la longueur de sa sinuosité. Des joncs se penchaient pourtant, et l'eau secouait légèrement des perches plantées au bord pour tenir des filets ; une masse d'osier, deux ou trois vieilles chaloupes étaient là. Près de l'auberge, une fille en chapeau de paille tirait des seaux d'un puits ; — chaque fois qu'ils remontaient, Frédéric écoutait avec une jouissance inexprimable le grincement de la chaîne.

Il ne doutait pas qu'il ne fût heureux pour jusqu'à la fin de ses jours, tant son bonheur lui paraissait naturel, inhérent à sa vie et à la personne de cette femme. Un besoin le poussait à lui dire des tendresses. Elle y répondait par de gentilles paroles, de petites tapes sur l'épaule, des douceurs dont la surprise le charmaient. Il lui découvrait enfin une beauté toute nouvelle, qui n'était peut-être que le reflet des choses ambiantes, à moins que leurs virtualités secrètes ne l'eussent fait s'épanouir.

Quand ils se reposaient au milieu de la campagne, il s'étendait la tête sur ses genoux, à l'abri de son ombrelle ; — ou bien couchés sur le ventre au milieu de l'herbe, ils restaient l'un en face de l'autre, à se regarder, plongeant dans leurs prunelles, altérés d'eux-mêmes, s'en assouvissant toujours, puis les paupières entrefermées, ne parlant plus.

Quelquefois, ils entendaient tout au loin des roulements de tambour. C'était la générale que l'on battait dans les villages, pour aller défendre Paris.

— “Ah ! tiens ! l'émeute !” disait Frédéric avec une pitié dédaigneuse, toute cette agitation lui apparaissant misérable à côté de leur amour et de la nature éternelle.

Et ils causaient de n'importe quoi, de choses qu'ils savaient parfaitement, de personnes qui ne les intéressaient pas, de mille niaiseries. Elle l'entretenait de sa femme de chambre et de son coiffeur. Un jour, elle s'oublia à dire son âge : vingt-neuf ans ; elle devenait vieille.

En plusieurs fois, sans le vouloir, elle lui apprit des détails sur elle-même. Elle avait été “demoiselle dans un magasin”, avait fait un voyage en Angleterre, commencé des études pour être actrice ; tout cela sans transitions, et il ne pouvait reconstruire un ensemble. Elle en conta plus long, un jour qu'ils étaient assis sous un platane, au revers d'un pré. En bas, sur le bord de la route, une petite fille nu-pieds dans la poussière, faisait paître une vache. Dès qu'elle les aperçut, elle vint leur demander l'aumône ; et, tenant d'une main son jupon en lambeaux, elle grattait de l'autre ses cheveux noirs qui entouraient comme une perruque à la Louis XIV, toute sa tête brune, illuminée par des yeux splendides.

— “Elle sera bien jolie plus tard”, dit Frédéric.

— “Quelle chance pour elle si elle n'a pas de mère !” reprit Rosanette.

— “Hein ? comment ?”

— “Mais oui ; moi, sans la mienne...”

Elle soupira, et se mit à parler de son enfance. Ses parents étaient des canuts de la Croix-Rousse. Elle servait son père comme apprentie. Le pauvre bonhomme avait beau s'exténuer, sa femme l'invectivait et vendait tout pour aller boire. Rosanette voyait leur chambre, avec les métiers rangés en longueur contre les fenêtres, le pot-bouille sur le poêle, le lit peint en acajou, une armoire en face, et la soupente obscure où elle avait couché jusqu'à quinze ans. Enfin un monsieur était venu, un homme gras, la figure couleur de buis, des façons de dévot, habillé de noir. Sa mère et lui eurent ensemble une conversation, si bien que, trois jours après... Rosanette s'arrêta, et, avec un regard plein d'impudeur et d'amertume :

— "C'était fait !"

Puis, répondant au geste de Frédéric :

— "Comme il était marié (il aurait craint de se compromettre dans sa maison), on m'emmena dans un cabinet de restaurateur, et on m'avait dit que je serais heureuse, que je recevrais un beau cadeau.

"Dès la porte, la première chose qui m'a frappée, c'était un candélabre de vermeil, sur une table où il y avait deux couverts. Une glace au plafond les reflétait, et les tentures des murailles en soie bleue faisaient ressembler tout l'appartement à une alcôve. Une surprise m'a saisie. Tu comprends, un pauvre être qui n'a jamais rien vu ! Malgré mon éblouissement, j'avais peur. Je désirais m'en aller. Je suis restée pourtant.

"Le seul siège qu'il y eût était un divan contre la table. Il a cédé sous moi avec mollesse ; la bouche du calorifère dans le tapis m'envoyait une haleine chaude, et je restai là sans rien prendre. Le garçon qui se tenait debout m'a engagée à manger. Il m'a versé tout de suite un grand verre de vin ; la tête me tournait, j'ai voulu ouvrir la fenêtre, il m'a dit : — " Non, mademoiselle, c'est défendu. "Et il m'a quittée. La table était couverte d'un tas de choses que je ne connaissais pas. Rien ne m'a semblé bon. Alors je me suis rabattue sur un pot de confitures, et j'attendais toujours. Je ne sais quoi l'empêchait de venir. Il était très tard, minuit au moins, je n'en pouvais plus de fatigue ; en repoussant un des oreillers pour mieux m'étendre, je rencontre sous ma main une sorte d'album, un cahier — , c'étaient des images obscènes... Je dormais dessus, quand il est entré." Elle baissa la tête, et demeura pensive.

Les feuilles autour d'eux susurraient, dans un fouillis d'herbes une grande digitale se balançait, la lumière coulait comme une onde sur le gazon ; et le silence était coupé à intervalles rapides par le broutement de la vache qu'on ne voyait plus.

Rosanette considérait un point par terre, à trois pas d'elle, fixement, les narines battantes, absorbée. Frédéric lui prit la main.

— “Comme tu as souffert, pauvre chérie !”

— “Oui”, dit-elle “plus que tu ne crois... Jusqu'à vouloir en finir ; on m'a repêchée.”

— “Comment ?”

— “Ah ! n'y pensons plus !... Je t'aime, je suis heureuse ! embrasse-moi.”

Et elle ôta, une à une, les brindilles de chardons accrochées dans le bas de sa robe.

Frédéric songeait surtout à ce qu'elle n'avait pas dit. Par quels degrés avait-elle pu sortir de la misère ? A quel amant devait-elle son éducation ? Que s'était-il passé dans sa vie jusqu'au jour où il était venu chez elle pour la première fois ? Son dernier aveu interdisait les questions. Il lui demanda, seulement, comment elle avait fait la connaissance d'Arnoux.

— “Par la Vatnaz.”

— “N'était-ce pas toi que j'ai vue, une fois, au Palais-Royal, avec eux deux ?”

Il cita la date précise. Rosanette fit un effort.

— “Oui, c'est vrai !... Je n'étais pas gaie dans ce temps-là !”

Mais Arnoux s'était montré excellent. Frédéric n'en doutait pas ; cependant, leur ami était un drôle d'homme, plein de défauts ; il eut soin de les rappeler. Elle en convenait.

— “N'importe !... On l'aime tout de même, ce chameau-là !”

— “Encore, maintenant ?” dit Frédéric.

Elle se mit à rougir, moitié riante, moitié fâchée.

— “Eh ! non ! C'est de l'histoire ancienne. Je ne te cache rien. Quand même cela serait, lui, c'est différent ! D'ailleurs, je ne te trouve pas gentil pour ta victime.”

— “Ma victime ?”

Rosanette lui prit le menton.

— “Sans doute !”

Et, zézayant à la manière des nourrices :

— “Avons pas toujours été bien sage ! Avons fait dodo avec sa femme !”

— “Moi ! jamais de la vie !”

Rosanette sourit. Il fut blessé de son sourire, preuve d'indifférence, crut-il. Mais elle reprit doucement, et avec un de ces regards qui implorent le mensonge : — “Bien sûr ?”

— “Certainement !”

Frédéric jura sa parole d'honneur qu'il n'avait jamais pensé à Mme Arnoux, étant trop amoureux d'une autre.

— “De qui donc ?”

— “Mais de vous, ma toute belle !”

— “Ah ! ne te moque pas de moi ! Tu m'agaces !”

Il jugea prudent d'inventer une histoire, une passion. Il trouva des détails circonstanciés. Cette personne du reste, l'avait rendu fort malheureux.

— “Décidément, tu n'as pas de chance !” dit Rosanette.

— “Oh ! oh ! peut-être !” voulant faire entendre par là plusieurs bonnes fortunes, afin de donner de lui meilleure opinion, de même que Rosanette n'avouait pas tous ses amants pour qu'il l'estimât davantage ; — car, au milieu des confidences les plus intimes, il y a toujours des restrictions, par fausse honte, délicatesse, pitié. On découvre chez l'autre ou dans soi-même des précipices ou des fanges qui empêchent de poursuivre ; on sent, d'ailleurs, que l'on ne serait pas compris ; il est difficile d'exprimer exactement quoi que ce soit ; aussi les unions complètes sont rares.

La pauvre Maréchale n'en avait jamais connu de meilleure. Souvent, quand elle considérait Frédéric, des larmes lui arrivaient aux paupières, puis elle levait les yeux, ou les projetait vers l'horizon, comme si elle avait aperçu quelque grande aurore, des perspectives de félicité sans bornes. Enfin, un jour, elle avoua qu'elle souhaitait faire dire une messe, “pour que ça porte bonheur à notre amour” .

D'où venait donc qu'elle lui avait résisté pendant si longtemps ? Elle n'en savait rien elle-même. Il renouvela plusieurs fois sa question ; et elle répondait en le serrant dans ses bras :

— “C'est que j'avais peur de t'aimer trop, mon chéri !”

Le dimanche matin, Frédéric lut dans un journal, sur une liste de blessés, le nom de Dussardier. Il jeta un cri, et, montrant le papier à Rosanette, déclara qu'il allait partir immédiatement.

— "Pourquoi faire ?"

— "Mais pour le voir, le soigner !"

— "Tu ne vas pas me laisser seule, j'imagine ?"

— "Viens avec moi."

— "Ah ! que j'aie me fourrer dans une bagarre pareille ! Merci bien !"

— "Cependant, je ne peux pas..."

— "Ta ta ta ! Comme si on manquait d'infirmiers dans les hôpitaux ! Et puis, qu'est-ce que ça le regardait encore, celui-là ? Chacun pour soi !"

Il fut indigné de cet égoïsme ; et il se reprocha de n'être pas là-bas avec les autres. Tant d'indifférence aux malheurs de la patrie avait quelque chose de mesquin et de bourgeois. Son amour lui pesait tout à coup comme un crime. Ils se boudèrent pendant une heure.

Puis elle le supplia d'attendre, de ne pas s'exposer.

— "Si par hasard on te tue !"

— "Eh ! je n'aurai fait que mon devoir !"

Rosanette bondit. D'abord, son devoir était de l'aimer.

C'est qu'il ne voulait plus d'elle, sans doute ! Ça n'avait pas le sens commun ! Quelle idée, mon Dieu !

Frédéric sonna pour avoir la note. Mais il n'était pas facile de s'en retourner à Paris. La voiture des messageries Leloir venait de partir, les berlines Lecomte ne partiraient pas, la diligence du Bourbonnais ne passerait que tard dans la nuit, et serait peut-être pleine ; on n'en savait rien. Quand il eut perdu beaucoup de temps à ces informations, l'idée lui vint de prendre la poste. Le maître de poste refusa de fournir des chevaux, Frédéric n'ayant point de passeport. Enfin, il loua une calèche (la même qui les avait promenés) et ils arrivèrent devant l'hôtel du Commerce, à Melun, vers cinq heures.

La place du Marché était couverte de faisceaux d'armes. Le préfet avait défendu aux gardes nationaux de se porter sur Paris. Ceux qui n'étaient pas de son département voulaient continuer leur route. On criait. L'auberge était pleine de tumulte.

Rosanette, prise de peur, déclara qu'elle n'irait pas plus loin, et le supplia encore de rester. L'aubergiste et sa femme se joignirent à elle.

Un brave homme qui dînait s'en mêla, affirmant que la bataille serait terminée d'ici à peu ; d'ailleurs, il fallait faire son devoir. Alors, la Maréchale redoubla de sanglots. Frédéric était exaspéré. Il lui donna sa bourse, l'embrassa vivement, et disparut.

Arrivé à Corbeil, dans la gare, on lui apprit que les insurgés avaient de distance en distance coupé les rails, et le cocher refusa de le conduire plus loin ; ses chevaux, disait-il, étaient "rendus".

Par sa protection cependant, Frédéric obtint un mauvais cabriolet qui, pour la somme de soixante francs, sans compter le pourboire, consentit à le mener jusqu'à la barrière d'Italie. Mais, à cent pas de la barrière, son conducteur le fit descendre et s'en retourna. Frédéric marchait sur la route, quand tout à coup une sentinelle croisa la baïonnette. Quatre hommes l'empoignèrent en vociférant :

— "C'en est un ! Prenez garde ! Fouillez-le ! Brigand Canaille"

Et sa stupéfaction fut si profonde, qu'il se laissa entraîner au poste de la barrière, dans le rond-point même où convergent les boulevards des Gobelins et de l'Hôpital et les rues Godefroy et Mouffetard.

Quatre barricades formaient, au bout des quatre voies, d'énormes talus de pavés ; des torches çà et là grésillaient ; malgré la poussière qui s'élevait, il distingua des fantassins de la ligne et des gardes nationaux, tous le visage noir, débraillés, hagards. Ils venaient de prendre la place, avaient fusillé plusieurs hommes ; leur colère durait encore. Frédéric dit qu'il arrivait de Fontainebleau au secours d'un camarade blessé logeant rue Bellefond ; personne d'abord ne voulut le croire ; on examina ses mains, on flaira même son oreille pour s'assurer qu'il ne sentait pas la poudre.

Cependant, à force de répéter la même chose, il finit par convaincre un capitaine, qui ordonna à deux fusiliers de le conduire au poste du Jardin des Plantes.

Ils descendirent le boulevard de l'Hôpital. Une forte brise soufflait. Elle le ranima.

Ils tournèrent ensuite par la rue du Marché-aux-Chevaux. Le Jardin des Plantes, à droite, faisait une grande masse noire ; tandis qu'à gauche, la façade entière de la Pitié, éclairée à toutes ses fenêtres, flambait comme un incendie, et des ombres passaient rapidement sur les carreaux.

Les deux hommes de Frédéric s'en allèrent. Un autre l'accompagna jusqu'à l'Ecole polytechnique.

La rue Saint-Victor était toute sombre, sans un bec de gaz ni une lumière aux maisons. De dix minutes en dix minutes, on entendait :

— “Sentinelles ! prenez garde à vous !”

Et ce cri jeté au milieu du silence, se prolongeait comme la répercussion d'une pierre tombant dans un abîme.

Quelquefois, un battement de pas lourds s'approchait. C'était une patrouille de cent hommes au moins ; des chuchotements, de vagues cliquetis de fer s'échappaient de cette masse confuse ; et, s'éloignant avec un balancement rythmique, elle se fondait dans l'obscurité.

Il y avait au centre des carrefours un dragon à cheval, immobile. De temps en temps, une estafette passait au grand galop, puis le silence recommençait. Des canons en marche faisaient au loin sur le pavé un roulement sourd et formidable ; le cœur se serrait à ces bruits différant de tous les bruits ordinaires. Ils semblaient même élargir le silence, qui était profond, absolu ; un silence noir. Des hommes en blouse blanche abordaient les soldats, leur disaient un mot, et s'évanouissaient comme des fantômes.

Le poste de l'Ecole polytechnique regorgeait de monde. Des femmes encombraient le seuil, demandant à voir leur fils ou leur mari. On les renvoyait au Panthéon transformé en dépôt de cadavres, — et on n'écoutait pas Frédéric. Il s'obstina, jurant que son ami Dussardier l'attendait, allait mourir. On lui donna enfin un caporal pour le mener au haut de la rue Saint-Jacques, à la mairie du XII<sup>e</sup> arrondissement.

La place du Panthéon était pleine de soldats couchés sur de la paille. Le jour se levait. Les feux de bivac s'éteignaient.

L'insurrection avait laissé dans ce quartier-là des traces formidables. Le soi des rues se trouvait, d'un bout à l'autre, inégalement bosselé. Sur les barricades en ruines, il restait des omnibus, des tuyaux de gaz, des roues de charrettes ; de petites flaques noires, en de certains endroits, devaient être du sang. Les maisons étaient criblées de projectiles, et leur charpente se montrait sous les écaillures du plâtre. Des jalousies, tenant par un clou, pendaient comme des haillons. Les escaliers ayant croulé, des portes s'ouvraient sur le vide. On apercevait l'intérieur des chambres avec leurs papiers en lambeaux ; des choses délicates s'y étaient conservées, quelquefois. Frédéric observa une pendule, un bâton de perroquet, des gravures.

Quand il entra dans la mairie, les gardes nationaux bavardaient intarissablement sur les morts de Bréa et de Négrier, du représentant Charbonnel et de l'archevêque de Paris. On disait que le duc d'Aumale était débarqué à Boulogne, Barbès enfui de Vincennes, que l'artillerie arrivait de Bourges et que les secours de la province affluaient. Vers trois heures, quelqu'un apporta de bonnes nouvelles ; des parlementaires de l'émeute étaient chez le président de l'Assemblée.

Alors, on se réjouit ; et, comme il avait encore douze francs, Frédéric fit venir douze bouteilles de vin, espérant par là hâter sa délivrance. Tout à coup, on crut entendre une fusillade. Les libations s'arrêtèrent ; on regarda l'inconnu avec des yeux méfiants ; ce pouvait être Henri VI.

Pour n'avoir aucune responsabilité, ils le transportèrent à la mairie du XI<sup>e</sup> arrondissement, d'où on ne lui permit pas de sortir avant neuf heures du matin.

Il alla en courant jusqu'au quai Voltaire. A une fenêtre ouverte, un vieillard en manches de chemise pleurait, les yeux levés. La Seine coulait paisiblement. Le ciel était tout bleu ; dans les arbres des Tuileries, des oiseaux chantaient.

Frédéric traversait le Carrousel quand une civière vint à passer. Le poste, tout de suite, présenta les armes, et l'officier dit en mettant la main à son shako : "Honneur au courage malheureux !" Cette parole était devenue presque obligatoire ; celui qui la prononçait paraissait toujours solennellement ému. Un groupe de gens furieux escortait la civière, en criant :

— "Nous vous vengerons ! nous vous vengerons !"

Les voitures circulaient sur le boulevard, et des femmes devant les portes faisaient de la charpie. Cependant, l'émeute était vaincue, ou à peu près ; une proclamation de Cavaignac, affichée tout à l'heure, l'annonçait. Au haut de la rue Vivienne, un peloton de mobiles parut. Alors, les bourgeois poussèrent des cris d'enthousiasme ; ils levaient leurs chapeaux, applaudissaient, dansaient, voulaient les embrasser, leur offrir à boire ; et des fleurs jetées par des dames tombaient des balcons.

Enfin, à dix heures, au moment où le canon grondait pour prendre le faubourg Saint-Antoine, Frédéric arriva chez Dussardier. Il le trouva dans sa mansarde, étendu sur le dos et dormant. De la pièce voisine une femme sortit à pas muets, Mlle Vatnaz.

Elle emmena Frédéric à l'écart, et lui apprit comment Dussardier avait reçu sa blessure.

Le samedi, au haut d'une barricade, dans la rue Lafayette, un gamin enveloppé d'un drapeau tricolore criait aux gardes nationaux : "Allez-vous tirer contre vos frères !" Comme ils s'avançaient, Dussardier avait jeté bas son fusil, écarté les autres, bondi sur la barricade, et, d'un coup de savate, abattu l'insurgé en lui arrachant le drapeau. On l'avait retrouvé sous les décombres, la cuisse percée d'un lingot de cuivre. Il avait fallu débrider la plaie, extraire le projectile. Mlle Vatnaz était arrivée le soir même, et, depuis ce temps-là, ne le quittait plus.

Elle préparait avec intelligence tout ce qu'il fallait pour les pansements, l'aidait à boire, épiait ses moindres désirs, allait et venait plus légère qu'une mouche, et le contemplait avec des yeux tendres.

Frédéric, pendant deux semaines, ne manqua pas de revenir tous les matins ; un jour qu'il parlait du dévouement de la Vatnaz, Dussardier haussa les épaules.

— "Eh non ! c'est par intérêt"

— "Tu crois ?"

Il reprit : "J'en suis sûr !" sans vouloir s'expliquer davantage.

Elle le comblait de prévenances, jusqu'à lui apporter les journaux où l'on exaltait sa belle action. Ces hommages paraissaient l'importuner. Il avoua même à Frédéric l'embarras de sa conscience.

Peut-être qu'il aurait dû se mettre de l'autre bord, avec les blouses ; car enfin on leur avait promis un tas de choses qu'on n'avait pas tenues. Leurs vainqueurs détestaient la République ; et puis, on s'était montré bien dur pour eux ! Ils avaient tort, sans doute, pas tout à fait, cependant ; et le brave garçon était torturé par cette idée qu'il pouvait avoir combattu la justice.

Sénecal, enfermé aux Tuileries sous la terrasse du bord de l'eau, n'avait rien de ces angoisses.

Ils étaient là, neuf cents hommes, entassés dans l'ordure, pêle-mêle, noirs de poudre et de sang caillé, grelottant la fièvre, criant de rage, et on ne retirait pas ceux qui venaient à mourir parmi les autres.

Quelquefois, au bruit soudain d'une détonation, ils croyaient qu'on allait tous les fusiller ; alors, ils se précipitaient contre les murs, puis retombaient à leur place, tellement hébétés par la douleur, qu'il leur semblait vivre dans un cauchemar, une hallucination funèbre. La lampe suspendue à la voûte avait l'air d'une tache de sang ; et de petites flammes vertes et jaunes voltigeaient, produites par les émanations du caveau. Dans la crainte des épidémies, une commission fut nommée. Dès les premières marches, le président se rejeta en arrière, épouvanté par l'odeur des excréments et des cadavres. Quand les prisonniers s'approchaient d'un soupirail, les gardes nationaux qui étaient de faction — pour les empêcher d'ébranler les grilles, fourraient des coups de baïonnette, au hasard, dans le tas.

Ils furent, généralement, impitoyables. Ceux qui ne s'étaient pas battus voulaient se signaler. C'était un débordement de peur. On se vengeait à la fois des journaux, des clubs, des attroupements, des doctrines, de tout ce qui exaspérait depuis trois mois ; et, en dépit de la victoire, l'égalité (comme pour le châtement de ses défenseurs et la dérision de ses ennemis) se manifestait triomphalement, une égalité de bêtes brutes, un même niveau de turpitudes sanglantes ; car le fanatisme des intérêts équilibra les délires du besoin, l'aristocratie eut les fureurs de la crapule, et le bonnet de coton ne se montra pas moins hideux que le bonnet rouge. La raison publique était troublée comme après les grands bouleversements de la nature. Des gens d'esprit en restèrent idiots pour toute leur vie.

Le père Roque était devenu très brave, presque téméraire. Arrivé le 26 à Paris avec les Nogentais, au lieu de s'en retourner en même temps qu'eux, il avait été s'adjoindre à la garde nationale qui campait aux Tuileries ; et il fut très content d'être placé en sentinelle devant la terrasse du bord de l'eau. Au moins, là, il les avait sous lui, ces brigands ! Il jouissait de leur défaite, de leur abjection, et ne pouvait se retenir de les invectiver.

Un d'eux, un adolescent à longs cheveux blonds, mit sa face aux barreaux en demandant du pain. M. Roque lui ordonna de se taire. Mais le jeune homme répétait d'une voix lamentable :

— “Du pain !”

— “Est-ce que j'en ai, moi ?”

D'autres prisonniers apparurent dans le soupirail, avec leurs barbes hérissées, leurs prunelles flamboyantes. tous se poussant et hurlant :

— “Du pain !”

Le père Roque fut indigné de voir son autorité méconnue. Pour leur faire peur, il les mit en joue ; et, porté jusqu'à la voûte par le flot qui l'étouffait, le jeune homme, la tête en arrière, cria encore une fois : — "Du pain !"

— "Tiens ! en voilà !" dit le père Roque, en lâchant son coup de fusil.

Il y eut un énorme hurlement, puis rien. Au bord du baquet, quelque chose de blanc était resté.

Après quoi, M. Roque s'en retourna chez lui ; car il possédait, rue Saint-Martin, une maison où il s'était réservé un pied-à-terre ; et les dommages causés par l'émeute à la devanture de son immeuble n'avaient pas contribué médiocrement à le rendre furieux. Il lui sembla, en la revoyant, qu'il s'était exagéré le mal. Son action de tout à l'heure l'apaisait, comme une indemnité.

Ce fut sa fille elle-même qui lui ouvrit la porte. Elle lui dit, tout de suite, que son absence trop longue l'avait inquiétée ; elle avait craint un malheur, une blessure.

Cette preuve d'amour filial attendrit le père Roque. Il s'étonna qu'elle se fût mise en route sans Catherine.

— "Je l'ai envoyée faire une commission", répondit Louise.

Et elle s'informa de sa santé, de choses et d'autres ; puis, d'un air indifférent, lui demanda si par hasard il n'avait pas rencontré Frédéric.

— "Non ! pas le moins du monde !"

C'était pour lui seul qu'elle avait fait le voyage.

Quelqu'un marcha dans le corridor.

— "Ah ! pardon..."

Et elle disparut.

Catherine n'avait point trouvé Frédéric. Il était absent depuis plusieurs jours, et son ami intime, M. Deslauriers, habitait maintenant la province.

Louise reparut toute tremblante, sans pouvoir parler.

Elle s'appuyait contre les meubles.

— "Qu'as-tu ? qu'as-tu donc ?" s'écria son père.

Elle fit signe que ce n'était rien, et par un grand effort de volonté se remit.

Le traiteur d'en face apporta la soupe. Mais le père Roque avait subi une trop violente émotion. "Ça ne pouvait pas passer", et il eut au dessert une espèce de défaillance. On envoya chercher vivement un médecin, qui prescrivit une potion. Puis, quand il fut dans son lit, M. Roque exigea le plus de couvertures possible, pour se faire suer. Il soupirait, il geignait.

— “Merci, ma bonne Catherine ! — Baise ton pauvre père, ma poulette ! Ah ! ces révolutions !”

Et, comme sa fille le grondait de s’être rendu malade en se tourmentant pour elle, il répliqua :

— “Oui ! tu as raison ! Mais c’est plus fort que moi ! Je suis trop sensible !”

CHAPITRE 2

Mme Dambreuse, dans son boudoir, entre sa nièce et miss John, écoutait parler M. Roque, contant ses fatigues militaires.

Elle se mordait les lèvres, semblait souffrir.

— “Oh ! ce n'est rien ! ça se passera !”

Et, d'un air gracieux :

— “Nous aurons à dîner une de vos connaissances, M. Moreau.”

Louise tressaillit.

— “Puis seulement quelques intimes, Alfred de Cisy, entre autres.”

Et elle vanta ses manières, sa figure, et principalement ses mœurs.

Mme Dambreuse mentait moins qu'elle ne croyait ; le Vicomte rêvait le mariage. Il l'avait dit à Martinon, ajoutant qu'il était sûr de plaire à Mlle Cécile et que ses parents l'accepteraient.

Pour risquer une telle confidence, il devait avoir sur la dot des renseignements avantageux. Or, Martinon soupçonnait Cécile d'être la fille naturelle de M. Dambreuse ; et il eût été, probablement, très fort de demander sa main à tout hasard. Cette audace offrait des dangers ; aussi Martinon, jusqu'à présent, s'était conduit de manière à ne pas se compromettre ; d'ailleurs, il ne savait comment se débarrasser de la tante. Le mot de Cisy le détermina ; et il avait fait sa requête au banquier, lequel, n'y voyant pas d'obstacle, venait d'en prévenir Mme Dambreuse.

Cisy parut. Elle se leva, dit :

— “Vous nous oubliez... Cécile, shake hands !”

Au même moment, Frédéric entra.

— “Ah ! enfin ! on vous retrouve !” s'écria le père Roque. “J'ai été trois fois chez vous, avec Louise, cette semaine !”

Frédéric les avait soigneusement évités. Il alléguait qu'il passait tous ses jours près d'un camarade blessé. Depuis longtemps, du reste, un tas de choses l'avaient pris ; et il cherchait des histoires. Heureusement, les convives arrivèrent : d'abord M. Paul de Grémonville le diplomate entrevu au bal ; puis Fumichon, cet industriel dont le dévouement conservateur l'avait un soir scandalisé ; la vieille duchesse de Montreuil-Nantua les suivait.

Mais deux voix s'élevèrent dans l'antichambre.

— "J'en suis certaine", disait l'une.

— "Chère belle dame ! chère belle dame !" répondait l'autre, "de grâce, calmez-vous !"

C'était M. de Nonancourt, un vieux beau, l'air momifié dans du cold-cream, et Mme de Larsillois, l'épouse d'un préfet de Louis-Philippe. Elle tremblait extrêmement, car elle avait entendu, tout à l'heure, sur un orgue, une polka qui était un signal entre les insurgés. Beaucoup de bourgeois avaient des imaginations pareilles on croyait que des hommes, dans les catacombes, allaient faire sauter le faubourg Saint-Germain ; des rumeurs s'échappaient des caves ; il se passait aux fenêtres des choses suspectes.

Tout le monde s'évertua cependant à tranquilliser Mme de Larsillois. L'ordre était rétabli. Plus rien à craindre. "Cavaignac nous a sauvés !" Comme si les horreurs de l'insurrection n'eussent pas été suffisamment nombreuses, on les exagérait. Il y avait eu vingt-trois mille forçats du côté des socialistes, — pas moins ! On ne doutait nullement des vivres empoisonnés, des mobiles sciés entre deux planches, et des inscriptions des drapeaux qui réclamaient le pillage, l'incendie.

— "Et quelque chose de plus !" ajouta l'ex-préfète.

— "Ah ! chère !" dit par pudeur Mme Dambreuse, en désignant d'un coup d'oeil les trois jeunes filles.

M. Dambreuse sortit de son cabinet avec Martinon. Elle détourna la tête, et répondit aux saluts de Pellerin qui s'avancait. L'artiste considérait les murailles, d'une façon inquiète. Le banquier le prit à part, et lui fit comprendre qu'il avait dû, pour le moment, cacher sa toile révolutionnaire.

— "Sans doute !" dit Pellerin, son échec au Club de l'Intelligence ayant modifié ses opinions.

M. Dambreuse glissa fort poliment qu'il lui commanderait d'autres travaux.

— "Mais pardon !... — Ah ! cher ami ! quel bonheur !" Arnoux et Mme Arnoux étaient devant Frédéric.

Il eut comme un vertige. Rosanette, avec son admiration pour les soldats, l'avait agacé toute l'après-midi ; et le vieil amour se réveilla.

Le maître d'hôtel vint annoncer que Madame était servie. D'un regard, elle ordonna au Vicomte de prendre le bras de Cécile, dit tout bas à Martinon : “Misérable !” et on passa dans la salle à manger.

Sous les feuilles vertes d’un ananas, au milieu de la nappe, une dorade s’allongeait, le museau tendu vers un quartier de chevreuil et touchant de sa queue un buisson d’écrevisses. Des figues, des cerises énormes, des poires et des raisins (primeurs de la culture parisienne) montaient en pyramides dans des corbeilles de vieux saxe ; une touffe de fleurs, par intervalles, se mêlait aux claires argenteries ; les stores de soie blanche abaissés devant les fenêtres emplissaient l’appartement d’une lumière douce ; il était rafraîchi par deux fontaines où il y avait des morceaux de glace ; et de grands domestiques en culotte courte servaient. Tout cela semblait meilleur après l’émotion des jours passés. On rentrait dans la jouissance des choses que l’on avait eu peur de perdre ; et Nonancourt exprima le sentiment général en disant :

— “Ah ! espérons que MM. les républicains vont nous permettre de dîner !”

— “Malgré leur fraternité !” ajouta spirituellement le père Roque.

Ces deux honorables étaient à la droite et à la gauche de Mme Dambreuse ayant devant elle son mari, entre Mme de Larsillois flanquée du diplomate et la vieille duchesse, que Fumichon coudoyait. Puis venaient le peintre, le marchand de faïences, Mlle Louise ; et grâce à Martinon qui lui avait enlevé sa place pour se mettre auprès de Cécile, Frédéric se trouvait à côté de Mme Arnoux.

Elle portait une robe de barège noir, un cercle d’or au poignet, et comme le premier jour où il avait dîné chez elle, quelque chose de rouge dans les cheveux, une branche de fuchsia entortillée à son chignon. Il ne put s’empêcher de lui dire :

— “Voilà longtemps que nous ne nous sommes vus !”

— “Ah !” répliqua-t-elle froidement.

Il reprit, avec une douceur dans la voix qui atténuait l’impertinence de sa question :

— “Avez-vous quelquefois pensé à moi ?”

— “Pourquoi y penserais-je ?”

Frédéric fut blessé par ce mot.

— “Vous avez peut-être raison, après tout.”

Mais, se repentant vite, il jura qu’il n’avait pas vécu un seul jour sans être ravagé par son souvenir.

— “Je n’en crois absolument rien, monsieur.”

— “Cependant, vous savez que je vous aime !”

Mme Arnoux ne répondit pas.

— “Vous savez que je vous aime.”

Elle se taisait toujours.

— “Eh bien, va te promener !”, se dit Frédéric.

Et, levant les yeux, il aperçut, à l’autre bout de la table, Mlle Roque.

Elle avait cru coquet de s’habiller tout en vert, couleur qui jurait grossièrement avec le ton de ses cheveux rouges. Sa boucle de ceinture était trop haute, sa collerette l’engonçait ; ce peu d’élégance avait contribué sans doute au froid abord de Frédéric. Elle l’observait de loin, curieusement ; et Arnoux, près d’elle, avait beau prodiguer les galanteries, il n’en pouvait tirer trois paroles, si bien que, renonçant à plaire, il écouta la conversation. Elle roulait maintenant sur les purées d’ananas du Luxembourg.

Louis Blanc, d’après Fumichon, possédait un hôtel rue Saint-Dominique et refusait de louer aux ouvriers.

— “Moi, ce que je trouve drôle”, dit Nonancourt, “c’est Ledru-Rollin chassant dans les domaines de la Couronne !”

— “Il doit vingt mille francs à un orfèvre ajouta Cisy ;” et même on prétend... ”

Mme Dambreuse l’arrêta.

— “Ah ! que c’est vilain de s’échauffer pour la politique ! Un jeune homme, fi donc ! Occupez-vous plutôt de votre voisine !”

Ensuite, les gens sérieux attaquèrent les journaux.

Arnoux prit leur défense ; Frédéric s’en mêla, les appelant des maisons de commerce pareilles aux autres. Leurs écrivains, généralement, étaient des imbéciles, ou des blagueurs ; il se donna pour les connaître, et combattait par des sarcasmes les sentiments généreux de son ami. Mme Arnoux ne voyait pas que c’était une vengeance contre elle.

Cependant, le Vicomte se torturait l’intellect afin de conquérir Mlle Cécile. D’abord, il étala des goûts d’artiste, en blâmant la forme des carafons et la gravure des couteaux. Puis il parla de son écurie, de son tailleur et de son chemisier ; enfin, il aborda le chapitre de la religion et trouva moyen de faire entendre qu’il accomplissait tous ses devoirs.

Martinon s'y prenait mieux. D'un train monotone, et en la regardant continuellement, il vantait son profil d'oiseau, sa fade chevelure blonde, ses mains trop courtes. La laide jeune fille se délectait sous cette averse de douceurs.

On n'en pouvait rien entendre, tous parlant très haut.

M. Roque voulait pour gouverner la France "un bras de fer". Nonancourt regretta même que l'échafaud politique fût aboli. On aurait dû tuer en masse tous ces gredins-là !

— "Ce sont même des lâches", dit Fumichon. "Je ne vois pas de bravoure à se mettre derrière les barricades !"

— "A propos, parlez-nous donc de Dussardier !" dit M. Dambreuse en se tournant vers Frédéric.

Le brave commis était maintenant un héros, comme Sallesse, les frères Jeanson, la femme Péquillet, etc.

Frédéric, sans se faire prier, débita l'histoire de son ami ; il lui en revint une espèce d'auréole.

On arriva, tout naturellement, à relater différents traits de courage. Suivant le diplomate, il n'était pas difficile d'affronter la mort, témoin ceux qui se battent en duel.

— "On peut s'en rapporter au Vicomte", dit Martinon.

Le Vicomte devint très rouge.

Les convives le regardaient ; et Louise, plus étonnée que les autres, murmura :

— "Qu'est-ce donc ?"

— "Il a calé devant Frédéric", reprit tout bas Arnoux. "Vous savez quelque chose, mademoiselle ?" demanda aussitôt Nonancourt ; et il dit sa réponse à Mme Dambreuse, qui, se penchant un peu, se mit à regarder Frédéric.

Martinon n'attendit pas les questions de Cécile. Il lui apprit que cette affaire concernait une personne inqualifiable. La jeune fille se recula légèrement sur sa chaise, comme pour fuir le contact de ce libertin.

La conversation avait recommencé. Les grands vins de Bordeaux circulaient, — on s'animait — , Pellerin en voulait à la révolution à cause du musée espagnol, définitivement perdu. C'était ce qui l'affligeait le plus, comme peintre. A ce mot, M. Roque l'interpella.

— "Ne seriez-vous pas l'auteur d'un tableau très remarquable ?"

— “Peut-être ! Lequel ?”

— “Cela représente une dame dans un costume... ma foi !... un peu... léger, avec une bourse et un paon derrière.”

Frédéric à son tour s’empourpra. Pellerin faisait semblant de ne pas entendre.

— “Cependant c’est bien de vous ! Car il y a votre nom écrit au bas, et une ligne sur le cadre constatant que c’est la propriété de M. Moreau.”

Un jour que le père Roque et sa fille l’attendaient chez lui, ils avaient vu le portrait de la Maréchale. Le bonhomme l’avait même pris pour “un tableau gothique.”

— “Non !” dit Pellerin brutalement ; “c’est un portrait de femme.”

Martinon ajouta :

— “D’une femme très vivante ! N’est-ce pas, Cisy ?”

— “Eh ! je n’en sais rien.”

— “Je croyais que vous la connaissiez. Mais du moment que ça vous fait de la peine, mille excuses !”

Cisy baissa les yeux, prouvant par son embarras qu’il avait dû jouer un rôle pitoyable à l’occasion de ce portrait. Quant à Frédéric, le modèle ne pouvait être que sa maîtresse. Ce fut une de ces convictions qui se forment tout de suite, et les figures de l’assemblée la manifestaient clairement.

— “Comme il me mentait !” se dit Mme Arnoux.

— “C’est donc pour cela qu’il m’a quittée !” pensa Louise.

Frédéric s’imaginait que ces deux histoires pouvaient le compromettre ; et, quand on fut dans le jardin, il en fit des reproches à Martinon.

L’amoureux de Mlle Cécile lui éclata de rire au nez.

— “Eh ! pas du tout ! ça te servira ! Va de l’avant !” Que voulait-il dire ? D’ailleurs, pourquoi cette bienveillance si contraire à ses habitudes ? Sans rien expliquer, il s’en alla vers le fond, où les dames étaient assises. Les hommes se tenaient debout, et Pellerin, au milieu d’eux, émettait des idées. Ce qu’il y avait de plus favorable pour les arts, c’était une monarchie bien entendue. Les temps modernes le dégoûtaient, “quand ce ne serait qu’à cause de la garde nationale”, il regrettait le Moyen Age, Louis XIV ; M. Roque le félicita de ses opinions, avouant même qu’elles renversaient tous ses préjugés sur les artistes. Mais il s'éloigna presque aussitôt, attiré par la voix de Fumichon. Arnoux tâchait d'établir qu'il y a deux socialismes, un bon et un mauvais. L'industriel n'y voyait pas de différence, la tête lui tournant de colère au mot propriété.

— "C'est un droit écrit dans la nature ! Les enfants tiennent à leurs joujoux ; tous les peuples sont de mon avis, tous les animaux ; le lion même, s'il pouvait parler, se déclarerait propriétaire ? Ainsi, moi, messieurs, j'ai commencé avec quinze mille francs de capital ! Pendant trente ans, savez-vous, je me levais régulièrement à quatre heures du matin ! J'ai eu un mal des cinq cents diables à faire ma fortune ! Et on viendra me soutenir que je n'en suis pas le maître, que mon argent n'est pas mon argent, enfin, que la propriété, c'est le vol !"

— "Mais Proudhon..."

— "Laissez-moi tranquille, avec votre Proudhon ! S'il était là, je crois que je l'étranglerais !"

Il l'aurait étranglé. Après les liqueurs surtout, Fumichon ne se connaissait plus ; et son visage apoplectique était près d'éclater comme un obus.

— "Bonjour, Arnoux", dit Hussonnet, qui passa lestement sur le gazon.

Il apportait à M. Dambreuse la première feuille d'une brochure intitulée l'Hydre, le bohème défendant les intérêts d'un cercle réactionnaire, et le banquier le présenta comme tel à ses hôtes.

Hussonnet les divertit, en soutenant d'abord que les marchands de suif payaient trois cent quatre-vingt-douze gamins pour crier chaque soir : "Des lampions !" puis en blaguant les principes de 89, l'affranchissement des nègres, les orateurs de la gauche ; il se lança même jusqu'à faire Prudhomme sur une barricade, peut-être par l'effet d'une jalousie naïve contre ces bourgeois qui avaient bien dîné. La charge plut médiocrement. Leurs figures s'allongèrent.

Ce n'était pas le moment de plaisanter, du reste Nonancourt le dit, en rappelant la mort de Monseigneur Affre et celle du général Bréa. Elles étaient toujours rappelées ; on en faisait des arguments. M. Roque déclara le trépas de l'Archevêque : "tout ce qu'il y avait de plus sublime" ; Fumichon donnait la palme au militaire ; et, au lieu de déplorer simplement ces deux meurtres, on discuta pour savoir lequel devait exciter la plus forte indignation. Un second parallèle vint après, celui de Lamoricière et de Cavaignac, M. Dambreuse exaltant Cavaignac et Nonancourt Lamoricière. Personne de la compagnie, sauf Arnoux, n'avait pu les voir à l'œuvre. Tous n'en formulèrent pas moins sur leurs opérations un jugement irrévocable. Frédéric s'était récusé, confessant qu'il n'avait pas pris les armes. Le diplomate et M. Dambreuse lui firent un signe de tête approbatif. En effet, avoir combattu l'émeute, c'était avoir défendu la République. Le résultat, bien que favorable, la consolidait ; et, maintenant qu'on était débarrassé des vaincus, on souhaitait l'être des vainqueurs.

A peine dans le jardin, Mme Dambreuse, prenant Cisy, l'avait gourmandé de sa maladresse ; à la vue de Martinon, elle le congédia, puis voulut savoir de son futur neveu la cause de ses plaisanteries sur le Vicomte.

— "Il n'y en a pas."

— "Et tout cela comme pour la gloire de M. Moreau ! Dans quel but ?"

— "Dans aucun. Frédéric est un charmant garçon. Je l'aime beaucoup."

— "Et moi aussi ! Qu'il vienne ! Allez le chercher !"

Après deux ou trois phrases banales, elle commença par déprécier légèrement ses convives, ce qui était le mettre au-dessus d'eux. Il ne manqua pas de dénigrer un peu les autres femmes, manière habile de lui adresser des compliments. Mais elle le quittait de temps en temps, c'était soir de réception, des dames arrivaient ; puis elle revenait à sa place, et la disposition toute fortuite des sièges leur permettait de n'être pas entendus.

Elle se montra enjouée, sérieuse, mélancolique et raisonnable. Les préoccupations du jour l'intéressaient médiocrement ; il y avait tout un ordre de sentiments moins transitoires. Elle se plaignit des poètes qui dénaturent la vérité, puis elle leva les yeux vers le ciel, en lui demandant le nom d'une étoile.

On avait mis dans les arbres deux ou trois lanternes chinoises ; le vent les agitait, des rayons colorés tremblaient sur sa robe blanche. Elle se tenait, comme d'habitude, un peu en arrière dans son fauteuil, avec un tabouret devant elle ; on apercevait la pointe d'un soulier de satin noir ; et Mme Dambreuse, par intervalles, lançait une parole plus haute, quelquefois même un rire.

Ces coquetteries n'atteignaient pas Martinon, occupé de Cécile ; mais elles allaient frapper la petite Roque, qui causait avec Mme Arnoux. C'était la seule, parmi ces femmes, dont les manières ne lui semblaient pas dédaigneuses. Elle était venue s'asseoir à côté d'elle ; puis, cédant à un besoin d'épanchement :

— “N'est-ce pas qu'il parle bien, Frédéric Moreau ?”

— “Vous le connaissez ?”

— “Oh ! beaucoup ! Nous sommes voisins. Il m'a fait jouer toute petite.”

Mme Arnoux lui jeta un long regard qui signifiait : “Vous ne l'aimez pas, j'imagine ?”

Celui de la jeune fille répliqua sans trouble : — “Si”

— “Vous le voyez souvent, alors ?”

— “Oh ! non ! seulement quand il vient chez sa mère. Voilà dix mois qu'il n'est venu ! Il avait promis cependant d'être plus exact.”

— “Il ne faut pas trop croire aux promesses des hommes, mon enfant.” — “Mais il ne m'a pas trompée, moi !”

— “Comme d'autres !”

Louise frissonna : “Est-ce que, par hasard, il lui aurait aussi promis quelque chose, à elle ?” et sa figure était crispée de défiance et de haine.

Mme Arnoux en eut presque peur ; elle aurait voulu rattraper son mot. Puis, toutes deux se turent.

Comme Frédéric se trouvait en face, sur un pliant, elles le considéraient, l'une avec décence, du coin des paupières, l'autre franchement, la bouche ouverte, si bien que Mme Dambreuse lui dit :

— “Tournez-vous donc, pour qu'elle vous voie !”

— “Qui cela ?”

— “Mais la fille de M. Roque !”

Et elle le plaisanta sur l'amour de cette jeune provinciale. Il s'en défendait, en tâchant de rire.

— “Est-ce croyable ! je vous le demande ! Une laideron pareille !”

Cependant, il éprouvait un plaisir de vanité immense. Il se rappelait l'autre soirée, celle dont il était sorti, le cœur plein d'humiliations ; et il respirait largement ; il se sentait dans son vrai milieu, presque dans son domaine, comme si tout cela, y compris l'hôtel Dambreuse, lui avait appartenu. Les dames formaient un demi-cercle en l'écoutant ; et, afin de briller, il se prononça pour le rétablissement du divorce, qui devait être facile jusqu'à pouvoir se quitter et se reprendre indéfiniment, tant qu'on voudrait. Elles se récrièrent ; d'autres chuchotaient ; il y avait de petits éclats de voix dans l'ombre, au pied du mur couvert d'aristoloches. C'était comme un caquetage de poules en gaité ; et il développait sa théorie, avec cet aplomb que la conscience du succès procure. Un domestique apporta dans la tonnelle un plateau chargé de glaces. Les messieurs s'en rapprochèrent. Ils causaient des arrestations.

Alors, Frédéric se vengea du Vicomte en lui faisant accroire qu'on allait peut-être le poursuivre comme légitimiste. L'autre objectait qu'il n'avait pas bougé de sa chambre ; son adversaire accumula les chances mauvaises ; MM. Dambreuse et de Grémonville eux-mêmes s'amusaient. Puis ils complimentèrent Frédéric, tout en regrettant qu'il n'employât pas ses facultés à la défense de l'ordre ; et leur poignée de main fut cordiale ; il pouvait désormais compter sur eux. Enfin, comme tout le monde s'en allait, le Vicomte s'inclina très bas devant Cécile :

— “Mademoiselle, j'ai bien l'honneur de vous souhaiter le bonsoir.”

Elle répondit d'un ton sec :

— “Bonsoir !” Mais elle envoya un sourire à Martinon.

Le père Roque, pour continuer sa discussion avec Arnoux, lui proposa de le reconduire “ainsi que madame”, leur route étant la même. Louise et Frédéric marchaient devant. Elle avait saisi son bras ; et, quand elle fut un peu loin des autres :

— “Ah ! enfin ! enfin ! Ai-je assez souffert toute la soirée ! Comme ces femmes sont méchantes ! Quels airs de hauteur !”

Il voulut les défendre.

— “D'abord, tu pouvais bien me parler en entrant, depuis un an que tu n'es venu !”

— “Il n'y a pas un an”, dit Frédéric, heureux de la reprendre sur ce détail pour esquiver les autres.

— “Soit ! Le temps m'a paru long, voilà tout ! Mais, pendant cet abominable dîner, c'était à croire que tu avais honte de moi ! Ah ! je comprends, je n'ai pas ce qu'il faut pour plaire, comme elles.”

— “Tu te trompes”, dit Frédéric.

— “Vraiment ! Jure-moi que tu n’en aimes aucune ?”

Il jura.

— “Et c’est moi seule que tu aimes ?”

— “Parbleu !”

Cette assurance la rendit gaie. Elle aurait voulu se perdre dans les rues, pour se promener ensemble toute la nuit.

— “J’ai été si tourmentée là-bas ! On ne parlait que de barricades ! Je te voyais tombant sur le dos, couvert de sang ! Ta mère était dans son lit avec ses rhumatismes. Elle ne savait rien. Il fallait me taire ! Je n’y tenais plus. Alors, j’ai pris Catherine.”

Et elle lui conta son départ, toute sa route, et le mensonge fait à son père.

— “Il me ramène dans deux jours. Viens demain soir, comme par hasard, et profite-en pour me demander en mariage.”

Jamais Frédéric n’avait été plus loin du mariage. D’ailleurs, Mlle Roque lui semblait une petite personne assez ridicule. Quelle différence avec une femme comme Mme Dambreuse ! Un bien autre avenir lui était réservé ! Il en avait la certitude aujourd’hui ; aussi n’était-ce pas le moment de s’engager, par un coup de cœur, dans une détermination de cette importance. Il fallait maintenant être positif ; — et puis il avait revu Mme Arnoux. Cependant la franchise de Louise l’embarrassait.

Il répliqua : — “As-tu bien réfléchi à cette démarche ?”

— “Comment !” s’écria-t-elle, glacée de surprise et d’indignation.

Il dit que se marier actuellement serait une folie.

— “Ainsi tu ne veux pas de moi ?”

— “Mais tu ne me comprends pas !”

Et il se lança dans un verbiage très embrouillé, pour lui faire entendre qu’il était retenu par des considérations majeures, qu’il avait des affaires à n’en plus finir, que même sa fortune était compromise (Louise tranchait tout, d’un mot net), enfin que les circonstances politiques s’y opposaient. Donc, le plus raisonnable était de patienter quelque temps. Les choses s’arrangeraient, sans doute ; du moins, il l’espérait ; et, comme il ne trouvait plus de raisons, il feignit de se rappeler brusquement qu’il aurait dû être depuis deux heures chez Dussardier.

Puis, ayant salué les autres, il s’enfonça dans la rue Hauteville, fit le tour du Gymnase, revint sur le boulevard, et monta en courant les quatre étages de Rosanette.

M. et Mme Arnoux quittèrent le père Roque et sa fille, à l'entrée de la rue Saint-Denis. Ils s'en retournèrent sans rien dire ; lui, n'en pouvant plus d'avoir bavardé, et elle, éprouvant une grande lassitude ; elle s'appuyait même sur son épaule. C'était le seul homme qui eût montré pendant la soirée des sentiments honnêtes. Elle se sentit pour lui pleine d'indulgence. Cependant, il gardait un peu de rancune contre Frédéric.

— “As-tu vu sa mine, lorsqu'il a été question du portrait ? Quand je te disais qu'il est son amant ? Tu ne voulais pas me croire !”

— “Oh ! oui, j'avais tort !”

Arnoux, content de son triomphe, insista.

— “Je parie même qu'il nous a lâchés, tout à l'heure pour aller la rejoindre ! Il est maintenant chez elle, va ! Il y passe la nuit.”

Mme Arnoux avait rabattu sa capeline très bas.

— “Mais tu trembles !”

— “C'est que j'ai froid”, reprit-elle.

Dès que son père fut endormi, Louise entra dans la chambre de Catherine, et, la secouant par l'épaule :

— “Lève-toi !... vite ! plus vite ! et va me chercher un fiacre.”

Catherine lui répondit qu'il n'y en avait plus à cette heure.

— “Tu vas m'y conduire toi-même, alors ?”

— “Où donc ?”

— “Chez Frédéric !”

— “Pas possible ! A cause ?”

C'était pour lui parler. Elle ne pouvait attendre. Elle voulait le voir tout de suite.

— “Y pensez-vous ! Se présenter comme ça dans une maison au milieu de la nuit ! D'ailleurs, à présent, il dort !”

— “Je le réveillerai !”

— “Mais ce n'est pas convenable pour une demoiselle !”

— “Je ne suis pas une demoiselle ! Je suis sa femme Je l'aime ! Allons, mets ton châle.”

Catherine, debout au bord de son lit, réfléchissait. Elle finit par dire :

— “Non ! je ne veux pas !”

— “Eh bien reste ! Moi, j’y vais !”

Louise glissa comme une couleuvre dans l’escalier. Catherine s’élança par derrière, la rejoignit sur le trottoir. Ses représentations furent inutiles ; et elle la suivait, tout en achevant de nouer sa camisole. Le chemin lui parut extrêmement long. Elle se plaignait de ses vieilles jambes.

— “Après ça, moi, je n’ai pas ce qui vous pousse, dame !”

Puis elle s’attendrissait.

— “Pauvre cœur ! Il n’y a encore que ta Catau, vois-tu !”

Des scrupules, de temps en temps, la reprenaient.

— “Ah ! vous me faites faire quelque chose de joli ! Si votre père se réveillait ! Seigneur Dieu ! Pourvu qu’un malheur n’arrive pas !”

Devant le théâtre des Variétés, une patrouille de gardes nationaux les arrêta. Louise dit tout de suite qu’elle allait avec sa bonne dans la rue Rumford chercher un médecin. On les laissa passer.

Au coin de la Madeleine, elles rencontrèrent une seconde patrouille ; et, Louise ayant donné la même explication, un des citoyens reprit :

— “Est-ce pour une maladie de neuf mois, ma petite chatte ?”

— “Gougibaud !” s’écria le capitaine, “pas de polissonneries dans les rangs ! — Mesdames, circulez !”

Malgré l’injonction, les traits d’esprit continuèrent :

— “Bien du plaisir !”

— “Mes respects au docteur !”

— “Prenez garde au loup !”

— “Ils aiment à rire”, remarqua tout haut Catherine.

— “C’est jeune !”

Enfin, elles arrivèrent chez Frédéric. Louise tira la sonnette avec vigueur, plusieurs fois. La porte s’entrebâilla ; et le concierge répondit à sa demande :

— “Non !”

— “Mais il doit être couché ?”

— “Je vous dit que non ! Voilà près de trois mois qu’il ne couche pas chez lui !”

Et le petit carreau de la loge retomba nettement, comme une guillotine. Elles restaient dans l’obscurité, sous la voûte. Une voix furieuse leur cria :

— “Sortez donc !”

La porte se rouvrit ; elles sortirent.

Louise fut obligée de s’asseoir sur une borne ; et elle pleura, la tête dans ses mains, abondamment, de tout son cœur. Le jour se levait, des charrettes passaient.

Catherine la ramena en la soutenant, en la baisant, en lui disant toutes sortes de bonnes choses tirées de son expérience. Il ne fallait pas se faire tant de mal pour les amoureux. Si celui-là manquait, elle en trouverait d’autres !

CHAPITRE 3

Quand l'enthousiasme de Rosanette pour les gardes mobiles se fut calmé, elle redevint plus charmante que jamais, et Frédéric prit l'habitude insensiblement de vivre chez elle.

Le meilleur de la journée, c'était le matin sur leur terrasse. En caraco de batiste et pieds nus dans ses pantoufles, elle allait et venait autour de lui, nettoyait la cage de ses serins, donnait de l'eau à ses poissons rouges, et jardinait avec une pelle à feu dans la caisse remplie de terre, d'où s'élevait un treillage de capucines garnissant le mur. Puis, accoudés sur leur balcon, ils regardaient ensemble les voitures, les passants ; et on se chauffait au soleil, on faisait des projets pour la soirée. Il s'absentait pendant deux heures tout au plus ; ensuite, ils allaient dans un théâtre quelconque, aux avant-scènes ; et Rosanette, un gros bouquet de fleurs à la main, écoutait les instruments, tandis que Frédéric, penché à son oreille, lui contait des choses joviales ou galantes. D'autres fois, ils prenaient une calèche pour les conduire au bois de Boulogne ; ils se promenaient tard, jusqu'au milieu de la nuit. Enfin, ils s'en revenaient par l'Arc de triomphe et la grande avenue, en humant l'air, avec les étoiles sur leur tête, et, jusqu'au fond de la perspective, tous les becs de gaz alignés comme un double cordon de perles lumineuses.

Frédéric l'attendait toujours quand ils devaient sortir elle était fort longue à disposer autour de son menton les deux rubans de sa capote et elle se souriait à elle-même, devant son armoire à glace. Puis passait son bras sur le sien et le forçant à se mirer près d'elle :

— “Nous faisons bien comme cela, tous les deux côte à côte ! Ah pauvre amour, je te mangerais !”

Il était maintenant sa chose, sa propriété. Elle en avait sur le visage un rayonnement continu, en même temps qu'elle paraissait plus langoureuse de manières, plus ronde dans ses formes ; et, sans pouvoir dire de quelle façon, il la trouvait changée, cependant.

Un jour, elle lui apprit comme une nouvelle très importante que le sieur Arnoux venait de monter un magasin de blanc à une ancienne ouvrière de sa fabrique ; il y venait tous les soirs, “dépensait beaucoup, pas plus tard que l'autre semaine, lui avait même donné un ameublement de palissandre."

— "Comment le sais-tu ?" dit Frédéric.

— "Oh ! j'en suis sûre !"

Delphine, exécutant ses ordres, avait pris des informations. Elle aimait donc bien Arnoux, pour s'en occuper si fortement ! Il se contenta de lui répondre — "Qu'est-ce que cela te fait ?"

Rosanette eut l'air surprise de cette demande.

— "Mais la canaille me doit de l'argent ! N'est-ce pas abominable de le voir entretenir des gueuses !"

Puis, avec une expression de haine triomphante :

— "Au reste, elle se moque de lui joliment ! Elle a trois autres particuliers. Tant mieux ! et qu'elle le mange jusqu'au dernier liard, j'en serai contente !"

Arnoux, en effet, se laissait exploiter par la Bordelaise, avec l'indulgence des amours séniles.

Sa fabrique ne marchait plus ; l'ensemble de ses affaires était pitoyable ; si bien que, pour les remettre à flot, il pensa d'abord à établir un café chantant, où l'on n'aurait chanté rien que des œuvres patriotiques ; le ministre lui accordant une subvention, cet établissement serait devenu tout à la fois un foyer de propagande et une source de bénéfices. La direction du Pouvoir ayant changé, c'était une chose impossible. Maintenant, il rêvait une grande chapellerie militaire. Les fonds lui manquaient pour commencer.

Il n'était pas plus heureux dans son intérieur domestique. Mme Arnoux se montrait moins douce pour lui, parfois même un peu rude. Marthe se rangeait toujours du côté de son père. Cela augmentait le désaccord, et la maison devenait intolérable. Souvent, il en partait dès le matin, passait sa journée à faire de longues courses, pour s'étourdir, puis dînait dans un cabaret de campagne, en s'abandonnant à ses réflexions.

L'absence prolongée de Frédéric troublait ses habitudes. Donc, il parut, une après-midi, le supplia de venir le voir comme autrefois, et en obtint la promesse. Frédéric n'osait retourner chez Mme Arnoux. Il lui semblait l'avoir trahie. Mais cette conduite était bien lâche. Les excuses manquaient. Il faudrait en finir par là ! et, un soir, il se mit en marche.

Comme la pluie tombait, il venait d'entrer dans le passage Jouffroy quand, sous la lumière des devantures, un gros petit homme en casquette l'aborda. Frédéric n'eut pas de peine à reconnaître Compain, cet orateur dont la motion avait causé tant de rires au club. Il s'appuyait sur le bras d'un individu affublé d'un bonnet rouge de zouave, la lèvre supérieure très longue, le teint jaune comme une orange, la mâchoire couverte d'une barbiche, et qui le contemplait avec de gros yeux, lubrifiés d'admiration.

Compain, sans doute, en était fier, car il dit :

— “Je vous présente ce gaillard-là ! C'est un bottier de mes amis, un patriote ! Prenons-nous quelque chose ?”

Frédéric l'ayant remercié, il tonna immédiatement contre la proposition Rateau, une manœuvre des aristocrates. Pour en finir, il fallait recommencer ! Puis, il s'informa de Regimbart et de quelques autres, aussi fameux, tels que Masselin, Sanson, Lecornu, Maréchal, et un certain Deslauriers, compromis dans l'affaire des carabines interceptées dernièrement à Troyes.

Tout cela était nouveau pour Frédéric. Compain n'en savait pas davantage. Il le quitta, en disant :

— “A bientôt, n'est-ce pas, car vous en êtes ?”

— “De quoi ?”

— “De la tête de veau”

— “Quelle tête de veau ?”

— “Ah ! farceur !” reprit Compain, en lui donnant une tape sur le ventre.

Et les deux terroristes s'enfoncèrent dans un café.

Dix minutes après, Frédéric ne songeait plus à Deslauriers. Il était sur le trottoir de la rue Paradis, devant une maison ; et il regardait au second étage, derrière des rideaux, la lueur d'une lampe.

Enfin, il monta l'escalier.

— “Arnoux y est-il ?”

La femme de chambre répondit :

— “Non ! mais entrez tout de même.”

Et, ouvrant brusquement une porte :

— “Madame, c'est M. Moreau !”

Elle se leva plus pâle que sa collerette. Elle tremblait.

— “Qui me vaut l'honneur... d'une visite... aussi imprévue ?”

— " Rien ! Le plaisir de revoir d'anciens amis Et, tout en s'asseyant :

— "Comment va ce bon Arnoux ?"

— "Parfaitement ! Il est sorti."

— "Ah ! je comprends ! toujours ses vieilles habitudes du soir ; un peu de distraction !"

— "Pourquoi pas ? Après une journée de calculs, la tête a besoin de se reposer !"

Elle vanta même son mari, comme travailleur. Cet é loge irritait Frédéric ; et, désignant sur ses genoux un morceau de drap noir, avec des soutaches bleues :

— "Qu'est-ce que vous faites là ?"

— "Une veste que j'arrange pour ma fille."

— "A propos, je ne l'aperçois pas, où est-elle donc ?"

— "Dans une pension", reprit Mme Arnoux.

Des larmes lui vinrent aux yeux — , elle les retenait, en poussant son aiguille rapidement. Il avait pris par contenance un numéro de l'Illustration, sur la table, près d'elle.

— "Ces caricatures de Cham sont très drôles, n'est-ce pas ?"

— "Oui."

Puis ils retombèrent dans leur silence.

Une rafale ébranla tout à coup les carreaux.

— "Quel temps !" dit Frédéric.

— "En effet ; c'est bien aimable d'être venu par cette horrible pluie !"

— "Oh ! moi, je m'en moque ! Je ne suis pas comme ceux qu'elle empêche, sans doute, d'aller à leurs rendez-vous !"

— "Quels rendez-vous ?" demanda-t-elle naïvement.

— "Vous ne vous rappelez pas ?"

Un frisson la saisit, et elle baissa la tête.

Il lui posa doucement la main sur le bras.

— "Je vous assure que vous m'avez fait bien souffrir !"

Elle reprit, avec une sorte de lamentation dans la voix :

— "Mais j'avais peur pour mon enfant !"

Elle lui conta la maladie du petit Eugène et toutes les angoisses de cette journée.

— "Merci ! merci ! Je ne doute plus ! je vous aime comme toujours !”

— “Eh non ! ce n’est pas vrai !”

— “Pourquoi ?”

Elle le regarda froidement.

— “Vous oubliez l’autre ! Celle que vous promenez aux courses !

La femme dont vous avez le portrait, votre maîtresse !”

— “Eh bien, oui !” s’écria Frédéric, “Je ne nie rien Je suis un misérable ! écoutez-moi !” S’il l’avait eue, c’était par désespoir, comme on se suicide. Du reste, il l’avait rendue fort malheureuse, pour se venger sur elle de sa propre honte. “Quel supplice ! Vous ne comprenez pas ?”

Mme Arnoux tourna son beau visage, en lui tendant la main ; et ils fermèrent les yeux, absorbés dans une ivresse qui était comme un bercement doux et infini. Puis ils restèrent à se contempler, face à face, l’un près de l’autre.

— “Est-ce que vous pouviez croire que je ne vous aimais plus ?”

Elle répondit d’une voix basse, pleine de caresses :

— “ Non ! En dépit de tout, je sentais au fond de mon cœur que cela était impossible et qu’un jour l’obstacle entre nous deux s’évanouirait !

— “Moi aussi ! et j’avais des besoins de vous revoir, à en mourir !”

— “Une fois”, reprit-elle, “dans le Palais-Royal, j’ai suis passé à côté de vous !”

— “Vraiment ?”

Et il lui dit le bonheur qu’il avait eu en la retrouvant chez les Dambreuse.

— “Mais comme je vous détestais le soir, en sortant de là !”

— “Pauvre garçon !”

— “Ma vie est si triste.”

— “Et la mienne !... S’il n’y avait que les chagrins, les inquiétudes, les humiliations, tout ce que j’endure comme épouse et comme mère, puisqu’on doit mourir, je ne me plaindrais pas ; ce qu’il y a d’affreux, c’est ma solitude, sans personne...”

— “Mais je suis là, moi !”

— “Oh ! oui !”

Un sanglot de tendresse l’avait soulevée. Ses bras s’écartèrent ; et ils s’étreignirent debout, dans un long baiser.

Un craquement se fit sur le parquet. Une femme était près d'eux, Rosanette. Mme Arnoux l'avait reconnue ; ses yeux, ouverts démesurément, l'examinaient, tout pleins de surprise et d'indignation. Enfin, Rosanette lui dit :

— “Je viens parler à M. Arnoux, pour affaires.”

— “Il n'y est pas, vous le voyez.”

— “Ah ! c'est vrai !” reprit la Maréchale, “votre bonne avait raison ! Mille excuses !”

Et, se tournant vers Frédéric :

— “Te voilà ici, toi ?”

Ce tutoiement, donné devant elle, fit rougir Mme Arnoux, comme un soufflet en plein visage.

— “Il n'y est pas, je vous le répète !”

Alors, la Maréchale, qui regardait çà et là, dit tranquillement :

— “Rentrons-nous ? J'ai un fiacre, en bas.”

Il faisait semblant de ne pas entendre.

— “Allons, viens !”

— “Ah ! oui ! c'est une occasion ! Partez ! partez !” dit Mme Arnoux.

Ils sortirent. Elle se pencha sur la rampe pour les voir encore ; et un rire aigu, déchirant, tomba sur eux, du haut de l'escalier. Frédéric poussa Rosanette dans le fiacre, se mit en face d'elle, et, pendant toute la route, ne prononça pas un mot.

L'infamie dont le rejaillissement l'outrageait, c'était lui-même qui en était cause. Il éprouvait tout à la fois la honte d'une humiliation écrasante et le regret de sa félicité ; quand il allait enfin la saisir, elle était devenue irrévocablement impossible ! — et par la faute de celle-là, de cette fille, de cette catin. Il aurait voulu l'étrangler ; il étouffait. Rentrés chez eux, il jeta son chapeau sur un meuble, arracha sa cravate.

— “Ah ! tu viens de faire quelque chose de propre, avoue-le !”

Elle se campa fièrement devant lui.

— “Eh bien, après ? Où est le mal ?”

— “Comment ! Tu m'espionnes ?”

— “Est-ce ma faute ? Pourquoi vas-tu te divertir chez les femmes honnêtes ?”

— “N'importe ! Je ne veux pas que tu les insultes.”

— “En quoi l’ai-je insultée ?”

Il n’eut rien à répondre ; et, d’un accent plus haineux :

— “Mais, l’autre fois, au Champ-de-Mars...”

— “Ah ! tu nous ennues avec tes anciennes !”

— “Misérable !”

Il leva le poing.

— “Ne me tue pas ! Je suis enceinte !”

Frédéric se recula.

— “Tu mens !”

— “Mais regarde-moi !”

Elle prit un flambeau, et, montrant son visage :

— “T’y connais-tu ?”

De petites taches jaunes maculaient sa peau, qui était singulièrement bouffie. Frédéric ne nia pas l’évidence. Il alla ouvrir la fenêtre, fit quelques pas de long en large, puis s’affaissa dans un fauteuil.

Cet événement était une calamité, qui d’abord ajournait leur rupture, — et puis bouleversait tous ses projets. L’idée d’être père, d’ailleurs, lui paraissait grotesque, inadmissible. Mais pourquoi ? Si, au lieu de la Maréchale... ? Et sa rêverie devint tellement profonde, qu’il eut une sorte d’hallucination. Il voyait là, sur le tapis, devant la cheminée, une petite fille. Elle ressemblait à Mme Arnoux et à lui-même, un peu ; — brune et blanche, avec des yeux noirs, de très grands sourcils, un ruban rose dans ses cheveux bouclants ! (Oh ! comme il l’aurait aimée ! ) Et il lui semblait entendre sa voix : “Papa ! papa !”

Rosanette, qui venait de se déshabiller, s’approcha de lui, aperçut une larme à ses paupières, et le baisa sur le front, gravement. Il se leva, en disant :

— “ Parbleu ! On ne le tuera pas, ce marmot !

Alors, elle bavarda beaucoup. Ce serait un garçon, bien sûr ! On l’appellerait Frédéric. Il fallait commencer son trousseau ; — et, en la voyant si heureuse, une pitié le prit. Comme il ne ressentait, maintenant, aucune colère, il voulut savoir la raison de sa démarche, tout à l’heure.

C’est que Mlle Vatnaz lui avait envoyé, ce jour-là même, un billet protesté depuis longtemps ; et elle avait couru chez Arnoux pour avoir de l'argent.

— “Je t'en aurais donné !” dit Frédéric.

— “C'était plus simple de prendre là-bas ce qui m'appartient, et de rendre à l'autre ses mille francs.” — “Est-ce au moins tout ce que tu lui dois ?” Elle répondit :

— “Certainement !”

Le lendemain, à neuf heures du soir (heure indiquée par le portier), Frédéric se rendit chez Mlle Vatnaz.

Il se cogna dans l'antichambre contre les meubles entassés. Mais un bruit de voix et de musique le guidait. Il ouvrit une porte et tomba au milieu d'un raout. Debout, devant le piano que touchait une demoiselle en lunettes, Delmar, sérieux comme un pontife, déclamait une poésie humanitaire sur la prostitution et sa voix caverneuse roulait, soutenue par les accords plaqués. Un rang de femmes occupait la muraille, vêtues généralement de couleurs sombres, sans col de chemises ni manchettes. Cinq ou six hommes, tous des penseurs, étaient çà et là, sur des chaises. Il y avait dans un fauteuil un ancien fabuliste, une ruine ; — et l'odeur âcre de deux lampes se mêlait à l'arôme du chocolat, qui emplissait des bois encombrant la table à jeu.

Mlle Vatnaz, une écharpe orientale autour des reins, se tenait à un coin de la cheminée. Dussardier était à l'autre bout, en face ; il avait l'air un peu embarrassé de sa position. D'ailleurs, ce milieu artistique l'intimidait.

La Vatnaz en avait-elle fini avec Delmar ? non peut-être.

Cependant, elle semblait jalouse du brave commis ; et, Frédéric ayant réclamé d'elle un mot d'entretien, elle lui fit signe de passer avec eux dans sa chambre. Quand les mille francs furent alignés, elle demanda, en plus, les intérêts.

— “Pas la peine !” dit Dussardier.

— “Tais-toi donc !”

Cette lâcheté d'un homme si courageux fut agréable à Frédéric comme une justification de la sienne. Il rapporta le billet, et ne reparla jamais de l'esclandre chez Mme Arnoux. Mais, dès lors, toutes les déficiences de la Maréchale lui apparurent.

Elle avait un mauvais goût irrémédiable, une incompréhensible paresse, une ignorance de sauvage, jusqu'à considérer comme très célèbre le docteur Desrois ; et elle était fière de le recevoir, lui et son épouse, parce que c'étaient — des gens mariés “. Elle régenta d'un air pédantesque sur les choses de la vie Mlle Irma, pauvre petite créature douée d'une petite voix, ayant pour protecteur un monsieur” très bien “, ex-employé dans les douanes, et fort aux tours de cartes ; Rosanette l'appelait” mon gros loulou “. Frédéric ne pouvait souffrir, non plus, la répétition de ses mots bêtes tels que” Du flan ! A Chaillot. On n'a jamais pu savoir, etc. ”-, et elle s'obstinait à épousseter le matin ses bibelots avec une paire de vieux gants blancs ! Il était révolté surtout par ses façons envers sa bonne, — dont les gages étaient sans cesse arriérés, et qui même lui prêtait de l'argent. Les jours qu'elles réglaient leurs comptes, elles se chamaillaient comme deux poissardes, puis on se réconciliait en s'embrassant. Le tête-à-tête devenait triste. Ce fut un soulagement pour lui, quand les soirées de Mme Dambreuse recommencèrent.

Celle-là, au moins, l'amusait ! Elle savait les intrigues du monde, les mutations d'ambassadeurs, le personnel des couturières ; et, s'il lui échappait des lieux communs, c'était dans une formule tellement convenue, que sa phrase pouvait passer pour une déférence ou pour une ironie. Il fallait la voir au milieu de vingt personnes qui causaient, n'en oubliant aucune, amenant les réponses qu'elle voulait, évitant les périlleuses ! Des choses très simples, racontées par elle, semblaient des confidences ; le moindre de ses sourires faisait rêver ; son charme enfin, comme l'exquise odeur qu'elle portait ordinairement, était complexe et indéfinissable. Frédéric, dans sa compagnie, éprouvait chaque fois le plaisir d'une découverte ; et cependant, il la retrouvait toujours avec sa même sérénité, pareille au miroitement des eaux limpides. Mais pourquoi ses manières envers sa nièce avaient-elles tant de froideur ? Elle lui lançait même, par moments, de singuliers coups d'oeil.

Dès qu'il fut question de mariage, elle avait objecté à M. Dambreuse la santé de “la chère enfant”, et l'avait emmenée tout de suite aux bains de Balaruc. A son retour, des prétextes nouveaux avaient surgi : le jeune homme manquait de position, ce grand amour ne paraissait pas sérieux, on ne risquait rien d'attendre. Martinon avait répondu qu'il attendrait. Sa conduite fut sublime. Il prôna Frédéric. Il fit plus : il le renseigna sur les moyens de plaire à Mme Dambreuse, laissant même entrevoir qu'il connaissait, par la nièce, les sentiments de la tante.

Quant à M. Dambreuse, loin de montrer de la jalousie, il entourait d'égards son jeune ami, le consultait sur différentes choses, s'inquiétait même de son avenir, si bien qu'un jour, comme on parlait du père Roque, il lui dit à l'oreille, d'un air finot :

“Vous avez bien fait.”

Et Cécile, miss John, les domestiques, le portier, pas un qui ne fût charmant pour lui, dans cette maison. Il y venait tous les soirs, abandonnant Rosanette. Sa maternité future la rendait plus sérieuse, même un peu triste, comme si des inquiétudes l'eussent tourmentée. A toutes les questions, elle répondait :

— “Tu te trompes ! Je me porte bien !”

C'étaient cinq billets qu'elle avait souscrits autrefois et, n'osant le dire à Frédéric après le paiement du premier, elle était retournée chez Arnoux, lequel lui avait promis, par écrit, le tiers de ses bénéfices dans l'éclairage au gaz des villes du Languedoc (une entreprise merveilleuse !), en lui recommandant de ne pas se servir de cette lettre avant l'assemblée des actionnaires ; l'assemblée était remise de semaine en semaine.

Cependant, la Maréchale avait besoin d'argent. Elle serait morte plutôt que d'en demander à Frédéric. Elle n'en voulait pas de lui. Cela aurait gâté leur amour. Il subvenait bien aux frais du ménage ; mais une petite voiture louée au mois, et d'autres sacrifices indispensables depuis qu'il fréquentait les Dambreuse, l'empêchaient d'en faire plus pour sa maîtresse. Deux ou trois fois, en rentrant à des heures inaccoutumées, il crut voir des dos masculins disparaître entre les portes ; et elle sortait souvent sans vouloir dire où elle allait. Frédéric n'essaya pas de creuser les choses. Un de ces jours, il prendrait un parti définitif. Il rêvait une autre vie, qui serait plus amusante et plus noble. Un pareil idéal le rendait indulgent pour l'hôtel Dambreuse.

C'était une succursale intime de la rue de Poitiers. Il y rencontra le grand M. A., l'illustre B., le profond C., l'éloquent Z., l'immense Y., les vieux ténors du centre gauche, les paladins de la droite, les burgraves du juste-milieu, les éternels bonshommes de la comédie. Il fut stupéfait par leur exécration langage, leurs petitesesses, leurs rancunes, leur mauvaise foi, — tous ces gens qui avaient voté la Constitution s'évertuant à la démolir ; et ils s'agitaient beaucoup, lançaient des manifestes, des pamphlets, des biographies ; celle de Fumichon par Hussonnet fut un chef-d'œuvre. Nonancourt s'occupait de la propagande dans les campagnes, M. de Grémonville travaillait le clergé, Martinon ralliait de jeunes bourgeois. Chacun, selon ses moyens, s'employa, jusqu'à Cisy lui-même. Pensant maintenant aux choses sérieuses, tout le long de la journée il faisait des courses en cabriolet, pour le parti.

M. Dambreuse, tel qu'un baromètre, en exprimait constamment la dernière variation. On ne parlait pas de Lamartine sans qu'il citât ce mot d'un homme du peuple : "Assez de lyre !" Cavaignac n'était plus, à ses yeux, qu'un traître. Le Président, qu'il avait admiré pendant trois mois, commençait à déchoir dans son estime (ne lui trouvant pas "l'énergie nécessaire" ) — , et, comme il lui fallait toujours un sauveur, sa reconnaissance, depuis l'affaire du Conservatoire, appartenait à Changarnier : "Dieu merci, Changarnier... Espérons que Changarnier... Oh ! rien à craindre tant que Changarnier..."

On exaltait avant tout M. Thiers pour son volume contre le Socialisme, où il s'était montré aussi penseur qu'écrivain. On riait énormément de Pierre Leroux, qui citait à la Chambre des passages des philosophes. On faisait des plaisanteries sur la queue phalanstériennel. On allait applaudir la Foire aux Idées ; et on comparait les auteurs à Aristophane. Frédéric y alla, comme les autres.

Le verbiage politique et la bonne chère engourdissaient sa moralité. Si médiocres que lui parussent ces personnages, il était fier de les connaître et intérieurement souhaitait la considération bourgeoise. Une maîtresse comme Mme Dambreuse le poserait.

Il se mit à faire tout ce qu'il faut.

Il se trouvait sur son passage à la promenade, ne manquait pas d'aller la saluer dans sa loge au théâtre ; et, sachant les heures où elle se rendait à l'église, il se campait derrière un pilier dans une pose mélancolique. Pour des indications de curiosités, des renseignements sur un concert, des emprunts de livres ou de revues, c'était un échange continuels de petits billets. Outre sa visite du soir, il lui en faisait quelquefois une autre vers la fin du jour ; et il avait une gradation de joies à passer successivement par la grande porte, par la cour. par l'antichambre par les deux salons ; enfin, il arrivait dans son boudoir, discret comme un tombeau, tiède comme une alcôve, où l'on se heurtait aux capitons des meubles parmi toutes sortes d'objets çà et là : chiffonnières, écrans, coupes et plateaux en laque, en écaille, en ivoire, en malachite, bagatelles dispendieuses, souvent renouvelées. Il y en avait de simples : trois galets d'Etretat pour servir de presse-papier, un bonnet de Frisonne suspendu à un paravent chinois ; toutes ces choses s'harmoniaient cependant ; on était même saisi par la noblesse de l'ensemble, ce qui tenait peut-être à la hauteur du plafond, à l'opulence des portières et aux longues crépines de soie, flottant sur les bâtons dorés des tabourets.

Elle était presque toujours sur une petite causeuse, près de la jardinière garnissant l'embrasure de la fenêtre. Assis au bord d'un gros pouf à roulettes, il lui adressait les compliments les plus justes possible ; et elle le regardait la tête un peu de côté, la bouche souriante.

Il lui lisait des pages de poésie, en y mettant toute son âme, afin de l'émouvoir, et pour se faire admirer. Elle l'arrêtait par une remarque dénigrante ou une observation pratique ; et leur causerie retombait sans cesse dans l'éternelle question de l'Amour ! Ils se demandaient ce qui l'occasionnait, si les femmes le sentaient mieux que les hommes, quelles étaient là-dessus leurs différences. Frédéric tâchait d'émettre son opinion, en évitant à la fois la grossièreté et la fadeur. Cela devenait une espèce de lutte, agréable par moments, fastidieuse en d'autres.

Il n'éprouvait pas à ses côtés ce ravissement de tout son être qui l'emportait vers Mme Arnoux, ni le désordre gai où l'avait mis d'abord Rosanette. Mais il la convoitait comme une chose anormale et difficile, parce qu'elle était noble, parce qu'elle était riche, parce qu'elle était dévote, — se figurant qu'elle avait des délicatesses de sentiment, rares comme ses dentelles, avec des amulettes sur la peau et des pudeurs dans la dépravation.

Il se servit du vieil amour. Il lui conta, comme inspiré par elle, tout ce que Mme Arnoux autrefois lui avait fait ressentir, ses langueurs, ses appréhensions, ses rêves.

Elle recevait cela comme une personne accoutumée à ces choses, sans le repousser formellement ne cédait rien ; et il n'arrivait pas plus à la séduire que Martinon à se marier. Pour en finir avec l'amoureux de sa nièce, elle l'accusa de viser à l'argent, et pria même son mari d'en faire l'épreuve. M. Dambreuse déclara donc au jeune homme que Cécile, étant l'orpheline de parents pauvres, n'avait aucune "espérance" ni dot.

Martinon, ne croyant pas que cela fût vrai, ou trop avancé pour se dédire, ou par un de ces entêtements d'idiot qui sont des actes de génie, répondit que son patrimoine, quinze mille livres de rente, leur suffirait. Ce désintéressement imprévu toucha le banquier. Il lui promit un cautionnement de receveur, en s'engageant à obtenir la place ; et, au mois de mai 1850, Martinon épousa Mlle Cécile. Il n'y eut pas de bal. Les jeunes gens partirent le soir même pour l'Italie. Frédéric, le lendemain, vint faire une visite à Mme Dambreuse. Elle lui parut plus pâle que d'habitude. Elle le contredit avec aigreur sur deux ou trois sujets sans importance. Du reste, tous les hommes étaient des égoïstes.

Il y en avait pourtant de dévoués, quand ce ne serait que lui.

— "Ah bah ! comme les autres !"

Ses paupières étaient rouges — , elle pleurait. Puis, en s'efforçant de sourire :

"Excusez-moi ! J'ai tort ! C'est une idée triste qui m'est venue"

Il n'y comprenait rien.

— "N'importe ! elle est moins forte que je ne croyais", pensa-t-il.

Elle sonna pour avoir un verre d'eau, en but une gorgée, le renvoya, puis se plaignit de ce qu'on la servait horriblement. Afin de l'amuser, il s'offrit comme domestique, se prétendant capable de donner des assiettes, d'épousseter les meubles, d'annoncer le monde, d'être enfin un valet de chambre ou plutôt un chasseur, bien que la mode en fût passée. Il aurait voulu se tenir derrière sa voiture avec un chapeau de plumes de coq.

— "Et comme je vous suivrais à pied majestueusement, en portant sur le bras un petit chien !"

— "Vous êtes gai", dit Mme Dambreuse.

N'était-ce pas une folie, reprit-il, de considérer tout sérieusement ? Il y avait bien assez de misères sans s'en forger. Rien ne méritait la peine d'une douleur. Mme Dambreuse leva les sourcils, d'une manière de vague approbation.

Cette parité de sentiments poussa Frédéric à plus de hardiesse. Ses mécomptes d'autrefois lui faisaient, maintenant, une clairvoyance. Il poursuivit :

— "Nos grands-pères vivaient mieux. Pourquoi ne pas obéir à l'impulsion qui nous pousse ?” L’amour, après tout, n’était pas en soi une chose si importante.

— “Mais c’est immoral, ce que vous dites là !” Elle s’était remise sur la causeuse. Il s’assit au bord, contre ses pieds.

— “Ne voyez-pas que je mens ! Car, pour plaire aux femmes, il faut étaler une insouciance de bouffon ou des fureurs de tragédie ! Elles se moquent de nous quand on leur dit qu’on les aime, simplement ! Moi, je trouve ces hyperboles où elles s’amusent une profanation de l’amour vrai ; si bien qu’on ne sait plus comment l’exprimer, surtout devant celles... qui ont... beaucoup d’esprit.”

Elle le considérait les cils entre-clos. Il baissait la voix, en se penchant vers son visage.

— “Oui ! vous me faites peur ! Je vous offense, peut-être ?... Pardon !... Je ne voulais pas dire tout cela ! Ce n’est pas ma faute ! Vous êtes si belle”

Mme Dambreuse ferma les yeux, et il fut surpris par la facilité de sa victoire. Les grands arbres du jardin qui frissonnaient mollement s’arrêtèrent. Des nuages immobiles rayaient le ciel de longues bandes rouges, et il y eut comme une suspension universelle des choses. Alors, des soirs semblables, avec des silences pareils, revinrent dans son esprit, confusément. Où était-ce ?...

Il se mit à genoux, prit sa main, et lui jura un amour éternel. Puis, comme il partait, elle le rappela d’un signe et lui dit tout bas :

— “Revenez dîner ! Nous serons seuls !”

Il semblait à Frédéric, en descendant l’escalier, qu’il était devenu un autre homme, que la température embaumante des serres chaudes l’entourait, qu’il entrait définitivement dans le monde supérieur des adultères patriciens et des hautes intrigues. Pour y tenir la première place, il suffisait d’une femme comme celle-là. Avidé, sans doute, de pouvoir et d’action, et mariée à un homme médiocre qu’elle avait prodigieusement servi, elle désirait quelqu’un de fort pour le conduire ? Rien d’impossible maintenant ! Il se sentait capable de faire deux cents lieues à cheval, de travailler pendant plusieurs nuits de suite, sans fatigue son cœur débordait d’orgueil.

Sur le trottoir, devant lui, un homme couvert d’un vieux paletot marchait la tête basse, et avec un tel air d’accablement, que Frédéric se retourna, pour le voir. L’autre releva sa figure. C’était Deslauriers. Il hésitait. Frédéric lui sauta au cou.

— “Ah ! mon pauvre vieux ! Comment ! c’est toi !”

Et il l’entraîna vers sa maison, en lui faisant beaucoup de questions à la fois.

L’ex-commissaire de Ledru-Rollin conta, d’abord, les tourments qu’il avait eus. Comme il prêchait la fraternité aux conservateurs et le respect des lois aux socialistes, les uns lui avaient tiré des coups de fusil, les autres apporté une corde pour le pendre. Après juin, on l’avait destitué brutalement. Il s’était jeté dans un complot, celui des armes saisies à Troyes. On l’avait relâché, faute de preuves. Puis le comité d’action l’avait envoyé à Londres, où il s’était flanqué des gifles avec ses frères, au milieu d’un banquet. De retour à Paris...

— “Pourquoi n’es-tu pas venu chez moi ?”

— “Tu étais toujours absent ! Ton suisse avait des allures mystérieuses, je ne savais que penser ; et puis je ne voulais pas paraître en vaincu.”

Il avait frappé aux portes de la Démocratie, s’offrant à la servir de sa plume, de sa parole, de ses démarches ; partout on l’avait repoussé ; on se méfiait de lui — , et il avait vendu sa montre, sa bibliothèque, son linge.

— “Mieux vaudrait crever sur les pontons de Belle-Isle, avec Sénecal !”

Frédéric, qui arrangeait alors sa cravate, n’eut pas l’air très ému par cette nouvelle.

— “Ah ! il est déporté, ce bon Sénecal ?” Deslauriers répliqua, en parcourant les murailles d’un air envieux :

— “Tout le monde n’a pas ta chance !”

— “Excuse-moi”, dit Frédéric, sans remarquer l’allusion, “mais je dîne en ville. On va le faire à manger ; commande ce que tu voudras ! Prends même mon lit.” Devant une cordialité si complète, l’amertume de Deslauriers disparut.

— “Ton lit ? Mais... ça te gênerait !”

— “Eh non ! J’en ai d’autres !”

— “Ah ! très bien”, reprit l’avocat, en riant. “Où dînes-tu donc ?”

— “Chez Mme Dambreuse.”

— “Est-ce que... par hasard... ce serait... ?”

— “Tu es trop curieux”, dit Frédéric avec un sourire, qui confirmait cette supposition.

Puis, ayant regardé la pendule, il se rassit.

— “C’est comme ça ! et il ne faut pas désespérer, vieux défenseur du peuple !”

— “Miséricorde ! que d’autres s’en mêlent !”

L’avocat détestait les ouvriers, pour en avoir souffert dans sa province, un pays de houille. Chaque puits d’extraction avait nommé un gouvernement provisoire lui intimant des ordres.

— “D’ailleurs, leur conduite a été charmante partout à Lyon, à Lille, au Havre, à Paris ! Car, à l’exemple des fabricants qui voudraient exclure les produits de l’étranger, ces messieurs réclament pour qu’on bannisse les travailleurs anglais, allemands, belges et savoyards ! Quant à leur intelligence, à quoi a servi, sous la Restauration, leur fameux compagnonnage ? En 1830, ils sont entrés dans la garde nationale, sans même avoir le bon sens de la dominer ! Est-ce que, dès le lendemain de 48, les corps de métiers n’ont pas reparu avec des étendards à eux ! Ils demandaient même des représentants du peuple à eux, lesquels n’auraient parlé que pour eux ! Tout comme les députés de la betterave ne s’inquiètent que de la betterave Ah ! j’en ai assez de ces cocos-là, se prosternant tour à tour devant l’échafaud de Robespierre, les bottes de l’Empereur, le parapluie de Louis-Philippe, racaille éternellement dévouée à qui lui jette du pain dans la gueule ! On crie toujours contre la vénalité de Talleyrand et de Mirabeau ; mais le commissionnaire d’en bas vendrait la patrie pour cinquante centimes, si on lui promettait de tarifier sa course à trois francs ! Ah ! quelle faute ! Nous aurions dû mettre le feu aux quatre coins de l’Europe !

Frédéric lui répondit :

— “L’étincelle manquait ! Vous étiez simplement de petits bourgeois, et les meilleurs d’entre vous, des cuistres ! Quant aux ouvriers, ils peuvent se plaindre ; car, si l’on excepte un million soustrait à la liste civile, et que vous leur avez octroyé avec la plus basse flagornerie, vous n’avez rien fait pour eux que des phrases ! Le livret demeure aux mains du patron, et le salarié (même devant la justice) reste l’inférieur de son maître, puisque sa parole n’est pas crue. Enfin, la République me paraît vieille. Qui sait ? Le Progrès, peut-être, n’est réalisable que par une aristocratie ou par un homme ? L’initiative vient toujours d'en haut ! Le peuple est mineur, quoi qu'on prétende !”

— “C’est peut-être vrai”, dit Deslauriers.

Selon Frédéric, la grande masse des citoyens n’aspirait qu’au repos (il avait profité à l’hôtel Dambreuse), et toutes les chances étaient pour les conservateurs. Ce parti-là, cependant, manquait d’hommes neufs.

— “Si tu te présentais, je suis sûr...”

Il n’acheva pas. Deslauriers comprit, se passa les deux mains sur le front ; puis, tout à coup :

— “Mais toi ? Rien ne t’empêche ? Pourquoi ne serais-tu pas député ?”

Par suite d’une double élection, il y avait, dans l’Aube, une candidature vacante. M. Dambreuse, réélu à la Législative, appartenait à un autre arrondissement.

— “Veux-tu que je m’en occupe ?”

Il connaissait beaucoup de cabaretiers, d’instituteurs, de médecins, de clercs d’étude et leurs patrons.

— “D’ailleurs, on fait accroire aux paysans tout ce qu’on veut !”

Frédéric sentait se rallumer son ambition. Deslauriers ajouta :

— “Tu devrais bien me trouver une place à Paris.”

— “Oh ! ce ne sera pas difficile, par M. Dambreuse.”

— “Puisque nous parlions de houilles”, reprit l’avocat, “que devient sa grande société ? C’est une occupation de ce genre qu’il me faudrait ! — et je leur serais utile, tout en gardant mon indépendance.”

Frédéric promit de le conduire chez le banquier avant trois jours.

Son repas en tête-à-tête avec Mme Dambreuse fut une chose exquise. Elle souriait en face de lui, de l’autre côté de la table, par-dessus des fleurs dans une corbeille, à la lumière de la lampe suspendue ; et, comme la fenêtre était ouverte, on apercevait des étoiles. Ils causèrent fort peu, se méfiant d’eux-mêmes, sans doute ; mais, dès que les domestiques tournaient le dos, ils s’envoyaient un baiser, du bout des lèvres. Il dit son idée de candidature. Elle l’approuva, s’engageant même à y faire travailler M. Dambreuse.

Le soir, quelques amis se présentèrent pour la féliciter et pour la plaindre ; elle devait être si chagrine de n’avoir plus sa nièce ! C’était fort bien, d’ailleurs, aux jeunes mariés de s’être mis en voyage ; plus tard, les embarras, les enfants surviennent ! Mais l’Italie ne répondait pas à l’idée qu’on s’en faisait. Après cela, ils étaient dans l’âge des illusions ! et puis la lune de miel embellissait tout ! Les deux derniers qui restèrent furent M. de Grémonville et Frédéric. Le diplomate ne voulait pas s'en aller. Enfin, à minuit, il se leva. Mme Dambreuse fit signe à Frédéric de partir avec lui, et le remercia de cette obéissance par une pression de main, plus suave que tout le reste.

La Maréchale poussa un cri de joie en le revoyant. Elle l'attendait depuis cinq heures. Il donna pour excuse une démarche indispensable dans l'intérêt de Deslauriers. Sa figure avait un air de triomphe, une auréole, dont Rosanette fut éblouie.

— “C'est peut-être à cause de ton habit noir qui te va bien ; mais je ne t'ai jamais trouvé si beau ! Comme tu es beau !”

Dans un transport de sa tendresse, elle se jura intérieurement de ne plus appartenir à d'autres, quoiqu'il advînt, quand elle devrait crever de misère !

Ses jolis yeux humides pétillaient d'une passion tellement puissante, que Frédéric l'attira sur ses genoux et il se dit : “Quelle canaille je fais” en s'applaudissant de sa perversité.

CHAPITRE 4

M. Dambreuse. quand Deslauriers se présenta chez lui, songeait à raviver sa grande affaire de houilles. Mais cette fusion de toutes les compagnies en une seule était mal vue ; on criait au monopole, comme s'il ne fallait pas, pour de telles exploitations, d'immenses capitaux !

Deslauriers, qui venait de lire exprès l'ouvrage de Gobet et les articles de M. Chappe dans le Journal des Mines, connaissait la question parfaitement. Il démontra que la loi de 1810 établissait au profit du concessionnaire un droit impermutable. D'ailleurs, on pouvait donner à l'entreprise une couleur démocratique : empêcher les réunions houillères était un attentat contre le principe même d'association.

M. Dambreuse lui confia des notes pour rédiger un mémoire. Quant à la manière dont il payerait son travail, il fit des promesses d'autant meilleures qu'elles n'étaient pas précises.

Deslauriers s'en revint chez Frédéric et lui rapporta la conférence. De plus, il avait vu Mme Dambreuse au bas de l'escalier, comme il sortait.

— “Je t'en fais mes compliments, saprelotte !”

Puis ils causèrent de l'élection. Il y avait quelque chose à inventer.

Trois jours après, Deslauriers reparut avec une feuille d'écriture destinée aux journaux et qui était une lettre familière, où M. Dambreuse approuvait la candidature de leur ami. Soutenue par un conservateur et prônée par un rouge, elle devait réussir. Comment le capitaliste signait-il une pareille élucubration ? L'avocat, sans le moindre embarras, de lui-même, avait été la montrer à Mme Dambreuse, qui, la trouvant fort bien, s'était chargée du reste.

Cette démarche surprit Frédéric. Il l'approuva cependant ; puis, comme Deslauriers s'aboucherait avec M. Roque, il lui conta sa position vis-à-vis de Louise.

— “Dis-leur tout ce que tu voudras, que mes affaires sont troubles ; je les arrangerai ; elle est assez jeune pour attendre !”

Deslauriers partit ; et Frédéric se considéra comme un homme très fort. Il éprouvait, d'ailleurs, un assouvissement, une satisfaction profonde. Sa joie de posséder une femme riche n'était gâtée par aucun contraste ; le sentiment s'harmoniait avec le milieu. Sa vie, maintenant, avait des douceurs partout.

La plus exquise, peut-être, était de contempler Mme Dambreuse, entre plusieurs personnes, dans son salon. La convenance de ses manières le faisait rêver à d'autres attitudes ; pendant qu'elle causait d'un ton froid, il se rappelait ses mots d'amour balbutiés ; tous les respects pour sa vertu le délectaient comme un hommage retournant vers lui ; et il avait parfois des envies de s'écrier : "Mais je la connais mieux que vous ! Elle est à moi !"

Leur liaison ne tarda pas à être une chose convenue, acceptée. Mme Dambreuse, durant tout l'hiver, traîna Frédéric dans le monde.

Il arrivait presque toujours avant elle ; et il la voyait entrer, les bras nus, l'éventail à la main, des perles dans les cheveux. Elle s'arrêtait sur le seuil (le linteau de la porte l'entourait comme un cadre), et elle avait un léger mouvement d'indécision, en clignant les paupières, pour découvrir s'il était là. Elle le ramenait dans sa voiture ; la pluie fouettait les vasistas ; les passants, tels que des ombres, s'agitaient dans la boue ; et, serrés l'un contre l'autre, ils apercevaient tout cela, confusément, avec un dédain tranquille. Sous des prétextes différents, il restait encore une bonne heure dans sa chambre.

C'était par ennui, surtout, que Mme Dambreuse avait cédé. Mais cette dernière épreuve ne devait pas être perdue. Elle voulait un grand amour, et elle se mit à le combler d'adulations et de caresses.

Elle lui envoyait des fleurs ; elle lui fit une chaise en tapisserie ; elle lui donna un porte-cigares, une écritoire, mille petites choses d'un usage quotidien, pour qu'il n'eût pas une action indépendante de son souvenir. Ces prévenances le charmèrent d'abord, et bientôt lui parurent toutes simples.

Elle montait dans un fiacre, le renvoyait à l'entrée d'un passage, sortait par l'autre bout ; puis, se glissant le long des murs, avec un double voile sur le visage, elle atteignait la rue où Frédéric en sentinelle lui prenait le bras, vivement, pour la conduire dans sa maison. Ses deux domestiques se promenaient, le portier faisait des courses ; elle jetait les yeux tout à l'entour ; rien à craindre ! et elle poussait comme un soupir d'exilé qui revoit sa patrie. La chance les enhardit. Leurs rendez-vous se multiplièrent. Un soir même, elle se présenta tout à coup en grande toilette de bal. Ces surprises pouvaient être dangereuses ; il la blâma de son imprudence ; elle lui déplut, du reste. Son corsage ouvert découvrait trop sa poitrine maigre.

Il reconnut alors ce qu'il s'était caché, la désillusion de ses sens. Il n'en feignait pas moins de grandes ardeurs ; mais pour les ressentir, il lui fallait évoquer l'image de Rosanette ou de Mme Arnoux.

Cette atrophie sentimentale lui laissait la tête entièrement libre, et plus que jamais il ambitionnait une haute position dans le monde. Puisqu'il avait un marchepied pareil, c'était bien le moins qu'il s'en servît.

Vers le milieu de janvier, un matin, Sénécals entra dans son cabinet ; et à son exclamation d'étonnement, répondit qu'il était secrétaire de Deslauriers. Il lui apportait même une lettre. Elle contenait de bonnes nouvelles, et le blâmait cependant de sa négligence ; il fallait venir là-bas.

Le futur député dit qu'il se mettrait en route le surlendemain.

Sénécals n'exprima pas d'opinion sur cette candidature. Il parla de sa personne, et des affaires du pays.

Si lamentables qu'elles fussent, elles le réjouissaient ; car on marchait au communisme. D'abord, l'Administration y menait d'elle-même, puisque, chaque jour, il y avait plus de choses régies par le Gouvernement. Quant à la Propriété, la Constitution de 48, malgré ses faiblesses, ne l'avait pas ménagée ; au nom de l'utilité publique, l'Etat pouvait prendre désormais ce qu'il jugeait lui convenir. Sénécals se déclara pour l'Autorité ; et Frédéric aperçut dans ses discours l'exagération de ses propres paroles à Deslauriers. Le républicain tonna même contre l'insuffisance des masses.

— “Robespierre, en défendant le droit du petit nombre, amena Louis XVI devant la Convention nationale, et sauva le peuple. La fin des choses les rend légitimes. La dictature est quelquefois indispensable. Vive la tyrannie, pourvu que le tyran fasse le bien !”

Leur discussion dura longtemps, et, comme il s'en allait, Sénécals avoua (c'était le but de sa visite, peut-être) que Deslauriers s'impatientait beaucoup du silence de M. Dambreuse.

Mais M. Dambreuse était malade. Frédéric le voyait tous les jours, sa qualité d'intime le faisait admettre près de lui.

La révocation du général Changarnier avait ému extrêmement le capitaliste. Le soir même, il fut pris d'une grande chaleur dans la poitrine, avec une oppression à ne pouvoir se tenir couché. Des sangsues amenèrent un soulagement immédiat. La toux sèche disparut, la respiration devint plus calme ; et, huit jours après, il dit en avalant un bouillon :

— "Ah ! ça va mieux ! Mais j'ai manqué faire le grand voyage !"

— " Pas sans moi s'écria Mme Dambreuse, notifiant par ce mot qu'elle n'aurait pu lui survivre.

Au lieu de répondre, il étala sur elle et sur son amant un singulier sourire, où il y avait à la fois de la résignation, de l'indulgence, de l'ironie, et même comme une pointe, un sous-entendu presque gai.

Frédéric voulut partir pour Nogent, Mme Dambreuse s'y opposa ; et il défaisait et refaisait tour à tour ses paquets, selon les alternatives de la maladie.

Tout à coup, M. Dambreuse cracha le sang abondamment. "Les princes de la science", consultés, n'avisèrent à rien de nouveau. Ses jambes enflaient, et la faiblesse augmentait. Il avait témoigné plusieurs fois le désir de voir Cécile, qui était à l'autre bout de la France, avec son mari, nommé receveur depuis un mois. Il ordonna expressément qu'on la fît venir. Mme Dambreuse écrivit trois lettres, et les lui montra.

Sans se fier même à la religieuse, elle ne le quittait pas d'une seconde, ne se couchait plus. Les personnes qui se faisaient inscrire chez le concierge s'informaient d'elle avec admiration ; et les passants étaient saisis de respect devant la quantité de paille qu'il y avait dans la rue, sous les fenêtres.

Le 12 février, à cinq heures, une hémoptysie effrayante se déclara. Le médecin de garde dit le danger. On courut vite chez un prêtre.

Pendant la confession de M. Dambreuse, Madame le regardait de loin, curieusement. Après quoi, le jeune docteur posa un vésicatoire, et attendit.

La lumière des lampes, masquée par des meubles, éclairait la chambre inégalement. Frédéric et Mme Dambreuse, au pied de la couche, observaient le moribond. Dans l'embrasure d'une croisée, le prêtre et le médecin causaient à demi-voix ; la bonne sœur à genoux, marmottait des prières.

Enfin, un râle s'éleva. Les mains se refroidissaient, la face commençait à pâlir. Quelquefois, il tirait tout à coup une aspiration énorme ; elles devinrent de plus en plus rares ; deux ou trois paroles confuses lui échappèrent ; il exhala un petit souffle en même temps qu'il tournait ses yeux, et le tête retomba de côté sur l'oreiller.

Tous, pendant une minute, restèrent immobiles.

Mme Dambreuse s'approcha ; et, sans effort, avec la simplicité du devoir, elle lui ferma les paupières.

Puis elle écarta les deux bras, en se tordant la taille comme dans le spasme d'un désespoir contenu, et sortit de l'appartement, appuyée sur le médecin et la religieuse. Un quart d'heure après, Frédéric monta dans sa chambre.

On y sentait une odeur indéfinissable, émanation des choses délicates qui l'emplissaient. Au milieu du lit, une robe noire s'étalait, tranchant sur le couvre-pied rose.

Mme Dambreuse était au coin de la cheminée, debout. Sans lui supposer de violents regrets, il la croyait un peu triste ; et, d'une voix dolente :

— “Tu souffres ?”

— “Moi ? Non, pas du tout.”

Comme elle se retournait, elle aperçut la robe, l'examina ; puis elle lui dit de ne pas se gêner.

— “Fume si tu veux ! Tu es chez moi”

Et, avec un grand soupir :

— “Ah ! sainte Vierge ! quel débarras” Frédéric fut étonné de l'exclamation. Il reprit en lui baisant la main :

— “On était libre, pourtant !”

Cette allusion à l'aisance de leurs amours parut blesser Mme Dambreuse.

— “Eh ! tu ne sais pas les services que je lui rendais, ni dans quelles angoisses j'ai vécu !”

— “Comment ?”

— “Mais oui ! Etait-ce une sécurité que d'avoir toujours près de soi cette bâtarde, une enfant introduite dans la maison au bout de cinq ans de ménage, et qui, sans moi, bien sûr, l'aurait amené à quelque sottise ?”

Alors, elle expliqua ses affaires. Ils s'étaient mariés sous le régime de la séparation. Son patrimoine était de trois cent mille francs. M.

Dambreuse, par leur contrat, lui avait assuré, en cas de survivance, quinze mille livres de rente avec la propriété de l'hôtel. Mais, peu de temps après, il avait fait un testament où il lui donnait toute sa fortune ; et elle l'évaluait, autant qu'il était possible de le savoir maintenant, à plus de trois millions.

Frédéric ouvrit de grands yeux.

— “Ça en valait la peine, n'est-ce pas ? J'y ai contribué, du reste ! C'était mon bien que je défendais ; Cécile m'aurait dépouillée, injustement.”

— “Pourquoi n'est-elle pas venue voir son père ?” dit Frédéric.

A cette question, Mme Dambreuse le considéra ; puis, d'un ton sec :

— “Je n'en sais rien ! Faute de cœur, sans doute ! Oh ! je la connais ! Aussi elle n'aura pas de moi une obole !” Elle n'était guère gênante, du moins depuis son mariage.

— “Ah ! son mariage !” fit en ricanant Mme Dambreuse.

Et elle s'en voulait d'avoir trop bien traité cette pécure-là, qui était jalouse, intéressée, hypocrite. “Tous les défauts de son père !” Elle le dénigrait de plus en plus. Personne d'une fausseté aussi profonde, impitoyable d'ailleurs, dur comme un caillou, “un mauvais homme, un mauvais homme !”

Il échappe des fautes, même aux plus sages. Mme Dambreuse venait d'en faire une, par ce débordement de haine. Frédéric, en face d'elle, dans une bergère, réfléchissait, scandalisé.

Elle se leva, se mit doucement sur ses genoux.

— “Toi seul es bon ! Il n'y a que toi que j'aime !” En le regardant, son cœur s'amollit, une réaction nerveuse lui amena des larmes aux paupières, et elle murmura :

— “Veux-tu m'épouser !”

Il crut d'abord n'avoir pas compris. Cette richesse l'étourdissait. Elle répéta plus haut :

— “Veux-tu m'épouser !”

Enfin, il dit, en souriant :

— “Tu en doutes ?”

Puis une pudeur le prit et, pour faire au défunt une sorte de réparation, il s'offrit à le veiller lui-même. Mais comme il avait honte de ce pieux sentiment, il ajouta d'un ton dégagé :

— “Ce serait peut-être plus convenable.”

— “Oui, peut-être bien”, dit-elle, “à cause des domestiques !”

On avait tiré le lit complètement hors de l’alcôve. La religieuse était au pied ; et au chevet se tenait un prêtre, un autre, un grand homme maigre, l’air espagnol et fanatique. Sur la table de nuit, couverte d’une serviette blanche, trois flambeaux brûlaient.

Frédéric prit une chaise, et regarda le mort.

Son visage était jaune comme de la paille ; un peu d’écume sanguinolente marquait les coins de sa bouche. Il avait un foulard autour du crâne, un gilet de tricot, et un crucifix d’argent sur la poitrine, entre ses bras croisés.

Elle était finie, cette existence pleine d’agitations ! Combien n’avait-il pas fait de courses dans les bureaux, aligné de chiffres, tripoté d’affaires, entendu de rapports ! Que de boniments, de sourires, de courbettes ! Car il avait acclamé Napoléon, les Cosaques, Louis XVIII, 1830, les ouvriers, tous les régimes, chérissant le Pouvoir d’un tel amour, qu’il aurait payé pour se vendre.

Mais il laissait le domaine de la Fortelle, trois manufactures en Picardie, le bois de Crancé dans l’Yonne, une ferme près d’Orléans, des valeurs mobilières considérables.

Frédéric fit ainsi la récapitulation de sa fortune ; et elle allait, pourtant, lui appartenir ! Il songea d’abord à “ce qu’on dirait”, à un cadeau pour sa mère, à ses futurs attelages, à un vieux cocher de sa famille dont il voulait faire le concierge. La livrée ne serait plus la même, naturellement. Il prendrait le grand salon comme cabinet de travail. Rien n’empêchait, en abattant trois murs, d’avoir, au second étage, une galerie de tableaux. Il y avait moyen, peut-être, d’organiser en bas une salle de bains turcs. Quant au bureau de M. Dambreuse, pièce déplaisante, à quoi pouvait-elle servir ?

Le prêtre qui venait à se moucher, ou la bonne sœur arrangeant le feu, interrompait brutalement ces imaginations. Mais la réalité les confirmait ; le cadavre était toujours là. Ses paupières s’étaient rouvertes ; et les pupilles, bien que noyées dans des ténèbres visqueuses, avaient une expression énigmatique, intolérable. Frédéric croyait y voir comme un jugement porté sur lui ; et il sentait presque un remords, car il n’avait jamais eu à se plaindre de cet homme, qui, au contraire... “Allons donc ! un vieux misérable !” et il le considérait de plus près, pour se raffermir, en lui criant mentalement — “Eh bien, quoi ? Est-ce que je t’ai tué ?” Cependant, le prêtre lisait son bréviaire ; la religieuse, immobile, sommeillait ; les mèches des trois flambeaux s’allongeaient.

On entendit, pendant deux heures, le roulement sourd des charrettes défilant vers les Halles. Les carreaux blanchirent, un fiacre passa, puis une compagnie d’ânesses qui trottaient sur le pavé, et des coups de marteau, des cris de vendeurs ambulants, des éclats de trompette ; tout déjà se confondait dans la grande voix de Paris qui s’éveille.

Frédéric se mit en courses. Il se transporta premièrement à la mairie pour faire la déclaration ; puis, quand le médecin des morts eut donné un certificat, il revint à la mairie dire quel cimetière la famille choisissait, et pour s’entendre avec le bureau des pompes funèbres.

L’employé exhiba un dessin et un programme, l’un indiquant les diverses classes d’enterrement, l’autre le détail complet du décor. Voulait-on un char avec galerie ou un char avec panaches, des tresses aux chevaux, des aigrettes aux valets, des initiales ou un blason, des lampes funèbres, un homme pour porter les honneurs, et combien de voitures ? Frédéric fut large ; Mme Dambreuse tenait à ne rien ménager.

Puis, il se rendit à l’église.

Le vicaire des convois commença par blâmer l’exploitation des pompes funèbres ; ainsi l’officier pour les pièces d’honneur était vraiment inutile ; beaucoup de cierges valait mieux ! On convint d’une messe basse relevée de musique. Frédéric signa ce qui était convenu, avec obligation solidaire de payer tous les frais.

Il alla ensuite à l’Hôtel de Ville pour l’achat du terrain. Une concession de deux mètres en longueur sur un de largeur, coûtait cinq cents francs. Était-ce une concession mi-séculaire ou perpétuelle ?

— “Oh ! perpétuelle !” dit Frédéric.

Il prenait la chose au sérieux, se donnait du mal. Dans la cour de l’hôtel, un marbrier l’attendait pour lui montrer des devis et plans de tombeaux grecs, égyptiens, mauresques ; mais l’architecte de la maison en avait déjà conféré avec Madame ; et, sur la table, dans le vestibule, il y avait toutes sortes de prospectus relatifs au nettoyage des matelas, à la désinfection des chambres, à divers procédés d’embaumement.

Après son dîner, il retourna chez le tailleur pour le deuil des domestiques ; et il dut faire une dernière course, car il avait commandé des gants de castor, et c'étaient des gants de filoselle qui convenaient.

Quand il arriva le lendemain, à dix heures, le grand salon s'emplissait de monde, et presque tous, en s'abordant d'un air mélancolique, disaient :

— “Moi qui l'ai encore vu il y a un mois ! Mon Dieu ! c'est notre sort à tous !”

— “Oui ; mais tâchons que ce soit le plus tard possible !”

Alors, on poussait un petit rire de satisfaction, et même on engageait des dialogues parfaitement étrangers à la circonstance. Enfin, le maître des cérémonies, en habit noir à la française et culotte courte, avec manteau, pleureuses, brette au côté et tricorné sous le bras, articula, en saluant, les mots d'usage :

— “Messieurs, quand il vous fera plaisir.”

On partit.

C'était jour de marché aux fleurs sur la place de la Madeleine. Il faisait un temps clair et doux ; et la brise, qui secouait un peu les baraques de toile, gonflait, par les bords, l'immense drap noir accroché sur le portail. L'écusson de M. Dambreuse, occupant un carré de velours, s'y répétait trois fois. Il était de sable au senestrochère d'or, à poing fermé, ganté d'argent, avec la couronne de comte, et cette devise : Par toutes voies.

Les porteurs montèrent jusqu'au haut de l'escalier le lourd cercueil, et l'on entra.

Les six chapelles, l'hémicycle et les chaises étaient tendus de noir. Le catafalque au bas du chœur formait, avec ses grands cierges, un seul foyer de lumières jaunes. Aux deux angles, sur des candélabres, des flammes d'esprit de vin brûlaient.

Les plus considérables prirent place dans le sanctuaire, les autres dans la nef ; et l'office commença.

A part quelques-uns, l'ignorance religieuse de tous était si profonde, que le maître des cérémonies, de temps à autre, leur faisait signe de se lever, de s'agenouiller, de se rasseoir. L'orgue et deux contrebasses alternaient avec les voix ; dans les intervalles de silence, on entendait le marmottement du prêtre à l'autel ; puis la musique et les chants reprenaient.

Un jour mat tombait des trois coupoles ; mais la porte ouverte envoyait horizontalement comme un fleuve de clarté blanche qui frappait toutes les têtes nues ; et dans l'air, à mi-hauteur du vaisseau, flottait une ombre, pénétrée par le reflet des ors décorant la nervure des pendentifs et le feuillage des chapiteaux.

Frédéric, pour se distraire, écouta le Dies irae ; il considérait les assistants, tâchait de voir les peintures trop élevées qui représentent la vie de Madeleine. Heureusement, Pellerin vint se mettre près de lui, et commença tout de suite, à propos de fresques, une longue dissertation. La cloche tinta. On sortit de l'église.

Le corbillard, orné de draperies pendantes et de hauts plumets, s'achemina vers le Père-Lachaise, tiré par quatre chevaux noirs ayant des tresses dans la crinière, des panaches sur la tête, et qu'enveloppaient jusqu'aux sabots de larges caparaçons brodés d'argent. Leur cocher, en bottes à l'écuyère, portait un chapeau à trois cornes avec un long crêpe retombant. Les cordons étaient tenus par quatre personnages : un questeur de la Chambre des députés, un membre du conseil général de l'Aube, un délégué des houilles, — et Fumichon, comme ami. La calèche du défunt et douze voitures de deuil suivaient. Les conviés, par derrière, emplissaient le milieu du boulevard.

Pour voir tout cela, les passants s'arrêtaient ; des femmes, leur marmot entre les bras, montaient sur des chaises ; et des gens qui prenaient des chopes dans les cafés apparaissaient aux fenêtres, une queue de billard à la main.

La route était longue ; et, — comme dans les repas de cérémonie où l'on est réservé d'abord, puis expansif, la tenue générale se relâcha bientôt. On ne causait que du refus d'allocation fait par la Chambre au Président.

M. Piscatory s'était montré trop acerbe, Montalembert "magnifique, comme d'habitudes", et MM. Chambolle, Pidoux, Creton, enfin toute la commission aurait dû suivre, peut-être, l'avis de MM. Quentin-Bauchard et Dufour.

Ces entretiens continuèrent dans la rue de la Roquette, bordée par des boutiques, où l'on ne voit que des chaînes en verre de couleur et des rondelles noires couvertes de dessins et de lettres d'or, — ce qui les fait ressembler à des grottes pleines de stalactites et à des magasins de faïence. Mais, devant la grille du cimetière, tout le monde, instantanément, se tut.

Les tombes se levaient au milieu des arbres, colonnes brisées, pyramides, temples, dolmens, obélisques, caveaux étrusques à porte de bronze. On apercevait dans quelques-uns des espèces de boudoirs funèbres, avec des fauteuils rustiques et des pliants. Des toiles d'araignée pendaient comme des haillons aux chaînettes des urnes ; et de la poussière couvrait les bouquets à rubans de satin et les crucifix. Partout, entre les balustres, sur les tombeaux, des couronnes d'immortelles et des chandeliers, des vases, des fleurs, des disques noirs rehaussés de lettres d'or, des statuettes de plâtre : petits garçons et petites demoiselles ou petits anges tenus en l'air par un fil de laiton ; plusieurs même ont un toit de zinc sur la tête. D'énormes câbles en verre filé, noir, blanc et azur, descendent du haut des stèles jusqu'au pied des dalles, avec de longs replis, comme des boas. Le soleil, frappant dessus, les faisait scintiller entre les croix de bois noir ; — et le corbillard s'avancait dans les grands chemins, qui sont pavés comme les rues d'une ville. De temps à autre, les essieux claquaient. Des femmes à genoux, la robe traînant dans l'herbe, parlaient doucement aux morts. Des lumignons blanchâtres sortaient de la verdure des ifs. C'étaient des offrandes abandonnées, des débris que l'on brûlait.

La fosse de M. Dambreuse était dans le voisinage de Manuel et de Benjamin Constant. Le terrain dévale, en cet endroit, par une pente abrupte. On a sous les pieds des sommets d'arbres verts ; plus loin, des cheminées de pompes à feu, puis toute la grande ville.

Frédéric put admirer le paysage pendant qu'on prononçait les discours.

Le premier fut au nom de la Chambre des députés, le deuxième au nom du conseil général de l'Aube, le troisième au nom de la Société houillère de Saône-et-Loire, le quatrième au nom de la Société d'agriculture de l'Yonne ; et il y en eut un autre, au nom d'une Société philanthropique. Enfin, on s'en allait, lorsqu'un inconnu se mit à lire un sixième discours, au nom de la Société des antiquaires d'Amiens.

Et tous profitèrent de l'occasion pour tonner contre le Socialisme, dont M. Dambreuse était mort victime. C'était le spectacle de l'anarchie et son dévouement à l'ordre qui avait abrégé ses jours. On exalta ses lumières, sa probité, sa générosité et même son mutisme comme représentant du peuple, car, s'il n'était pas orateur, il possédait en revanche ces qualités solides, mille fois préférables, etc.... avec tous les mots qu'il faut dire : "Fin prématurée, — regrets éternels l'autre patrie, — adieu, ou plutôt non, au revoir !"

La terre, mêlée de cailloux, retomba ; et il ne devait plus en être question dans le monde.

On en parla encore un peu en descendant le cimetière et on ne se gênait pas pour l'apprécier. Hussonnet, qui devait rendre compte de l'enterrement dans les journaux, reprit même, en blague, tous les discours ; — car enfin le bonhomme Dambreuse avait été un des potdevinistes les plus distingués du dernier règne. Puis les voitures de deuil reconduisirent les bourgeois à leurs affaires. La cérémonie n'avait pas duré trop longtemps ; on s'en félicitait.

Frédéric, fatigué, rentra chez lui.

Quand il se présenta le lendemain à l'hôtel Dambreuse, on l'avertit que Madame travaillait en bas, dans le bureau. Les cartons, les tiroirs étaient ouverts pêle-mêle, les livres de comptes jetés de droite et de gauche ; un rouleau de paperasses ayant pour titre : "Recouvrements désespérés", traînait par terre ; il manqua tomber dessus et le ramassa. Mme Dambreuse disparaissait ensevelie dans le grand fauteuil.

— "Eh bien ? Où êtes-vous donc ? qu'y a-t-il" Elle se leva d'un bond.

— "Ce qu'il y a ? Je suis ruinée, ruinée ! entends-tu ?" M. Adolphe Langlois, le notaire, l'avait fait venir en son étude, et lui avait communiqué un testament, écrit par son mari, avant leur mariage. Il léguait tout à Cécile ; et l'autre testament était perdu. Frédéric devint très pâle. Sans doute elle avait mal cherché ?

— "Mais regarde donc !" dit Mme Dambreuse, en lui montrant l'appartement.

Les deux coffres-forts bâillaient, défoncés à coups de merlin ; et elle avait retourné le pupitre, fouillé les placards, secoué les paillassons, quand tout à coup, poussant un cri aigu, elle se précipita dans un angle où elle venait d'apercevoir une petite boîte à serrure de cuivre ; elle l'ouvrit, rien !

— "Ah ! le misérable ! Moi qui l'ai soigné avec tant de dévouement !"

Puis elle éclata en sanglots.

— “Il est peut-être ailleurs ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Eh non ! Il était là dans ce coffre-fort. Je l’ai vu dernièrement. Il est brûlé j’en suis certaine !”

Un jour, au commencement de sa maladie, M. Dambreuse était descendu pour donner des signatures.

— “C’est alors qu’il aura fait le coup !”

Et elle retomba sur une chaise, anéantie. Une mère en deuil n’est pas plus lamentable près d’un berceau vide que ne l’était Mme Dambreuse devant les coffres-forts béants. Enfin sa douleur — malgré la bassesse du motif — semblait tellement profonde, qu’il tâcha de la consoler en lui disant qu’après tout, elle n’était pas réduite à la misère.

— “C’est la misère, puisque je ne peux pas t’offrir une grande fortune !”

Elle n’avait plus que trente mille livres de rente, sans compter l’hôtel, qui en valait de dix-huit à vingt, peut-être.

Bien que ce fût de l’opulence pour Frédéric, il n’en ressentait pas moins une déception. Adieu ses rêves, et toute la grande vie qu’il aurait menée ! L’honneur le forçait à épouser Mme Dambreuse. Il réfléchit une minute ; puis, d’un air tendre :

— “J’aurai toujours ta personne !”

Elle se jeta dans ses bras ; et il la serra contre sa poitrine, avec un attendrissement où il y avait un peu d’admiration pour lui-même. Mme Dambreuse, dont les larmes ne coulaient plus, releva sa figure, toute rayonnante de bonheur, et, lui prenant la main :

— “Ah ! je n’ai jamais douté de toi ! J’y comptais !”

Cette certitude anticipée de ce qu’il regardait comme une belle action déplut au jeune homme.

Puis elle l’emmena dans sa chambre, et ils firent des projets. Frédéric devait songer maintenant à se pousser. Elle lui donna même sur sa candidature d’admirables conseils.

Le premier point était de savoir deux ou trois phrases d’économie politique. Il fallait prendre une spécialité, comme les haras par exemple, écrire plusieurs mémoires sur une question d’intérêt local, avoir toujours à sa disposition des bureaux de poste ou de tabac, rendre une foule de petits services. M. Dambreuse s’était montré là-dessus un vrai modèle. Ainsi, une fois à la campagne, il avait fait arrêter son char à bancs, plein d'amis, devant l'échoppe d'un savetier, avait pris pour ses hôtes douze paires de chaussures, et pour lui des bottes épouvantables — qu'il eut même l'héroïsme de porter durant quinze jours. Cette anecdote les rendit gais. Elle en conta d'autres, et avec un revif de grâce, de jeunesse et d'esprit.

Elle approuva son idée d'un voyage immédiat à Nogent. Leurs adieux furent tendres ; puis, sur le seuil, elle murmura encore une fois :

— “Tu m'aimes, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Eternellement !” répondit-il.

Un commissionnaire l'attendait chez lui avec un mot au crayon, le prévenant que Rosanette allait accoucher. Il avait eu tant d'occupation depuis quelques jours, qu'il n'y pensait plus. Elle s'était mise dans un établissement spécial, à Chaillot.

Frédéric prit un fiacre et partit.

Au coin de la rue de Marbeuf, il lut sur une planche en grosses lettres : — “Maison de santé et d'accouchement tenue par Mme Alessandri, sage-femme de première classe, ex-élève de la Maternité, auteur de divers ouvrages, etc.” Puis, au milieu de la rue, sur la porte, une petite porte bâtarde, l'enseigne répétait (sans le mot accouchement) : “Maison de santé de Mme Alessandri”, avec tous ses titres.

Frédéric donna un coup de marteau.

Une femme de chambre, à tournure de soubrette, l'introduisit dans le salon, orné d'une table en acajou, de fauteuils en velours grenat, et d'une pendule sous globe.

Presque aussitôt, Madame parut. C'était une grande brune de quarante ans, la taille mince, de beaux yeux, l'usage du monde. Elle apprit à Frédéric l'heureuse délivrance de la mère, et le fit monter dans sa chambre.

Rosanette se mit à sourire ineffablement, et, comme submergée sous les flots d'amour qui l'étouffaient, elle dit d'une voix basse :

— “Un garçon, là, là !” en désignant près de son lit une barcelonnette.

Il écarta les rideaux, et aperçut, au milieu des linges, quelque chose d'un rouge jaunâtre, extrêmement ridé, qui sentait mauvais et vagissait.

— “Embrasse-le !”

Il répondit, pour cacher sa répugnance :

— “Mais j’ai peur de lui faire mal ?”

— “Non ! non !”

Alors, il baisa, du bout des lèvres, son enfant.

— “Comme il te ressemble !”

Et, de ses deux bras faibles, elle se suspendit à son cou, avec une effusion de sentiment qu’il n’avait jamais vue.

Le souvenir de Mme Dambreuse lui revint. Il se reprocha comme une monstruosité de trahir ce pauvre être, qui aimait et souffrait dans toute la franchise de sa nature. Pendant plusieurs jours, il lui tint compagnie jusqu’au soir.

Elle se trouvait heureuse dans cette maison discrète les volets de la façade restaient même constamment fermés ; sa chambre tendue en perse claire, donnait sur un grand jardin ; Mme Alessandri, dont le seul défaut était de citer comme intimes les médecins illustres, l’entourait d’attentions ; ses compagnes, presque toutes des demoiselles de la province, s’ennuyaient beaucoup, n’ayant personne qui vînt les voir ; Rosanette s’aperçut qu’on l’enviait, et le dit à Frédéric avec fierté. Il fallait parler bas, cependant ; les cloisons étaient minces et tout le monde se tenait aux écoutes, malgré le bruit continu des pianos.

Il allait enfin partir pour Nogent, quand il reçut une lettre de Deslauriers.

Deux candidats nouveaux se présentaient, l’un conservateur, l’autre rouge ; un troisième, quel qu’il fût, n’avait pas de chances. C’était la faute de Frédéric ; il avait laissé passer le bon moment, il aurait dû venir plus tôt, se remuer. “On ne t’a même pas vu aux comices agricoles ! — L’avocat le blâmait de n’avoir aucune attache dans les journaux.” Ah ! si tu avais suivi autrefois mes conseils ! Si nous avions une feuille publique à nous ! ” Il insistait là-dessus. Du reste, beaucoup de personnes qui auraient voté en sa faveur, par considération pour M. Dambreuse, l’abandonneraient maintenant. Deslauriers était de ceux-là. N’ayant plus rien à attendre du capitaliste, il lâchait son protégé.

Frédéric porta sa lettre à Mme Dambreuse.

— “Tu n’as donc pas été à Nogent ?” dit-elle.

— “Pourquoi ?”

— “C’est que j’ai vu Deslauriers il y a trois jours.” Sachant la mort de son mari, l’avocat était venu rapporter des notes sur les houilles et lui offrir ses services comme homme d'affaires. Cela parut étrange à Frédéric ; et que faisait son ami, là-bas ?

Mme Dambreuse voulut savoir l'emploi de son temps depuis leur séparation.

— "J'ai été malade", répondit-il.

— "Tu aurais dû me prévenir, au moins."

— "Oh ! cela n'en valait pas la peine" ; d'ailleurs, il avait eu une foule de dérangements, des rendez-vous, des visites.

Il mena dès lors une existence double, couchant religieusement chez la Maréchale et passant l'après-midi chez Mme Dambreuse, si bien qu'il lui restait à peine, au milieu de la journée, une heure de liberté.

L'enfant était à la campagne, à Andilly. On allait le voir toutes les semaines.

La maison de la nourrice se trouvait sur la hauteur du village, au fond d'une petite cour, sombre comme un puits, avec de la paille par terre, des poules çà et là, une charrette à légumes sous le hangar. Rosanette commençait par baiser frénétiquement son poupon ; et, prise d'une sorte de délire, allait et venait, essayait de traire la chèvre, mangeait du gros pain, aspirait l'odeur du fumier, voulait en mettre un peu dans son mouchoir.

Puis ils faisaient de grandes promenades ; elle entraînait chez les pépiniéristes, arrachait les branches de lilas qui pendaient en dehors des murs, criait : "Hue, bourriquet !" aux ânes traînant une carriole, s'arrêtait à contempler, par la grille, l'intérieur des beaux jardins ; ou bien la nourrice prenait l'enfant, on le posait à l'ombre sous un noyer ; et les deux femmes débitaient, pendant des heures, d'assommantes niaiseries.

Frédéric, près d'elles, contemplait les carrés de vignes sur les pentes du terrain, avec la touffe d'un arbre de place en place, les sentiers poudreux pareils à des rubans grisâtres, les maisons étalant dans la verdure des taches blanches et rouges ; et, quelquefois, la fumée d'une locomotive allongeait horizontalement, au pied des collines couvertes de feuillages, comme une gigantesque plume d'autruche dont le bout léger s'envolait.

Puis ses yeux retombaient sur son fils. Il se le figurait jeune homme, il en ferait son compagnon ; mais ce serait peut-être un sot, un malheureux à coup sûr. L'illégalité de sa naissance l'opprimerait toujours ; mieux aurait valu pour lui ne pas naître, et Frédéric murmurait : "Pauvre enfant !" le cœur gonflé d'une incompréhensible tristesse.

Souvent, ils manquaient le dernier départ. Alors, Mme Dambreuse le grondait de son inexactitude. Il lui faisait une histoire.

Il fallait en inventer aussi pour Rosanette. Elle ne comprenait pas à quoi il employait toutes ses soirées ; et, quand on envoyait chez lui, il n'y était jamais ! Un jour, comme il s'y trouvait, elles apparurent presque à la fois. Il fit sortir la Maréchale et cacha Mme Dambreuse, en disant que sa mère allait arriver.

Bientôt ces mensonges le divertirent ; il répétait à l'une le serment qu'il venait de faire à l'autre, leur envoyait deux bouquets semblables, leur écrivait en même temps, puis établissait entre elles des comparaisons ; — il y en avait une troisième toujours présente à sa pensée. L'impossibilité de l'avoir le justifiait de ses perfidies, qui avivaient le plaisir, en y mettant de l'alternance ; et plus il avait trompé n'importe laquelle des deux, plus elle l'aimait, comme si leurs amours se fussent échauffés réciproquement et que, dans une sorte d'émulation, chacune eût voulu lui faire oublier l'autre.

— "Admire ma confiance !" lui dit un jour Mme Dambreuse, en dépliant un papier, où on la prévenait que M. Moreau vivait conjugalement avec une certaine Rose Bron. "Est-ce la demoiselle des courses, par hasard ?"

— "Quelle absurdité !" reprit-il. "Laisse-moi voir."

La lettre, écrite en caractères romains, n'était pas signée. Mme Dambreuse, au début, avait toléré cette maîtresse qui couvrait leur adultère. Mais, sa passion devenant plus forte, elle avait exigé une rupture, chose faite depuis longtemps, selon Frédéric ; et, quand il eut fini ses protestations, elle répliqua, tout en clignant ses paupières où brillait un regard pareil à la pointe d'un stylet sous de la mousseline :

— "Eh bien, et l'autre ?"

— "Quelle autre ?"

— "La femme du faïencier !"

Il leva les épaules dédaigneusement. Elle n'insista pas.

Mais, un mois plus tard, comme ils parlaient d'honneur et de loyauté, et qu'il vantait la sienne (d'une manière incidente, par précaution), elle lui dit :

— “C’est vrai, tu es honnête, tu n’y retournes plus.”

Frédéric, qui pensait à la Maréchale, balbutia :

— “Où donc ?”

— “Chez Mme Arnoux.”

Il la supplia de lui avouer d’où elle tenait ce renseignement. C’était par sa couturière en second, Mme Regimbart.

Ainsi, elle connaissait sa vie, et lui ne savait rien de la sienne !

Cependant, il avait découvert dans son cabinet de toilette la miniature d’un monsieur à longues moustaches : était-ce le même sur lequel on lui avait conté autrefois une vague histoire de suicide ? Mais, il n’existait aucun moyen d’en savoir davantage ! A quoi bon, du reste ? Les cœurs des femmes sont comme ces petits meubles à secret, pleins de tiroirs emboîtés les uns dans les autres ; on se donne du mal, on se casse les ongles, et on trouve au fond quelque fleur desséchée, des brins de poussière — ou le vide ! Et puis il craignait peut-être d’en trop apprendre.

Elle lui faisait refuser les invitations où elle ne pouvait se rendre avec lui, le tenait à ses côtés, avait peur de le perdre ; et, malgré cette union chaque jour plus grande, tout à coup des abîmes se découvraient entre eux, à propos de choses insignifiantes, l’appréciation d’une personne, d’une œuvre d’art.

Elle avait une façon de jouer du piano, correcte et dure. Son spiritualisme (Mme Dambreuse croyait à la transmigration des âmes dans les étoiles) ne l’empêchait pas de tenir sa caisse admirablement. Elle était hautaine avec ses gens ; ses yeux restaient secs devant les haillons des pauvres. Un égoïsme ingénu éclatait dans ses locutions ordinaires : “Qu’est-ce que cela me fait ? je serais bien bonne ! est-ce que j’ai besoin !” et mille petites actions inanalysables, odieuses. Elle aurait écouté derrière les portes ; elle devait mentir à son confesseur. Par esprit de domination, elle voulut que Frédéric l’accompagnât le dimanche à l’église. Il obéit, et porta le livre.

La perte de son héritage l’avait considérablement changée. Ces marques d’un chagrin qu’on attribuait à la mort de M. Dambreuse la rendaient intéressante, et, comme autrefois, elle recevait beaucoup de monde. Depuis l’insuccès électoral de Frédéric, elle ambitionnait pour eux deux une légation en Allemagne, aussi la première chose à faire était de se soumettre aux idées régnantes.

Les uns désiraient l'Empire, d'autres les Orléans, d'autres le comte de Chambord ; mais tous s'accordaient sur l'urgence de la décentralisation, et plusieurs moyens étaient proposés, tels que ceux-ci : couper Paris en une foule de grandes rues afin d'y établir des villages, transférer à Versailles le siège du gouvernement, mettre à Bourges les écoles, supprimer les bibliothèques, confier tout aux généraux de division ; — et on exaltait les campagnes, l'homme illettré ayant naturellement plus de sens que les autres ! Les haines foisonnaient : haine contre les instituteurs primaires et contre les marchands de vin, contre les classes de philosophie, contre les cours d'histoire, contre les romans, les gilets rouges, les barbes longues, contre toute indépendance, toute manifestation individuelle ; car il fallait “relever le principe d'autorité”, qu'elle s'exerçât au nom de n'importe qui, qu'elle vînt de n'importe où, pourvu que ce fût la Force, l'Autorité ! Les conservateurs parlaient maintenant comme Sénécal. Frédéric ne comprenait plus ; et il retrouvait chez son ancienne maîtresse les mêmes propos, débités par les mêmes hommes !

Les salons des filles (c'est de ce temps-là que date leur importance) étaient un terrain neutre, où les réactionnaires de bords différents se rencontraient. Hussonnet, qui se livrait au dénigrement des gloires contemporaines (bonne chose pour la restauration de l'Ordre), inspira l'envie à Rosanette d'avoir, comme une autre, ses soirées ; il en ferait des comptes rendus ; et il amena d'abord un homme sérieux, Fumichon ; puis parurent Nonancourt, M. de Grémonville, le sieur de Larsillois, ex-préfet, et Cisy, qui était maintenant agronome, bas breton et plus que jamais chrétien.

Il venait, en outre, d'anciens amants de la Maréchale, tels que le baron de Comaing, le comte de Jumillac et quelques autres ; la liberté de leurs allures blessait Frédéric.

Afin de se poser comme le maître, il augmenta le train de la maison. Alors, on prit un groom, on changea de logement, et on eut un mobilier nouveau. Ces dépenses étaient utiles pour faire paraître son mariage moins disproportionné à sa fortune. Aussi diminuait-elle effroyablement et Rosanette ne comprenait rien à tout cela !

Bourgeoise déclassée elle adorait la vie de ménage, un petit intérieur paisible. Cependant, elle était contente d'avoir “un jour” ; disait : “Ces femmes-là !” en parlant de ses pareilles — , voulait être “une dame du monde”, s’en croyait une. Elle le pria de ne plus fumer dans le salon, essaya de lui faire faire maigre, par bon genre.

Elle mentait à son rôle enfin, car elle devenait sérieuse, et même, avant de se coucher, montrait toujours un peu de mélancolie, comme il y a des cyprès à la porte d’un cabaret.

Il en découvrit la cause : elle rêvait mariage, — elle aussi ! Frédéric en fut exaspéré. D’ailleurs, il se rappelait son apparition chez Mme Arnoux, et puis il lui gardait rancune pour sa longue résistance.

Il n’en cherchait pas moins quels avaient été ses amants. Elle les niait tous. Une sorte de jalousie l’envahit. Il s’irrita des cadeaux qu’elle avait reçus, qu’elle recevait et, à mesure que le fond même de sa personne l’agaçait davantage, un goût des sens âpre et bestial l’entraînait vers elle, illusions d’une minute qui se résolvaient en haine.

Ses paroles, sa voix, son sourire, tout vint à lui déplaire, ses regards surtout, cet oeil de femme éternellement limpide et inepte. Il s’en trouvait tellement excédé quelquefois, qu’il l’aurait vue mourir sans émotion. Mais comment se fâcher ? Elle était d’une douceur désespérante.

Deslauriers reparut, et expliqua son séjour à Nogent en disant qu’il y marchandait une étude d’avoué. Frédéric fut heureux de le revoir ; c’était quelqu’un ! Il le mit en tiers dans la compagnie.

L’avocat dînait chez eux de temps à autre, et, quand il s’élevait de petites contestations, se déclarait toujours pour Rosanette, si bien qu’une fois Frédéric lui dit :

— “ Eh ! couche avec elle si ça t’amuse tant il souhaitait un hasard qui l’en débarrassât.

Vers le milieu du mois de juin, elle reçut un commandement où maître Athanase Gautherot, huissier, lui enjoignait de solder quatre mille francs dus à la demoiselle Clémence Vatnaz ; sinon, qu’il viendrait le lendemain la saisir.

En effet, des quatre billets autrefois souscrits un seul était payé ; — l’argent qu’elle avait pu avoir depuis lors ayant passé à d’autres besoins.

Elle courut chez Arnoux. Il habitait le faubourg Saint-Germain, et le portier ignorait la rue. Elle se transporta chez plusieurs amis, ne trouva personne, et rentra désespérée. Elle ne voulait rien dire à Frédéric, tremblant que cette nouvelle histoire ne fît du tort à son mariage.

Le lendemain matin, Me Athanase Gautherot se présenta, flanqué de deux acolytes, l'un blême, à figure chafouine, l'air dévoré d'envie, l'autre portant un faux-col et des sous-pieds très tendus, avec un délot de taffetas noir à l'index ; — et tous deux, ignoblement sales, avaient des cols gras, des manches de redingote trop courtes.

Leur patron, un fort bel homme, au contraire, commença par s'excuser de sa mission pénible, tout en regardant l'appartement, "plein de jolies choses, ma parole d'honneur !" Il ajouta "outre celles qu'on ne peut saisir". Sur un geste, les deux recors disparurent.

Alors, ses compliments redoublèrent. Pouvait-on croire qu'une personne aussi... charmante n'eût pas d'ami sérieux ! Une vente par autorité de justice était un véritable malheur ! On ne s'en relève jamais. Il tâcha de l'effrayer ; puis, la voyant émue, prit subitement un ton paternel. Il connaissait le monde, il avait eu affaire à toutes ces dames ; et, en les nommant, il examinait les cadres sur les murs. C'étaient d'anciens tableaux du brave Arnoux, des esquisses de Sombaz, des aquarelles de Burieu, trois paysages de Dittmer. Rosanette n'en savait pas le prix, évidemment. Maître Gautherot se tourna vers elle :

— "Tenez ! Pour vous montrer que je suis un bon garçon, faisons une chose : cédez-moi ces Dittmer-là ! et je paye tout. Est-ce convenu ?"

A ce moment, Frédéric, que Delphine avait instruit dans l'antichambre et qui venait de voir les deux praticiens, entra le chapeau sur la tête, d'un air brutal. Maître Gautherot reprit sa dignité ; et, comme la porte était restée ouverte :

— "Allons, messieurs, écrivez ! Dans la seconde pièce, nous disons : une table de chêne, avec ses deux rallonges, deux buffets..."

Frédéric l'arrêta, demandant s'il n'y avait pas quelque moyen d'empêcher la saisie ?

— "Oh ! parfaitement ! Qui a payé les meubles ?"

— "Moi."

— "Eh bien, formulez une revendication ; c'est toujours du temps que vous aurez devant vous."

Maître Gautherot acheva vivement ses écritures, et, dans le même procès-verbal, assigna en référé Mlle Bron, puis se retira.

Frédéric ne fit pas un reproche. Il contemplait, sur le tapis, les traces de boue laissées par les chaussures des praticiens ; et, se parlant à lui-même :

— “Il va falloir chercher de l’argent !”

— “Ah ! mon Dieu, que je suis bête !” dit la Maréchale.

Elle fouilla dans un tiroir, prit une lettre, et s’en alla vivement à la Société d’éclairage du Languedoc, afin d’obtenir le transfert de ses actions.

Elle revint une heure après. Les titres étaient vendus à un autre ! Le commis lui avait répondu en examinant son papier, la promesse écrite par Arnoux : “Cet acte ne vous constitue nullement propriétaire. La Compagnie ne connaît pas cela.” Bref, il l’avait congédiée, elle en suffoquait ; et Frédéric devait se rendre à l’instant même chez Arnoux, pour éclaircir la chose.

Mais Arnoux croirait, peut-être, qu’il venait pour recouvrer indirectement les quinze mille francs de son hypothèque perdue ; et puis cette réclamation à un homme qui avait été l’amant de sa maîtresse lui semblait une turpitude. Choissant un moyen terme, il alla prendre à l’hôtel Dambreuse l’adresse de Mme Regimbart, envoya chez elle un commissionnaire, et connut ainsi le café que hantait maintenant le Citoyen.

C’était un petit café sur la place de la Bastille, où il se tenait toute la journée, dans le coin de droite, au fond, ne bougeant pas plus que s’il avait fait partie de l’immeuble.

Après avoir passé successivement par la demi-tasse, le grog, le bischof, le vin chaud et même l’eau rougie, il était revenu à la bière ; et, de demi-heure en demi-heure, laissait tomber ce mot : “Bock !” ayant réduit son langage à l’indispensable. Frédéric lui demanda s’il voyait quelquefois Arnoux.

— “Non !”

— “Tiens, pourquoi ?”

— “Un imbécile !”

La politique, peut-être, les séparait, et Frédéric crut bien faire de s’informer de Compain.

— “Quelle brute !” dit Regimbart.

— “Comment cela ?”

— “Sa tête de veau !”

— “Ah ! apprenez-moi ce que c’est que la tête de veau !”

Régimbart eut un sourire de pitié.

— “Des bêtises !”

Frédéric, après un long silence, reprit :

— “Il a donc changé de logement ?”

— “Qui ?”

— “Arnoux !”

— “Oui : rue de Fleurus !”

— “Quel numéro ?”

— “Est-ce que je fréquente les jésuites ?”

— “Comment, jésuites !”

Le Citoyen répondit, furieux :

— “Avec l’argent d’un patriote que je lui ai fait connaître, ce cochon-là s’est établi marchand de chapelets !”

— “Pas possible !”

— “Allez-y voir !”

Rien de plus vrai ; Arnoux, affaibli par une attaque, avait tourné à la religion ; d’ailleurs, “il avait toujours eu un fond de religion”, et (avec l’alliage de mercantilisme et d’ingénuité qui lui était naturel), pour faire son salut et sa fortune, il s’était mis dans le commerce des objets religieux.

Frédéric n’eut pas de mal à découvrir son établissement, dont l’enseigne portait : “Aux arts gothiques. Restauration du culte. — Ornaments d’église. — Sculpture polychrome. — Encens des rois mages, etc.”

Aux deux coins de la vitrine s’élevaient deux statues en bois, bariolées d’or, de cinabre et d’azur ; un saint Jean-Baptiste avec sa peau de mouton, et une sainte Geneviève, des roses dans son tablier et une quenouille sous son bras ; puis des groupes en plâtre ; une bonne sœur instruisant une petite fille, une mère à genoux près d’une couchette, trois collégiens devant la sainte table. Le plus joli était une manière de chalet figurant l’intérieur de la crèche avec l’âne, le bœuf et l’enfant Jésus étalé sur de la paille, de la vraie paille. Du haut en bas des étagères, on voyait des médailles à la douzaine, des chapelets de toute espèce, des bénitiers en forme de coquille, et les portraits des gloires ecclésiastiques, parmi lesquelles brillaient Mgr Affre et notre Saint-Père, tous deux souriant.

Arnoux, à son comptoir, sommeillait la tête basse. Il était prodigieusement vieilli, avait même autour des tempes une couronne de boutons roses, et le reflet des croix d'or frappées par le soleil tombait dessus.

Frédéric, devant cette décadence, fut pris de tristesse. Par dévouement pour la Maréchale, il se résigna cependant, et il s'avança ; au fond de la boutique, Mme Arnoux parut ; alors, il tourna les talons.

— “Je ne l'ai pas trouvé”, dit-il en rentrant.

Et il eut beau reprendre qu'il allait écrire, tout de suite, à son notaire du Havre pour avoir de l'argent, Rosanette s'emporta. On n'avait jamais vu un homme si faible, si mollasse ; pendant qu'elle endurait mille privations, les autres se gobergeaient.

Frédéric songeait à la pauvre Mme Arnoux, se figurant la médiocrité navrante de son intérieur. Il s'était mis au secrétaire et, comme la voix aigre de Rosanette continuait :

— “Ah au nom du ciel, tais-toi !”

— “Vas-tu les défendre, par hasard ?”

— “Eh bien, oui !” s'écria-t-il, “car d'où vient cet acharnement ?”

— “Mais toi, pourquoi ne veux-tu pas qu'ils payent ? C'est dans la peur d'affliger ton ancienne, avoue-le !” Il eut envie de l'assommer avec la pendule ; les paroles lui manquèrent. Il se tut. Rosanette, tout en marchant dans la chambre, ajouta :

— “Je vais lui flanquer un procès, à ton Arnoux. Oh je n'ai pas besoin de toi !” et, pinçant les lèvres Je consulterai. ”

Trois jours après, Delphine entra brusquement.

— “Madame, madame, il y a là un homme avec un pot de colle qui me fait peur.”

Rosanette passa dans la cuisine, et vit un chenapan, la face criblée de petite vérole, paralytique d'un bras, aux trois quarts ivre et bredouillant.

C'était l'afficheur de maître Gautherot. L'opposition à la saisie ayant été repoussée, la vente, naturellement, s'ensuivait.

Pour sa peine d'avoir monté l'escalier, il réclama d'abord un petit verre ; — puis il implora une autre faveur, à savoir des billets de spectacle, croyant que Madame était une actrice. Il fut ensuite plusieurs minutes à faire des clignements d'yeux incompréhensibles ; enfin, il déclara que, moyennant quarante sous, il déchirerait les coins de l'affiche déjà posée en bas, contre la porte. Rosanette s'y trouvait désignée par son nom, rigueur exceptionnelle qui marquait toute la haine de la Vatnaz.

Elle avait été sensible autrefois, et même, dans une peine de cœur, avait écrit à Béranger pour en obtenir un conseil. Mais elle s'était aigrie sous les bourrasques de l'existence, ayant, tour à tour, donné des leçons de piano, présidé une table d'hôte, collaboré à des journaux de modes, sous-loué des appartements, fait le trafic des dentelles dans le monde des femmes légères ; où ses relations lui permirent d'obliger beaucoup de personnes, Arnoux entre autres. Elle avait travaillé auparavant dans une maison de commerce.

Elle y soldait les ouvrières ; et il y avait pour chacune d'elles deux livres, dont l'un restait toujours entre ses mains. Dussardier, qui tenait par obligeance celui d'une nommée Hortense Baslin, se présenta un jour à la caisse au moment où Mlle Vatnaz apportait le compte de cette fille, 1.682 francs, que le caissier lui paya. Or, la veille même, Dussardier n'en avait inscrit que 1.082 sur le livre de la Baslin. Il le redemanda sous un prétexte ; puis, voulant ensevelir cette histoire de vol, lui conta qu'il l'avait perdu. L'ouvrière redit naïvement son mensonge à Mlle Vatnaz ; celle-ci, pour en avoir le cœur net, d'un air indifférent, vint en parler au brave commis. Il se contenta de répondre : "Je l'ai brûlé" ; ce fut tout. Elle quitta la maison peu de temps après, sans croire à l'anéantissement du livre, et s'imaginant que Dussardier le gardait.

A la nouvelle de sa blessure, elle était accourue chez lui dans l'intention de le reprendre. Puis, n'ayant rien découvert, malgré les perquisitions les plus fines, elle avait été saisie de respect, et bientôt d'amour, pour ce garçon, si loyal, si doux, si héroïque et si fort ! Une pareille bonne fortune à son âge était inespérée. Elle se jeta dessus avec un appétit d'ogresse ; — et elle en avait abandonné la littérature, le socialisme, "les doctrines consolantes et les utopies généreuses", le cours qu'elle professait sur la Désubalternisation de la femme, tout, Delmar lui-même ; enfin, elle offrit à Dussardier de s'unir par un mariage.

Bien qu'elle fût sa maîtresse, il n'en était nullement amoureux. D'ailleurs, il n'avait pas oublié son vol. Puis elle était trop riche. Il la refusa. Alors, elle lui dit, en pleurant, les rêves qu'elle avait faits : c'était d'avoir à eux deux un magasin de confection. Elle possédait les premiers fonds indispensables, qui s'augmenteraient de quatre mille francs la semaine prochaine ; et elle narra ses poursuites contre la Maréchale.

Dussardier en fut chagrin, à cause de son ami. Il se rappelait le porte-cigares offert au corps de garde, les soirs du quai Napoléon, tant de bonnes causeries, de livres prêtés, les mille complaisances de Frédéric. Il pria la Vatnaz de se désister.

Elle le railla de sa bonhomie, en manifestant contre Rosanette une exécution incompréhensible ; elle ne souhaitait même la fortune que pour l'écraser plus tard avec son carrosse.

Ces abîmes de noirceur effrayèrent Dussardier ; et, quand il sut positivement le jour de la vente, il sortit. Dès le lendemain matin, il entra chez Frédéric avec une contenance embarrassée.

— “J’ai des excuses à vous faire.”

— “De quoi donc ?”

— “Vous devez me prendre pour un ingrat, moi dont elle est...” Il balbutiait. “Oh ! je ne la verrai plus, je ne serai pas son complice !” Et, l’autre le regardant tout surpris : “Est-ce qu’on ne va pas, dans trois jours, vendre les meubles de votre maîtresse ?”

— “Qui vous a dit cela ?”

— “Elle-même, la Vatnaz ! Mais j’ai peur de vous offenser...”

— “Impossible, cher ami !”

— “Ah ! c’est vrai, vous êtes si bon !”

Et il lui tendit, d’une main discrète, un petit portefeuille de basane. C’était quatre mille francs, toutes ses économies.

— “Comment ! Ah ! non ! — non !...”

— “Je savais bien que je vous blesserais”, répliqua Dussardier, avec une larme au bord des yeux.

Frédéric lui serra la main ; et le brave garçon reprit d’une voix dolente : — “Acceptez-les Faites-moi ce plaisir-là ! Je suis tellement désespéré ! Est-ce que tout n’est pas fini, d’ailleurs ? — J’avais cru, quand la révolution est arrivée, qu’on serait heureux. Vous rappelez-vous comme c’était beau ! comme on respirait bien Mais nous voilà retombés pire que jamais.”

Et, fixant ses yeux à terre :

— “Maintenant, ils tuent notre République, comme ils ont tué l’autre, la romaine ! et la pauvre Venise, la pauvre Pologne, la pauvre Hongrie ! Quelles abominations ! D’abord, on a abattu les arbres d’e la liberté, puis restreint le droit de suffrage, fermé les clubs, rétabli la censure et livré l’enseignement aux prêtres, en attendant l’Inquisition. Pourquoi pas ? Des conservateurs nous souhaitent bien les Cosaques ! On condamne les journaux quand ils parlent contre la peine de mort, Paris regorge de baïonnettes, seize départements sont en état de siège et l’amnistie qui est encore une fois repoussée”

Il se prit le front à deux mains puis, écartant les bras comme dans une grande détresse

— “Si on tâchait, cependant. Si on était de bonne foi, on pourrait s’entendre ! Mais non ! Les ouvriers ne valent pas mieux que les bourgeois, voyez-vous ! A Elbeuf, dernièrement, ils ont refusé leurs secours dans un incendie. Des misérables traitent Barbès d’aristocrate ! Pour qu’on se moque du peuple, ils veulent nommer à la présidence Nadaud, un maçon, je vous demande un peu ! Et il n’y a pas de moyen ! pas de remède ! Tout le monde est contre nous ! — Moi, je n’ai jamais fait de mai ; et, pourtant, c’est comme un poids qui me pèse sur l’estomac. J’en deviendrai fou, si ça continue. J’ai envie de me faire tuer. Je vous dis que je n’ai pas besoin de mon argent ! Vous me le rendrez, parbleu ! je vous le prête.”

Frédéric, que la nécessité contraignait, finit par prendre ses quatre mille francs. Ainsi, du côté de la Vatnaz, ils n’avaient plus d’inquiétude.

Mais Rosanette perdit bientôt son procès contre Arnoux, et, par entêtement, voulait en appeler.

Deslauriers s’exténua à lui faire comprendre que la promesse d’Arnoux ne constituait ni une donation, ni une cession régulière ; elle n’écoutait même pas, trouvant la loi injuste ; c’est parce qu’elle était une femme, les hommes se soutenaient entre eux ! A la fin, cependant, elle suivit ses conseils.

Il se gênait si peu dans la maison, que, plusieurs fois, il amena Sénecal y dîner. Ce sans-façon déplut à Frédéric, qui lui avançait de l’argent, le faisait même habiller par son tailleur et l’avocat donnait ses vieilles redingotes au socialiste, dont les moyens d'existence étaient inconnus.

Il aurait voulu servir Rosanette, cependant. Un jour qu'elle lui montrait douze actions de la Compagnie du kaolin (cette entreprise qui avait fait condamner Arnoux à trente mille francs), il lui dit :

— “Mais c'est véreux ! c'est superbe !”

Elle avait le droit de l'assigner pour le remboursement de ses créances. Elle prouverait d'abord qu'il était tenu solidairement à payer tout le passif de la Compagnie, puis qu'il avait déclaré comme dettes collectives des dettes personnelles, enfin qu'il avait diverti plusieurs effets à la Société.

— “Tout cela le rend coupable de banqueroute frauduleuse, articles 586 et 587 du Code de commerce ; et nous l'emballerons, soyez-en sûre, ma mignonne.”

Rosanette lui sauta au cou. Il la recommanda le lendemain à son ancien patron, ne pouvant s'occuper lui-même du procès, car il avait besoin à Nogent ; Sénécals lui écrirait, en cas d'urgence.

Ses négociations pour l'achat d'une étude étaient un prétexte. Il passait son temps chez M. Roque, où il avait commencé non seulement par faire l'éloge de leur ami, mais par l'imiter d'allures et de langage autant que possible ; — ce qui lui avait obtenu la confiance de Louise, tandis qu'il gagnait celle de son père en se déchaînant contre Ledru-Rollin.

Si Frédéric ne revenait pas, c'est qu'il fréquentait le grand monde ; et peu à peu Deslauriers leur apprit qu'il aimait quelqu'un, qu'il avait un enfant, qu'il entretenait une créature.

Le désespoir de Louise fut immense, l'indignation de Mme Moreau non moins forte. Elle voyait son fils tourbillonnant vers le fond d'un gouffre vague, était blessée dans sa religion des convenances et en éprouvait comme un déshonneur personnel, quand tout à coup sa physionomie changea. Aux questions qu'on lui faisait sur Frédéric, elle répondait d'un air narquois — “Il va bien, très bien.”

Elle savait son mariage avec Mme Dambreuse.

L'époque en était fixée ; et même il cherchait comment faire avaler la chose à Rosanette.

Vers le milieu de l'automne, elle gagna son procès relatif aux actions de kaolin. Frédéric l'apprit en rencontrant à sa porte Sénécal, qui sortait de l'audience.

On avait reconnu M. Arnoux complice de toutes les fraudes ; et l'ex-répétiteur avait un tel air de s'en réjouir, que Frédéric l'empêcha d'aller plus loin, en assurant qu'il se chargeait de sa commission près de Rosanette. Il entra chez elle la figure irritée.

— “Eh bien, te voilà contente !”

Mais, sans remarquer ces paroles :

— “Regarde donc !”

Et elle lui montra son enfant couché dans un berceau, près du feu. Elle l'avait trouvé si mal le matin chez sa nourrice, qu'elle l'avait ramené à Paris.

Tous ses membres étaient maigris extraordinairement et ses lèvres couvertes de points blancs, qui faisaient dans l'intérieur de sa bouche comme des caillots de lait.

— “Qu'a dit le médecin ?”

— “Ah ! le médecin ! Il prétend que le voyage a augmenté son... je ne sais plus, un nom en ite... enfin qu'il a le muguet. Connais-tu cela ?”

Frédéric n'hésita pas à répondre :

— “Certainement”, ajoutant que ce n'était rien.

Mais dans la soirée, il fut effrayé par l'aspect débile de l'enfant et le progrès de ces taches blanchâtres, pareilles à de la moisissure, comme si la vie, abandonnant déjà ce pauvre petit corps, n'eût laissé qu'une matière où la végétation poussait. Ses mains étaient froides ; il ne pouvait plus boire, maintenant ; et la nourrice, une autre que le portier avait été prendre au hasard dans un bureau, répétait :

— “Il me paraît bien bas, bien bas !”

Rosanette fut debout toute la nuit.

Le matin, elle alla trouver Frédéric.

— “Viens donc voir. Il ne remue plus.”

En effet, il était mort. Elle le prit, le secoua, l'étreignait en l'appelant des noms les plus doux, le couvrait de baisers et de sanglots, tournait sur elle-même éperdue, s'arrachait les cheveux, poussait des cris et se laissa tomber au bord du divan, où elle restait la bouche ouverte, avec un flot de larmes tombant de ses yeux fixes. Puis une torpeur la gagna, et tout devint tranquille dans l'appartement. Les meubles étaient renversés. Deux ou trois serviettes traînaient. Six heures sonnèrent. La veilleuse s'éteignit.

Frédéric, en regardant tout cela, croyait presque rêver. Son cœur se serrait d'angoisse. Il lui semblait que cette mort n'était qu'un commencement, et qu'il y avait par derrière un malheur plus considérable près de survenir.

Tout à coup Rosanette dit d'une voix tendre :

— “Nous le conserverons, n'est-ce pas ?”

Elle désirait le faire embaumer. Bien des raisons s'y opposaient. La meilleure, selon Frédéric, c'est que la chose était impraticable sur des enfants si jeunes. Un portrait valait mieux. Elle adopta cette idée. Il écrivit un mot à Pellerin, et Delphine courut le porter.

Pellerin arriva promptement, voulant effacer par ce zèle tout souvenir de sa conduite. Il dit d'abord :

— “Pauvre petit ange ! Ah ! mon Dieu, quel malheur !”

Mais, peu à peu (l'artiste en lui l'emportant), il déclara qu'on ne pouvait rien faire avec ces yeux bistrés, cette face livide, que c'était une véritable nature morte, qu'il faudrait beaucoup de talent ; et il murmurait :

— “Oh ! pas commode, pas commode !”

— “Pourvu que ce soit ressemblant”, objecta Rosanette.

— “Eh ! je me moque de la ressemblance ! A bas le Réalisme ! C'est l'esprit qu'on peint ! Laissez-moi ! Je vais tâcher de me figurer ce que ça devait être.”

Il réfléchit, le front dans la main gauche, le coude dans la droite ; puis, tout à coup :

— “Ah ! une idée ! un pastel ! Avec des demi-teintes colorées, passées presque à plat, on peut obtenir un beau modelé, sur les bords seulement.”

Il envoya la femme de chambre chercher sa boîte ; puis, ayant une chaise sous les pieds et une autre près de lui, il commença à jeter de grands traits, aussi calme que s'il eût travaillé d'après la bosse. Il vantait les petits saint Jean de Corrège, l'infante Rose de Velasquez, les chairs lactées de Reynolds, la distinction de Lawrence, et surtout l'enfant aux longs cheveux qui est sur les genoux de lady Gower.

— “D'ailleurs, peut-on trouver rien de plus charmant que ces crapauds-là ! Le type du sublime (Raphaël l'a prouvé par ses madones), c'est peut-être une mère avec son enfant ?”

Rosanette, qui suffoquait, sortit — , et Pellerin dit aussitôt :

— “Eh bien, Arnoux !... vous savez ce qui arrive ?”

— “Non ! Quoi ?”

— “Ça devait finir comme ça, du reste !”

— “Qu'est-ce donc ?”

— “Il est peut-être maintenant... Pardon”

L'artiste se leva pour exhausser la tête du petit cadavre.

— “Vous disiez...” reprit Frédéric.

Et Pellerin, tout en clignant pour mieux prendre ses mesures :

— “Je disais que notre ami Arnoux est peut-être, maintenant, coffré !”

Puis, d'un ton satisfait :

— “Regardez un peu ! Est-ce ça ?”

— “Oui, très bien ! Mais Arnoux ?”

Pellerin déposa son crayon.

— “D'après ce que j'ai pu comprendre, il se trouve poursuivi par un certain Mignot, un intime de Regimbart, une bonne tête, celui-là, hein ? Quel idiot ! figurez-vous qu'un jour...”

— “Eh ! il ne s'agit pas de Regimbart !”

— “C'est vrai. Eh bien, Arnoux, hier au soir, devait trouver douze mille francs, sinon, il était perdu.”

— “Oh ! c'est peut-être exagéré”, dit Frédéric.

— “Pas le moins du monde ! Ça m'avait l'air grave, très grave”

Rosanette, à ce moment, reparut avec des rougeurs sous les paupières, ardentes comme des plaques de fard.

Elle se mit près du carton et regarda. Pellerin fit signe qu'il se taisait à cause d'elle. Mais Frédéric, sans y prendre garde :

— “Cependant, je ne peux pas croire...”

— “Je vous répète que je l'ai rencontré hier”, dit l'artiste, “à sept heures du soir, rue Jacob. Il avait même son passeport, par précaution ; et il parlait de s'embarquer au Havre, lui et toute sa smala.”

— “Comment ! Avec sa femme ?”

— “Sans doute ! Il est trop bon père de famille pour vivre tout seul.”

— “Et vous en êtes sûr ?”

— “Parbleu ! Où voulez-vous qu'il ait trouvé douze mille francs ?”

Frédéric fit deux ou trois tours dans la chambre. Il haletait, se mordait les lèvres, puis saisit son chapeau.

— “Où vas-tu donc ?” dit Rosanette.

Il ne répondit pas, et disparut.

CHAPITRE 5

Il fallait douze mille francs, ou bien il ne reverrait plus Mme Arnoux ; et, jusqu'à présent, un espoir invincible lui était resté. Est-ce qu'elle ne faisait pas comme la substance de son cœur, le fond même de sa vie ? Il fut pendant quelques minutes à chanceler sur le trottoir, se rongant d'angoisses, heureux néanmoins de n'être plus chez l'autre.

Où avoir de l'argent ? Frédéric savait par lui-même combien il est difficile d'en obtenir tout de suite, à n'importe quel prix. Une seule personne pouvait l'aider, Mme Dambreuse. Elle gardait toujours dans son secrétaire plusieurs billets de banque. Il alla chez elle ; et, d'un ton hardi :

— “As-tu douze mille francs à me prêter ?”

— “Pourquoi ?”

C'était le secret d'un autre. Elle voulait le connaître. Il ne céda pas. Tous deux s'obstinaient. Enfin, elle déclara ne rien donner, avant de savoir dans quel but. Frédéric devint très rouge. Un de ses camarades avait commis un vol. La somme devait être restituée aujourd'hui même.

— “Tu l'appelles ? Son nom ? Voyons, son nom ?”

— “Dussardier !”

Et il se jeta à ses genoux, en la suppliant de n'en rien dire.

— “Quelle idée as-tu de moi ?” reprit Mme Dambreuse. “On croirait que tu es le coupable. Finis donc tes airs tragiques ! Tiens, les voilà ! et grand bien lui fasse !”

Il courut chez Arnoux. Le marchand n'était pas dans sa boutique. Mais il logeait toujours rue Paradis, car il possédait deux domiciles.

Rue Paradis, le portier jura que M. Arnoux était absent depuis la veille ; quant à Madame, il n'osait rien dire ; et Frédéric, ayant monté l'escalier comme une flèche, colla son oreille contre la serrure. Enfin, on ouvrit. Madame était partie avec Monsieur. La bonne ignorait quand ils reviendraient ; ses gages étaient payés ; elle-même s'en allait.

Tout à coup un craquement de porte se fit entendre.

— “Mais il y a quelqu’un ?”

— “Oh ! non, monsieur ! C’est le vent.”

Alors, il se retira. N’importe, une disparition si prompte avait quelque chose d’inexplicable.

Regimbart, étant l’intime de Mignot, pouvait peut-être l’éclairer ? Et Frédéric se fit conduire chez lui, à Montmartre, rue de l’Empereur.

Sa maison était flanquée d’un jardinet, clos par une grille que bouchaient des plaques de fer. Un perron de trois marches relevait la façade blanche ; et en passant sur le trottoir, on apercevait les deux pièces du rez-de-chaussée, dont la première était un salon avec des robes partout sur les meubles, et la seconde l’atelier où se tenaient les ouvrières de Mme Regimbart.

Toutes étaient convaincues que Monsieur avait de grandes occupations, de grandes relations, que c’était un homme complètement hors ligne. Quand il traversait le couloir, avec son chapeau à bords retroussés, sa longue figure sérieuse et sa redingote verte, elles en interrompaient leur besogne. D’ailleurs, il ne manquait pas de leur adresser toujours quelque mot d’encouragement, une politesse sous forme de sentence et, plus tard, dans leur ménage, elles se trouvaient malheureuses, parce qu’elles l’avaient gardé pour idéal.

Aucune cependant ne l’aimait comme Mme Regimbart, petite personne intelligente qui le faisait vivre avec son métier.

Dès que M. Moreau eut dit son nom, elle vint prestement le recevoir, sachant par les domestiques ce qu’il était à Mme Dambreuse. Son mari “rentrait à l’instant même” ; et Frédéric tout en la suivant, admira la tenue du logis et la profusion de toile cirée qu’il y avait. Puis il attendit quelques minutes dans une manière de bureau, où le Citoyen se retirait pour penser.

Son accueil fut moins rébarbatif que d’habitude.

Il conta l’histoire d’Arnoux. L’ex-fabricant de faïences avait enguirlandé Mignot, un patriote, possesseur de cent actions du Siècle, en lui démontrant qu’il fallait, au point de vue démocratique, changer la gérance et la rédaction du journal ; et, sous prétexte de faire triompher son avis dans la prochaine assemblée des actionnaires, il lui avait demandé cinquante actions, en disant qu’il les repasserait à des amis sûrs, lesquels appuieraient son vote ; Mignot n’aurait aucune responsabilité, ne se fâcherait avec personne ; puis, le succès obtenu, il lui ferait avoir dans l'administration une bonne place, de cinq à six mille francs pour le moins. Les actions avaient été livrées. Mais Arnoux, tout de suite, les avait vendues ; et, avec l'argent, s'était associé à un marchand d'objets religieux. Là-dessus, réclamations de Mignot, lanternements d'Arnoux ; enfin, le patriote l'avait menacé d'une plainte en escroquerie, s'il ne restituait ses titres ou la somme équivalente : cinquante mille francs.

Frédéric eut l'air désespéré.

— “Ce n'est pas tout”, dit le Citoyen. “Mignot, qui est un brave homme, s'est rabattu sur le quart. Nouvelles promesses de l'autre, nouvelles farces naturellement. Bref, avant-hier matin, Mignot l'a sommé d'avoir à lui rendre dans les vingt-quatre heures sans préjudice du reste, douze mille francs.”

— “Mais je les ai !” dit Frédéric.

Le Citoyen se retourna lentement :

— “Blagueur !”

— “Pardon ! ils sont dans ma poche. Je les apportais.”

— “Comme vous y allez, vous ! Nom d'un petit bonhomme ! Du reste, il n'est plus temps ; la plainte est déposée, et Arnoux parti.”

— “Seul ?”

— “Non ! avec sa femme. On les a rencontrés à la gare du Havre.”

Frédéric pâlit extraordinairement. Mme Regimbart crut qu'il allait s'évanouir. Il se contint, et même il eut la force d'adresser deux ou trois questions sur l'aventure. Regimbart s'en attristait, tout cela en somme nuisant à la Démocratie. Arnoux avait toujours été sans conduite et sans ordre.

— “Une vraie tête de linotte ! Il brûlait la chandelle par les deux bouts ! Le cotillon l'a perdu ! Ce n'est pas lui que je plains, mais sa pauvre femme !” car le Citoyen admirait les femmes vertueuses, et faisait grand cas de Mme Arnoux. “Elle a dû joliment souffrir !”

Frédéric lui sut gré de cette sympathie ; et, comme s'il en avait reçu un service, il serra sa main avec effusion.

— “As-tu fait toutes les courses nécessaires ?” dit Rosanette en le revoyant.

Il n'en avait pas eu le courage, répondit-il, et avait marché au hasard, dans les rues, pour s'étourdir.

A huit heures, ils passèrent dans la salle à manger ; mais ils restèrent silencieux l'un devant l'autre, poussaient par intervalles un long soupir et renvoyaient leur assiette. Frédéric but de l'eau-de-vie. Il se sentait tout délabré, écrasé, anéanti, n'ayant plus conscience de rien que d'une extrême fatigue.

Elle alla chercher le portrait. Le rouge, le jaune, le vert et l'indigo s'y heurtaient par taches violentes, en faisaient une chose hideuse, presque dérisoire.

D'ailleurs, le petit mort était méconnaissable, maintenant. Le ton violacé de ses lèvres augmentait la blancheur de sa peau ; les narines étaient encore plus minces, les yeux plus caves ; et sa tête reposait sur un oreiller de taffetas bleu, entre des pétales de camélias, des roses d'automne et des violettes ; c'était une idée de la femme de chambre ; elles l'avaient ainsi arrangé toutes les deux, dévotement. La cheminée, couverte d'une housse en guipure, supportait des flambeaux de vermeil espacés par des bouquets de buis bénit ; aux coins, dans les deux vases, des pastilles du sérail brûlaient ; tout cela formait avec le berceau une manière de reposoir ; et Frédéric se rappela sa veillée près de M. Dambreuse.

Tous les quarts d'heure, à peu près, Rosanette ouvrait les rideaux pour contempler son enfant. Elle l'apercevait, dans quelques mois d'ici, commençant à marcher, puis au collège au milieu de la cour, jouant aux barres ; puis à vingt ans, jeune homme ; et toutes ces images, qu'elle se créait, lui faisaient comme autant de fils qu'elle aurait perdus, — l'excès de la douleur multipliant sa maternité.

Frédéric, immobile dans l'autre fauteuil, pensait à Mme Arnoux.

Elle était en chemin de fer, sans doute, le visage au carreau d'un wagon, et regardant la campagne s'enfuir derrière elle du côté de Paris, ou bien sur le pont d'un bateau à vapeur, comme la première fois qu'il l'avait rencontrée ; mais celui-là s'en allait indéfiniment vers des pays d'où elle ne sortirait plus. Puis il la voyait dans une chambre d'auberge, avec des malles par terre, un papier de tenture en lambeaux, la porte qui tremblait au vent. Et après ? que deviendrait-elle ? Institutrice, dame de compagnie, femme de chambre, peut-être ? Elle était livrée à tous les hasards de la misère. Cette ignorance de son sort le torturait. Il aurait dû s'opposer à sa fuite ou partir derrière elle. N'était-il pas son véritable époux ? Et, en songeant qu'il ne la retrouverait jamais, que c'était bien fini, qu'elle était irrévocablement perdue, il sentait comme un déchirement de tout son être ; ses larmes accumulées depuis le matin débordèrent.

Rosanette s'en aperçut.

— “Ah ! tu pleures comme moi ! Tu as du chagrin ?”

— “Oui ! oui ! j'en ai !...”

Il la serra contre son cœur, et tous deux sanglotaient en se tenant embrassés.

Mme Dambreuse aussi pleurait, couchée sur son lit, à plat ventre, la tête dans ses mains.

Olympe Regimbart, étant venue le soir lui essayer sa première robe de couleur, avait conté la visite de Frédéric, et même qu'il tenait tout prêts douze mille francs destinés à M. Arnoux.

Ainsi cet argent, son argent à elle, était pour empêcher le départ de l'autre, pour se conserver une maîtresse ?

Elle eut d'abord un accès de rage ; et elle avait résolu de le chasser comme un laquais. Des larmes abondantes la calmèrent. Il valait mieux tout renfermer, ne rien dire.

Frédéric, le lendemain, rapporta les douze mille francs.

Elle le pria de les garder, en cas de besoin, pour son ami, et elle l'interrogea beaucoup sur ce monsieur. Qui donc l'avait poussé à un tel abus de confiance ? Une femme, sans doute ! Les femmes vous entraînent à tous les crimes.

Ce ton de persiflage décontenança Frédéric. Il éprouvait un grand remords de sa calomnie. Ce qui le rassurait, c'est que Mme Dambreuse ne pouvait connaître la vérité.

Elle y mit de l'entêtement, cependant ; car, le surlendemain, elle s'informa encore de son petit camarade, puis d'un autre, de Deslauriers.

— “Est-ce un homme sûr et intelligent ?” Frédéric le vanta.

— “Priez-le de passer à la maison un de ces matins je désirerais le consulter pour une affaire.”

Elle avait trouvé un rouleau de paperasses contenant des billets d'Arnoux parfaitement protestés, et sur lesquels Mme Arnoux avait mis sa signature. C'était pour ceux-là que Frédéric était venu une fois chez M. Dambreuse pendant son déjeuner ; et, bien que le capitaliste n'eût pas voulu en poursuivre le recouvrement, il avait fait prononcer par le Tribunal de commerce, non seulement la condamnation d'Arnoux, mais celle de sa femme, qui l'ignorait, son mari n'ayant pas jugé convenable de l'en avertir.

C'était une arme, cela ! Mme Dambreuse n'en doutait pas. Mais son notaire lui conseillerait peut-être l'abstention, elle eût préféré quelqu'un d'obscur ; et elle s'était rappelé ce grand diable, à mine impudente, qui lui avait offert ses services.

Frédéric fit naïvement sa commission.

L'avocat fut enchanté d'être mis en rapport avec une si grande dame.

Il accourut.

Elle le prévint que la succession appartenait à sa nièce, motif de plus pour liquider ces créances qu'elle rembourserait, tenant à accabler les époux Martinon des meilleurs procédés.

Deslauriers comprit qu'il y avait là-dessous un mystère ; il y rêvait en considérant les billets. Le nom de Mme Arnoux, tracé par elle-même, lui remit devant les yeux toute sa personne et l'outrage qu'il en avait reçu. Puisque la vengeance s'offrait, pourquoi ne pas la saisir ?

Il conseilla donc à Mme Dambreuse de faire vendre aux enchères les créances désespérées qui dépendaient de la succession. Un homme de paille les rachèterait en sous-main et exercerait les poursuites. Il se chargeait de fournir cet homme-là.

Vers la fin du mois de novembre, Frédéric, en passant dans la rue de Mme Arnoux, leva les yeux vers ses fenêtres, et aperçut contre la porte une affiche, où il y avait en grosses lettres :

— “C'est leur mobilier !” se dit Frédéric ; et le portier confirma ses soupçons.

Quant à la personne qui faisait vendre, il l'ignorait. Mais le commissaire-priseur, Me Berthelot, donnerait peut-être des éclaircissements.

L'officier ministériel ne voulut point, tout d'abord, dire quel créancier poursuivait la vente. Frédéric insista. C'était un sieur Sénecal, agent d'affaires ; et Me Berthelot poussa même la complaisance jusqu'à prêter son journal des Petites Affiches.

Frédéric, en arrivant chez Rosanette, le jeta sur la table tout ouvert.

— “Lis donc !”

— “Eh bien, quoi ?” dit-elle, avec une figure tellement placide, qu’il en fut révolté.

— “Ah ! garde ton innocence !”

— “Je ne comprends pas.”

— “C’est toi qui fais vendre Mme Arnoux ?”

Elle relut l’annonce.

— “Où est son nom ?”

— “Eh ! c’est son mobilier ! Tu le sais mieux que moi !”

— “Qu’est-ce que ça me fait ?” dit Rosanette en haussant les épaules.

— “Ce que ça te fait ? Mais tu te venges, voilà tout ! C’est la suite de tes persécutions ! Est-ce que tu ne l’as pas outragée jusqu’à venir chez elle ! Toi, une fille de rien. La femme la plus sainte, la plus charmante et la meilleure ! Pourquoi t’acharnes-tu à la ruiner ?”

— “Tu te trompe, je t’assure !”

— “Allons donc ! Comme si tu n’avais pas mis Sénécals en avant !”

— “Quelle bêtise !”

Alors, une fureur l’emporta.

— “Tu mens ! tu mens, misérable ! Tu es jalouse d’elle ! Tu possèdes une condamnation contre son mari ! Sénécals s’est déjà mêlé de tes affaires ! Il déteste Arnoux, vos deux haines s’entendent. J’ai vu sa joie quand tu as gagné ton procès pour le kaolin. Le nieras-tu, celui-là ?”

— “Je te donne ma parole...”

— “Oh ! je la connais, ta parole !”

Et Frédéric lui rappela ses amants par leurs noms, avec des détails circonstanciés. Rosanette, toute pâissante, se reculait.

— “Cela t’étonne ! Tu me croyais aveugle parce que je fermais les yeux. J’en ai assez, aujourd’hui ! On ne meurt pas pour les trahisons d’une femme de ton espèce. Quand elles deviennent trop monstrueuses, on s’en écarte ; ce serait se dégrader que de les punir !”

Elle se tordait les bras.

— “Mon Dieu, qu’est-ce donc qui l’a changé ?”

— “Pas d’autres que toi-même !”

— “Et tout cela pour Mme Arnoux !...” s’écria Rosanette en pleurant.

Il reprit froidement :

— “Je n’ai jamais aimé qu’elle !”

A cette insulte, ses larmes s’arrêtèrent.

— “Ça prouve ton bon goût ! Une personne d’un âge mûr, le teint couleur de réglisse, la taille épaisse, des yeux grands comme des soupiraux de cave, et vides comme eux ! Puisque ça te plaît, va la rejoindre”

— “C’est ce que j’attendais ! Merci !”

Rosanette demeura immobile, stupéfiée par ces façons extraordinaires. Elle laissa même la porte se refermer ; puis, d’un bond, elle le rattrapa dans l’antichambre, et, l’entourant de ses bras :

— “Mais tu es fou ! tu es fou ! c’est absurde ! je t’aime !” Elle le suppliait : “Mon Dieu, au nom de notre petit enfant !”

— “Avoue que c’est toi qui as fait le coup !” dit Frédéric.

Elle protesta encore de son innocence.

— “Tu ne veux pas avouer ?”

— “Non !”

— “Eh bien, adieu ! et pour toujours !”

— “Ecoute-moi !”

Frédéric se retourna.

— “Si tu me connaissais mieux, tu saurais que ma décision est irrévocable !”

— “Oh ! oh ! tu me reviendras !”

— “Jamais de la vie !”

Et il fit claquer la porte violemment.

Rosanette écrivit à Deslauriers qu’elle avait besoin de lui tout de suite.

Il arriva cinq jours après, un soir ; et, quand elle eut conté sa rupture :

— “Ce n’est que ça ! Beau malheur !”

Elle avait cru d’abord qu’il pourrait lui ramener Frédéric ; mais, à présent, tout était perdu. Elle avait appris, par son portier, son prochain mariage avec Mme Dambreuse.

Deslauriers lui fit de la morale, se montra même singulièrement gai, farceur ; et, comme il était fort tard, demanda la permission de passer la nuit sur un fauteuil. Puis, le lendemain matin, il repartit pour Nogent, en la prévenant qu'il ne savait pas quand ils se reverraient d'ici à peu, il y aurait peut-être un grand changement dans sa vie.

Deux heures après son retour, la ville était en révolution. On disait que M. Frédéric allait épouser Mme Dambreuse. Enfin, les trois demoiselles Auger, n'y tenant plus, se transportèrent chez Mme Moreau, qui confirma cette nouvelle avec orgueil. Le père Roque en fut malade. Louise s'enferma. Le bruit courut même qu'elle était folle.

Cependant, Frédéric ne pouvait cacher sa tristesse. Mme Dambreuse, pour l'en distraire sans doute, redoublait d'attentions. Toutes les après-midi, elle le promenait dans sa voiture ; et, une fois qu'ils passaient sur la place de la Bourse, elle eut l'idée d'entrer dans l'hôtel des commissaires-priseurs, par amusement.

C'était le 1er décembre, jour même où devait se faire la vente de Mme Arnoux. Il se rappela la date, et manifesta sa répugnance, en déclarant ce lieu intolérable, à cause de la foule et du bruit. Elle désirait y jeter un coup d'oeil seulement. Le coupé s'arrêta. Il fallait bien la suivre.

On voyait, dans la cour, des lavabos sans cuvettes, des bois de fauteuils, de vieux paniers, des tessons de porcelaine, des bouteilles vides, des matelas ; et des hommes en blouse ou en sale redingote, tout gris de poussière, la figure ignoble, quelques-uns avec des sacs de toile sur l'épaule, causaient par groupes distincts ou se hélaient tumultueusement.

Frédéric objecta les inconvénients d'aller plus loin.

— “Ah ! bah !”

Et ils montèrent l'escalier.

Dans la première salle, à droite, des messieurs, un catalogue à la main, examinaient des tableaux ; dans une autre, on vendait une collection d'armes chinoises ; Mme Dambreuse voulut descendre. Elle regardait les numéros au-dessus des portes, et elle le mena jusqu'à l'extrémité du corridor, vers une pièce encombrée de monde.

Il reconnut immédiatement les deux étagères de l'Art industriel, sa table à ouvrage, tous ses meubles ! Entassés au fond, par rang de taille, ils formaient un large talus depuis le plancher jusqu'aux fenêtres ; et, sur les autres côtés de l'appartement, les tapis et les rideaux pendaient droit le long des murs. Il y avait, en dessous, des gradins occupés par de vieux bonshommes qui sommeillaient. A gauche, s'élevait une espèce de comptoir, où le commissaire-priseur en cravate blanche brandissait légèrement un petit marteau. Un jeune homme, près de lui, écrivait ; et, plus bas, debout, un robuste gaillard, tenant du commis-voyageur et du marchand de contremarques, criait les meubles à vendre. Trois garçons les apportaient sur une table, que bordaient, assis en ligne, des brocanteurs et des revendeuses. La foule circulait derrière eux.

Quand Frédéric entra, les jupons, les fichus, les mouchoirs et jusqu'aux chemises étaient passés de main en main, retournés ; quelquefois, on les jetait de loin, et des blancheurs traversaient l'air tout à coup. Ensuite, on vendit ses robes, puis un de ses chapeaux dont la plume cassée retombait, puis ses fourrures, puis trois paires de bottines et le partage de ces reliques, où il retrouvait confusément les formes de ses membres, lui semblait une atrocité, comme s'il avait vu des corbeaux déchiquetant son cadavre. L'atmosphère de la salle, toute chargée d'haleines, l'écœurait. Mme Dambreuse lui offrit son flacon ; elle se divertissait beaucoup, disait-elle.

On exhiba les meubles de la chambre à coucher.

Me Berthelmot annonçait un prix. Le crieur, tout de suite, le répétait plus fort ; et les trois commissaires attendaient tranquillement le coup de marteau, puis emportaient l'objet dans une pièce contiguë. Ainsi disparurent, les uns après les autres, le grand tapis bleu semé de camélias que ses pieds mignons frôlaient en venant vers lui, la petite bergère de tapisserie où il s'asseyait toujours en face d'elle quand ils étaient seuls ; les deux écrans de la cheminée, dont l'ivoire était rendu plus doux par le contact de ses mains ; une pelote de velours, encore hérissée d'épingles. C'était comme des parties de son cœur qui s'en allaient avec ces choses ; et la monotonie des mêmes voix, des mêmes gestes l'engourdissait de fatigue, lui causait une torpeur funèbre, une dissolution.

Un craquement de soie se fit à son oreille ; Rosanette le touchait.

Elle avait eu connaissance de cette vente par Frédéric lui-même. Son chagrin passé, l'idée d'en tirer profit lui était venue. Elle arrivait pour la voir, en gilet de satin blanc à boutons de perles, avec une robe à falbalas, étroitement gantée, l'air vainqueur.

Il pâlit de colère. Elle regarda la femme qui l'accompagnait.

Mme Dambreuse l'avait reconnue ; et, pendant une minute, elles se considérèrent de haut en bas, scrupuleusement, afin de découvrir le défaut, la tare, — l'une enviant peut-être la jeunesse de l'autre, et celle-ci dépitée par l'extrême bon ton, la simplicité aristocratique de sa rivale.

Enfin, Mme Dambreuse détourna la tête, avec un sourire d'une insolence inexprimable.

Le crieur avait ouvert un piano, — son piano ! Tout en restant debout, il fit une gamme de la main droite, et annonça l'instrument pour douze cents francs, puis se rabattit à mille, à huit cents, à sept cents.

Mme Dambreuse, d'un ton folâtre, se moquait du sabot.

On posa devant les brocanteurs un petit coffret avec des médaillons, des angles et des fermoirs d'argent, le même qu'il avait vu au premier dîner dans la rue de Choiseul, qui ensuite avait été chez Rosanette, était revenu chez Mme Arnoux ; souvent, pendant leurs conversations, ses yeux le rencontraient ; il était lié à ses souvenirs les plus chers, et son âme se fondait d'attendrissement, quand Mme Dambreuse dit tout à coup :

— "Tiens ! je vais l'acheter."

— "Mais ce n'est pas curieux", reprit-il.

Elle le trouvait, au contraire, fort joli ; et le crieur en prônait la délicatesse :

— "Un bijou de la Renaissance ! Huit cents francs, messieurs ! En argent presque tout entier ! Avec un peu de blanc d'Espagne, ça brillera !"

Et, comme elle se poussait dans la foule :

— "Quelle singulière idée !" dit Frédéric.

— "Cela vous fâche ?"

— "Non ! Mais que peut-on faire de ce bibelot ?"

— "Qui sait ? y mettre des lettres d'amour, peut-être ?"

Elle eut un regard qui rendait l'allusion fort claire.

— "Raison de plus pour ne pas dépouiller les morts de leurs secrets."

— "Je ne la croyais pas si morte."

Elle ajouta distinctement : "Huit cent quatre-vingts francs !"

— "Ce que vous faites n'est pas bien", murmura Frédéric.

Elle riait.

— “Mais, chère amie, c’est la première grâce que je vous demande.”

— “Mais vous ne serez pas un mari aimable, savez-vous ?”

Quelqu’un venait de lancer une surenchère ; elle leva la main :

— “Neuf cents francs !”

— “Neuf cents francs !” répéta Me Berthelmont.

— “Neuf cent dix... — quinze... vingt... trente !” glapissait le crieur, tout en parcourant du regard l’assistance, avec des hochements de tête saccadés.

— “Prouvez-moi que ma femme est raisonnable”, dit Frédéric.

Il l’entraîna doucement vers la porte.

Le commissaire-priseur continuait.

— “Allons, allons, messieurs, neuf cent trente ! Y a-t-il marchand à neuf cent trente ?”

Mme Dambreuse, qui était arrivée sur le seuil, s’arrêta ; et, d’une voix haute :

— “Mille francs !”

Il y eut un frisson dans le public, un silence.

— “Mille francs, messieurs, mille francs Personne ne dit rien ? bien vu ? mille francs Adjugé” Le marteau d’ivoire s’abattit.

Elle fit passer sa carte, on lui envoya le coffret. Elle le plongea dans son manchon.

Frédéric sentit un grand froid lui traverser le cœur.

Mme Dambreuse n’avait pas quitté son bras ; et elle n’osa le regarder en face jusque dans la rue, où l’attendait sa voiture.

Elle s’y jeta comme un voleur qui s’échappe, et, quand elle fut assise, se retourna vers Frédéric. Il avait son chapeau à la main.

— “Vous ne montez pas ?”

— “Non, madame !”

Et, la saluant froidement, il ferma la portière, puis fit signe au cocher de partir.

Il éprouva d’abord un sentiment de joie et d’indépendance reconquise. Il était fier d’avoir vengé Mme Arnoux en lui sacrifiant une fortune ; puis il fut étonné de son action, et une courbature infinie l’accabla.

Le lendemain matin, son domestique lui apprit les nouvelles. L’état de siège était décrété, l’Assemblée dissoute, et une partie des représentants du peuple à Mazas. Les affaires publiques le laissèrent indifférent, tant il était préoccupé des siennes.

Il écrivit à des fournisseurs pour décommander plusieurs emplettes relatives à son mariage, qui lui apparaissait maintenant comme une spéculation un peu ignoble, et il exécutait Mme Dambreuse parce qu'il avait manqué, à cause d'elle, commettre une bassesse. Il en oubliait la Maréchale, ne s'inquiétait même pas de Mme Arnoux, ne songeant qu'à lui, à lui seul, — perdu dans les décombres de ses rêves, malade, plein de douleur et de découragement ; et, en haine du milieu factice où il avait tant souffert, il souhaita la fraîcheur de l'herbe, le repos de la province, une vie somnolente passée à l'ombre du toit natal avec des cœurs ingénus. Le mercredi soir enfin, il sortit.

Des groupes nombreux stationnaient sur le boulevard. De temps à autre, une patrouille les dissipait ; ils se reformaient derrière elle. On parlait librement, on vociférait contre la troupe des plaisanteries et des injures, sans rien de plus.

— “Comment ! est-ce qu'on ne va pas se battre ?” dit Frédéric à un ouvrier.

L'homme en blouse lui répondit :

— “Pas si bêtes de nous faire tuer pour les bourgeois Qu'ils s'arrangent !”

Et un monsieur grommela, tout en regardant de travers le faubourien :

— “Canailles de socialistes ! Si on pouvait, cette fois, les exterminer !”

Frédéric ne comprenait rien à tant de rancune et de sottise. Son dégoût de Paris en augmenta ; et, le surlendemain, il partit pour Nogent par le premier convoi.

Les maisons bientôt disparurent, la campagne s'élargit. Seul dans son wagon et les pieds sur la banquette, il ruminait les événements des derniers jours, tout son passé. Le souvenir de Louise lui revint.

— “Elle m'aimait, celle-là ! J'ai eu tort de ne pas saisir ce bonheur... Bah ! n'y pensons plus”

Puis, cinq minutes après :

— “Qui sait, cependant ?... plus tard, pourquoi pas ?”

Sa rêverie, comme ses yeux, s'enfonçait dans de vagues horizons.

— “Elle était naïve, une paysanne, presque une sauvage, mais si bonne !”

A mesure qu’il avançait vers Nogent, elle se rapprochait de lui. Quand on traversa les prairies de Sourdun, il l’aperçut sous les peupliers comme autrefois, coupant des joncs au bord des flaques d’eau ; on arrivait ; il descendit.

Puis il s’accouda sur le pont, pour revoir l’île et le jardin où ils s’étaient promenés un jour de soleil ; — et l’étourdissement du voyage et du grand air, la faiblesse qu’il gardait de ses émotions récentes, lui causant une sorte d’exaltation, il se dit :

— “Elle est peut-être sortie ; si j’allais la rencontrer” La cloche de Saint-Laurent tintait ; et il y avait sur la place, devant l’église, un rassemblement de pauvres, avec une calèche, la seule du pays (celle qui servait pour les noces), quand, sous le portail, tout à coup, dans un flot de bourgeois en cravate blanche, deux nouveaux mariés parurent.

Il se crut halluciné. Mais non ! C’était bien elle, Louise couverte d’un voile blanc qui tombait de ses cheveux rouges à ses talons ; et c’était bien lui, Deslauriers ! — portant un habit bleu brodé d’argent, un costume de préfet. Pourquoi donc ?

Frédéric se cacha dans l’angle d’une maison, pour laisser passer le cortège.

Honteux, vaincu, écrasé, il retourna vers le chemin de fer, et s’en revint à Paris.

Son cocher de fiacre assura que les barricades étaient dressées depuis le Château-d’Eau jusqu’au Gymnase, et prit par le faubourg Saint-Martin. Au coin de la rue de Provence, Frédéric mit pied à terre pour gagner les boulevards.

Il était cinq heures, une pluie fine tombait. Des bourgeois occupaient le trottoir du côté de l’Opéra. Les maisons d’en face étaient closes. Personne aux fenêtres. Dans toute la largeur du boulevard, des dragons galopèrent, à fond de train, penchés sur leurs chevaux, le sabre nu ; et les crinières de leurs casques et leurs grands manteaux blancs soulevés derrière eux passaient sur la lumière des becs de gaz, qui se tordaient au vent dans la brume. La foule les regardait, muette, terrifiée.

Entre les charges de cavalerie, des escouades de sergents de ville survenaient, pour faire refluer le monde dans les rues.

Mais, sur les marches de Tortoni, un homme, — Dussardier, — remarquable de loin à sa haute taille, restait sans plus bouger qu'une cariatide.

Un des agents qui marchait en tête, le tricorne sur les yeux, le menaça de son épée.

L'autre alors, s'avancant d'un pas, se mit à crier :

— “Vive la République !”

Il tomba sur le dos, les bras en croix.

Un hurlement d'horreur s'éleva de la foule. L'agent fit un cercle autour de lui avec son regard ; et Frédéric, béant, reconnut Sénécal.

CHAPITRE 6

Il voyagea.

Il connut la mélancolie des paquebots, les froids réveils sous la tente, l'étourdissement des paysages et des ruines, l'amertume des sympathies interrompues.

Il revint.

Il fréquenta le monde, et il eut d'autres amours, encore. Mais le souvenir continuel du premier les lui rendait insipides ; et puis la véhémence du désir, la fleur même de la sensation était perdue. Ses ambitions d'esprit avaient également diminué. Des années passèrent ; et il supportait le désœuvrement de son intelligence et l'inertie de son cœur.

Vers la fin de mars 1867, à la nuit tombante, comme il était seul dans son cabinet, une femme entra.

— “Madame Arnoux !”

— “Frédéric !”

Elle le saisit par les mains, l'attira doucement vers la fenêtre, et elle le considérait tout en répétant :

— “C'est lui ! C'est donc lui !”

Dans la pénombre du crépuscule, il n'apercevait que ses yeux sous la voilette de dentelle noire qui masquait sa figure.

Quand elle eut déposé au bord de la cheminée un petit portefeuille de velours grenat, elle s'assit. Tous deux restèrent sans pouvoir parler, se souriant l'un à l'autre.

Enfin, il lui adressa quantité de questions sur elle et son mari.

Ils habitaient le fond de la Bretagne, pour vivre économiquement et payer leurs dettes. Arnoux, presque toujours malade, semblait un vieillard maintenant. Sa fille était mariée à Bordeaux, et son fils en garnison à Mostaganem. Puis elle releva la tête :

— “Mais je vous revois ! Je suis heureuse !”

ne manqua pas de lui dire qu'à la nouvelle de leur catastrophe, il était accouru chez eux.

— “Je le savais !”

— “Comment ?”

Elle l'avait aperçu dans la cour, et s'était cachée.

— “Pourquoi ?”

Alors, d'une voix tremblante, et avec de longs intervalles entre ses mots :

— “J'avais peur ! Oui... peur de vous... de moi !”

Cette révélation lui donna comme un saisissement de volupté. Son cœur battait à grands coups. Elle reprit “Excusez-moi de n'être pas venue plus tôt.” Et désignant le petit portefeuille grenat couvert de palmes d'or :

— “Je l'ai brodé à votre intention, tout exprès. Il contient cette somme, dont les terrains de Belleville devaient répondre.”

Frédéric la remercia du cadeau, tout en la blâmant de s'être dérangée.

— “Non ! Ce n'est pas pour cela que je suis venue Je tenais à cette visite, puis je m'en retournerai... là-bas.”

Et elle lui parla de l'endroit qu'elle habitait.

C'était une maison basse, à un seul étage, avec un jardin rempli de buis énormes et une double avenue de châtaigniers montant jusqu'au haut de la colline, d'où l'on découvre la mer.

— “Je vais m'asseoir là, sur un banc, que j'ai appelé le banc Frédéric.”

Puis elle se mit à regarder les meubles, les bibelots, les cadres, avidement, pour les emporter dans sa mémoire. Le portrait de la Maréchale était à demi caché par un rideau. Mais les ors et les blancs, qui se détachaient au milieu des ténèbres, l'attirèrent.

— “Je connais cette femme, il me semble ?”

— “Impossible !” dit Frédéric. “C'est une vieille peinture italienne.”

Elle avoua qu'elle désirait faire un tour à son bras, dans les rues.

Ils sortirent.

La lueur des boutiques éclairait, par intervalles, son profil pâle ; puis l'ombre l'enveloppait de nouveau ; et, au milieu des voitures, de la foule et du bruit, ils allaient sans se distraire d'eux-mêmes, sans rien entendre, comme ceux qui marchent ensemble dans la campagne, sur un lit de feuilles mortes.

Ils se racontèrent leurs anciens jours, les dîners du temps de l'Art industriel, les manies d'Arnoux, sa façon de tirer les pointes de son faux-col, d'écraser du cosmétique sur ses moustaches, d'autres choses plus intimes et plus profondes. Quel ravissement il avait eu la première fois, en l'entendant chanter Comme elle était belle, le jour de sa fête, à Saint-Cloud ! Il lui rappela le petit jardin d'Auteuil, des soirs au théâtre, une rencontre sur le boulevard, d'anciens domestiques, sa négresse.

Elle s'étonnait de sa mémoire. Cependant, elle lui dit :

— “Quelquefois, vos paroles me reviennent comme un écho lointain, comme le son d'une cloche apporté par le vent ; et il me semble que vous êtes là, quand je lis des passages d'amour dans les livres.”

— “Tout ce qu'on y blâme d'exagéré, vous me l'avez fait ressentir”, dit Frédéric. “Je comprends Werther, que ne dégoûtent pas les tartines de Charlotte.”

— “Pauvre cher ami !”

Elle soupira ; et, après un long silence :

— “N'importe, nous nous serons bien aimés.”

— “Sans nous appartenir, pourtant !”

— “Cela vaut peut-être mieux”, reprit-elle.

— “Non ! non ! Quel bonheur nous aurions eu !”

— “Oh ! je le crois, avec un amour comme le vôtre !”

Et il devait être bien fort pour durer après une séparation si longue ! Frédéric lui demanda comment elle l'avait découvert.

— “C'est un soir que vous m'avez baisé le poignet entre le gant et la manchette. Je me suis dit :” Mais il m'aime... il m'aime. “J'avais peur de m'en assurer, cependant. Votre réserve était si charmante, que j'en jouissais comme d'un hommage involontaire et continu.”

Il ne regretta rien. Ses souffrances d'autrefois étaient payées.

Quand ils rentrèrent, Mme Arnoux ôta son chapeau. La lampe, posée sur une console, éclaira ses cheveux blancs. Ce fut comme un heurt en pleine poitrine.

Pour lui cacher cette déception, il se posa par terre à ses genoux, et, prenant ses mains, se mit à lui dire des tendresses.

— “Votre personne, vos moindres mouvements me semblaient avoir dans le monde une importante extrahumaine. Mon cœur, comme de la poussière, se soulevait derrière vos pas. Vous me faisiez l'effet d'un clair de lune par une nuit d'été, quand tout est parfums, ombres douces, blancheurs, infini ; et les délices de la chair et de l'âme étaient contenues pour moi dans votre nom, que je me répétais, en tâchant de le baiser sur mes lèvres. Je n'imaginai rien au-delà. C'était Mme Arnoux telle que vous étiez, avec ses deux enfants, tendre, sérieuse, belle à éblouir, et si bonne ! Cette image-là effaçait toutes les autres. Est-ce que j'y pensais, seulement ! puisque j'avais toujours au fond de moi-même la musique de votre voix et la splendeur de vos yeux !" Elle acceptait avec ravissement ces adorations pour la femme quelle n'était plus. Frédéric, se grisant par ses paroles, arrivait à croire ce qu'il disait. Madame Arnoux, le dos tourné à la lumière, se penchait vers lui. Il sentait sur son front la caresse de son haleine, à travers ses vêtements le contact indécis de tout son corps. Leurs mains se serrèrent ; la pointe de sa bottine s'avancait un peu sous sa robe, et il lui dit, presque défaillant :

— "La vue de votre pied me trouble."

Un mouvement de pudeur la fit se lever. Puis, immobile, et avec l'intonation singulière des somnambules :

— "A mon âge ! lui ! Frédéric !... Aucune n'a jamais été aimée comme moi ! Non, non ! à quoi sert d'être jeune ? Je m'en moque bien je les méprise, toutes celles qui viennent ici !"

— "Oh ! il n'en vient guère !" reprit-il complaisamment.

Son visage s'épanouit, et elle voulut savoir s'il se marierait.

Il jura que non.

— "Bien sûr ? pourquoi ?"

— "A cause de vous", dit Frédéric en la serrant dans ses bras.

Elle y restait, la taille en arrière, la bouche entrouverte, les yeux levés. Tout à coup, elle le repoussa avec un air de désespoir ; et, comme il la suppliait de lui répondre, elle dit en baissant la tête :

— "J'aurais voulu vous rendre heureux."

Frédéric soupçonna Mme Arnoux d'être venue pour s'offrir ; et il était repris par une convoitise plus forte que jamais, furieuse, enragée. Cependant, il sentait quelque chose d'inexprimable, une répulsion, et comme l'effroi d'un inceste. Une autre crainte l'arrêta, celle d'en avoir dégoûté plus tard. D'ailleurs, quel embarras ce serait !

— et tout à la fois par prudence et pour ne pas dégrader son idéal, il tourna sur ses talons et se mit à faire une cigarette.

Elle le contemplait, tout émerveillée.

— “Comme vous êtes délicat ! Il n’y a que vous ! Il n’y a que vous !”

Onze heures sonnèrent.

— “Déjà !” dit-elle ; “au quart, je m’en irai.”

Elle se rassit ; mais elle observait la pendule, et il continuait à marcher en fumant. Tous les deux ne trouvaient plus rien à se dire. Il y a un moment, dans les séparations, où la personne aimée n’est déjà plus avec nous.

Enfin, l’aiguille ayant dépassé vingt-cinq minutes, elle prit son chapeau par les brides, lentement.

— “Adieu, mon ami, mon cher ami ! Je ne vous reverrai jamais ! C’était ma dernière démarche de femme. Mon âme ne vous quittera pas. Que toutes les bénédictions du ciel soient sur vous !”

Et elle le baisa au front, comme une mère.

Mais elle parut chercher quelque chose, et lui demanda des ciseaux. Elle défit son peigne ; tous ses cheveux blancs tombèrent. Elle s’en coupa, brutalement, à la racine, une longue mèche.

— “Gardez-les ! Adieu !”

Quand elle fut sortie, Frédéric ouvrit sa fenêtre, Mme Arnoux, sur le trottoir, fit signe d’avancer à un fiacre qui passait. Elle monta dedans. La voiture disparut.

Et ce fut tout.

CHAPITRE 7

Vers le commencement de cet hiver, Frédéric et Deslauriers causaient au coin du feu, réconciliés encore une fois, par la fatalité de leur nature qui les faisait toujours se rejoindre et s'aimer.

L'un expliqua sommairement sa brouille avec Mme Dambreuse, laquelle s'était remariée à un Anglais.

L'autre, sans dire comment il avait épousé Mlle Roque, conta que sa femme, un beau jour, s'était enfuie avec un chanteur. Pour se laver un peu du ridicule, il s'était compromis dans sa préfecture par des excès de zèle gouvernemental. On l'avait destitué. Il avait été, ensuite, chef de colonisation en Algérie, secrétaire d'un pacha, gérant d'un journal, courtier d'annonces, pour être finalement employé au contentieux dans une compagnie industrielle.

Quant à Frédéric, ayant mangé les deux tiers de sa fortune, il vivait en petit bourgeois.

Puis, ils s'informèrent mutuellement de leurs amis.

Martinon était maintenant sénateur.

Hussonnet occupait une haute place, où il se trouvait avoir sous sa main tous les théâtres et toute la presse.

Cisy, enfoncé dans la religion et père de huit enfants, habitait le château de ses aïeux.

Pellerin, après avoir donné dans le fouriérisme, l'homéopathie, les tables tournantes, l'art gothique et la peinture humanitaire, était devenu photographe ; et sur toutes les murailles de Paris, on le voyait représenté en habit noir avec un corps minuscule et une grosse tête.

— “Et ton intime Sénecal ?” demanda Frédéric.

— “Disparu ! Je ne sais ! Et toi, ta grande passion, Mme Arnoux ?”

— “Elle doit être à Rome avec son fils, lieutenant de chasseurs.”

— “Et son mari ?”

— “Mort l'année dernière.”

— “Tiens !” dit l'avocat.

Puis se frappant le front :

— “A propos, l'autre jour, dans une boutique, j'ai rencontré cette bonne Maréchale, tenant par la main un petit garçon qu'elle a adopté.

Elle est veuve d'un certain M. Oudry, et très grosse maintenant, énorme. Quelle décadence ! Elle qui avait autrefois la taille si mince.”

Deslauriers ne cacha pas qu'il avait profité de son désespoir pour s'en assurer par lui-même.

— “Comme tu me l'avais permis, du reste.”

Cet aveu était une compensation au silence qu'il gardait touchant sa tentative près de Mme Arnoux. Frédéric l'eût pardonnée, puisqu'elle n'avait pas réussi. Bien que vexé un peu de la découverte, il fit semblant d'en rire ; et l'idée de la Maréchale lui amena celle de la Vatnaz.

Deslauriers ne l'avait jamais vue, non plus que bien d'autres qui venaient chez Arnoux ; mais il se souvenait parfaitement de Regimbart.

— “Vit-il encore ?”

— “A peine ! Tous les soirs, régulièrement, depuis la rue de Grammont jusqu'à la rue Montmartre, il se traîne devant les cafés, affaibli, courbé en deux, vidé, un spectre !”

— “Eh bien, et Compain ?”

Frédéric poussa un cri de joie, et pria l'ex-délégué du Gouvernement provisoire de lui apprendre le mystère de la tête de veau.

— “C'est une importation anglaise. Pour parodier la cérémonie que les royalistes célébraient le 30 janvier, des Indépendants fondèrent un banquet annuel, où l'on mangeait des têtes de veau, et on buvait du vin rouge dans des crânes de veau, en portant des toasts à l'extermination des Stuarts. Après thermidor, des terroristes organisèrent une confrérie toute pareille, ce qui prouve que la bêtise est féconde.”

— “Tu me parais bien calmé sur la politique ?”

— “Effet de l'âge”, dit l'avocat.

Et ils résumèrent leur vie.

Ils l'avaient manquée tous les deux, celui qui avait rêvé l'amour, celui qui avait rêvé le pouvoir. Quelle en était la raison ?

— “C'est peut-être le défaut de ligne droite”, dit Frédéric.

— “Pour toi, cela se peut. Moi, au contraire, j'ai péché par excès de rectitude, sans tenir compte de mille choses secondaires, plus fortes que tout. J'avais trop de logique, et toi de sentiment.”

Puis, ils accusèrent le hasard, les circonstances, l'époque où ils étaient nés.

Frédéric reprit :

— “Ce n’est pas là ce que nous croyions devenir autrefois, à Sens, quand tu voulais faire une histoire critique de la Philosophie, et moi, un grand roman moyen âge sur Nogent, dont j’avais trouvé le sujet dans Froissart : Comment messire Brokars de Fénéstranges et l’évêque de Troyes assaillirent messire Eustache d’Ambrecicourt. Te rappelles-tu ?”

Et, exhumant leur jeunesse, à chaque phrase, ils se disaient :

— “Te rappelles-tu ?”

Ils revoyaient la cour du collège, la chapelle, le parloir, la salle d’armes au bas de l’escalier, des figures de pions et d’élèves, un nommé Angelmarre, de Versailles, qui se taillait des sous-pieds dans de vieilles bottes, M. Mirbal et ses favoris rouges, les deux professeurs de dessin linéaire et de grand dessin, Varaud et Suriret, toujours en dispute, et le Polonais, le compatriote de Copernic, avec son système planétaire en carton, astronome ambulant dont on avait payé la séance par un repas au réfectoire, — puis une terrible ribote en promenade, leurs premières pipes fumées, les distributions des prix, la joie des vacances.

C’était pendant celles de 1837 qu’ils avaient été chez la Turque.

On appelait ainsi une femme qui se nommait de son vrai nom Zoraïde Turc ; et beaucoup de personnes la croyaient une musulmane, une Turque, ce qui ajoutait à la poésie de son établissement, situé au bord de l’eau, derrière le rempart ; même en plein été, il y avait de l’ombre autour de sa maison, reconnaissable à un bocal de poissons rouges près d’un pot de réséda sur une fenêtre. Des demoiselles en camisole blanche, avec du fard aux pommettes et de longues boucles d’oreilles, frappaient aux carreaux quand on passait, et, le soir, sur le pas de la porte, chantaient doucement d’une voix rauque.

Ce lieu de perdition projetait dans tout l’arrondissement un éclat fantastique. On le désignait par des périphrases : “L’endroit que vous savez, — une certaine rue, — au bas des Ponts.” Les fermières des alentours en tremblaient pour leurs maris, les bourgeoises le redoutaient pour leurs bonnes, parce que la cuisinière de M. le sous-préfet y avait été surprise ; et c’était, bien entendu, l’obsession secrète de tous les adolescents.

Or, un dimanche, pendant qu'on était aux Vêpres, Frédéric et Deslauriers, s'étant fait préalablement friser, cueillirent des fleurs dans le jardin de Mme Moreau, puis sortirent par la porte des champs, et, après un grand détour dans les vignes, revinrent par la Pêcherie et se glissèrent chez la Turque, en tenant toujours leurs gros bouquets.

Frédéric présenta le sien, comme un amoureux à sa fiancée. Mais la chaleur qu'il, faisait, l'appréhension de l'inconnu, une espèce de remords, et jusqu'au plaisir de voir, d'un seul coup d'oeil, tant de femmes à sa disposition, l'émurent tellement, qu'il devint très pâle et restait sans avancer, sans rien dire. Toutes riaient, joyeuses de son embarras ; croyant qu'on s'en moquait, il s'enfuit ; et, comme Frédéric avait l'argent, Deslauriers fut bien obligé de le suivre.

On les vit sortir. Cela fit une histoire, qui n'était pas oubliée trois ans après.

Ils se la contèrent prolixement, chacun complétant les souvenirs de l'autre ; et, quand ils eurent fini :

— “C'est là ce que nous avons eu de meilleur !” dit Frédéric.

— “Oui, peut-être bien ? C'est là ce que nous avons eu de meilleur !” dit Deslauriers.

FIN

BOUVARD AND PÉCUCHET

Translated by D. F. Hannigan

This unfinished satirical work was published posthumously in 1881, a year after Flaubert's death. Although conceived in 1863 as Les Deux Cloportes, Flaubert did not begin the novel in earnest until 1872, at a time when he was threatened with financial ruin. Over time, the novel obsessed him to the degree that he claimed to have read over 1500 books in preparation of its composition. It was intended to be his masterpiece, although it received lukewarm reviews, with many critics failing to appreciate its merits.

The novel concerns the adventures of two Parisian copy-clerks, François Denys Bartholomée Bouvard and Juste Romain Cyrille Pécuchet, who are of the same age and temperament. They meet one hot summer day in 1838 by the canal Saint-Martin and form an instant, symbiotic friendship. When Bouvard inherits a sizable fortune, the two decide to move to the countryside. They find a 94-acre property near the town of Chavignolles in Normandy, between Caen and Falaise. Their search for intellectual stimulation leads them, over the course of years, to flounder through almost every branch of knowledge. Flaubert uses their quest to expose the hidden weaknesses of the sciences and arts, as nearly every project Bouvard and Pécuchet set their minds on comes to grief. Their endeavours are interleaved with the story of their deteriorating relations with the local villagers; and the Revolution of 1848 is the occasion for much despondent discussion.

The manuscript breaks off near the end of the novel. According to Flaubert's notes, the townsfolk, enraged by Bouvard and Pécuchet's antics, try to force them out of the area, or have them committed.

CHAPTER I.

Kindred Souls.

As there were thirty-three degrees of heat the Boulevard Bourdon was absolutely deserted.

Farther down, the Canal St. Martin, confined by two locks, showed in a straight line its water black as ink. In the middle of it was a boat, filled with timber, and on the bank were two rows of casks.

Beyond the canal, between the houses which separated the timber-yards, the great pure sky was cut up into plates of ultramarine; and under the reverberating light of the sun, the white façades, the slate roofs, and the granite wharves glowed dazzlingly. In the distance arose a confused noise in the warm atmosphere; and the idleness of Sunday, as well as the melancholy engendered by the summer heat, seemed to shed around a universal languor.

Two men made their appearance.

One came from the direction of the Bastille; the other from that of the Jardin des Plantes. The taller of the pair, arrayed in linen cloth, walked with his hat back, his waistcoat unbuttoned, and his cravat in his hand. The smaller, whose form was covered with a maroon frock-coat, wore a cap with a pointed peak.

As soon as they reached the middle of the boulevard, they sat down, at the same moment, on the same seat.

In order to wipe their foreheads they took off their headgear, each placing his beside himself; and the little man saw "Bouvard" written in his neighbour's hat, while the latter easily traced "Pécuchet" in the cap of the person who wore the frock-coat.

"Look here!" he said; "we have both had the same idea — to write our names in our head-coverings!"

"Yes, faith, for they might carry off mine from my desk."

"'Tis the same way with me. I am an employé."

Then they gazed at each other. Bouvard's agreeable visage quite charmed Pécuchet.

His blue eyes, always half-closed, smiled in his fresh-coloured face. His trousers, with big flaps, which creased at the end over beaver shoes, took the shape of his stomach, and made his shirt bulge out at the waist; and his fair hair, which of its own accord grew in tiny curls, gave him a somewhat childish look.

He kept whistling continually with the tips of his lips.

Bouvard was struck by the serious air of Pécuchet. One would have thought that he wore a wig, so flat and black were the locks which adorned his high skull. His face seemed entirely in profile, on account of his nose, which descended very low. His legs, confined in tight wrappings of lasting, were entirely out of proportion with the length of his bust. His voice was loud and hollow.

This exclamation escaped him:

"How pleasant it would be in the country!"

But, according to Bouvard, the suburbs were unendurable on account of the noise of the public-houses outside the city. Pécuchet was of the same opinion. Nevertheless, he was beginning to feel tired of the capital, and so was Bouvard.

And their eyes wandered over heaps of stones for building, over the hideous water in which a truss of straw was floating, over a factory chimney rising towards the horizon. Sewers sent forth their poisonous exhalations. They turned to the opposite side; and they had in front of them the walls of the Public Granary.

Decidedly (and Pécuchet was surprised at the fact), it was still warmer in the street than in his own house. Bouvard persuaded him to put down his overcoat. As for him, he laughed at what people might say about him.

Suddenly, a drunken man staggered along the footpath; and the pair began a political discussion on the subject of working-men. Their opinions were similar, though perhaps Bouvard was rather more liberal in his views.

A noise of wheels sounded on the pavement amid a whirlpool of dust. It turned out to be three hired carriages which were going towards Bercy, carrying a bride with her bouquet, citizens in white cravats, ladies with their petticoats huddled up so as almost to touch their armpits, two or three little girls, and a student.

The sight of this wedding-party led Bouvard and Pécuchet to talk about women, whom they declared to be frivolous, waspish, obstinate. In spite of this, they were often better than men; but at other times they were worse. In short, it was better to live without them. For his part, Pécuchet was a bachelor.

"As for me, I'm a widower," said Bouvard, "and I have no children."

"Perhaps you are lucky there. But, in the long run, solitude is very sad."

Then, on the edge of the wharf, appeared a girl of the town with a soldier, — sallow, with black hair, and marked with smallpox. She leaned on the soldier's arm, dragging her feet along, and swaying on her hips.

When she was a short distance from them, Bouvard indulged in a coarse remark. Pécuchet became very red in the face, and, no doubt to avoid answering, gave him a look to indicate the fact that a priest was coming in their direction.

The ecclesiastic slowly descended the avenue, along which lean elm trees were placed as landmarks, and Bouvard, when he no longer saw the priest's three-cornered head-piece, expressed his relief; for he hated Jesuits. Pécuchet, without absolving them from blame, exhibited some respect for religion.

Meanwhile, the twilight was falling, and the window-blinds in front of them were raised. The passers-by became more numerous. Seven o'clock struck.

Their words rushed on in an inexhaustible stream; remarks succeeding to anecdotes, philosophic views to individual considerations. They disparaged the management of the bridges and causeways, the tobacco administration, the theatres, our marine, and the entire human race, like people who had undergone great mortifications. In listening to each other both found again some ideas which had long since slipped out of their minds; and though they had passed the age of simple emotions, they experienced a new pleasure, a kind of expansion, the tender charm associated with their first appearance on life's stage.

Twenty times they had risen and sat down again, and had proceeded along the boulevard from the upper to the lower lock, each time intending to take their departure, but not having the strength to do so, held back by a kind of fascination.

However, they came to parting at last, and they had clasped each other's hands, when Bouvard said all of a sudden:

"Faith! what do you say to our dining together?"

"I had the very same idea in my own head," returned Pécuchet, "but I hadn't the courage to propose it to you."

And he allowed himself to be led towards a little restaurant facing the Hôtel de Ville, where they would be comfortable.

Bouvard called for the menu. Pécuchet was afraid of spices, as they might inflame his blood. This led to a medical discussion. Then they glorified the utility of science: how many things could be learned, how many researches one could make, if one had only time! Alas! earning one's bread took up all one's time; and they raised their arms in astonishment, and were near embracing each other over the table on discovering that they were both copyists, Bouvard in a commercial establishment, and Pécuchet in the Admiralty, which did not, however, prevent him from devoting a few spare moments each evening to study. He had noted faults in M. Thiers's work, and he spoke with the utmost respect of a certain professor named Dumouchel.

Bouvard had the advantage of him in other ways. His hair watch-chain, and his manner of whipping-up the mustard-sauce, revealed the greybeard, full of experience; and he ate with the corners of his napkin under his armpits, giving utterance to things which made Pécuchet laugh. It was a peculiar laugh, one very low note, always the same, emitted at long intervals. Bouvard's laugh was explosive, sonorous, uncovering his teeth, shaking his shoulders, and making the customers at the door turn round to stare at him.

When they had dined they went to take coffee in another establishment. Pécuchet, on contemplating the gas-burners, groaned over the spreading torrent of luxury; then, with an imperious movement, he flung aside the newspapers. Bouvard was more indulgent on this point. He liked all authors indiscriminately, having been disposed in his youth to go on the stage.

He had a fancy for trying balancing feats with a billiard-cue and two ivory balls, such as Barberou, one of his friends, had performed. They invariably fell, and, rolling along the floor between people's legs, got lost in some distant corner. The waiter, who had to rise every time to search for them on all-fours under the benches, ended by making complaints. Pécuchet picked a quarrel with him; the coffee-house keeper came on the scene, but Pécuchet would listen to no excuses, and even cavilled over the amount consumed.

He then proposed to finish the evening quietly at his own abode, which was quite near, in the Rue St. Martin. As soon as they had entered he put on a kind of cotton nightgown, and did the honours of his apartment.

A deal desk, placed exactly in the centre of the room caused inconvenience by its sharp corners; and all around, on the boards, on the three chairs, on the old armchair, and in the corners, were scattered pell-mell a number of volumes of the "Roret Encyclopædia," "The Magnetiser's Manual," a Fénelon, and other old books, with heaps of waste paper, two cocoa-nuts, various medals, a Turkish cap, and shells brought back from Havre by Dumouchel. A layer of dust velveted the walls, which otherwise had been painted yellow. The shoe-brush was lying at the side of the bed, the coverings of which hung down. On the ceiling could be seen a big black stain, produced by the smoke of the lamp.

Bouvard, on account of the smell no doubt, asked permission to open the window.

"The papers will fly away!" cried Pécuchet, who was more afraid of the currents of air.

However, he panted for breath in this little room, heated since morning by the slates of the roof.

Bouvard said to him: "If I were in your place, I would remove my flannel."

"What!" And Pécuchet cast down his head, frightened at the idea of no longer having his healthful flannel waistcoat.

"Let me take the business in hand," resumed Bouvard; "the air from outside will refresh you."

At last Pécuchet put on his boots again, muttering, "Upon my honour, you are bewitching me." And, notwithstanding the distance, he accompanied Bouvard as far as the latter's house at the corner of the Rue de Béthune, opposite the Pont de la Tournelle.

Bouvard's room, the floor of which was well waxed, and which had curtains of cotton cambric and mahogany furniture, had the advantage of a balcony overlooking the river. The two principal ornaments were a liqueur-frame in the middle of the chest of drawers, and, in a row beside the glass, daguerreotypes representing his friends. An oil painting occupied the alcove.

"My uncle!" said Bouvard. And the taper which he held in his hand shed its light on the portrait of a gentleman.

Red whiskers enlarged his visage, which was surmounted by a forelock curling at its ends. His huge cravat, with the triple collar of his shirt, and his velvet waistcoat and black coat, appeared to cramp him. You would have imagined there were diamonds on his shirt-frill. His eyes seemed fastened to his cheekbones, and he smiled with a cunning little air.

Pécuchet could not keep from saying, "One would rather take him for your father!"

"He is my godfather," replied Bouvard carelessly, adding that his baptismal name was François-Denys-Bartholémée.

Pécuchet's baptismal name was Juste-Romain-Cyrille, and their ages were identical — forty-seven years. This coincidence caused them satisfaction, but surprised them, each having thought the other much older. They next vented their admiration for Providence, whose combinations are sometimes marvellous.

"For, in fact, if we had not gone out a while ago to take a walk we might have died before knowing each other."

And having given each other their employers' addresses, they exchanged a cordial "good night."

"Don't go to see the women!" cried Bouvard on the stairs.

Pécuchet descended the steps without answering this coarse jest.

Next day, in the space in front of the establishment of MM. Descambos Brothers, manufacturers of Alsatian tissues, 92, Rue Hautefeuille, a voice called out:

"Bouvard! Monsieur Bouvard!"

The latter glanced through the window-panes and recognised Pécuchet, who articulated more loudly:

"I am not ill! I have remained away!"

"Why, though?"

"This!" said Pécuchet, pointing at his breast.

All the talk of the day before, together with the temperature of the apartment and the labours of digestion, had prevented him from sleeping, so much so that, unable to stand it any longer, he had flung off his flannel waistcoat. In the morning he recalled his action, which fortunately had no serious consequences, and he came to inform Bouvard about it, showing him in this way that he had placed him very high in his esteem.

He was a small shopkeeper's son, and had no recollection of his mother, who died while he was very young. At fifteen he had been taken away from a boarding-school to be sent into the employment of a process-server. The gendarmes invaded his employer's residence one day, and that worthy was sent off to the galleys — a stern history which still caused him a thrill of terror. Then he had attempted many callings — apothecary's apprentice, usher, book-keeper in a packet-boat on the Upper Seine. At length, a head of a department in the Admiralty, smitten by his handwriting, had employed him as a copying-clerk; but the consciousness of a defective education, with the intellectual needs engendered by it, irritated his temper, and so he lived altogether alone, without relatives, without a mistress. His only distraction was to go out on Sunday to inspect public works.

The earliest recollections of Bouvard carried him back across the banks of the Loire into a farmyard. A man who was his uncle had brought him to Paris to teach him commerce. At his majority, he got a few thousand francs. Then he took a wife, and opened a confectioner's shop. Six months later his wife disappeared, carrying off the cash-box. Friends, good cheer, and above all, idleness, had speedily accomplished his ruin. But he was inspired by the notion of utilising his beautiful chirography, and for the past twelve years he had clung to the same post in the establishment of MM. Descambos Brothers, manufacturers of tissues, 92, Rue Hautefeuille. As for his uncle, who formerly had sent him the celebrated portrait as a memento, Bouvard did not even know his residence, and expected nothing more from him. Fifteen hundred francs a year and his salary as copying-clerk enabled him every evening to take a nap at a coffee-house. Thus their meeting had the importance of an adventure. They were at once drawn together by secret fibres. Besides, how can we explain sympathies? Why does a certain peculiarity, a certain imperfection, indifferent or hateful in one person, prove a fascination in another? That which we call the thunderbolt is true as regards all the passions.

Before the month was over they "thou'd" and "thee'd" each other.

Frequently they came to see each other at their respective offices. As soon as one made his appearance, the other shut up his writing-desk, and they went off together into the streets. Bouvard walked with long strides, whilst Pécuchet, taking innumerable steps, with his frock-coat flapping at his heels, seemed to slip along on rollers. In the same way, their peculiar tastes were in harmony. Bouvard smoked his pipe, loved cheese, regularly took his half-glass of brandy. Pécuchet snuffed, at dessert ate only preserves, and soaked a piece of sugar in his coffee. One was self-confident, flighty, generous; the other prudent, thoughtful, and thrifty.

In order to please him, Bouvard desired to introduce Pécuchet to Barberou. He was an ex-commercial traveller, and now a purse-maker — a good fellow, a patriot, a ladies' man, and one who affected the language of the faubourgs. Pécuchet did not care for him, and he brought Bouvard to the residence of Dumouchel. This author (for he had published a little work on mnemonics) gave lessons in literature at a young ladies' boarding-school, and had orthodox opinions and a grave deportment. He bored Bouvard.

Neither of the two friends concealed his opinion from the other. Each recognised the correctness of the other's view. They altered their habits, they quitting their humdrum lodgings, and ended by dining together every day.

They made observations on the plays at the theatre, on the government, the dearness of living, and the frauds of commerce. From time to time, the history of Collier or the trial of Fualdès turned up in their conversations; and then they sought for the causes of the Revolution.

They lounged along by the old curiosity shops. They visited the School of Arts and Crafts, St. Denis, the Gobelins, the Invalides, and all the public collections.

When they were asked for their passports, they made pretence of having lost them, passing themselves off as two strangers, two Englishmen.

In the galleries of the Museum, they viewed the stuffed quadrupeds with amazement, the butterflies with delight, and the metals with indifference; the fossils made them dream; the conchological specimens bored them. They examined the hot-houses through the glass, and groaned at the thought that all these leaves distilled poisons. What they admired about the cedar was that it had been brought over in a hat.

At the Louvre they tried to get enthusiastic about Raphael. At the great library they desired to know the exact number of volumes.

On one occasion they attended at a lecture on Arabic at the College of France, and the professor was astonished to see these two unknown persons attempting to take notes. Thanks to Barberou, they penetrated into the green-room of a little theatre. Dumouchel got them tickets for a sitting at the Academy. They inquired about discoveries, read the prospectuses, and this curiosity developed their intelligence. At the end of a horizon, growing every day more remote, they perceived things at the same time confused and marvellous.

When they admired an old piece of furniture they regretted that they had not lived at the period when it was used, though they were absolutely ignorant of what period it was. In accordance with certain names, they imagined countries only the more beautiful in proportion to their utter lack of definite information about them. The works of which the titles were to them unintelligible, appeared to their minds to contain some mysterious knowledge.

And the more ideas they had, the more they suffered. When a mail-coach crossed them in the street, they felt the need of going off with it. The Quay of Flowers made them sigh for the country.

One Sunday they started for a walking tour early in the morning, and, passing through Meudon, Bellevue, Suresnes, and Auteuil, they wandered about all day amongst the vineyards, tore up wild poppies by the sides of fields, slept on the grass, drank milk, ate under the acacias in the gardens of country inns, and got home very late — dusty, worn-out, and enchanted.

They often renewed these walks. They felt so sad next day that they ended by depriving themselves of them.

The monotony of the desk became odious to them. Always the eraser and the sandarac, the same inkstand, the same pens, and the same companions. Looking on the latter as stupid fellows, they talked to them less and less. This cost them some annoyances. They came after the regular hour every day, and received reprimands.

Formerly they had been almost happy, but their occupation humiliated them since they had begun to set a higher value on themselves, and their disgust increased while they were mutually glorifying and spoiling each other. Pécuchet contracted Bouvard's bluntness, and Bouvard assumed a little of Pécuchet's moroseness.

"I have a mind to become a mountebank in the streets!" said one to the other.

"As well to be a rag-picker!" exclaimed his friend.

What an abominable situation! And no way out of it. Not even the hope of it!

One afternoon (it was the 20th of January, 1839) Bouvard, while at his desk, received a letter left by the postman.

He lifted up both hands; then his head slowly fell back, and he sank on the floor in a swoon.

The clerks rushed forward; they took off his cravat; they sent for a physician. He re-opened his eyes; then, in answer to the questions they put to him:

"Ah! the fact is — — the fact is — — A little air will relieve me. No; let me alone. Kindly give me leave to go out."

And, in spite of his corpulence, he rushed, all breathless, to the Admiralty office, and asked for Pécuchet.

Pécuchet appeared.

"My uncle is dead! I am his heir!"

"It isn't possible!"

Bouvard showed him the following lines:

OFFICE OF MAÎTRE TARDIVEL, NOTARY.

Savigny-en-Septaine, 14th January, 1839.

Sir, — I beg of you to call at my office in order to take notice there of the will of your natural father, M. François-Denys-Bartholomée Bouvard, ex-merchant in the town of Nantes, who died in this parish on the 10th of the present month. This will contains a very important disposition in your favour.

Tardivel, Notary.

Pécuchet was obliged to sit down on a boundary-stone in the courtyard outside the office.

Then he returned the paper, saying slowly:

"Provided that this is not — some practical joke."

"You think it is a farce!" replied Bouvard, in a stifled voice like the rattling in the throat of a dying man.

But the postmark, the name of the notary's office in printed characters, the notary's own signature, all proved the genuineness of the news; and they regarded each other with a trembling at the corners of their mouths and tears in their staring eyes.

They wanted space to breathe freely. They went to the Arc de Triomphe, came back by the water's edge, and passed beyond Notre Dame. Bouvard was very flushed. He gave Pécuchet blows with his fist in the back, and for five minutes talked utter nonsense.

They chuckled in spite of themselves. This inheritance, surely, ought to mount up — — ?

"Ah! that would be too much of a good thing. Let's talk no more about it."

They did talk again about it. There was nothing to prevent them from immediately demanding explanations. Bouvard wrote to the notary with that view.

The notary sent a copy of the will, which ended thus:

"Consequently, I give to François-Denys-Bartholémée Bouvard, my recognised natural son, the portion of my property disposable by law."

The old fellow had got this son in his youthful days, but he had carefully kept it dark, making him pass for a nephew; and the "nephew" had always called him "my uncle," though he had his own idea on the matter. When he was about forty, M. Bouvard married; then he was left a widower. His two legitimate sons having gone against his wishes, remorse took possession of him for the desertion of his other child during a long period of years. He would have even sent for the lad but for the influence of his female cook. She left him, thanks to the manœuvres of the family, and in his isolation, when death drew nigh, he wished to repair the wrongs he had done by bequeathing to the fruit of his early love all that he could of his fortune. It ran up to half a million francs, thus giving the copying-clerk two hundred and fifty thousand francs. The eldest of the brothers, M. Étienne, had announced that he would respect the will.

Bouvard fell into a kind of stupefied condition. He kept repeating in a low tone, smiling with the peaceful smile of drunkards: "An income of fifteen thousand livres!" — and Pécuchet, whose head, however, was stronger, was not able to get over it.

They were rudely shaken by a letter from Tardivel. The other son, M. Alexandre, declared his intention to have the entire matter decided by law, and even to question the legacy, if he could, requiring, first of all, to have everything sealed, and to have an inventory taken and a sequestrator appointed, etc. Bouvard got a bilious attack in consequence. Scarcely had he recovered when he started for Savigny, from which place he returned without having brought the matter nearer to a settlement, and he could only grumble about having gone to the expense of a journey for nothing. Then followed sleepless nights, alternations of rage and hope, of exaltation and despondency. Finally, after the lapse of six months, his lordship Alexandre was appeased, and Bouvard entered into possession of his inheritance.

His first exclamation was: "We will retire into the country!" And this phrase, which bound up his friend with his good fortune, Pécuchet had found quite natural. For the union of these two men was absolute and profound. But, as he did not wish to live at Bouvard's expense, he would not go before he got his retiring pension. Two years more; no matter! He remained inflexible, and the thing was decided.

In order to know where to settle down, they passed in review all the provinces. The north was fertile, but too cold; the south delightful, so far as the climate was concerned, but inconvenient because of the mosquitoes; and the middle portion of the country, in truth, had nothing about it to excite curiosity. Brittany would have suited them, were it not for the bigoted tendency of its inhabitants. As for the regions of the east, on account of the Germanic patois they could not dream of it. But there were other places. For instance, what about Forez, Bugey, and Rumois? The maps said nothing about them. Besides, whether their house happened to be in one place or in another, the important thing was to have one. Already they saw themselves in their shirt-sleeves, at the edge of a plat-band, pruning rose trees, and digging, dressing, settling the ground, growing tulips in pots. They would awaken at the singing of the lark to follow the plough; they would go with baskets to gather apples, would look on at butter-making, the thrashing of corn, sheep-shearing, bee-culture, and would feel delight in the lowing of cows and in the scent of new-mown hay. No more writing! No more heads of departments! No more even quarters' rent to pay! For they had a dwelling-house of their own! And they would eat the hens of their own poultry-yard, the vegetables of their own garden, and would dine without taking off their wooden shoes! "We'll do whatever we like! We'll let our beards grow!"

They would purchase horticultural implements, then a heap of things "that might perhaps be useful," such as a tool-chest (there was always need of one in a house), next, scales, a land-surveyor's chain, a bathing-tub in case they got ill, a thermometer, and even a barometer, "on the Gay-Lussac system," for physical experiences, if they took a fancy that way. It would not be a bad thing either (for a person cannot always be working out of doors), to have some good literary works; and they looked out for them, very embarrassed sometimes to know if such a book was really "a library book."

Bouvard settled the question. "Oh! we shall not want a library. Besides, I have my own."

They prepared their plans beforehand. Bouvard would bring his furniture, Pécuchet his big black table; they would turn the curtains to account; and, with a few kitchen utensils, this would be quite sufficient. They swore to keep silent about all this, but their faces spoke volumes. So their colleagues thought them funny. Bouvard, who wrote spread over his desk, with his elbows out, in order the better to round his letters, gave vent to a kind of whistle while half-closing his heavy eyelids with a waggish air. Pécuchet, squatted on a big straw foot-stool, was always carefully forming the pot-hooks of his large handwriting, but all the while swelling his nostrils and pressing his lips together, as if he were afraid of letting his secret slip.

After eighteen months of inquiries, they had discovered nothing. They made journeys in all the outskirts of Paris, both from Amiens to Evreux, and from Fontainebleau to Havre. They wanted a country place which would be a thorough country place, without exactly insisting on a picturesque site; but a limited horizon saddened them.

They fled from the vicinity of habitations, and only redoubled their solitude.

Sometimes they made up their minds; then, fearing they would repent later, they changed their opinion, the place having appeared unhealthy, or exposed to the sea-breeze, or too close to a factory, or difficult of access.

Barberou came to their rescue. He knew what their dream was, and one fine day he called on them to let them know that he had been told about an estate at Chavignolles, between Caen and Falaise. This comprised a farm of thirty-eight hectares, with a kind of château, and a garden in a very productive state.

They proceeded to Calvados, and were quite enraptured. For the farm, together with the house (one would not be sold without the other), only a hundred and forty-three thousand francs were asked. Bouvard did not want to give more than a hundred and twenty thousand.

Pécuchet combated his obstinacy, begged of him to give way, and finally declared that he would make up the surplus himself. This was his entire fortune, coming from his mother's patrimony and his own savings. Never had he breathed a word, reserving this capital for a great occasion.

The entire amount was paid up about the end of 1840, six months before his retirement.

Bouvard was no longer a copying-clerk. At first he had continued his functions through distrust of the future; but he had resigned once he was certain of his inheritance. However, he willingly went back to MM. Descambos; and the night before his departure he stood drinks to all the clerks.

Pécuchet, on the contrary, was morose towards his colleagues, and went off, on the last day, roughly clapping the door behind him.

He had to look after the packing, to do a heap of commissions, then to make purchases, and to take leave of Dumouchel.

The professor proposed to him an epistolary interchange between them, of which he would make use to keep Pécuchet well up in literature; and, after fresh felicitations, wished him good health.

Barberou exhibited more sensibility in taking leave of Bouvard. He expressly gave up a domino-party, promised to go to see him "over there," ordered two aniseed cordials, and embraced him.

Bouvard, when he got home, inhaled over the balcony a deep breath of air, saying to himself, "At last!" The lights along the quays quivered in the water, the rolling of omnibuses in the distance gradually ceased. He recalled happy days spent in this great city, supper-parties at restaurants, evenings at the theatre, gossips with his portress, all his habitual associations; and he experienced a sinking of the heart, a sadness which he dared not acknowledge even to himself.

Pécuchet was walking in his room up to two o'clock in the morning. He would come back there no more: so much the better! And yet, in order to leave behind something of himself, he printed his name on the plaster over the chimney-piece.

The larger portion of the baggage was gone since the night before. The garden implements, the bedsteads, the mattresses, the tables, the chairs, a cooking apparatus, and three casks of Burgundy would go by the Seine, as far as Havre, and would be despatched thence to Caen, where Bouvard, who would wait for them, would have them brought on to Chavignolles.

But his father's portrait, the armchairs the liqueur-case, the old books, the time-piece, all the precious objects were put into a furniture waggon, which would proceed through Nonancourt, Verneuil, and Falaise. Pécuchet was to accompany it.

He installed himself beside the conductor, upon a seat, and, wrapped up in his oldest frock-coat, with a comforter, mittens, and his office foot-warmer, on Sunday, the 20th of March, at daybreak, he set forth from the capital.

The movement and the novelty of the journey occupied his attention during the first few hours. Then the horses slackened their pace, which led to disputes between the conductor and the driver. They selected execrable inns, and, though they were accountable for everything, Pécuchet, through excess of prudence, slept in the same lodgings.

Next day they started again, at dawn, and the road, always the same, stretched out, uphill, to the verge of the horizon. Yards of stones came after each other; the ditches were full of water; the country showed itself in wide tracts of green, monotonous and cold; clouds scudded through the sky. From time to time there was a fall of rain. On the third day squalls arose. The awning of the waggon, badly fastened on, went clapping with the wind, like the sails of a ship. Pécuchet lowered his face under his cap, and every time he opened his snuff-box it was necessary for him, in order to protect his eyes, to turn round completely.

During the joltings he heard all his baggage swinging behind him, and shouted out a lot of directions. Seeing that they were useless, he changed his tactics. He assumed an air of good-fellowship, and made a display of civilities; in the troublesome ascents he assisted the men in pushing on the wheels: he even went so far as to pay for the coffee and brandy after the meals. From that time they went on more slowly; so much so that, in the neighbourhood of Gauburge, the axletree broke, and the waggon remained tilted over. Pécuchet immediately went to inspect the inside of it: the sets of porcelain lay in bits. He raised his arms, while he gnashed his teeth, and cursed these two idiots; and the following day was lost owing to the waggon-driver getting tipsy: but he had not the energy to complain, the cup of bitterness being full.

Bouvard had quitted Paris only on the third day, as he had to dine once more with Barberou. He arrived in the coach-yard at the last moment; then he woke up before the cathedral of Rouen: he had mistaken the diligence.

In the evening, all the places for Caen were booked. Not knowing what to do, he went to the Theatre of Arts, and he smiled at his neighbours, telling them he had retired from business, and had lately purchased an estate in the neighbourhood. When he started on Friday for Caen, his packages were not there. He received them on Sunday, and despatched them in a cart, having given notice to the farmer who was working the land that he would follow in the course of a few hours.

At Falaise, on the ninth day of his journey, Pécuchet took a fresh horse, and even till sunset they kept steadily on. Beyond Bretteville, having left the high-road, he got off into a cross-road, fancying that every moment he could see the gable-ends of Chavignolles. However, the ruts hid them from view; they vanished, and then the party found themselves in the midst of ploughed fields. The night was falling. What was to become of them? At last Pécuchet left the waggon behind, and, splashing in the mire, advanced in front of it to reconnoitre. When he drew near farm-houses, the dogs barked. He called out as loudly as ever he could, asking what was the right road. There was no answer. He was afraid, and got back to the open ground. Suddenly two lanterns flashed. He perceived a cabriolet, and rushed forward to meet it. Bouvard was inside.

But where could the furniture waggon be? For an hour they called out to it through the darkness. At length it was found, and they arrived at Chavignolles.

A great fire of brushwood and pine-apples was blazing in the dining-room. Two covers were placed there. The furniture, which had come by the cart, was piled up near the vestibule. Nothing was wanting. They sat down to table.

Onion soup had been prepared for them, also a chicken, bacon, and hard-boiled eggs. The old woman who cooked came from time to time to inquire about their tastes. They replied, "Oh! very good, very good!" and the big loaf, hard to cut, the cream, the nuts, all delighted them. There were holes in the flooring, and the damp was oozing through the walls. However, they cast around them a glance of satisfaction, while eating on the little table on which a candle was burning. Their faces were reddened by the strong air. They stretched out their stomachs; they leaned on the backs of their chairs, which made a cracking sound in consequence, and they kept repeating: "Here we are in the place, then! What happiness! It seems to me that it is a dream!"

Although it was midnight, Pécuchet conceived the idea of taking a turn round the garden. Bouvard made no objection. They took up the candle, and, screening it with an old newspaper, walked along the paths. They found pleasure in mentioning aloud the names of the vegetables.

"Look here — carrots! Ah! — cabbages!"

Next, they inspected the espaliers. Pécuchet tried to discover the buds. Sometimes a spider would scamper suddenly over the wall, and the two shadows of their bodies appeared magnified, repeating their gestures. The ends of the grass let the dew trickle out. The night was perfectly black, and everything remained motionless in a profound silence, an infinite sweetness. In the distance a cock was crowing.

Their two rooms had between them a little door, which was hidden by the papering of the wall. By knocking a chest of drawers up against it, nails were shaken out; and they found the place gaping open. This was a surprise.

When they had undressed and got into bed, they kept babbling for some time. Then they went asleep — Bouvard on his back, with his mouth open, his head bare; Pécuchet on his right side, his knees in his stomach, his head muffled in a cotton night-cap; and the pair snored under the moonlight which made its way in through the windows.

CHAPTER II.

Experiments in Agriculture.

How happy they felt when they awoke next morning! Bouvard smoked a pipe, and Pécuchet took a pinch of snuff, which they declared to be the best they had ever had in their whole lives. Then they went to the window to observe the landscape.

In front of them lay the fields, with a barn and the church-bell at the right and a screen of poplars at the left.

Two principal walks, forming a cross, divided the garden into four parts. The vegetables were contained in wide beds, where, at different spots, arose dwarf cypresses and trees cut in distaff fashion. On one side, an arbour just touched an artificial hillock; while, on the other, the espaliers were supported against a wall; and at the end, a railed opening gave a glimpse of the country outside. Beyond the wall there was an orchard, and, next to a hedge of elm trees, a thicket; and behind the railed opening there was a narrow road.

They were gazing on this spectacle together, when a man, with hair turning grey, and wearing a black overcoat, appeared walking along the pathway, striking with his cane all the bars of the railed fence. The old servant informed them that this was M. Vaucorbeil, a doctor of some reputation in the district. She mentioned that the other people of note were the Comte de Faverges, formerly a deputy, and an extensive owner of land and cattle; M. Foureau, who sold wood, plaster, all sorts of things; M. Marescot, the notary; the Abbé Jeufroy; and the widow Bordin, who lived on her private income. The old woman added that, as for herself, they called her Germaine, on account of the late Germain, her husband. She used to go out as a charwoman, but would be very glad to enter into the gentlemen's service. They accepted her offer, and then went out to take a look at their farm, which was situated over a thousand yards away.

When they entered the farmyard, Maître Gouy, the farmer, was shouting at a servant-boy, while his wife, on a stool, kept pressed between her legs a turkey-hen, which she was stuffing with balls of flour.

The man had a low forehead, a thin nose, a downward look, and broad shoulders. The woman was very fair-haired, with her cheek-bones speckled with bran, and that air of simplicity which may be seen in the faces of peasants on the windows of churches.

In the kitchen, bundles of hemp hung from the ceiling. Three old guns stood in a row over the upper part of the chimney-piece. A dresser loaded with flowered crockery occupied the space in the middle of the wall; and the window-panes with their green bottle-glass threw over the tin and copper utensils a sickly lustre.

The two Parisians wished to inspect the property, which they had seen only once — and that a mere passing glance. Maître Gouy and his wife escorted them, and then began a litany of complaints.

All the appointments, from the carhouse to the boilery, stood in need of repair. It would be necessary to erect an additional store for the cheese, to put fresh iron on the railings, to raise the boundaries, to deepen the ponds, and to plant anew a considerable number of apple trees in the three enclosures.

Then they went to look at the lands under cultivation. Maître Gouy ran them down, saying that they ate up too much manure; cartage was expensive; it was impossible to get rid of stones; and the bad grass poisoned the meadows. This depreciation of his land lessened the pleasure experienced by Bouvard in walking over it.

They came back by the hollow path under an avenue of beech trees. On this side the house revealed its front and its courtyard. It was painted white, with a coating of yellow. The carhouse and the storehouse, the bakehouse and the woodshed, made, by means of a return, two lower wings. The kitchen communicated with a little hall. Next came the vestibule, a second hall larger than the other, and the drawing-room. The four rooms on the first floor opened on the corridor facing the courtyard. Pécuchet selected one of them for his collections. The last was to be the library; and, on opening some of the presses, they found a few ancient volumes, but they had no fancy for reading the titles of them. The most urgent matter was the garden.

Bouvard, while passing close to the row of elm trees, discovered under their branches a plaster figure of a woman. With two fingers she held wide her petticoat, with her knees bent and her head over her shoulder, as if she were afraid of being surprised.

"I beg your pardon! Don't inconvenience yourself!" — and this pleasantry amused them so much that they kept repeating it twenty times a day for three months.

Meanwhile, the people of Chavignolles were desirous to make their acquaintance. Persons came to look at them through the railed fence. They stopped up the openings with boards. This thwarted the inhabitants. To protect himself from the sun Bouvard wore on his head a handkerchief, fastened so as to look like a turban. Pécuchet wore his cap, and he had a big apron with a pocket in front, in which a pair of pruning-shears, his silk handkerchief, and his snuff-box jostled against one another. Bare-armed, side by side, they dug, weeded, and pruned, imposing tasks on each other, and eating their meals as quickly as ever they could, taking care, however, to drink their coffee on the hillock, in order to enjoy the view.

If they happened to come across a snail, they pounced on it and crushed it, making grimaces with the corners of their mouths, as if they were cracking nuts. They never went out without their grafting implements, and they used to cut the worms in two with such force that the iron of the implement would sink three inches deep. To get rid of caterpillars, they struck the trees furiously with switches.

Bouvard planted a peony in the middle of the grass plot, and tomatoes so that they would hang down like chandeliers under the arch of the arbour.

Pécuchet had a large pit dug in front of the kitchen, and divided it into three parts, where he could manufacture composts which would grow a heap of things, whose detritus would again bring other crops, providing in this way other manures to a limitless extent; and he fell into reveries on the edge of the pit, seeing in the future mountains of fruits, floods of flowers, and avalanches of vegetables. But the horse-dung, so necessary for the beds, was not to be had, inasmuch as the farmers did not sell it, and the innkeepers refused to supply it. At last, after many searches, in spite of the entreaties of Bouvard, and flinging aside all shamefacedness, he made up his mind to go for the dung himself.

It was in the midst of this occupation that Madame Bordin accosted him one day on the high-road. When she had complimented him, she inquired about his friend. This woman's black eyes, very small and very brilliant, her high complexion, and her assurance (she even had a little moustache) intimidated Pécuchet. He replied curtly, and turned his back on her — an impoliteness of which Bouvard disapproved.

Then the bad weather came on, with frost and snow. They installed themselves in the kitchen, and went in for trellis-work, or else kept going from one room to another, chatted by the chimney corner, or watched the rain coming down.

Since the middle of Lent they had awaited the approach of spring, and each morning repeated: "Everything is starting out!" But the season was late, and they consoled their impatience by saying: "Everything is going to start out!"

At length they were able to gather the green peas. The asparagus gave a good crop; and the vine was promising.

Since they were able to work together at gardening, they must needs succeed at agriculture; and they were seized with an ambition to cultivate the farm. With common sense and study of the subject, they would get through it beyond a doubt.

But they should first see how others carried on operations, and so they drew up a letter in which they begged of M. de Faverges to do them the honour of allowing them to visit the lands which he cultivated.

The count made an appointment immediately to meet them.

After an hour's walking, they reached the side of a hill overlooking the valley of the Orne. The river wound its way to the bottom of the valley. Blocks of red sandstone stood here and there, and in the distance larger masses of stone formed, as it were, a cliff overhanging fields of ripe corn. On the opposite hill the verdure was so abundant that it hid the house from view. Trees divided it into unequal squares, outlining themselves amid the grass by more sombre lines.

Suddenly the entire estate came into view. The tiled roofs showed where the farm stood. To the right rose the château with its white façade, and beyond it was a wood. A lawn descended to the river, into which a row of plane trees cast their shadows.

The two friends entered a field of lucern, which people were spreading. Women wearing straw hats, with cotton handkerchiefs round their heads, and paper shades, were lifting with rakes the hay which lay on the ground, while at the end of the plain, near the stacks, bundles were being rapidly flung into a long cart, yoked to three horses.

The count advanced, followed by his manager. He was dressed in dimity; and his stiff figure and mutton-chop whiskers gave him at the same time the air of a magistrate and a dandy. Even when he was speaking, his features did not appear to move.

As soon as they had exchanged some opening courtesies, he explained his system with regard to fodder: the swathes should be turned without scattering them; the ricks should be conical, and the bundles made immediately on the spot, and then piled together by tens. As for the English rake, the meadow was too uneven for such an implement.

A little girl, with her stockingless feet in old shoes, and showing her skin through the rents in her dress, was supplying the women with cider, which she poured out of a jug supported against her hip. The count asked where this child came from, but nobody could tell. The women who were making the hay had picked her up to wait on them during the harvesting. He shrugged his shoulders, and just as he was moving away from the spot, he gave vent to some complaints as to the immorality of our country districts.

Bouvard eulogised his lucern field.

It was fairly good, in spite of the ravages of the cuscuta.

The future agriculturists opened their eyes wide at the word "cuscuta."

On account of the number of his cattle, he resorted to artificial meadowing; besides, it went well before the other crops — a thing that did not always happen in the case of fodder.

"This at least appears to me incontestable."

"Oh! incontestable," replied Bouvard and Pécuchet in one breath. They were on the borders of a field which had been carefully thinned. A horse, which was being led by hand, was dragging along a large box, mounted on three wheels. Seven ploughshares below were opening in parallel lines small furrows, in which the grain fell through pipes descending to the ground.

"Here," said the count, "I sow turnips. The turnip is the basis of my quadrennial system of cultivation."

And he was proceeding to deliver a lecture on the drill-plough when a servant came to look for him, and told him that he was wanted at the château.

His manager took his place — a man with a forbidding countenance and obsequious manners.

He conducted "these gentlemen" to another field, where fourteen harvesters, with bare breasts and legs apart, were cutting down rye. The steels whistled in the chaff, which came pouring straight down. Each of them described in front of him a large semicircle, and, all in a line, they advanced at the same time. The two Parisians admired their arms, and felt smitten with an almost religious veneration for the opulence of the soil. Then they proceeded to inspect some of the ploughed lands. The twilight was falling, and the crows swooped down into the ridges.

As they proceeded they met a flock of sheep pasturing here and there, and they could hear their continual browsing. The shepherd, seated on the stump of a tree, was knitting a woollen stocking, with his dog beside him.

The manager assisted Bouvard and Pécuchet to jump over a wooden fence, and they passed close to two orchards, where cows were ruminating under the apple trees.

All the farm-buildings were contiguous and occupied the three sides of the yard. Work was carried on there mechanically by means of a turbine moved by a stream which had been turned aside for the purpose. Leathern bands stretched from one roof to the other, and in the midst of dung an iron pump performed its operations.

The manager drew their attention to little openings in the sheepfolds nearly on a level with the floor, and ingenious doors in the pigsties which could shut of their own accord.

The barn was vaulted like a cathedral, with brick arches resting on stone walls.

In order to amuse the gentlemen, a servant-girl threw a handful of oats before the hens. The shaft of the press appeared to them enormously big. Next they went up to the pigeon-house. The dairy especially astonished them. By turning cocks in the corners, you could get enough water to flood the flagstones, and, as you entered, a sense of grateful coolness came upon you as a surprise. Brown jars, ranged close to the barred opening in the wall, were full to the brim of milk, while the cream was contained in earthen pans of less depth. Then came rolls of butter, like fragments of a column of copper, and froth overflowed from the tin pails which had just been placed on the ground.

But the gem of the farm was the ox-stall. It was divided into two sections by wooden bars standing upright their full length, one portion being reserved for the cattle, and the other for persons who attended on them. You could scarcely see there, as all the loopholes were closed up. The oxen were eating, with little chains attached to them, and their bodies exhaled a heat which was kept down by the low ceiling. But someone let in the light, and suddenly a thin stream of water flowed into the little channel which was beside the racks. Lowings were heard, and the horns of the cattle made a rattling noise like sticks. All the oxen thrust their muzzles between the bars, and proceeded to drink slowly.

The big teams made their way into the farmyard, and the foals began to neigh. On the ground floor two or three lanterns flashed and then disappeared. The workpeople were passing, dragging their wooden shoes over the pebbles, and the bell was ringing for supper.

The two visitors took their departure.

All they had seen delighted them, and their resolution was taken. After that evening, they took out of their library the four volumes of La Maison Rustique, went through Gasperin's course of lectures, and subscribed to an agricultural journal.

In order to be able to attend the fairs more conveniently, they purchased a car, which Bouvard used to drive.

Dressed in blue blouses, with large-brimmed hats, gaiters up to their knees, and horse-dealers' cudgels in their hands, they prowled around cattle, asked questions of labourers, and did not fail to attend at all the agricultural gatherings.

Soon they wearied Maître Gouy with their advice, and especially by their depreciation of his system of fallowing. But the farmer stuck to his routine. He asked to be allowed a quarter, putting forward as a reason the heavy falls of hail. As for the farm-dues, he never furnished any of them. His wife raised an outcry at even the most legitimate claims. At length Bouvard declared his intention not to renew the lease.

Thenceforth Maître Gouy economised the manures, allowed weeds to grow up, ruined the soil; and he took himself off with a fierce air, which showed that he was meditating some scheme of revenge.

Bouvard had calculated that 20,000 francs, that is to say, more than four times the rent of the farm, would be enough to start with. His notary sent the amount from Paris.

The property which they had undertaken to cultivate comprised fifteen hectares of grounds and meadows, twenty-three of arable land, and five of waste land, situated on a hillock covered with stones, and known by the name of La Butte.

They procured all the indispensable requirements for the purpose: four horses, a dozen cows, six hogs, one hundred and sixty sheep, and for the household two carters, two women, a shepherd, and in addition a big dog.

In order to get cash at once, they sold their fodder. The price was paid to them directly, and the gold napoleons counted over a chest of oats appeared to them more glittering than any others, more rare and valuable.

In the month of November they brewed cider. It was Bouvard that whipped the horse, while Pécuchet on the trough shovelled off the strained apples.

They panted while pressing the screw, drew the juice off into the vat, looked after the bung-holes, with heavy wooden shoes on their feet; and in all this they found a huge diversion.

Starting with the principle that you cannot have too much corn, they got rid of about half of their artificial meadows; and, as they had not rich pasturing, they made use of oil-cakes, which they put into the ground without pounding, with the result that the crop was a wretched one.

The following year they sowed the ground very thickly. Storms broke out, and the ears of corn were scattered.

Nevertheless, they set their hearts on the cheese, and undertook to clear away the stones from La Butte. A hamper carried away the stones. The whole year, from morn to eve, in sunshine or in rain, the everlasting hamper was seen, with the same man and the same horse, toiling up the hill, coming down, and going up again. Sometimes Bouvard walked in the rear, making a halt half-way up the hill to dry the sweat off his forehead.

As they had confidence in nobody, they treated the animals themselves, giving them purgatives and clysters.

Serious irregularities occurred in the household. The girl in the poultry-yard became enceinte. Then they took married servants; but the place soon swarmed with children, cousins, male and female, uncles, and sisters-in-law. A horde of people lived at their expense; and they resolved to sleep in the farm-house successively.

But when evening came they felt depressed, for the filthiness of the room was offensive to them; and besides, Germaine, who brought in the meals, grumbled at every journey. They were preyed upon in all sorts of ways. The threshers in the barn stuffed corn into the pitchers out of which they drank. Pécuchet caught one of them in the act, and exclaimed, while pushing him out by the shoulders:

"Wretch! You are a disgrace to the village that gave you birth!"

His presence inspired no respect. Moreover, he was plagued with the garden. All his time would not have sufficed to keep it in order. Bouvard was occupied with the farm. They took counsel and decided on this arrangement.

The first point was to have good hotbeds. Pécuchet got one made of brick. He painted the frames himself; and, being afraid of too much sunlight, he smeared over all the bell-glasses with chalk. He took care to cut off the tops of the leaves for slips. Next he devoted attention to the layers. He attempted many sorts of grafting — flute-graft, crown-graft, shield-graft, herbaceous grafting, and whip-grafting. With what care he adjusted the two libers! how he tightened the ligatures! and what a heap of ointment it took to cover them again!

Twice a day he took his watering-pot and swung it over the plants as if he would have shed incense over them. In proportion as they became green under the water, which fell in a thin shower, it seemed to him as if he were quenching his own thirst and reviving along with them. Then, yielding to a feeling of intoxication, he snatched off the rose of the watering-pot, and poured out the liquid copiously from the open neck.

At the end of the elm hedge, near the female figure in plaster, stood a kind of log hut. Pécuchet locked up his implements there, and spent delightful hours there picking the berries, writing labels, and putting his little pots in order. He sat down to rest himself on a box at the door of the hut, and then planned fresh improvements.

He had put two clumps of geraniums at the end of the front steps. Between the cypresses and the distaff-shaped trees he had planted sunflowers; and as the plots were covered with buttercups, and all the walks with fresh sand, the garden was quite dazzling in its abundance of yellow hues.

But the bed swarmed with larvæ. In spite of the dead leaves placed there to heat the plants, under the painted frames and the whitened bell-glasses, only a stunted crop made its appearance. He failed with the broccoli, the mad-apples, the turnips, and the watercress, which he had tried to raise in a tub. After the thaw all the artichokes were ruined. The cabbages gave him some consolation. One of them especially excited his hopes. It expanded and shut up quickly, but ended by becoming prodigious and absolutely uneatable. No matter — Pécuchet was content with being the possessor of a monstrosity!

Then he tried his hand at what he regarded as the sumum of art — the growing of melons.

He sowed many varieties of seed in plates filled with vegetable mould, which he deposited in the soil of the bed. Then he raised another bed, and when it had put forth its virgin buddings he transplanted the best of them, putting bell-glasses over them. He made all the cuttings in accordance with the precepts of The Good Gardener. He treated the flowers tenderly; he let the fruits grow in a tangle, and then selected one on either arm, removed the others, and, as soon as they were as large as nuts, he slipped a little board around their rind to prevent them from rotting by contact with dung. He heated them, gave them air, swept off the mist from the bell-glasses with his pocket-handkerchief, and, if he saw lowering clouds, he quickly brought out straw mattings to protect them.

He did not sleep at night on account of them. Many times he even got up out of bed, and, putting on his boots without stockings, shivering in his shirt, he traversed the entire garden to throw his own counterpane over his hotbed frames.

The melons ripened. Bouvard grinned when he saw the first of them. The second was no better; neither was the third. For each of them Pécuchet found a fresh excuse, down to the very last, which he threw out of the window, declaring that he could not understand it at all.

The fact was, he had planted some things beside others of a different species; and so the sweet melons got mixed up with the kitchen-garden melons, the big Portugal with the Grand Mogul variety; and this anarchy was completed by the proximity of the tomatoes — the result being abominable hybrids that had the taste of pumpkins.

Then Pécuchet devoted his attention to the flowers. He wrote to Dumouchel to get shrubs with seeds for him, purchased a stock of heath soil, and set to work resolutely.

But he planted passion-flowers in the shade and pansies in the sun, covered the hyacinths with dung, watered the lilies near their blossoms, tried to stimulate the fuchsias with glue, and actually roasted a pomegranate by exposing it to the heat of the kitchen fire.

When the weather got cold, he screened the eglantines under domes of strong paper which had been lubricated with a candle. They looked like sugarloaves held up by sticks.

The dahlias had enormous props; and between these straight lines could be seen the winding branches of a Sophora Japonica, which remained motionless, without either perishing or growing.

However, since even the rarest trees flourish in the gardens of the capital, they must needs grow successfully at Chavignolles; and Pécuchet provided himself with the Indian lilac, the Chinese rose, and the eucalyptus, then in the beginning of its fame. But all his experiments failed; and at each successive failure he was vastly astonished.

Bouvard, like him, met with obstacles. They held many consultations, opened a book, then passed on to another, and did not know what to resolve upon when there was so much divergence of opinion.

Thus, Puvis recommends marl, while the Roret Manual is opposed to it. As for plaster, in spite of the example of Franklin, Riefel and M. Rigaud did not appear to be in raptures about it.

According to Bouvard, fallow lands were a Gothic prejudice. However, Leclerc has noted cases in which they are almost indispensable. Gasparin mentions a native of Lyons who cultivated cereals in the same field for half a century: this upsets the theory as to the variation of crops. Tull extols tillage to the prejudice of rich pasture; and there is Major Beetson, who by means of tillage would abolish pasture altogether.

In order to understand the indications of the weather, they studied the clouds according to the classification of Luke Howard. They contemplated those which spread out like manes, those which resemble islands, and those which might be taken for mountains of snow — trying to distinguish the nimbus from the cirrus and the stratus from the cumulus. The shapes had altered even before they had discovered the names.

The barometer deceived them; the thermometer taught them nothing; and they had recourse to the device invented in the time of Louis XIV. by a priest from Touraine. A leech in a glass bottle was to rise up in the event of rain, to stick to the bottom in settled weather, and to move about if a storm were threatening. But nearly always the atmosphere contradicted the leech. Three others were put in along with it. The entire four behaved differently.

After many reflections, Bouvard realised that he had made a mistake. His property required cultivation on a large scale, the concentrated system, and he risked all the disposable capital that he had left — thirty thousand francs.

Stimulated by Pécuchet, he began to rave about pasture. In the pit for composts were heaped up branches of trees, blood, guts, feathers — everything that he could find. He used Belgian cordial, Swiss wash, lye, red herrings, wrack, rags; sent for guano, tried to manufacture it himself; and, pushing his principles to the farthest point, he would not suffer even urine or other refuse to be lost. Into his farmyard were carried carcasses of animals, with which he manured his lands. Their cut-up carrion strewed the fields. Bouvard smiled in the midst of this stench. A pump fixed to a dung-cart splattered the liquid manure over the crops. To those who assumed an air of disgust, he used to say, "But 'tis gold! 'tis gold!" And he was sorry that he had not still more manures. Happy the land where natural grottoes are found full of the excrements of birds!

The colza was thin; the oats only middling; and the corn sold very badly on account of its smell. A curious circumstance was that La Butte, with the stones cleared away from it at last, yielded less than before.

He deemed it advisable to renew his material. He bought a Guillaume scarifier, a Valcourt weeder, an English drill-machine, and the great swing-plough of Mathieu de Dombasle, but the ploughboy disparaged it.

"Do you learn to use it!"

"Well, do you show me!"

He made an attempt to show, but blundered, and the peasants sneered. He could never make them obey the command of the bell. He was incessantly bawling after them, rushing from one place to another, taking down observations in a note-book, making appointments and forgetting all about them — and his head was boiling over with industrial speculations.

He got the notion into his head of cultivating the poppy for the purpose of getting opium from it, and above all the milk-vetch, which he intended to sell under the name of "family coffee."

Finally, in order to fatten his oxen the more quickly, he blooded them for an entire fortnight.

He killed none of his pigs, and gorged them with salted oats. The pigsty soon became too narrow. The animals obstructed the farmyard, broke down the fences, and went gnawing at everything.

In the hot weather twenty-five sheep began to get spoiled, and shortly afterwards died. The same week three bulls perished owing to Bouvard's blood-lettings.

In order to destroy the maggots, he thought of shutting up the fowls in a hencoop on rollers, which two men had to push along behind the plough — a thing which had only the effect of breaking the claws of the fowls.

He manufactured beer with germander-leaves, and gave it to the harvesters as cider. The children cried, the women moaned, and the men raged. They all threatened to go, and Bouvard gave way to them.

However, to convince them of the harmlessness of his beverage, he swallowed several bottles of it in their presence; then he got cramps, but concealed his pains under a playful exterior. He even got the mixture sent to his own residence. He drank some of it with Pécuchet in the evening, and both of them tried to persuade themselves that it was good. Besides, it was necessary not to let it go to waste. Bouvard's colic having got worse, Germaine went for the doctor.

He was a grave-looking man, with a round forehead, and he began by frightening his patient. He thought the gentleman's attack of cholérine must be connected with the beer which people were talking about in the country. He desired to know what it was composed of, and found fault with it in scientific terms with shruggings of the shoulders. Pécuchet, who had supplied the recipe for it, was mortified.

In spite of pernicious limings, stinted redressings, and unseasonable weedings, Bouvard had in front of him, in the following year, a splendid crop of wheat. He thought of drying it by fermentation, in the Dutch fashion, on the Clap-Meyer system: that is to say, he got it thrown down all of a heap and piled up in stacks, which would be overturned as soon as the damp escaped from them, and then exposed to the open air — after which Bouvard went off without the least uneasiness.

Next day, while they were at dinner, they heard under the beech trees the beating of a drum. Germaine ran out to know what was the matter, but the man was by this time some distance away. Almost at the same moment the church-bell rang violently.

Bouvard and Pécuchet felt alarmed, and, impatient to learn what had happened, they rushed bareheaded along the Chavignolles road.

An old woman passed them. She knew nothing about it. They stopped a little boy, who replied:

"I believe it's a fire!"

And the drum continued beating and the bell ringing more loudly than before. At length they reached the nearest houses in the village. The grocer, some yards away, exclaimed:

"The fire is at your place!"

Pécuchet stepped out in double-quick time; and he said to Bouvard, who trotted by his side with equal speed:

"One, two! one, two!" — counting his steps regularly, like the chasseurs of Vincennes.

The road which they took was a continuously uphill one; the sloping ground hid the horizon from their view. They reached a height close to La Butte, and at a single glance the disaster was revealed to them.

All the stacks, here and there, were flaming like volcanoes in the midst of the plain, stripped bare in the evening stillness. Around the biggest of them there were about three hundred persons, perhaps; and under the command of M. Foureau, the mayor, in a tricoloured scarf, youngsters, with poles and crooks, were dragging down the straw from the top in order to save the rest of it.

Bouvard, in his eagerness, was near knocking down Madame Bordin, who happened to be there. Then, seeing one of his servant-boys, he loaded him with insults for not having given him warning. The servant-boy, on the contrary, through excess of zeal, had at first rushed to the house, then to the church, next to where Monsieur himself was staying, and had returned by the other road.

Bouvard lost his head. His entire household gathered round him, all talking together, and he forbade them to knock down the stacks, begged of them to give him some help, called for water, and asked where were the firemen.

"We've got to get them first!" exclaimed the mayor.

"That's your fault!" replied Bouvard.

He flew into a passion, and made use of improper language, and everyone wondered at the patience of M. Foureau, who, all the same, was a surly individual, as might be seen from his big lips and bulldog jaw.

The heat of the stacks became so great that nobody could come close to them any longer. Under the devouring flames the straw writhed with a crackling sound, and the grains of corn lashed one's face as if they were buckshot. Then the stack fell in a huge burning pile to the ground, and a shower of sparks flew out of it, while fiery waves floated above the red mass, which presented in its alternations of colour parts rosy as vermillion and others like clotted blood. The night had come, the wind was swelling; from time to time, a flake of fire passed across the black sky.

Bouvard viewed the conflagration with tears in his eyes, which were veiled by his moist lids, and his whole face was swollen with grief. Madame Bordin, while playing with the fringes of her green shawl, called him "Poor Monsieur!" and tried to console him. Since nothing could be done, he ought to do himself justice.

Pécuchet did not weep. Very pale, or rather livid, with open mouth, and hair stuck together with cold sweat, he stood apart, brooding. But the curé who had suddenly arrived on the scene, murmured, in a wheedling tone:

"Ah! really, what a misfortune! It is very annoying. Be sure that I enter into your feelings."

The others did not affect any regret. They chatted and smiled, with hands spread out before the flame. An old man picked out burning straws to light his pipe with; and one blackguard cried out that it was very funny.

"Yes, 'tis nice fun!" retorted Bouvard, who had just overheard him.

The fire abated, the burning piles subsided, and an hour later only ashes remained, making round, black marks on the plain. Then all withdrew.

Madame Bordin and the Abbé Jeufroy led MM. Bouvard and Pécuchet back to their abode.

On the way the widow addressed very polite reproaches to her neighbour on his unsociableness, and the ecclesiastic expressed his great surprise at not having up to the present known such a distinguished parishioner of his.

When they were alone together, they inquired into the cause of the conflagration, and, in place of recognising, like the rest of the world, that the moist straw had taken fire of its own accord, they suspected that it was a case of revenge. It proceeded, no doubt, from Maître Gouy, or perhaps from the mole-catcher. Six months before Bouvard had refused to accept his services, and even maintained, before a circle of listeners, that his trade was a baneful one, and that the government ought to prohibit it. Since that time the man prowled about the locality. He wore his beard full-grown, and appeared to them frightful-looking, especially in the evening, when he presented himself outside the farmyard, shaking his long pole garnished with hanging moles.

The damage done was considerable, and in order to know their exact position, Pécuchet for eight days worked at Bouvard's books, which he pronounced to be "a veritable labyrinth." After he had compared the day-book, the correspondence, and the ledger covered with pencil-notes and discharges, he realised the truth: no goods to sell, no funds to get in, and in the cash-box zero. The capital showed a deficit of thirty-three thousand francs.

Bouvard would not believe it, and more than twenty times they went over the accounts. They always arrived at the same conclusion. Two years more of such farming, and their fortune would be spent on it! The only remedy was to sell out.

To do that, it was necessary to consult a notary. The step was a disagreeable one: Pécuchet took it on himself.

In M. Marescot's opinion, it was better not to put up any posters. He would speak about the farm to respectable clients, and would let them make proposals.

"Very well," said Bouvard, "we have time before us." He intended to get a tenant; then they would see. "We shall not be more unlucky than before; only now we are forced to practise economy!"

Pécuchet was disgusted with gardening, and a few days later he remarked:

"We ought to give ourselves up exclusively to tree culture — not for pleasure, but as a speculation. A pear which is the product of three soils is sometimes sold in the capital for five or six francs. Gardeners make out of apricots twenty-five thousand livres in the year! At St. Petersburg, during the winter, grapes are sold at a napoleon per grape. It is a beautiful industry, you must admit! And what does it cost? Attention, manuring, and a fresh touch of the pruning-knife."

It excited Bouvard's imagination so much that they sought immediately in their books for a nomenclature for purchasable plants, and, having selected names which appeared to them wonderful, they applied to a nurseryman from Falaise, who busied himself in supplying them with three hundred stalks for which he had not found a sale. They got a lock-smith for the props, an iron-worker for the fasteners, and a carpenter for the rests. The forms of the trees were designed beforehand. Pieces of lath on the wall represented candelabra. Two posts at the ends of the plat-bands supported steel threads in a horizontal position; and in the orchard, hoops indicated the structure of vases, cone-shaped switches that of pyramids, so well that, in arriving in the midst of them, you imagined you saw pieces of some unknown machinery or the framework of a pyrotechnic apparatus.

The holes having been dug, they cut the ends of all the roots, good or bad, and buried them in a compost. Six months later the plants were dead. Fresh orders to the nurseryman, and fresh plantings in still deeper holes. But the rain softening the soil, the grafts buried themselves in the ground of their own accord, and the trees sprouted out.

When spring had come, Pécuchet set about the pruning of pear trees. He did not cut down the shoots, spared the superfluous side branches, and, persisting in trying to lay the "duchesses" out in a square when they ought to go in a string on one side, he broke them or tore them down invariably. As for the peach trees, he got mixed up with over-mother branches, under-mother branches, and second-under-mother branches. The empty and the full always presented themselves when they were not wanted, and it was impossible to obtain on an espalier a perfect rectangle, with six branches to the right and six to the left, not including the two principal ones, the whole forming a fine bit of herringbone work.

Bouvard tried to manage the apricot trees, but they rebelled. He lowered their stems nearly to a level with the ground; none of them shot up again. The cherry trees, in which he had made notches, produced gum.

At first, they cut very long, which destroyed the principal buds, and then very short, which led to excessive branching; and they often hesitated, not knowing how to distinguish between buds of trees and buds of flowers. They were delighted to have flowers, but when they recognised their mistake, they tore off three fourths of them to strengthen the remainder.

Incessantly they kept talking about "sap" and "cambium," "paling up," "breaking down," and "blinding of an eye." In the middle of their dining-room they had in a frame the list of their young growths, as if they were pupils, with a number which was repeated in the garden on a little piece of wood, at the foot of the tree. Out of bed at dawn, they kept working till nightfall with their twigs carried in their belts. In the cold mornings of spring, Bouvard wore his knitted vest under his blouse, and Pécuchet his old frock-coat under his packcloth wrapper; and the people passing by the open fence heard them coughing in the damp atmosphere.

Sometimes Pécuchet drew forth his manual from his pocket, and he studied a paragraph of it standing up with his grafting-tool near him in the attitude of the gardener who decorated the frontispiece of the book. This resemblance flattered him exceedingly, and made him entertain more esteem for the author.

Bouvard was continually perched on a high ladder before the pyramids. One day he was seized with dizziness, and, not daring to come down farther, he called on Pécuchet to come to his aid.

At length pears made their appearance, and there were plums in the orchard. Then they made use of all the devices which had been recommended to them against the birds. But the bits of glass made dazzling reflections, the clapper of the wind-mill woke them during the night, and the sparrows perched on the lay figure. They made a second, and even a third, varying the dress, but without any useful result.

However, they could hope for some fruit. Pécuchet had just given an intimation of the fact to Bouvard, when suddenly the thunder resounded and the rain fell — a heavy and violent downpour. The wind at intervals shook the entire surface of the espalier. The props gave way one after the other, and the unfortunate distaff-shaped trees, while swaying under the storm, dashed their pears against one another.

Pécuchet, surprised by the shower, had taken refuge in the hut. Bouvard stuck to the kitchen. They saw splinters of wood, branches, and slates whirling in front of them; and the sailors' wives who, on the sea-shore ten leagues away, were gazing out at the sea, had not eyes more wistful or hearts more anxious. Then, suddenly, the supports and wooden bars of espaliers facing one another, together with the rail-work, toppled down into the garden beds.

What a picture when they went to inspect the scene! The cherries and plums covered the grass, amid the dissolving hailstones. The Passe Colmars were destroyed, as well as the Besi des Vétérans and the Triumphes de Jordoigne. There was barely left amongst the apples even a few Bon Papas; and a dozen Tetons de Venus, the entire crop of peaches, rolled into the pools of water by the side of the box trees, which had been torn up by the roots.

After dinner, at which they ate very little, Pécuchet said softly:

"We should do well to see after the farm, lest anything has happened to it."

"Bah! only to find fresh causes of sadness."

"Perhaps so; for we are not exactly lucky."

And they made complaints against Providence and against nature.

Bouvard, with his elbows on the table, spoke in little whispers; and as all their troubles began to subside, their former agricultural projects came back to their recollection, especially the starch manufacture and the invention of a new sort of cheese.

Pécuchet drew a loud breath; and while he crammed several pinches of snuff into his nostrils, he reflected that, if fate had so willed it, he might now be a member of an agricultural society, might be delivering brilliant lectures, and might be referred to as an authority in the newspapers.

Bouvard cast a gloomy look around him.

"Faith! I'm anxious to get rid of all this, in order that we may settle down somewhere else!"

"Just as you like," said Pécuchet; and the next moment: "The authors recommend us to suppress every direct passage. In this way the sap is counteracted, and the tree necessarily suffers thereby. In order to be in good health, it would be necessary for it to have no fruit! However, those which we prune and which we never manure produce them not so big, it is true, but more luscious. I require them to give me a reason for this! And not only each kind demands its particular attentions, but still more each individual tree, according to climate, temperature, and a heap of things! Where, then, is the rule? and what hope have we of any success or profit?"

Bouvard replied to him, "You will see in Gasparin that the profit cannot exceed the tenth of the capital. Therefore, we should be doing better by investing this capital in a banking-house. At the end of fifteen years, by the accumulation of interest, we'd have it doubled, without having our constitutions ground down."

Pécuchet hung down his head.

"Arboriculture may be a humbug!"

"Like agriculture!" replied Bouvard.

Then they blamed themselves for having been too ambitious, and they resolved to husband thenceforth their labour and their money. An occasional pruning would suffice for the orchard. The counter-espaliers were forbidden, and dead or fallen trees should not be replaced; but he was going to do a nasty job — nothing less than to destroy all the others which remained standing. How was he to set about the work?

Pécuchet made several diagrams, while using his mathematical case. Bouvard gave him advice. They arrived at no satisfactory result. Fortunately, they discovered amongst their collection of books Boitard's work entitled L'Architecte des Jardins.

The author divides them into a great number of styles. First there is the melancholy and romantic style, which is distinguished by immortelles, ruins, tombs, and "a votive offering to the Virgin, indicating the place where a lord has fallen under the blade of an assassin." The terrible style is composed of overhanging rocks, shattered trees, burning huts; the exotic style, by planting Peruvian torch-thistles, "in order to arouse memories in a colonist or a traveller." The grave style should, like Ermenonville, offer a temple to philosophy. The majestic style is characterised by obelisks and triumphal arches; the mysterious style by moss and by grottoes; while a lake is appropriate to the dreamy style. There is even the fantastic style, of which the most beautiful specimen might have been lately seen in a garden at Würtemberg — for there might have been met successively a wild boar, a hermit, several sepulchres, and a barque detaching itself from the shore of its own accord, in order to lead you into a boudoir where water-spouts lave you when you are settling yourself down upon a sofa.

Before this horizon of marvels, Bouvard and Pécuchet experienced a kind of bedazzlement. The fantastic style appeared to them reserved for princes. The temple to philosophy would be cumbersome. The votive offering of the Madonna would have no signification, having regard to the lack of assassins, and — so much the worse for the colonists and the travellers — the American plants would cost too much. But the rocks were possible, as well as the shattered trees, the immortelles, and the moss; and in their enthusiasm for new ideas, after many experiments, with the assistance of a single man-servant, and for a trifling sum, they made for themselves a residence which had no analogy to it in the entire department.

The elm hedge, open here and there, allowed the light of day to fall on the thicket, which was full of winding paths in the fashion of a labyrinth. They had conceived the idea of making in the espalier wall an archway, through which the prospect could be seen. As the arch could not remain suspended, the result was an enormous breach and a fall of wreckage to the ground.

They had sacrificed the asparagus in order to build on the spot an Etruscan tomb, that is to say, a quadrilateral figure in dark plaster, six feet in height, and looking like a dog-hole. Four little pine trees at the corners flanked the monument, which was to be surmounted by an urn and enriched by an inscription.

In the other part of the kitchen garden, a kind of Rialto projected over a basin, presenting on its margin encrusted shells of mussels. The soil drank up the water — no matter! they would contrive a glass bottom which would keep it back.

The hut had been transformed into a rustic summer-house with the aid of coloured glass.

At the top of the hillock, six trees, cut square, supported a tin head-piece with the edges turned up, and the whole was meant to signify a Chinese pagoda.

They had gone to the banks of the Orne to select granite, and had broken it, marked the pieces with numbers, and carried them back themselves in a cart, then had joined the fragments together with cement, placing them one above the other in a mass; and in the middle of the grass arose a rock resembling a gigantic potato.

Something further was needed to complete the harmony. They pulled down the largest linden tree they had (however, it was three quarters dead), and laid it down the entire length of the garden, in such a way that one would imagine it had been carried thither by a torrent or levelled to the ground by a thunderstorm.

The task finished, Bouvard, who was on the steps, cried from a distance:

"Here! you can see best!" — "See best!" was repeated in the air.

Pécuchet answered:

"I am going there!" — "Going there!"

"Hold on! 'Tis an echo!" — "Echo!"

The linden tree had hitherto prevented it from being produced, and it was assisted by the pagoda, as it faced the barn, whose gables rose above the row of trees.

In order to try the effect of the echo, they amused themselves by giving vent to comical phrases: Bouvard yelled out language of a blackguard description.

He had been several times at Falaise, under the pretence of going there to receive money, and he always came back with little parcels, which he locked up in the chest of drawers. Pécuchet started one morning to repair to Bretteville, and returned very late with a basket, which he hid under his bed. Next day, when he awoke, Bouvard was surprised. The first two yew trees of the principal walk, which the day before were still spherical, had the appearance of peacocks, and a horn with two porcelain knobs represented the beak and the eyes. Pécuchet had risen at dawn, and trembling lest he should be discovered, he had cut the two trees according to the measurement given in the written instructions sent him by Dumouchel.

For six months the others behind the two above mentioned assumed the forms of pyramids, cubes, cylinders, stags, or armchairs; but there was nothing equal to the peacocks. Bouvard acknowledged it with many eulogies.

Under pretext of having forgotten his spade, he drew his comrade into the labyrinth, for he had profited by Pécuchet's absence to do, himself too, something sublime.

The gate leading into the fields was covered over with a coating of plaster, under which were ranged in beautiful order five or six bowls of pipes, representing Abd-el-Kader, negroes, naked women, horses' feet, and death's-heads.

"Do you understand my impatience?"

"I rather think so!"

And in their emotion they embraced each other.

Like all artists, they felt the need of being applauded, and Bouvard thought of giving a great dinner.

"Take care!" said Pécuchet, "you are going to plunge into entertainments. It is a whirlpool!"

The matter, however, was decided. Since they had come to live in the country, they had kept themselves isolated. Everybody, through eagerness to make their acquaintance, accepted their invitation, except the Count de Faverges, who had been summoned to the capital by business. They fell back on M. Hurel, his factotum.

Beljambe, the innkeeper, formerly a chef at Lisieux, was to cook certain dishes; Germaine had engaged the services of the poultry-wench; and Marianne, Madame Bordin's servant-girl, would also come. Since four o'clock the range was wide open; and the two proprietors, full of impatience, awaited their guests.

Hurel stopped under the beech row to adjust his frock-coat. Then the curé stepped forward, arrayed in a new cassock, and, a second later, M. Foureau, in a velvet waistcoat. The doctor gave his arm to his wife, who walked with some difficulty, assisting herself with her parasol. A stream of red ribbons fluttered behind them — it was the cap of Madame Bordin, who was dressed in a lovely robe of shot silk. The gold chain of her watch dangled over her breast, and rings glittered on both her hands, which were partly covered with black mittens. Finally appeared the notary, with a Panama hat on his head, and an eyeglass — for the professional practitioner had not stifled in him the man of the world. The drawing-room floor was waxed so that one could not stand upright there. The eight Utrecht armchairs had their backs to the wall; a round table in the centre supported the liqueur case; and above the mantelpiece could be seen the portrait of Père Bouvard. The shades, reappearing in the imperfect light, made the mouth grin and the eyes squint, and a slight mouldiness on the cheek-bones seemed to produce the illusion of real whiskers. The guests traced a resemblance between him and his son, and Madame Bordin added, glancing at Bouvard, that he must have been a very fine man.

After an hour's waiting, Pécuchet announced that they might pass into the dining-room.

The white calico curtains with red borders were, like those of the drawing-room, completely drawn before the windows, and the sun's rays passing across them, flung a brilliant light on the wainscotings, the only ornament of which was a barometer.

Bouvard placed the two ladies beside him, while Pécuchet had the mayor on his left and the curé on his right.

They began with the oysters. They had the taste of mud. Bouvard was annoyed, and was prodigal of excuses, and Pécuchet got up in order to go into the kitchen and make a scene with Beljambe.

During the whole of the first course, which consisted of a brill with a vol-au-vent and stewed pigeons, the conversation turned on the mode of manufacturing cider; after which they discussed what meats were digestible or indigestible. Naturally, the doctor was consulted. He looked at matters sceptically, like a man who had dived into the depths of science, and yet did not brook the slightest contradiction.

At the same time, with the sirloin of beef, Burgundy was supplied. It was muddy. Bouvard, attributing this accident to the rinsing of the bottles, got them to try three others without more success; then he poured out some St. Julien, manifestly not long enough in bottle, and all the guests were mute. Hurel smiled without discontinuing; the heavy steps of the waiters resounded over the flooring.

Madame Vaucorbeil, who was dumpy and waddling in her gait (she was near her confinement), had maintained absolute silence. Bouvard, not knowing what to talk to her about, spoke of the theatre at Caen.

"My wife never goes to the play," interposed the doctor.

M. Marescot observed that, when he lived in Paris, he used to go only to the Italian operas.

"For my part," said Bouvard, "I used to pay for a seat in the pit sometimes at the Vaudeville to hear farces."

Foureau asked Madame Bordin whether she liked farces.

"That depends on what kind they are," she said.

The mayor rallied her. She made sharp rejoinders to his pleasantries. Then she mentioned a recipe for preparing gherkins. However, her talents for housekeeping were well known, and she had a little farm, which was admirably looked after.

Foureau asked Bouvard, "Is it your intention to sell yours?"

"Upon my word, up to this I don't know what to do exactly."

"What! not even the Escalles piece?" interposed the notary. "That would suit you, Madame Bordin."

The widow replied in an affected manner:

"The demands of M. Bouvard would be too high."

"Perhaps someone could soften him."

"I will not try."

"Bah! if you embraced him?"

"Let us try, all the same," said Bouvard.

And he kissed her on both cheeks, amid the plaudits of the guests.

Almost immediately after this incident, they uncorked the champagne, whose detonations caused an additional sense of enjoyment. Pécuchet made a sign; the curtains opened, and the garden showed itself.

In the twilight it looked dreadful. The rockery, like a mountain, covered the entire grass plot; the tomb formed a cube in the midst of spinaches, the Venetian bridge a circumflex accent over the kidney-beans, and the summer-house beyond a big black spot, for they had burned its straw roof to make it more poetic. The yew trees, shaped like stags or armchairs, succeeded to the tree that seemed thunder-stricken, extending transversely from the elm row to the arbour, where tomatoes hung like stalactites. Here and there a sunflower showed its yellow disk.<sup>62</sup> The Chinese pagoda, painted red, seemed a lighthouse on the hillock. The peacocks' beaks, struck by the sun, reflected back the rays, and behind the railed gate, now freed from its boards, a perfectly flat landscape bounded the horizon.

In the face of their guests' astonishment Bouvard and Pécuchet experienced a veritable delight.

Madame Bordin admired the peacocks above all; but the tomb was not appreciated, nor the cot in flames, nor the wall in ruins. Then each in turn passed over the bridge. In order to fill the basin, Bouvard and Pécuchet had been carrying water in carts all the morning. It had escaped between the foundation stones, which were imperfectly joined together, and covered them over again with lime.

While they were walking about, the guests indulged in criticism.

"In your place that's what I'd have done." — "The green peas are late." — "Candidly, this corner is not all right." — "With such pruning you'll never get fruit."

Bouvard was obliged to answer that he did not care a jot for fruit.

As they walked past the hedge of trees, he said with a sly air:

"Ah! here's a lady that puts us out of countenance: a thousand excuses!"

It was a well-seasoned joke; everyone knew "the lady in plaster."

Finally, after many turns in the labyrinth, they arrived in front of the gate with the pipes. Looks of amazement were exchanged. Bouvard observed the faces of his guests, and, impatient to learn what was their opinion, asked:

"What do you say to it?"

Madame Bordin burst out laughing. All the others followed her example, after their respective ways — the curé giving a sort of cluck like a hen, Hurel coughing, the doctor mourning over it, while his wife had a nervous spasm, and Foureau, an unceremonious type of man, breaking an Abd-el-Kader and putting it into his pocket as a souvenir.

When they had left the tree-hedge, Bouvard, to astonish the company with the echo, exclaimed with all his strength:

"Servant, ladies!"

Nothing! No echo. This was owing to the repairs made in the barn, the gable and the roof having been demolished.

The coffee was served on the hillock; and the gentlemen were about to begin a game of ball, when they saw in front of them, behind the railed fence, a man staring at them.

He was lean and sunburnt, with a pair of red trousers in rags, a blue waistcoat, no shirt, his black beard cut like a brush. He articulated, in a hoarse voice:

"Give me a glass of wine!"

The mayor and the Abbé Jeufroy had at once recognised him. He had formerly been a joiner at Chavignolles.

"Come, Gorju! take yourself off," said M. Foureau. "You ought not to be asking for alms."

"I! Alms!" cried the exasperated man. "I served seven years in the wars in Africa. I've only just got up out of a hospital. Good God! must I turn cutthroat?"

His anger subsided of its own accord, and, with his two fists on his hips, he surveyed the assembled guests with a melancholy and defiant air. The fatigue of bivouacs, absinthe, and fever, an entire existence of wretchedness and debauchery, stood revealed in his dull eyes. His white lips quivered, exposing the gums. The vast sky, empurpled, enveloped him in a blood-red light; and his obstinacy in remaining there caused a species of terror.

Bouvard, to have done with him, went to look for the remnants of a bottle. The vagabond swallowed the wine greedily, then disappeared amongst the oats, gesticulating as he went.

After this, blame was attached by those present to Bouvard. Such kindnesses encouraged disorder. But Bouvard, irritated at the ill-success of his garden, took up the defence of the people. They all began talking at the same time.

Foureau extolled the government. Hurel saw nothing in the world but landed property. The Abbé Jeufroy complained of the fact that it did not protect religion. Pécuchet attacked the taxes. Madame Bordin exclaimed at intervals, "As for me, I detest the Republic." And the doctor declared himself in favour of progress: "For, indeed, gentlemen, we have need of reforms."

"Possibly," said Foureau; "but all these ideas are injurious to business."

"I laugh at business!" cried Pécuchet.

Vaucorbeil went on: "At least let us make allowance for abilities."

Bouvard would not go so far.

"That is your opinion," replied the doctor; "there's an end of you, then! Good evening. And I wish you a deluge in order to sail in your basin!"

"And I, too, am going," said M. Foureau the next moment; and, pointing to the pocket where the Abd-el-Kader was, "If I feel the want of another, I'll come back."

The curé, before departing, timidly confided to Pécuchet that he did not think this imitation of a tomb in the midst of vegetables quite decorous. Hurel, as he withdrew, made a low bow to the company. M. Marescot had disappeared after dessert. Madame Bordin again went over her recipe for gherkins, promised a second for plums with brandy, and made three turns in the large walk; but, passing close to the linden tree, the end of her dress got caught, and they heard her murmuring:

"My God! what a piece of idiocy this tree is!"

At midnight the two hosts, beneath the arbour, gave vent to their resentment.

No doubt one might find fault with two or three little details here and there in the dinner; and yet the guests had gorged themselves like ogres, showing that it was not so bad. But, as for the garden, so much depreciation sprang from the blackest jealousy. And both of them, lashing themselves into a rage, went on:

"Ha! water is needed in the basin, is it? Patience! they may see even a swan and fishes in it!"

"They scarcely noticed the pagoda."

"To pretend that the ruins are not proper is an imbecile's view."

"And the tomb objectionable! Why objectionable? Hasn't a man the right to erect one in his own demesne? I even intend to be buried in it!"

"Don't talk like that!" said Pécuchet.

Then they passed the guests in review.

"The doctor seems to me a nice snob!"

"Did you notice the sneer of M. Marescot before the portrait?"

"What a low fellow the mayor is! When you dine in a house, hang it! you should show some respect towards the curios."

"Madame Bordin!" said Bouvard.

"Ah! that one's a schemer. Don't annoy me by talking about her."

Disgusted with society, they resolved to see nobody any more, but live exclusively by themselves and for themselves.

And they spent days in the wine-cellar, picking the tartar off the bottles, re-varnished all the furniture, enamelled the rooms; and each evening, as they watched the wood burning, they discussed the best system of fuel.

Through economy they tried to smoke hams, and attempted to do the washing themselves. Germaine, whom they inconvenienced, used to shrug her shoulders. When the time came for making preserves she got angry, and they took up their station in the bakehouse. It was a disused wash-house, where there was, under the faggots, a big, old-fashioned tub, excellently fitted for their projects, the ambition having seized them to manufacture preserves.

Fourteen glass bottles were filled with tomatoes and green peas. They coated the stoppers with quicklime and cheese, attached to the rims silk cords, and then plunged them into boiling water. It evaporated; they poured in cold water; the difference of temperature caused the bowls to burst. Only three of them were saved. Then they procured old sardine boxes, put veal cutlets into them, and plunged them into a vessel of boiling water. They came out as round as balloons. The cold flattened them out afterwards. To continue their experiments, they shut up in other boxes eggs, chiccory, lobsters, a hotchpotch of fish, and a soup! — and they applauded themselves like M. Appert, "on having fixed the seasons." Such discoveries, according to Pécuchet, carried him beyond the exploits of conquerors.

They improved upon Madame Bordin's pickles by spicing the vinegar with pepper; and their brandy plums were very much superior. By the process of steeping ratafia, they obtained raspberry and absinthe. With honey and angelica in a cask of Bagnolles, they tried to make Malaga wine; and they likewise undertook the manufacture of champagne! The bottles of Châblis diluted with water must burst of themselves. Then he no longer was doubtful of success.

Their studies widening, they came to suspect frauds in all articles of food. They cavilled with the baker on the colour of his bread; they made the grocer their enemy by maintaining that he adulterated his chocolate. They went to Falaise for a jujube, and, even under the apothecary's own eyes, they submitted his paste to the test of water. It assumed the appearance of a piece of bacon, which indicated gelatine.

After this triumph, their pride rose to a high pitch. They bought up the stock of a bankrupt distiller, and soon there arrived in the house sieves, barrels, funnels, skimmers, filters, and scales, without counting a bowl of wood with a ball attached and a Moreshead still, which required a reflecting-furnace with a basket funnel. They learned how sugar is clarified, and the different kinds of boilings, the large and the small system of boiling twice over, the blowing system, the methods of making up in balls, the reduction of sugar to a viscous state, and the making of burnt sugar. But they longed to use the still; and they broached the fine liqueurs, beginning with the aniseed cordial. The liquid nearly always drew away the materials with it, or rather they stuck together at the bottom; at other times they were mistaken as to the amount of the ingredients. Around them shone great copper pans; egg-shaped vessels projected their narrow openings; saucepans hung from the walls. Frequently one of them culled herbs on the table, while the other made the ball swing in the suspended bowl. They stirred the ladles; they tasted the mashies.

Bouvard, always in a perspiration, had no garment on save his shirt and his trousers, drawn up to the pit of his stomach by his short braces; but, giddy as a bird, he would forget the opening in the centre of the cucurbit, or would make the fire too strong.

Pécuchet kept muttering calculations, motionless in his long blouse, a kind of child's smock-frock with sleeves; and they looked upon themselves as very serious people engaged in very useful occupations.

At length they dreamed of a cream which would surpass all others. They would put into it coriander as in Kummel, kirsch as in Maraschino, hyssop as in Chartreuse, amber-seed as in Vesperto cordial, and sweet calamus as in Krambambuly; and it would be coloured red with sandalwood. But under what name should they introduce it for commercial purposes? — for they would want a name easy to retain and yet fanciful. Having turned the matter over a long time, they determined that it should be called "Bouvarine."

About the end of autumn stains appeared in the three glass bowls containing the preserves. The tomatoes and green peas were rotten. That must have been due to the way they had stopped up the vessels. Then the problem of stoppage tormented them. In order to try the new methods, they required money; and the farm had eaten up their resources.

Many times tenants had offered themselves; but Bouvard would not have them. His principal farm-servant carried on the cultivation according to his directions, with a risky economy, to such an extent that the crops diminished and everything was imperilled; and they were talking about their embarrassments when Maître Gouy entered the laboratory, escorted by his wife, who remained timidly in the background.

Thanks to all the dressings they had got, the lands were improved, and he had come to take up the farm again. He ran it down. In spite of all their toils, the profits were uncertain; in short, if he wanted it, that was because of his love for the country, and his regret for such good masters.

They dismissed him coldly. He came back the same evening.

Pécuchet had preached at Bouvard; they were on the point of giving way. Gouy asked for a reduction of rent; and when the others protested, he began to bellow rather than speak, invoking the name of God, enumerating his labours, and extolling his merits. When they called on him to state his terms, he hung down his head instead of answering. Then his wife, seated near the door, with a big basket on her knees, made similar protestations, screeching in a sharp voice, like a hen that has been hurt.

At last the lease was agreed on, the rent being fixed at three thousand francs a year — a third less than it had been formerly.

Before they had separated, Maître Gouy offered to buy up the stock, and the bargaining was renewed.

The valuation of the chattels occupied fifteen days. Bouvard was dying of fatigue. He let everything go for a sum so contemptible that Gouy at first opened his eyes wide, and exclaiming, "Agreed!" slapped his palm.

After which the proprietors, following the old custom, proposed that they should take a "nip" at the house, and Pécuchet opened a bottle of his Malaga, less through generosity than in the hope of eliciting eulogies on the wine.

But the husbandman said, with a sour look, "It's like liquorice syrup." And his wife, "in order to get rid of the taste," asked for a glass of brandy.

A graver matter engaged their attention. All the ingredients of the "Bouvarine" were now collected. They heaped them together in the cucurbit, with the alcohol, lighted the fire, and waited. However, Pécuchet, annoyed by the misadventure about the Malaga, took the tin boxes out of the cupboard and pulled the lid off the first, then off the second, and then off the third. He angrily flung them down, and called out to Bouvard. The latter had fastened the cock of the worm in order to try the effect on the preserves.

The disillusion was complete. The slices of veal were like boiled boot-soles; a muddy fluid had taken the place of the lobster; the fish-stew was unrecognisable; mushroom growths had sprouted over the soup, and an intolerable smell tainted the laboratory.

Suddenly, with the noise of a bombshell, the still burst into twenty pieces, which jumped up to the ceiling, smashing the pots, flattening out the skimmers and shattering the glasses. The coal was scattered about, the furnace was demolished, and next day Germaine found a spatula in the yard.

The force of the steam had broken the instrument to such an extent that the cucurbit was pinned to the head of the still.

Pécuchet immediately found himself squatted behind the vat, and Bouvard lay like one who had fallen over a stool. For ten minutes they remained in this posture, not daring to venture on a single movement, pale with terror, in the midst of broken glass. When they were able to recover the power of speech, they asked themselves what was the cause of so many misfortunes, and of the last above all? And they could understand nothing about the matter except that they were near being killed. Pécuchet finished with these words:

"It is, perhaps, because we do not know chemistry!"

CHAPTER III.

Amateur Chemists.

In order to understand chemistry they procured Regnault's course of lectures, and were, in the first place, informed that "simple bodies are perhaps compound." They are divided into metalloids and metals — a difference in which, the author observes, there is "nothing absolute." So with acids and bases, "a body being able to behave in the manner of acids or of bases, according to circumstances."

The notation appeared to them irregular. The multiple proportions perplexed Pécuchet.

"Since one molecule of a, I suppose, is combined with several particles of b, it seems to me that this molecule ought to be divided into as many particles; but, if it is divided, it ceases to be unity, the primordial molecule. In short, I do not understand."

"No more do I," said Bouvard.

And they had recourse to a work less difficult, that of Girardin, from which they acquired the certainty that ten litres of air weigh a hundred grammes, that lead does not go into pencils, and that the diamond is only carbon.

What amazed them above all is that the earth, as an element, does not exist.

They grasped the working of straw, gold, silver, the lye-washing of linen, the tinning of saucepans; then, without the least scruple, Bouvard and Pécuchet launched into organic chemistry.

What a marvel to find again in living beings the same substances of which the minerals are composed! Nevertheless they experienced a sort of humiliation at the idea that their own personality contained phosphorus, like matches; albumen, like the whites of eggs; and hydrogen gas, like street-lamps.

After colours and oily substances came the turn of fermentation. This brought them to acids — and the law of equivalents once more confused them. They tried to elucidate it by means of the atomic theory, which fairly swamped them.

In Bouvard's opinion instruments would have been necessary to understand all this. The expense was very great, and they had incurred too much already. But, no doubt, Dr. Vaucorbeil could enlighten them.

They presented themselves during his consultation hours.

"I hear you, gentlemen. What is your ailment?"

Pécuchet replied that they were not patients, and, having stated the object of their visit:

"We want to understand, in the first place, the higher atomicity."

The physician got very red, then blamed them for being desirous to learn chemistry.

"I am not denying its importance, you may be sure; but really they are shoving it in everywhere! It exercises a deplorable influence on medicine."

And the authority of his language was strengthened by the appearance of his surroundings. Over the chimney-piece trailed some diachylum and strips for binding. In the middle of the desk stood the surgical case. A basin in a corner was full of probes, and close to the wall there was a representation of a human figure deprived of the skin.

Pécuchet complimented the doctor on it.

"It must be a lovely study, anatomy."

M. Vaucorbeil expatiated on the fascination he had formerly found in dissections; and Bouvard inquired what were the analogies between the interior of a woman and that of a man.

In order to satisfy him, the doctor fetched from his library a collection of anatomical plates.

"Take them with you! You can look at them more at your ease in your own house."

The skeleton astonished them by the prominence of the jawbone, the holes for the eyes, and the frightful length of the hands.

They stood in need of an explanatory work. They returned to M. Vaucorbeil's residence, and, thanks to the manual of Alexander Lauth, they learned the divisions of the frame, wondering at the backbone, sixteen times stronger, it is said, than if the Creator had made it straight (why sixteen times exactly?). The metacarpals drove Bouvard crazy; and Pécuchet, who was in a desperate state over the cranium, lost courage before the sphenoid, although it resembles a Turkish or "Turkesque" saddle.

As for the articulations, they were hidden under too many ligaments; so they attacked the muscles. But the insertions were not easily discovered; and when they came to the vertebral grooves they gave it up completely.

Then Pécuchet said:

"If we took up chemistry again, would not this be only utilising the laboratory?"

Bouvard protested, and he thought he had a recollection of artificial corpses being manufactured according to the custom of hot countries.

Barberou, with whom he communicated, gave him some information about the matter. For ten francs a month they could have one of the manikins of M. Auzoux; and the following week the carrier from Falaise deposited before their gate an oblong box.

Full of emotion, they carried it into the bakehouse. When the boards were unfastened, the straw fell down, the silver paper slipped off, and the anatomical figure made its appearance.

It was brick-coloured, without hair or skin, and variegated with innumerable strings, red, blue, and white. It did not look like a corpse, but rather like a kind of plaything, very ugly, very clean, and smelling of varnish.

They next took off the thorax; and they perceived the two lungs, like a pair of sponges, the heart like a big egg, slightly sidewise behind the diaphragm, the kidneys, the entire bundle of entrails.

"To work!" said Pécuchet. The day and the evening were spent at it. They had put blouses on, just as medical students do in the dissecting-rooms; and, by the light of three candles, they were working at their pieces of pasteboard, when a fist knocked at the door.

"Open!"

It was M. Foureau, followed by the keeper.

Germaine's masters were pleased to show him the manikin. She had rushed immediately to the grocer's shop to tell the thing, and the whole village now imagined that they had a real corpse concealed in their house. Foureau, yielding to the public clamour, had come to make sure about the fact. A number of persons, anxious for information, stood outside the porch.

When he entered, the manikin was lying on its side, and the muscles of the face, having been loosened, caused a monstrous protrusion, and looked frightful.

"What brings you here?" said Pécuchet.

Foureau stammered: "Nothing, nothing at all." And, taking up one of the pieces from the table, "What is this?"

"The buccinator," replied Bouvard.

Foureau said nothing, but smiled in a sly fashion, jealous of their having an amusement which he could not afford.

The two anatomists pretended to be pursuing their investigations. The people outside, getting bored with waiting, made their way into the bakehouse, and, as they began pushing one another a little, the table shook.

"Ah! this is too annoying," exclaimed Pécuchet. "Let us be rid of the public!"

The keeper made the busybodies take themselves off.

"Very well," said Bouvard; "we don't want anyone."

Foureau understood the allusion, and put it to them whether, not being medical men, they had the right to keep such an object in their possession. However, he was going to write to the prefect.

What a country district it was! There could be nothing more foolish, barbarous, and retrograde. The comparison which they instituted between themselves and the others consoled them — they felt a longing to suffer in the cause of science.

The doctor, too, came to see them. He disparaged the model as too far removed from nature, but took advantage of the occasion to give them a lecture.

Bouvard and Pécuchet were delighted; and at their request M. Vaucorbeil lent them several volumes out of his library, declaring at the same time that they would not reach the end of them. They took note of the cases of childbirth, longevity, obesity, and extraordinary constipation given in the Dictionary of Medical Sciences. Would that they had known the famous Canadian, De Beaumont, the polyphagi, Tarare and Bijou, the dropsical woman from the department of Eure, the Piedmontese who went every twenty days to the water-closet, Simon de Mirepoix, who was ossified at the time of his death, and that ancient mayor of Angoulême whose nose weighed three pounds!

The brain inspired them with philosophic reflections. They easily distinguished in the interior of it the septum lucidum, composed of two lamellæ, and the pineal gland, which is like a little red pea. But there were peduncles and ventricles, arches, columns, strata, ganglions, and fibres of all kinds, and the foramen of Pacchioni and the "body" of Paccini; in short, an inextricable mass of details, enough to wear their lives out.

Sometimes, in a fit of dizziness, they would take the figure completely to pieces, then would get perplexed about putting back each part in its proper place. This was troublesome work, especially after breakfast, and it was not long before they were both asleep, Bouvard with drooping chin and protruding stomach, and Pécuchet with his hands over his head and both elbows on the table.

Often at that moment M. Vaucorbeil, having finished his morning rounds, would open the door.

"Well, comrades, how goes anatomy?"

"Splendidly," they would answer.

Then he would put questions to them, for the pleasure of confusing them.

When they were tired of one organ they went on to another, in this way taking up and then throwing aside the heart, the stomach, the ear, the intestines; for the pasteboard manikin bored them to death, despite their efforts to become interested in him. At last the doctor came on them suddenly, just as they were nailing him up again in his box.

"Bravo! I expected that."

At their age they could not undertake such studies; and the smile that accompanied these words wounded them deeply.

What right had he to consider them incapable? Did science belong to this gentleman, as if he were himself a very superior personage? Then, accepting his challenge, they went all the way to Bayeux to purchase books there. What they required was physiology, and a second-hand bookseller procured for them the treatises of Richerand and Adelon, celebrated at the period.

All the commonplaces as to ages, sexes, and temperaments appeared to them of the highest importance. They were much pleased to learn that there are in the tartar of the teeth three kinds of animalcules, that the seat of taste is in the tongue, and the sensation of hunger in the stomach.

In order to grasp its functions better, they regretted that they had not the faculty of ruminating, as Montègre, M. Gosse, and the brother of Gerard had; and they masticated slowly, reduced the food to pulp, and insalivated it, accompanying in thought the alimentary mass passing into their intestines, and following it with methodical scrupulosity and an almost religious attention to its final consequences.

In order to produce digestion artificially, they piled up meat in a bottle, in which was the gastric juice of a duck, and they carried it under their armpits for a fortnight, without any other result save making their persons smell unpleasantly. You might have seen them running along the high-road in wet clothes under a burning sun. This was for the purpose of determining whether thirst is quenched by the application of water to the epidermis. They came back out of breath, both of them having caught cold.

Experiments in hearing, speech, and vision were then made in a lively fashion; but Bouvard made a show-off on the subject of generation.

Pécuchet's reserve with regard to this question had always surprised him. His friend's ignorance appeared to him so complete that Bouvard pressed him for an explanation, and Pécuchet, colouring, ended by making an avowal.

Some rascals had on one occasion dragged him into a house of ill-fame, from which he made his escape, preserving himself for the woman whom he might fall in love with some day. A fortunate opportunity had never come to him, so that, what with bashfulness, limited means, obstinacy, the force of custom, at fifty-two years, and in spite of his residence in the capital, he still possessed his virginity.

Bouvard found difficulty in believing it; then he laughed hugely, but stopped on perceiving tears in Pécuchet's eyes — for he had not been without attachments, having by turns been smitten by a rope-dancer, the sister-in-law of an architect, a bar-maid, and a young washerwoman; and the marriage had even been arranged when he had discovered that she was enceinte by another man.

Bouvard said to him:

"There is always a way to make up for lost time. Come — no sadness! I will take it on myself, if you like."

Pécuchet answered, with a sigh, that he need not think any more about it; and they went on with their physiology.

Is it true that the surfaces of our bodies are always letting out a subtle vapour? The proof of it is that the weight of a man is decreasing every minute. If each day what is wanting is added and what is excessive subtracted, the health would be kept in perfect equilibrium. Sanctorius, the discoverer of this law, spent half a century weighing his food every day together with its excretions, and took the weights himself, giving himself no rest, save for the purpose of writing down his computations.

They tried to imitate Sanctorius; but, as their scales could not bear the weight of both of them, it was Pécuchet who began.

He took his clothes off, in order not to impede the perspiration, and he stood on the platform of the scales perfectly naked, exposing to view, in spite of his modesty, his unusually long torso, resembling a cylinder, together with his short legs and his brown skin. Beside him, on his chair, his friend read for him:

"Learned men maintain that animal heat is developed by the contractions of the muscles, and that it is possible by moving the thorax and the pelvic regions to raise the temperature of a warm bath."

Bouvard went to look for their bathing-tub, and, when everything was ready, plunged into it, provided with a thermometer. The wreckage of the distillery, swept towards the end of the room, presented in the shadow the indistinct outlines of a hillock. Every now and then they could hear the mice nibbling; there was a stale odour of aromatic plants, and finding it rather agreeable, they chatted serenely.

However, Bouvard felt a little cool.

"Move your members about!" said Pécuchet.

He moved them, without at all changing with the thermometer.

"Tis decidedly cold."

"I am not hot either," returned Pécuchet, himself seized with a fit of shivering. "But move about your pelvic regions — move them about!"

Bouvard spread open his thighs, wriggled his sides, balanced his stomach, puffed like a whale, then looked at the thermometer, which was always falling.

"I don't understand this at all! Anyhow, I am stirring myself!"

"Not enough!"

And he continued his gymnastics.

This had gone on for three hours when once more he grasped the tube.

"What! twelve degrees! Oh, good-night! I'm off to bed!"

A dog came in, half mastiff, half hound, mangy, with yellowish hair and lolling tongue.

What were they to do? There was no bell, and their housekeeper was deaf. They were quaking, but did not venture to budge, for fear of being bitten.

Pécuchet thought it a good idea to hurl threats at him, and at the same time to roll his eyes about.

Then the dog began to bark; and he jumped about the scales, in which Pécuchet, by clinging on to the cords and bending his knees, tried to raise himself up as high as ever he could.

"You're getting your death of cold up there!" said Bouvard; and he began making smiling faces at the dog, while pretending to give him things.

The dog, no doubt, understood these advances. Bouvard went so far as to caress him, stuck the animal's paws on his shoulders, and rubbed them with his finger-nails.

"Hollo! look here! there, he's off with my breeches!"

The dog cuddled himself upon them, and lay quiet.

At last, with the utmost precautions, they ventured the one to come down from the platform of the scales, and the other to get out of the bathing-tub; and when Pécuchet had got his clothes on again, he gave vent to this exclamation:

"You, my good fellow, will be of use for our experiments."

What experiments? They might inject phosphorus into him, and then shut him up in a cellar, in order to see whether he would emit fire through the nostrils.

But how were they to inject it? and furthermore, they could not get anyone to sell them phosphorus.

They thought of putting him under a pneumatic bell, of making him inhale gas, and of giving him poison to drink. All this, perhaps, would not be funny! Eventually, they thought the best thing they could do was to apply a steel magnet to his spinal marrow.

Bouvard, repressing his emotion, handed some needles on a plate to Pécuchet, who fixed them against the vertebræ. They broke, slipped, and fell on the ground. He took others, and quickly applied them at random. The dog burst his bonds, passed like a cannon-ball through the window, ran across the yard to the vestibule, and presented himself in the kitchen.

Germaine screamed when she saw him soaked with blood, and with twine round his paws.

Her masters, who had followed him, came in at the same moment. He made one spring and disappeared.

The old servant turned on them.

"This is another of your tomfooleries, I'm sure! And my kitchen, too! It's nice! This perhaps will drive him mad! People are in jail who are not as bad as you!"

They got back to the laboratory in order to examine the magnetic needles.

Not one of them had the least particle of the filings drawn off.

Then Germaine's assumption made them uneasy. He might get rabies, come back unawares, and make a dash at them.

Next day they went making inquiries everywhere, and for many years they turned up a by-path whenever they saw in the open country a dog at all resembling this one.

Their other experiments were unsuccessful. Contrary to the statements in the text-books, the pigeons which they bled, whether their stomachs were full or empty, died in the same space of time. Kittens sunk under water perished at the end of five minutes; and a goose, which they had stuffed with madder, presented periosteal that were perfectly white.

The question of nutrition puzzled them.

How did it happen that the same juice is produced by bones, blood, lymph, and excrementitious materials? But one cannot follow the metamorphoses of an article of food. The man who uses only one of them is chemically equal to him who absorbs several. Vauquelin, having made a calculation of all the lime contained in the oats given as food to a hen, found a greater quantity of it in the shells of her eggs. So, then, a creation of substance takes place. In what way? Nothing is known about it.

It is not even known what is the strength of the heart. Borelli says it is what is necessary for lifting a weight of one hundred and eighty thousand pounds, while Kiell estimates it at about eight ounces; and from this they drew the conclusion that physiology is — as a well-worn phrase expresses it — the romance of medicine. As they were unable to understand it, they did not believe in it.

A month slipped away in doing nothing. Then they thought of their garden. The dead tree, displayed in the middle of it, was annoying, and accordingly, they squared it. This exercise fatigued them. Bouvard very often found it necessary to get the blacksmith to put his tools in order.

One day, as he was making his way to the forge, he was accosted by a man carrying a canvas bag on his back, who offered to sell him almanacs, pious books, holy medals, and lastly, the Health Manual of François Raspail.

This little book pleased him so much that he wrote to Barberou to send him the large work. Barberou sent it on, and in his letter mentioned an apothecary's shop for the prescriptions given in the work.

The simplicity of the doctrine charmed them. All diseases proceed from worms. They spoil the teeth, make the lungs hollow, enlarge the liver, ravage the intestines, and cause noises therein. The best thing for getting rid of them is camphor. Bouvard and Pécuchet adopted it. They took it in snuff, they chewed it and distributed it in cigarettes, in bottles of sedative water and pills of aloes. They even undertook the care of a hunchback. It was a child whom they had come across one fair-day. His mother, a beggar woman, brought him to them every morning. They rubbed his hump with camphorated grease, placed there for twenty minutes a mustard poultice, then covered it over with diachylum, and, in order to make sure of his coming back, gave him his breakfast.

As his mind was fixed on intestinal worms, Pécuchet noticed a singular spot on Madame Bordin's cheek. The doctor had for a long time been treating it with bitters. Round at first as a twenty-sou piece, this spot had enlarged and formed a red circle. They offered to cure it for her. She consented, but made it a condition that the ointment should be applied by Bouvard. She took a seat before the window, unfastened the upper portion of her corset, and remained with her cheek turned up, looking at him with a glance of her eye which would have been dangerous were it not for Pécuchet's presence. In the prescribed doses, and in spite of the horror felt with regard to mercury, they administered calomel. One month afterwards Madame Bordin was cured. She became a propagandist in their behalf, and the tax-collector, the mayor's secretary, the mayor himself, and everybody in Chavignolles sucked camphor by the aid of quills.

However, the hunchback did not get straight; the collector gave up his cigarette; it stopped up his chest twice as much. Foureau made complaints that the pills of aloes gave him hemorrhoids. Bouvard got a stomachache, and Pécuchet fearful headaches. They lost confidence in Raspail, but took care to say nothing about it, fearing that they might lessen their own importance.

They now exhibited great zeal about vaccine, learned how to bleed people over cabbage leaves, and even purchased a pair of lancets.

They accompanied the doctor to the houses of the poor, and then consulted their books. The symptoms noticed by the writers were not those which they had just observed. As for the names of diseases, they were Latin, Greek, French — a medley of every language. They are to be counted by thousands; and Linnæus's system of classification, with its genera and its species, is exceedingly convenient; but how was the species to be fixed? Then they got lost in the philosophy of medicine. They raved about the life-principle of Van Helmont, vitalism, Brownism, organicism, inquired of the doctor whence comes the germ of scrofula, towards what point the infectious miasma inclines, and the means in all cases of disease to distinguish the cause from its effects.

"The cause and the effect are entangled in one another," replied Vaucorbeil.

His want of logic disgusted them — and they went by themselves to visit the sick, making their way into the houses on the pretext of philanthropy. At the further end of rooms, on dirty mattresses, lay persons with faces hanging on one side, others who had them swollen or scarlet, or lemon-coloured, or very violet-hued, with pinched nostrils, trembling mouths, rattlings in the throat, hiccoughs, perspirations, and emissions like leather or stale cheese.

They read the prescriptions of their physicians, and were surprised at the fact that anodynes are sometimes excitants, and emetics purgatives, that the same remedy suits different ailments, and that a malady may disappear under opposite systems of treatment.

Nevertheless, they gave advice, got on the moral hobby again, and had the assurance to auscultate. Their imagination began to ferment. They wrote to the king, in order that there might be established in Calvados an institute of nurses for the sick, of which they would be the professors.

They would go to the apothecary at Bayeux (the one at Falaise had always a grudge against them on account of the jujube affair), and they gave him directions to manufacture, like the ancients, pila purgatoria, that is to say, medicaments in the shape of pellets, which, by dint of handling, become absorbed in the individual.

In accordance with the theory that by diminishing the heat we impede the watery humours, they suspended in her armchair to the beams of the ceiling a woman suffering from meningitis, and they were swinging her with all their force when the husband, coming on the scene, kicked them out. Finally, they scandalised the curé thoroughly by introducing the new fashion of thermometers in the rectum.

Typhoid fever broke out in the neighbourhood. Bouvard declared that he would not have anything to do with it. But the wife of Gouy, their farmer, came groaning to them. Her man was a fortnight sick, and M. Vaucorbeil was neglecting him. Pécuchet devoted himself to the case.

Lenticular spots on the chest, pains in the joints, stomach distended, tongue red, these were all symptoms of dothienenteritis. Recalling the statement of Raspail that by taking away the regulation of diet the fever may be suppressed, he ordered broth and a little meat.

The doctor suddenly made his appearance. His patient was on the point of eating, with two pillows behind his back, between his wife and Pécuchet, who were sustaining him. He drew near the bed, and flung the plate out through the window, exclaiming:

"This is a veritable murder!"

"Why?"

"You perforate the intestine, since typhoid fever is an alteration of its follicular membrane."

"Not always!"

And a dispute ensued as to the nature of fevers. Pécuchet believed that they were essential in themselves; Vaucorbeil made them dependent on our bodily organs.

"Therefore, I remove everything that might excite them excessively."

"But regimen weakens the vital principle."

"What twaddle are you talking with your vital principle? What is it? Who has seen it?"

Pécuchet got confused.

"Besides," said the physician, "Gouy does not want food."

The patient made a gesture of assent under his cotton nightcap.

"No matter, he requires it!"

"Not a bit! his pulse is at ninety-eight!"

"What matters about his pulse?" And Pécuchet proceeded to give authorities.

"Let systems alone!" said the doctor.

Pécuchet folded his arms. "So then, you are an empiric?"

"By no means; but by observing — —"

"But if one observes badly?"

Vaucorbeil took this phrase for an allusion to Madame Bordin's skin eruption — a story about which the widow had made a great outcry, and the recollection of which irritated him.

"To start with, it is necessary to have practised."

"Those who revolutionised the science did not practise — Van Helmont, Boerhaave, Broussais himself."

Without replying, Vaucorbeil stooped towards Gouy, and raising his voice:

"Which of us two do you select as your doctor?"

Mutually becoming afflicted, they looked at their tongues

The patient, who was falling asleep, perceived angry faces, and began to blubber. His wife did not know either what answer to make, for the one was clever, but the other had perhaps a secret.

"Very well," said Vaucorbeil, "since you hesitate between a man furnished with a diploma — —"

Pécuchet sneered.

"Why do you laugh?"

"Because a diploma is not always an argument."

The doctor saw himself attacked in his means of livelihood, in his prerogative, in his social importance. His wrath gave itself full vent.

"We shall see that when you are brought up before the courts for illegally practising medicine!" Then, turning round to the farmer's wife, "Get him killed by this gentleman at your ease, and I'm hanged if ever I come back to your house!"

And he dashed past the beech trees, shaking his walking-stick as he went.

When Pécuchet returned, Bouvard was himself in a very excited state. He had just had a visit from Foureau, who was exasperated about his hemorrhoids. Vainly had he contended that they were a safeguard against every disease. Foureau, who would listen to nothing, had threatened him with an action for damages. He lost his head over it.

Pécuchet told him the other story, which he considered more serious, and was a little shocked at Bouvard's indifference.

Gouy, next day, had a pain in his abdomen. This might be due to the ingestion of the food. Perhaps Vaucorbeil was not mistaken. A physician, after all, ought to have some knowledge of this! And a feeling of remorse took possession of Pécuchet! He was afraid lest he might turn out a homicide.

For prudence' sake they sent the hunchback away. But his mother cried a great deal at his losing the breakfast, not to speak of the infliction of having made them come every day from Barneval to Chavignolles.

Foureau calmed down, and Gouy recovered his strength. At the present moment the cure was certain. A success like this emboldened Pécuchet.

"If we studied obstetrics with the aid of one of these manikins —

"Enough of manikins!"

"There are half-bodies made with skin invented for the use of students of midwifery. It seems to me that I could turn over the fœtus!"

But Bouvard was tired of medicine.

"The springs of life are hidden from us, the ailments too numerous, the remedies problematical. No reasonable definitions are to be found in the authors of health, disease, diathesis, or even pus."

However, all this reading had disturbed their brains.

Bouvard, whenever he caught a cold, imagined he was getting inflammation of the lungs. When leeches did not abate a stitch in the side, he had recourse to a blister, whose action affected the kidneys. Then he fancied he had an attack of stone.

Pécuchet caught lumbago while lopping the elm trees, and vomited after his dinner — a circumstance which frightened him very much. Then, noticing that his colour was rather yellow, suspected a liver complaint, and asked himself, "Have I pains?" and ended by having them.

Mutually becoming afflicted, they looked at their tongues, felt each other's pulses, made a change as to the use of mineral waters, purged themselves — and dreaded cold, heat, wind, rain, flies, and principally currents of air.

Pécuchet imagined that taking snuff was fatal. Besides, sneezing sometimes causes the rupture of an aneurism; and so he gave up the snuff-box altogether. From force of habit he would thrust his fingers into it, then suddenly become conscious of his imprudence.

As black coffee shakes the nerves, Bouvard wished to give up his half cup; but he used to fall asleep after his meals, and was afraid when he woke up, for prolonged sleep is a foreboding of apoplexy.

Their ideal was Cornaro, that Venetian gentleman who by the regulation of his diet attained to an extreme old age. Without actually imitating him, they might take the same precautions; and Pécuchet took down from his bookshelves a Manual of Hygiene by Doctor Morin.

"How had they managed to live till now?"

Their favourite dishes were there prohibited. Germaine, in a state of perplexity, did not know any longer what to serve up to them.

Every kind of meat had its inconveniences. Puddings and sausages, red herrings, lobsters, and game are "refractory." The bigger a fish is, the more gelatine it contains, and consequently the heavier it is. Vegetables cause acidity, macaroni makes people dream; cheeses, "considered generally, are difficult of digestion." A glass of water in the morning is "dangerous." Everything you eat or drink being accompanied by a similar warning, or rather by these words: "Bad!" "Beware of the abuse of it!" "Does not suit everyone!" Why bad? Wherein is the abuse of it? How are you to know whether a thing like this suits you?

What a problem was that of breakfast! They gave up coffee and milk on account of its detestable reputation, and, after that, chocolate, for it is "a mass of indigestible substances." There remained, then, tea. But "nervous persons ought to forbid themselves the use of it completely." Yet Decker, in the seventeenth century, prescribed twenty decalitres of it a day, in order to cleanse the spongy parts of the pancreas.

This direction shook Morin in their estimation, the more so as he condemns every kind of head-dress, hats, women's caps, and men's caps — a requirement which was revolting to Pécuchet.

Then they purchased Becquerel's treatise, in which they saw that pork is in itself "a good aliment," tobacco "perfectly harmless in its character," and coffee "indispensable to military men."

Up to that time they had believed in the unhealthiness of damp places. Not at all! Casper declares them less deadly than others. One does not bathe in the sea without refreshing one's skin. Bégin advises people to cast themselves into it while they are perspiring freely. Wine taken neat after soup is considered excellent for the stomach; Levy lays the blame on it of impairing the teeth. Lastly, the flannel waistcoat — that safeguard, that preserver of health, that palladium cherished by Bouvard and inherent to Pécuchet, without any evasions or fear of the opinions of others — is considered unsuitable by some authors for men of a plethoric and sanguine temperament!

What, then, is hygiene? "Truth on this side of the Pyrenees, error on the other side," M. Levy asserts; and Becquerel adds that it is not a science.

So then they ordered for their dinner oysters, a duck, pork and cabbage, cream, a Pont l'Evêque cheese, and a bottle of Burgundy. It was an enfranchisement, almost a revenge; and they laughed at Cornaro! It was only an imbecile that could be tyrannised over as he had been! What vileness to be always thinking about prolonging one's existence! Life is good only on the condition that it is enjoyed.

"Another piece?"

"Yes, I will."

"So will I."

"Your health."

"Yours."

"And let us laugh at the rest of the world."

They became elated. Bouvard announced that he wanted three cups of coffee, though he was not a military man. Pécuchet, with his cap over his ears, took pinch after pinch, and sneezed without fear; and, feeling the need of a little champagne, they ordered Germaine to go at once to the wine-shop to buy a bottle of it. The village was too far away; she refused. Pécuchet got indignant:

"I command you — understand! — I command you to hurry off there."

She obeyed, but, grumbling, resolved soon to have done with her masters; they were so incomprehensible and fantastic.

Then, as in former days, they went to drink their coffee and brandy on the hillock.

The harvest was just over, and the stacks in the middle of the fields rose in dark heaps against the tender blue of a calm night. Nothing was astir about the farms. Even the crickets were no longer heard. The fields were all wrapped in sleep.

The pair digested while they inhaled the breeze which blew refreshingly against their cheeks.

Above, the sky was covered with stars; some shone in clusters, others in a row, or rather alone, at certain distances from each other. A zone of luminous dust, extending from north to south, bifurcated above their heads. Amid these splendours there were vast empty spaces, and the firmament seemed a sea of azure with archipelagoes and islets.

"What a quantity!" exclaimed Bouvard.

"We do not see all," replied Pécuchet. "Behind the Milky Way are the nebulae, and behind the nebulae, stars still; the most distant is separated from us by three millions of myriamètres."

He had often looked into the telescope of the Place Vendôme, and he recalled the figures.

"The sun is a million times bigger than the earth; Sirius is twelve times the size of the sun; comets measure thirty-four millions of leagues."

"'Tis enough to make one crazy!" said Bouvard.

He lamented his ignorance, and even regretted that he had not been in his youth at the Polytechnic School.

Then Pécuchet, turning him in the direction of the Great Bear, showed him the polar star; then Cassiopeia, whose constellation forms a Y; Vega, of the Lyra constellation — all scintillating; and at the lower part of the horizon, the red Aldebaran.

Bouvard, with his head thrown back, followed with difficulty the angles, quadrilaterals, and pentagons, which it is necessary to imagine in order to make yourself at home in the sky.

Pécuchet went on:

"The swiftness of light is eighty thousand leagues a second; one ray of the Milky Way takes six centuries to reach us; so that a star at the moment we observe it may have disappeared. Several are intermittent; others never come back; and they change positions. Every one of them is in motion; every one of them is passing on."

"However, the sun is motionless."

"It was believed to be so formerly. But to-day men of science declare that it rushes towards the constellation of Hercules!"

This put Bouvard's ideas out of order — and, after a minute's reflection:

"Science is constructed according to the data furnished by a corner of space. Perhaps it does not agree with all the rest that we are ignorant of, which is much vaster, and which we cannot discover."

So they talked, standing on the hillock, in the light of the stars; and their conversation was interrupted by long intervals of silence.

At last they asked one another whether there were men in the stars. Why not? And as creation is harmonious, the inhabitants of Sirius ought to be gigantic, those of Mars of middle stature, those of Venus very small. Unless it should be everywhere the same thing. There are merchants up there, and gendarmes; they trade there; they fight there; they dethrone kings there.

Some shooting stars slipped suddenly, describing on the sky, as it were, the parabola of an enormous rocket.

"Stop!" said Bouvard; "here are vanishing worlds."

Pécuchet replied:

"If ours, in its turn, kicks the bucket, the citizens of the stars will not be more moved than we are now. Ideas like this may pull down your pride."

"What is the object of all this?"

"Perhaps it has no object."

"However — — " And Pécuchet repeated two or three times "however," without finding anything more to say.

"No matter. I should very much like to know how the universe is made."

"That should be in Buffon," returned Bouvard, whose eyes were closing.

"I am not equal to any more of it. I am going to bed."

The Epoques de la Nature informed them that a comet by knocking against the sun had detached one portion of it, which became the earth. First, the poles had cooled; all the waters had enveloped the globe; they subsided into the caverns; then the continents separated from each other, and the beasts and man appeared.

The majesty of creation engendered in them an amazement infinite as itself. Their heads got enlarged. They were proud of reflecting on such lofty themes.

The minerals ere long proved wearisome to them, and for distraction they sought refuge in the Harmonies of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre.

Vegetable and terrestrial harmonies, ærial, aquatic, human, fraternal, and even conjugal — every one of them is here dealt with, not omitting the invocations to Venus, to the Zephyrs, and to the Loves. They exhibited astonishment at fishes having fins, birds wings, seeds an envelope; full of that philosophy which discovers virtuous intentions in Nature, and regards her as a kind of St. Vincent de Paul, always occupied in performing acts of benevolence.

Then they wondered at her prodigies, the water-spouts, the volcanoes, the virgin forests; and they bought M. Depping's work on the Marvels and Beauties of Nature in France. Cantal possesses three of them, Hérault five, Burgundy two — no more, while Dauphiné reckons for itself alone up to fifteen marvels. But soon we shall find no more of them. The grottoes with stalactites are stopped up; the burning mountains are extinguished; the natural ice-houses have become heated; and the old trees in which they said mass are falling under the leveller's axe, or are on the point of dying.

Their curiosity next turned towards the beasts.

They re-opened their Buffon, and got into ecstasies over the strange tastes of certain animals.

But all the books are not worth one personal observation. They hurried out into the farmyard, and asked the labourers whether they had seen bulls consorting with mares, hogs seeking after cows, and the males of partridges doing strange things among themselves.

"Never in their lives." They thought such questions even a little queer for gentlemen of their age.

They took a fancy to try abnormal unions. The least difficult is that of the he-goat and the ewe. Their farmer had not a he-goat in his possession; a neighbour lent his, and, as it was the period of rutting, they shut the two beasts up in the press, concealing themselves behind the casks in order that the event might be quietly accomplished.

Each first ate a little heap of hay; then they ruminated; the ewe lay down, and she bleated continuously, while the he-goat, standing erect on his crooked legs, with his big beard and his drooping ears, fixed on her his eyes, which glittered in the shade.

At length, on the evening of the third day, they deemed it advisable to assist nature, but the goat, turning round on Pécuchet, hit him in the lower part of the stomach with his horns. The ewe, seized with fear, began turning about in the press as if in a riding-school. Bouvard ran after her, threw himself on top of her to hold her, and fell on the ground with both hands full of wool.

They renewed their experiments on hens and a drake, on a mastiff and a sow, in the hope that monsters might be the result, not understanding anything about the question of species.

This word denotes a group of individuals whose descendants reproduce themselves, but animals classed as of different species may possess the power of reproduction, while others comprised in the same species have lost the capacity. They flattered themselves that they would obtain clear ideas on this subject by studying the development of germs; and Pécuchet wrote to Dumouchel in order to get a microscope.

By turns they put on the glass surface hairs, tobacco, finger-nails, and a fly's claw, but they forgot the drop of water which is indispensable; at other times it was the little lamel, and they pushed each other forward, and put the instrument out of order; then, when they saw only a haze, they blamed the optician. They went so far as to have doubts about the microscope. Perhaps the discoveries that have been attributed to it are not so certain?

Dumouchel, in sending on the invoice to them, begged of them to collect on his account some serpent-stones and sea-urchins, of which he had always been an admirer, and which were commonly found in country districts. In order to interest them in geology he sent them the Lettres of Bertrand with the Discours of Cuvier on the revolutions of the globe.

After the perusal of these two works they imagined the following state of things:

First, an immense sheet of water, from which emerged promontories speckled with lichens, and not one human being, not one sound. It was a world silent, motionless, and bare; there long plants swayed to and fro in a fog that resembled the vapour of a sweating-room. A red sun overheated the humid atmosphere. Then volcanoes burst forth; the igneous rocks sent up mountains of liquid flame, and the paste of the streaming porphyry and basalt began to congeal. Third picture: in shallow seas have sprung up isles of madrepore; a cluster of palm trees overhangs them here and there. There are shells like carriage wheels, tortoises three metres in length, lizards of sixty feet; amphibians stretch out amid the reeds their ostrich necks and crocodile jaws; winged serpents fly about. Finally, on the large continents, huge mammals make their appearance, their limbs misshapen, like pieces of wood badly squared, their hides thicker than plates of bronze, or else shaggy, thick-lipped, with manes and crooked fangs. Flocks of mammoths browsed on the plains where, since, the Atlantic has been; the paleotherium, half horse, half tapir, overturned with his tumbling the ant-hills of Montmartre; and the cervus giganteus trembled under the chestnut trees at the growls of the bears of the caverns, who made the dog of Beaugency, three times as big as a wolf, yelp in his den.

All these periods had been separated from one another by cataclysms, of which the latest is our Deluge. It was like a drama of fairyland in several acts, with man for apotheosis.

They were astounded when they learned that there existed on stones imprints of dragon-flies and birds' claws; and, having run through one of the Roret manuals, they looked out for fossils.

One afternoon, as they were turning over some flints in the middle of the high-road, the curé passed, and, accosting them in a wheedling tone:

"These gentlemen are busying themselves with geology. Very good."

For he held this science in esteem. It confirmed the authority of the Scriptures by proving the fact of the Deluge.

Bouvard talked about coprolites, which are animals' excrements in a petrified state.

The Abbé Jeufroy appeared surprised at the matter. After all, if it were so, it was a reason the more for wondering at Providence.

Pécuchet confessed that, up to the present, their inquiries had not been fruitful; and yet the environs of Falaise, like all Jurassic soils, should abound in remains of animals.

"I have been told," replied the Abbé Jeufroy, "that the jawbone of an elephant was at one time found at Villers."

However, one of his friends, M. Laroneur, advocate, member of the bar at Lisieux, and archæologist, would probably supply them with information about it. He had written a history of Port-en-Bessin, in which the discovery of an alligator was noticed.

Bouvard and Pécuchet exchanged glances: the same hope took possession of both; and, in spite of the heat, they remained standing a long time questioning the ecclesiastic, who sheltered himself from the sun under a blue cotton umbrella. The lower part of his face was rather heavy, and his nose was pointed. He was perpetually smiling, or bent his head while he closed his eyelids.

The church-bell rang the Angelus.

"A very good evening, gentlemen! You will allow me, will you not?"

At his suggestion they waited three weeks for Laroneur's reply. At length it arrived.

The name of the man who had dug up the tooth of the mastodon was Louis Bloche. Details were wanting. As to his history, it was comprised in one of the volumes of the Lisieux Academy, and he could not lend his own copy, as he was afraid of spoiling the collection. With regard to the alligator, it had been discovered in the month of November, 1825, under the cliff of the Hachettes of Sainte-Honorine, near Port-en-Bessin, in the arrondissement of Bayeux. His compliments followed.

The obscurity that enshrouded the mastodon provoked in Pécuchet's mind a longing to search for it. He would fain have gone to Villers forthwith.

Bouvard objected that, to save themselves a possibly useless and certainly expensive journey, it would be desirable to make inquiries. So they wrote a letter to the mayor of the district, in which they asked him what had become of one Louis Bloche. On the assumption of his death, his descendants or collateral relations might be able to enlighten them as to his precious discovery, when he made it, and in what public place in the township this testimony of primitive times was deposited? Were there any prospects of finding similar ones? What was the cost of a man and a car for a day?

And vainly did they make application to the deputy-mayor, and then to the first municipal councillor. They received no news from Villers. No doubt the inhabitants were jealous about their fossils — unless they had sold them to the English. The journey to the Hachettes was determined upon.

Bouvard and Pécuchet took the public conveyance from Falaise to Caen. Then a covered car brought them from Caen to Bayeux; from Bayeux, they walked to Port-en-Bessin.

They had not been deceived. There were curious stones alongside the Hachettes; and, assisted by the directions of the innkeeper, they succeeded in reaching the strand.

The tide was low. It exposed to view all its shingles, with a prairie of sea-wrack as far as the edge of the waves. Grassy slopes cut the cliff, which was composed of soft brown earth that had hardened and become in its lower strata a rampart of greyish stone. Tiny streams of water kept flowing down incessantly, while in the distance the sea rumbled. It seemed sometimes to suspend its throbbing, and then the only sound heard was the murmur of the little springs.

They staggered over the sticky soil, or rather they had to jump over holes.

Bouvard sat down on a mound overlooking the sea and contemplated the waves, thinking of nothing, fascinated, inert. Pécuchet brought him over to the side of the cliff to show him a serpent-stone incrustated in the rock, like a diamond in its gangue. It broke their nails; they would require instruments; besides, night was coming on. The sky was empurpled towards the west, and the entire sea-shore was wrapped in shadow. In the midst of the blackish wrack the pools of water were growing wider. The sea was coming towards them. It was time to go back.

Next day, at dawn, with a mattock and a pick, they made an attack on their fossil, whose covering cracked. It was an ammonite nodosus, corroded at the ends but weighing quite six pounds; and in his enthusiasm Pécuchet exclaimed:

"We cannot do less than present it to Dumouchel!"

They next chanced upon sponges, lampshells, orks — but no alligator. In default of it, they were hoping to get the backbone of a hippopotamus or an ichthyosaurus, the bones of any animals whatever that were contemporaneous with the Deluge, when they discovered against the cliff, at a man's height, outlines which assumed the form of a gigantic fish.

They deliberated as to the means by which they could get possession of it. Bouvard would extricate it at the top, while Pécuchet beneath would demolish the rock in order to make it descend gently without spoiling it.

Just as they were taking breath they saw above their heads a custom-house officer in a cloak, who was gesticulating with a commanding air.

"Well! What! Let us alone!" And they went on with their work, Bouvard on the tips of his toes, trapping with his mattock, Pécuchet, with his back bent, digging with his pick.

But the custom-house officer reappeared farther down, in an open space between the rocks, making repeated signals. They treated him with contempt. An oval body bulged out under the thinned soil, and sloped down, was on the point of slipping.

Suddenly another individual, with a sabre, presented himself.

"Your passports?"

It was the field-guard on his rounds, and, at the same instant, the man from the custom-house came up, having hastened through a ravine.

"Take them into custody for me, Père Morin, or the cliff will fall in!"

"It is for a scientific object," replied Pécuchet.

Then a mass of stone fell, grazing them all four so closely that a little more and they were dead men.

When the dust was scattered, they recognised the mast of a ship, which crumbled under the custom-house officer's boot.

Bouvard said with a sigh, "We did no great harm!"

"One should not do anything within the fortification limits," returned the guard.

"In the first place, who are you, in order that I may take out a summons against you?"

Pécuchet refused to give his name, cried out against such injustice.

"Don't argue! follow me!"

As soon as they reached the port a crowd of ragamuffins ran after them. Bouvard, red as a poppy, put on an air of dignity; Pécuchet, exceedingly pale, darted furious looks around; and these two strangers, carrying stones in their pocket-handkerchiefs, did not present a good appearance. Provisionally, they put them up at the inn, whose master on the threshold guarded the entrance. Then the mason came to demand back his tools. They were paying him for them, and still there were incidental expenses! — and the field-guard did not come back! Wherefore? At last, a gentleman, who wore the cross of the Legion of Honour, set them free, and they went away, after giving their Christian names, surnames, and their domicile, with an undertaking on their part to be more circumspect in future.

Besides a passport, they were in need of many things, and before undertaking fresh explorations they consulted the Geological Traveller's Guide, by Boné. It was necessary to have, in the first place, a good soldier's knapsack, then a surveyor's chain, a file, a pair of nippers, a compass, and three hammers, passed into a belt, which is hidden under the frock-coat, and "thus preserves you from that original appearance which one ought to avoid on a journey." As for the stick, Pécuchet freely adopted the tourist's stick, six feet high, with a long iron point. Bouvard preferred the walking-stick umbrella, or many-branched umbrella, the knob of which is removed in order to clasp on the silk, which is kept separately in a little bag. They did not forget strong shoes with gaiters, "two pairs of braces" each "on account of perspiration," and, although one cannot present himself everywhere in a cap, they shrank from the expense of "one of those folding hats, which bear the name of 'Gibus,' their inventor."

The same work gives precepts for conduct: "To know the language of the part of the country you visit": they knew it. "To preserve a modest deportment": this was their custom. "Not to have too much money about you": nothing simpler. Finally, in order to spare yourself embarrassments of all descriptions, it is a good thing to adopt the "description of engineer."

"Well, we will adopt it."

Thus prepared, they began their excursions; were sometimes eight days away, and passed their lives in the open air.

Sometimes they saw, on the banks of the Orne, in a rent, pieces of rock raising their slanting surfaces between some poplar trees and heather; or else they were grieved by meeting, for the entire length of the road, nothing but layers of clay. In the presence of a landscape they admired neither the series of perspectives nor the depth of the backgrounds, nor the undulations of the green surfaces; but that which was not visible to them, the underpart, the earth: and for them every hill was only a fresh proof of the Deluge.

To the Deluge mania succeeded that of erratic blocks. The big stones alone in the fields must come from vanished glaciers, and they searched for moraines and faluns.

They were several times taken for pedlars on account of their equipage; and when they had answered that they were "engineers," a dread seized them — the usurpation of such a title might entail unpleasant consequences.

At the end of each day they panted beneath the weight of their specimens; but they dauntlessly carried them off home with them. They were deposited on the doorsteps, on the stairs, in the bedrooms, in the dining-room, and in the kitchen; and Germaine used to make a hubbub about the quantity of dust. It was no slight task, before pasting on the labels, to know the names of the rocks; the variety of colours and of grain made them confuse argil and marl, granite and gneiss, quartz and limestone.

And the nomenclature plagued them. Why Devonian, Cambrian, Jurassic — as if the portions of the earth designated by these names were not in other places as well as in Devonshire, near Cambridge, and in the Jura? It was impossible to know where you are there. That which is a system for one is for another a stratum, for a third a mere layer. The plates of the layers get intermingled and entangled in one another; but Omalius d'Halloy warns you not to believe in geological divisions.

This statement was a relief to them; and when they had seen coral limestones in the plain of Caen, phillades at Balleroy, kaolin at St. Blaise, and oolite everywhere, and searched for coal at Cartigny and for mercury at Chapelle-en-Juger, near St. Lô, they decided on a longer excursion: a journey to Havre, to study the fire-resisting quartz and the clay of Kimmeridge.

As soon as they had stepped out of the packet-boat they asked what road led under the lighthouses.

Landslips blocked up the way; it was dangerous to venture along it.

A man who let out vehicles accosted them, and offered them drives around the neighbourhood — Ingouville, Octeville, Fécamp, Lillebonne, "Rome, if it was necessary."

His charges were preposterous, but the name of Falaise had struck them. By turning off the main road a little, they could see Étretat, and they took the coach that started from Fécamp to go to the farthest point first.

In the vehicle Bouvard and Pécuchet had a conversation with three peasants, two old women, and a seminarist, and did not hesitate to style themselves engineers.

They stopped in front of the bay. They gained the cliff, and five minutes after, rubbed up against it to avoid a big pool of water which was advancing like a gulf stream in the middle of the sea-shore. Then they saw an archway which opened above a deep grotto; it was sonorous and very bright, like a church, with descending columns and a carpet of sea-wrack all along its stone flooring.

This work of nature astonished them, and as they went on their way collecting shells, they started considerations as to the origin of the world.

Bouvard inclined towards Neptunism; Pécuchet, on the contrary, was a Plutonist.

"The central fire had broken the crust of the globe, heaved up the masses of earth, and made fissures. It is, as it were, an interior sea, which has its flow and ebb, its tempests; a thin film separates us from

it. We could not sleep if we thought of all that is under our heels. However, the central fire diminishes, and the sun grows more feeble, so much so that one day the earth will perish of refrigeration. It will become sterile; all the wood and all the coal will be converted into carbonic acid, and no life can subsist there."

"We haven't come to that yet," said Bouvard.

"Let us expect it," returned Pécuchet.

No matter, this end of the world, far away as it might be, made them gloomy; and, side by side, they walked in silence over the shingles.

The cliff, perpendicular, a mass of white, striped with black here and there by lines of flint, stretched towards the horizon like the curve of a rampart five leagues wide. An east wind, bitter and cold, was blowing; the sky was grey; the sea greenish and, as it were, swollen. From the highest points of rocks birds took wing, wheeled round, and speedily re-entered their hiding places. Sometimes a stone, getting loosened, would rebound from one place to another before reaching them.

Pécuchet continued his reflections aloud:

"Unless the earth should be destroyed by a cataclysm! We do not know the length of our period. The central fire has only to overflow."

"However, it is diminishing."

"That does not prevent its explosions from having produced the Julia Island, Monte Nuovo, and many others."

Bouvard remembered having read these details in Bertrand.

"But such catastrophes do not happen in Europe."

"A thousand pardons! Witness that of Lisbon. As for our own countries, the coal-mines and the firestone useful for war are numerous, and may very well, when decomposing, form the mouths of volcanoes. Moreover, the volcanoes always burst near the sea."

Bouvard cast his eyes over the waves, and fancied he could distinguish in the distance a volume of smoke ascending to the sky.

"Since the Julia Island," returned Pécuchet, "has disappeared, the fragments of the earth formed by the same cause will perhaps have the same fate. An islet in the Archipelago is as important as Normandy and even as Europe."

Bouvard imagined Europe swallowed up in an abyss.

"Admit," said Pécuchet, "that an earthquake takes place under the British Channel: the waters rush into the Atlantic; the coasts of France and England, tottering on their bases, bend forward and reunite — and there you are! The entire space between is wiped out."

Instead of answering, Bouvard began walking so quickly that he was soon a hundred paces away from Pécuchet. Being alone, the idea of a cataclysm disturbed him. He had eaten nothing since morning; his temples were throbbing. All at once the soil appeared to him to be shaking, and the cliff over his head to be bending forward at its summit. At that moment a shower of gravel rolled down from the top of it. Pécuchet observed him scampering off wildly, understood his fright, and cried from a distance:

"Stop! stop! The period is not completed!"

And in order to overtake him he made enormous bounds with the aid of his tourist's stick, all the while shouting out:

"The period is not completed! The period is not completed!"

Bouvard, in a mad state, kept running without stopping. The many-branched umbrella fell down, the skirts of his coat were flying, the knapsack was tossing on his back. He was like a tortoise with wings about to gallop amongst the rocks. One bigger than the rest concealed him from view.

Pécuchet reached the spot out of breath, saw nobody, then returned in order to gain the fields through a defile, which Bouvard, no doubt, had taken.

This narrow ascent was cut by four great steps in the cliff, as lofty as the heights of two men, and glittering like polished alabaster.

At an elevation of fifty feet Pécuchet wished to descend; but as the sea was dashing against him in front, he set about clambering up further. At the second turning, when he beheld the empty space, terror froze him. As he approached the third, his legs were becoming weak. Volumes of air vibrated around him, a cramp gripped his epigastrium; he sat down on the ground, with eyes closed, no longer having consciousness of aught save the beatings of his own heart, which were suffocating him; then he flung his tourist's stick on the ground, and on his hands and knees resumed his ascent. But the three hammers attached to his belt began to press against his stomach; the stones with which he had crammed his pockets knocked against his sides; the peak of his cap blinded him; the wind increased in violence. At length he reached the upper ground, and there found Bouvard, who had ascended higher through a less difficult defile. A cart picked them up. They forgot all about Étretat.

The next evening, at Havre, while waiting for the packet-boat, they saw at the tail-end of a newspaper, a short scientific essay headed, "On the Teaching of Geology." This article, full of facts, explained the subject as it was understood at the period.

"There has never been a complete cataclysm of the globe, but the same space has not always the same duration, and is exhausted more quickly in one place than in another. Lands of the same age contain different fossils, just as depositaries very far distant from each other enclose similar ones. The ferns of former times are identical with the ferns of to-day. Many contemporary zoophytes are found again in the most ancient layers. To sum up, actual modifications explain former convulsions. The same causes are always in operation; Nature does not proceed by leaps; and the periods, Brogniart asserts, are, after all, only abstractions."

Cuvier's work up to this time had appeared to them surrounded with the glory of an aureola at the summit of an incontestable science. It was sapped. Creation had no longer the same discipline, and their respect for this great man diminished.

From biographies and extracts they learned something of the doctrines of Lamarck and Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire.

All that was contrary to accepted ideas, the authority of the Church.

Bouvard experienced relief as if from a broken yoke. "I should like to see now what answer Citizen Jeufroy would make to me about the Deluge!"

They found him in his little garden, where he was awaiting the members of the vestry, who were to meet presently with a view to the purchase of a chasuble.

"These gentlemen wish for — — ?"

"An explanation, if you please."

And Bouvard began, "What means, in Genesis, 'The abyss which was broken up,' and 'The cataracts of heaven?' For an abyss does not get broken up, and heaven has no cataracts."

The abbé closed his eyelids, then replied that it was always necessary to distinguish between the sense and the letter. Things which shock you at first, turn out right when they are sifted.

"Very well, but how do you explain the rain which passed over the highest mountains — those that are two leagues in height. Just think of it! Two leagues! — a depth of water that makes two leagues!"

And the mayor, coming up, added:

"Bless my soul! What a bath!"

"Admit," said Bouvard, "that Moses exaggerates like the devil."

The curé had read Bonald, and answered:

"I am ignorant of his motives; it was, no doubt, to inspire a salutary fear in the people of whom he was the leader."

"Finally, this mass of water — where did it come from?"

"How do I know? The air was changed into water, just as happens every day."

Through the garden gate they saw M. Girbal, superintendent of taxes, making his way in, together with Captain Heurtaux, a landowner; and Beljambe, the innkeeper, appeared, assisting with his arm Langlois, the grocer, who walked with difficulty on account of his catarrh.

Pécuchet, without bestowing a thought on them, took up the argument:

"Excuse me, M. Jeufroy. The weight of the atmosphere, science demonstrates to us, is equal to that of a mass of water which would make a covering of ten metres around the globe. Consequently, if all the air that had been condensed fell down in a liquid state, it would augment very little the mass of existing waters."

The vestrymen opened their eyes wide, and listened.

The curé lost patience. "Will you deny that shells have been found on the mountains? What put them there, if not the Deluge? They are not accustomed, I believe, to grow out of the ground of themselves alone, like carrots!" And this joke having made the assembly laugh, he added, pressing his lips together: "Unless this be another discovery of science!"

Bouvard was pleased to reply by referring to the rising of mountains, the theory of Elie de Beaumont.

"Don't know him," returned the abbé.

Foureau hastened to explain: "He is from Caen. I have seen him at the Prefecture."

"But if your Deluge," Bouvard broke in again, "had sent shells drifting, they would be found broken on the surface, and not at depths of three hundred metres sometimes."

The priest fell back on the truth of the Scriptures, the tradition of the human race, and the animals discovered in the ice in Siberia.

"That does not prove that man existed at the time they did."

The earth, in Pécuchet's view, was much older. "The delta of the Mississippi goes back to tens of thousands of years. The actual epoch is a hundred thousand, at least. The lists of Manetho — —"

The Count de Faverges appeared on the scene. They were all silent at his approach.

"Go on, pray. What were you talking about?"

"These gentlemen are wrangling with me," replied the abbé.

"About what?"

"About Holy Writ, M. le Comte."

Bouvard immediately pleaded that they had a right, as geologists, to discuss religion.

"Take care," said the count; "you know the phrase, my dear sir, 'A little science takes us away from it, a great deal leads us back to it?'" And in a tone at the same time haughty and paternal: "Believe me, you will come back to it! you will come back to it!"

"Perhaps so. But what were we to think of a book in which it is pretended that the light was created before the sun? as if the sun were not the sole cause of light!"

"You forget the light which we call boreal," said the ecclesiastic.

Bouvard, without answering this point, strongly denied that light could be on one side and darkness on the other, that evening and morning could have existed when there were no stars, or that the animals made their appearance suddenly, instead of being formed by crystallisation.

As the walks were too narrow, while gesticulating, they trod on the flower-borders. Langlois took a fit of coughing.

The captain exclaimed: "You are revolutionaries!"

Girbal: "Peace! peace!"

The priest: "What materialism!"

Foureau: "Let us rather occupy ourselves with our chasuble!"

"No! let me speak!" And Bouvard, growing more heated, went on to say that man was descended from the ape!

All the vestrymen looked at each other, much amazed, and as if to assure themselves that they were not apes.

Bouvard went on: "By comparing the fœtus of a woman, of a bitch, of a bird, of a frog — — "

"Enough!"

"For my part, I go farther!" cried Pécuchet. "Man is descended from the fishes!"

There was a burst of laughter. But without being disturbed:

"The Telliamed — an Arab book — — "

"Come, gentlemen, let us hold our meeting."

And they entered the sacristy.

The two comrades had not given the Abbé Jeufroy such a fall as they expected; therefore, Pécuchet found in him "the stamp of Jesuitism." His "boreal light," however, caused them uneasiness. They searched for it in Orbigny's manual.

"This is a hypothesis to explain why the vegetable fossils of Baffin's Bay resemble the Equatorial plants. We suppose, in place of the sun, a great luminous source of heat which has now disappeared, and of which the Aurora Borealis is but perhaps a vestige."

Then a doubt came to them as to what proceeds from man, and, in their perplexity, they thought of Vaucorbeil.

He had not followed up his threats. As of yore, he passed every morning before their grating, striking all the bars with his walking-stick one after the other.

Bouvard watched him, and, having stopped him, said he wanted to submit to him a curious point in anthropology.

"Do you believe that the human race is descended from fishes?"

"What nonsense!"

"From apes rather — isn't that so?"

"Directly, that is impossible!"

On whom could they depend? For, in fact, the doctor was not a Catholic!

They continued their studies, but without enthusiasm, being weary of eocene and miocene, of Mount Jurillo, of the Julia Island, of the mammoths of Siberia and of the fossils, invariably compared in all the authors to "medals which are authentic testimonies," so much so that one day Bouvard threw his knapsack on the ground, declaring that he would not go any farther.

"Geology is too defective. Some parts of Europe are hardly known. As for the rest, together with the foundation of the oceans, we shall always be in a state of ignorance on the subject."

Finally, Pécuchet having pronounced the word "mineral kingdom":

"I don't believe in it, this mineral kingdom, since organic substances have taken part in the formation of flint, of chalk, and perhaps of gold. Hasn't the diamond been charcoal; coal a collection of vegetables? and by heating it to I know not how many degrees, we get the sawdust of wood, so that everything passes, everything goes to ruin, and everything is transformed. Creation is carried out in an undulating and fugitive fashion. Much better to occupy ourselves with something else."

He stretched himself on his back and went to sleep, while Pécuchet, with his head down and one knee between his hands, gave himself up to his own reflections.

A border of moss stood on the edge of a hollow path overhung by ash trees, whose slender tops quivered; angelica, mint, and lavender exhaled warm, pungent odours. The atmosphere was drowsy, and Pécuchet, in a kind of stupor, dreamed of the innumerable existences scattered around him — of the insects that buzzed, the springs hidden beneath the grass, the sap of plants, the birds in their nests, the wind, the clouds — of all Nature, without seeking to unveil her mysteries, enchanted by her power, lost in her grandeur.

"I'm thirsty!" said Bouvard, waking up.

"So am I. I should be glad to drink something."

"That's easy," answered a man who was passing by in his shirt-sleeves with a plank on his shoulder. And they recognised that vagabond to whom, on a former occasion, Bouvard had given a glass of wine. He seemed ten years younger, wore his hair foppishly curled, his moustache well waxed, and twisted his figure about in quite a Parisian fashion. After walking about a hundred paces, he opened the gateway of a farmyard, threw down his plank against the wall, and led them into a large kitchen.

"Mélie! are you there, Mélie?"

A young girl appeared. At a word from him she drew some liquor and came back to the table to serve the gentlemen.

Her wheat-coloured head-bands fell over a cap of grey linen. Her worn dress of poor material fell down her entire body without a crease, and, with her straight nose and blue eyes, she had about her something dainty, rustic, and ingenuous.

"She's nice, eh?" said the joiner, while she was bringing them the glasses. "You might take her for a lady dressed up as a peasant-girl, and yet able to do rough work! Poor little heart, come! When I'm rich I'll marry you!"

"You are always talking nonsense, Monsieur Gorju," she replied, in a soft voice, with a slightly drawling accent.

A stable boy came in to get some oats out of an old chest, and let the lid fall down so awkwardly that it made splinters of wood fly upwards.

Gorju declaimed against the clumsiness of all "these country fellows," then, on his knees in front of the article of furniture, he tried to put the piece in its place. Pécuchet, while offering to assist him, traced beneath the dust faces of notable characters.

It was a chest of the Renaissance period, with a twisted fringe below, vine branches in the corner, and little columns dividing its front into five portions. In the centre might be seen Venus-Anadyomene standing on a shell, then Hercules and Omphale, Samson and Delilah, Circe and her swine, the daughters of Lot making their father drunk; and all this in a state of complete decay, the chest being worm-eaten, and even its right panel wanting.

Gorju took a candle, in order to give Pécuchet a better view of the left one, which exhibited Adam and Eve under a tree in Paradise in an affectionate attitude.

Bouvard equally admired the chest.

"If you keep it they'll give it to you cheap."

They hesitated, thinking of the necessary repairs.

Gorju might do them, cabinet-making being a branch of his trade.

"Let us go. Come on."

And he dragged Pécuchet towards the fruit-garden, where Madame Castillon, the mistress, was spreading linen.

Mélie, when she had washed her hands, took from where it lay beside the window her lace-frame, sat down in the broad daylight and worked.

The lintel of the door enclosed her like a picture-frame. The bobbins disentangled themselves under her fingers with a sound like the clicking of castanets. Her profile remained bent.

Bouvard asked her questions as to her family, the part of the country she came from, and the wages she got.

She was from Ouistreham, had no relations alive, and earned seventeen shillings a month; in short, she pleased him so much that he wished to take her into his service to assist old Germaine.

Pécuchet reappeared with the mistress of the farm-house, and, while they went on with their bargaining, Bouvard asked Gorju in a very low tone whether the girl would consent to become their servant.

"Lord, yes."

"However," said Bouvard, "I must consult my friend."

The bargain had just been concluded, the price fixed for the chest being thirty-five francs. They were to come to an understanding about the repairs.

They had scarcely got out into the yard when Bouvard spoke of his intentions with regard to Mélie.

Pécuchet stopped (in order the better to reflect), opened his snuff-box, took a pinch, and, wiping the snuff off his nose:

"Indeed, it is a good idea. Good heavens! yes! why not? Besides, you are the master."

Ten minutes afterwards, Gorju showed himself on the top of a ditch, and questioning them: "When do you want me to bring you the chest?"

"To-morrow."

"And about the other question, have you both made up your minds?"

"It's all right," replied Pécuchet.

CHAPTER IV.

Researches in Archæology.

Six months later they had become archæologists, and their house was like a museum.

In the vestibule stood an old wooden beam. The staircase was encumbered with the geological specimens, and an enormous chain was stretched on the ground all along the corridor. They had taken off its hinges the door between the two rooms in which they did not sleep, and had condemned the outer door of the second in order to convert both into a single apartment.

As soon as you crossed the threshold, you came in contact with a stone trough (a Gallo-Roman sarcophagus); the ironwork next attracted your attention. Fixed to the opposite wall, a warming-pan looked down on two andirons and a hearthplate representing a monk caressing a shepherdess. On the boards all around, you saw torches, locks, bolts, and nuts of screws. The floor was rendered invisible beneath fragments of red tiles. A table in the centre exhibited curiosities of the rarest description: the shell of a Cauchoise cap, two argil urns, medals, and a phial of opaline glass. An upholstered armchair had at its back a triangle worked with guipure. A piece of a coat of mail adorned the partition to the right, and on the other side sharp spikes sustained in a horizontal position a unique specimen of a halberd.

The second room, into which two steps led down, contained the old books which they had brought with them from Paris, and those which, on their arrival, they had found in a press. The leaves of the folding-doors had been removed hither. They called it the library.

The back of the door was entirely covered by the genealogical tree of the Croixmare family. In the panelling on the return side, a pastel of a lady in the dress of the period of Louis XV. made a companion picture to the portrait of Père Bouvard. The casing of the glass was decorated with a sombrero of black felt, and a monstrous galoche filled with leaves, the remains of a nest.

Two cocoanuts (which had belonged to Pécuchet since his younger days) flanked on the chimney-piece an earthenware cask on which a peasant sat astride. Close by, in a straw basket, was a little coin brought up by a duck.

In front of the bookcase stood a shell chest of drawers trimmed with plush. The cover of it supported a cat with a mouse in its mouth — a petrification from St. Allyre; a work-box, also of shell work, and on this box a decanter of brandy contained a Bon Chrétien pear.

But the finest thing was a statue of St. Peter in the embrasure of the window. His right hand, covered with a glove of apple-green colour, was pressing the key of Paradise. His chasuble, ornamented with fleurs-de-luce, was azure blue, and his tiara very yellow, pointed like a pagoda. He had flabby cheeks, big round eyes, a gaping mouth, and a crooked nose shaped like a trumpet. Above him hung a canopy made of an old carpet in which you could distinguish two Cupids in a circle of roses, and at his feet, like a pillar, rose a butter-pot bearing these words in white letters on a chocolate ground: "Executed in the presence of H.R.H. the Duke of Angoulême at Noron, 3rd of October, 1847."

Pécuchet, from his bed, saw all these things in a row, and sometimes he went as far as Bouvard's room to lengthen the perspective.

One spot remained empty, exactly opposite to the coat of arms, that intended for the Renaissance chest. It was not finished; Gorju was still working at it, jointing the panels in the bakehouse, squaring them or undoing them.

At eleven o'clock he took his breakfast, chatted after that with Mélie, and often did not make his appearance again for the rest of the day.

In order to have pieces of furniture in good style, Bouvard and Pécuchet went scouring the country. What they brought back was not suitable; but they had come across a heap of curious things. Their first passion was a taste for articles of virtù; then came the love of the Middle Ages.

To begin with, they visited cathedrals; and the lofty naves mirroring themselves in the holy-water fountains, the glass ornaments dazzling as hangings of precious stones, the tombs in the recesses of the chapels, the uncertain light of crypts — everything, even to the coolness of the walls, thrilled them with a shudder of joy, a religious emotion.

They were soon able to distinguish the epochs, and, disdainful of sacristans, they would say: "Ha! a Romanesque apsis!" "That's of the twelfth century!" "Here we are falling back again into the flamboyant!"

They strove to interpret the sculptured symbols on the capitals, such as the two griffins of Marigny pecking at a tree in blossom; Pécuchet read a satire in the singers with grotesque jaws which terminate the mouldings at Feugerolles; and as for the exuberance of the man that covers one of the mullions at Hérouville, that was a proof, according to Bouvard, of our ancestors' love of broad jokes.

They ended by not tolerating the least symptom of decadence. All was decadence, and they deplored vandalism, and thundered against badigeon.

But the style of a monument does not always agree with its supposed date. The semicircular arch of the thirteenth century still holds sway in Provence. The ogive is, perhaps, very ancient; and authors dispute as to the anteriority of the Romanesque to the Gothic. This want of certainty disappointed them.

After the churches they studied fortresses — those of Domfront and Falaise. They admired under the gate the grooves of the portcullis, and, having reached the top, they first saw all the country around them, then the roofs of the houses in the town, the streets intersecting one another, the carts on the square, the women at the washhouse. The wall descended perpendicularly as far as the palisade; and they grew pale as they thought that men had mounted there, hanging to ladders. They would have ventured into the subterranean passages but that Bouvard found an obstacle in his stomach and Pécuchet in his horror of vipers.

They desired to make the acquaintance of the old manor-houses — Curcy, Bully, Fontenay, Lemarmion, Argonge. Sometimes a Carolingian tower would show itself at the corner of some farm-buildings behind a heap of manure. The kitchen, garnished with stone benches, made them dream of feudal junketings. Others had a forbiddingly fierce aspect with their three enceintes still visible, their loopholes under the staircase, and their high turrets with pointed sides. Then they came to an apartment in which a window of the Valois period, chased so as to resemble ivory, let in the sun, which heated the grains of colza that strewed the floor. Abbeys were used as barns. The inscriptions on tombstones were effaced. In the midst of fields a gable-end remained standing, clad from top to bottom in ivy which trembled in the wind.

A number of things excited in their breasts a longing to possess them — a tin pot, a paste buckle, printed calicoes with large flowerings. The shortness of money restrained them.

By a happy chance, they unearthed at Balleroy in a tinman's house a Gothic church window, and it was big enough to cover, near the armchair, the right side of the casement up to the second pane. The steeple of Chavignolles displayed itself in the distance, producing a magnificent effect. With the lower part of a cupboard Gorju manufactured a prie-dieu to put under the Gothic window, for he humoured their hobby. So pronounced was it that they regretted monuments about which nothing at all is known — such as the villa residence of the bishops of Séez.

"Bayeux," says M. de Caumont, "must have possessed a theatre." They searched for the site of it without success.

The village of Montrechy contained a meadow celebrated for the number of medals which chanced formerly to have been found there. They calculated on making a fine harvest in this place. The caretaker refused to admit them.

They were not more fortunate as to the connection which existed between a cistern at Falaise and the faubourg of Caen. Ducks which had been put in there reappeared at Vaucelles, quacking, "Can, can, can" — whence is derived the name of the town!

No step, no sacrifice, was too great for them.

At the inn of Mesnil-Villement, in 1816, M. Galeron got a breakfast for the sum of four sous. They took the same meal there, and ascertained with surprise that things were altered!

Who was the founder of the abbey of St. Anne? Is there any relationship between Marin Onfroy, who, in the twelfth century, imported a new kind of potato, and Onfroy, governor of Hastings at the period of the Conquest? How were they to procure L'Astucieuse Pythonisse, a comedy in verse by one Dutrezor, produced at Bayeux, and just now exceedingly rare? Under Louis XIV., Hérambert Dupaty, or Dupastis Hérambert, composed a work which has never appeared, full of anecdotes about Argentan: the question was how to recover these anecdotes. What have become of the autograph memoirs of Madame Dubois de la Pierre, consulted for the unpublished history of L'Aigle by Louis Dasprès, curate of St. Martin? So many problems, so many curious points, to clear up.

But a slight mark often puts one on the track of an invaluable discovery.

Accordingly, they put on their blouses, in order not to put people on their guard, and, in the guise of hawkers, they presented themselves at houses, where they expressed a desire to buy up old papers. They obtained heaps of them. These included school copybooks, invoices, newspapers that were out of date — nothing of any value.

At last Bouvard and Pécuchet addressed themselves to Laroneur.

He was absorbed in Celtic studies, and while summarily replying to their questions put others to them.

Had they observed in their rounds any traces of dog-worship, such as are seen at Montargis, or any special circumstances with regard to the fires on St. John's night, marriages, popular sayings, etc.? He even begged of them to collect for him some of those flint axes, then called celtæ, which the Druids used in their criminal holocausts.

They procured a dozen of them through Gorju, sent him the smallest of them, and with the others enriched the museum. There they walked with delight, swept the place themselves, and talked about it to all their acquaintances.

One afternoon Madame Bordin and M. Marescot came to see it.

Bouvard welcomed them, and began the demonstration in the porch.

The beam was nothing less than the old gibbet of Falaise, according to the joiner who had sold it, and who had got this information from his grand-father.

The big chain in the corridor came from the subterranean cells of the keep of Torteval. In the notary's opinion it resembled the boundary chains in front of the entrance-courts of manor-houses. Bouvard was convinced that it had been used in former times to bind the captives. He opened the door of the first chamber.

"What are all these tiles for?" exclaimed Madame Bordin.

"To heat the stoves. But let us be a little regular, if you please. This is a tomb discovered in an inn where they made use of it as a horsetrough."

After this, Bouvard took up the two urns filled with a substance which consisted of human dust, and he drew the phials up to his eyes, for the purpose of showing the way the Romans used to shed tears in it.

"But one sees only dismal things at your house!"

Indeed it was a rather grave subject for a lady. So he next drew out of a case several copper coins, together with a silver denarius.

Madame Bordin asked the notary what sum this would be worth at the present day.

The coat of mail which he was examining slipped out of his fingers; some of the links snapped.

Bouvard stifled his annoyance. He had even the politeness to unfasten the halberd, and, bending forward, raising his arms and stamping with his heels, he made a show of hamstringing a horse, stabbing as if with a bayonet and overpowering an enemy.

The widow inwardly voted him a rough person.

She went into raptures over the shell chest of drawers.

The cat of St. Allyre much astonished her, the pear in the decanter not quite so much; then, when she came to the chimney-piece: "Ha! here's a hat that would need mending!"

Three holes, marks of bullets, pierced its brims.

It was the head-piece of a robber chief under the Directory, David de la Bazoque, caught in the act of treason, and immediately put to death.

"So much the better! They did right," said Madame Bordin.

Marescot smiled disdainfully as he gazed at the different objects. He did not understand this galoche having been the sign of a hosier, nor the purport of the earthenware cask — a common cider-keg — and, to be candid, the St. Peter was lamentable with his drunkard's physiognomy.

Madame Bordin made this observation:

"All the same, it must have cost you a good deal?"

"Oh! not too much, not too much."

A slater had given it to him for fifteen francs.

After this, she found fault on the score of propriety with the low dress of the lady in the powdered wig.

"Where is the harm," replied Bouvard, "when one possesses something beautiful?" And he added in a lower tone: "Just as you are yourself, I'm sure."

(The notary turned his back on them, and studied the branches of the Croixmare family.)

She made no response but began to play with her long gold chain. Her bosom swelled out the black taffeta of her corsage, and, with her eyelashes slightly drawn together, she lowered her chin like a turtle-dove bridling up; then, with an ingenuous air:

"What is this lady's name?"

"It is unknown; she was one of the Regent's mistresses, you know; he who played so many pranks."

"I believe you; the memoirs of the time — —"

And the notary, without giving her time to finish the sentence, deplored this example of a prince carried away by his passions.

"But you are all like that!"

The two gentlemen protested, and then followed a dialogue on women and on love. Marescot declared that there were many happy unions; sometimes even, without suspecting it, we have close beside us what we require for our happiness.

The allusion was direct. The widow's cheeks flushed scarlet; but, recovering her composure almost the next moment:

"We are past the age for folly, are we not, M. Bouvard?"

"Ha! ha! For my part, I don't admit that."

And he offered his arm to lead her towards the adjoining room.

"Be careful about the steps. All right? Now observe the church window."

They traced on its surface a scarlet cloak and two angels' wings. All the rest was lost under the leads which held in equilibrium the numerous breakages in the glass. The day was declining; the shadows were lengthening; Madame Bordin had become grave.

Bouvard withdrew, and presently reappeared muffled up in a woollen wrapper, then knelt down at the prie-dieu with his elbows out, his face in his hands, the light of the sun falling on his bald patch; and he was conscious of this effect, for he said:

"Don't I look like a monk of the Middle Ages?"

Then he raised his forehead on one side, with swimming eyes, and trying to give a mystical expression to his face. The solemn voice of Pécuchet was heard in the corridor:

"Don't be afraid. It is I." And he entered, his head covered with a helmet — an iron pot with pointed ear-pieces.

Bouvard did not quit the prie-dieu. The two others remained standing. A minute slipped away in glances of amazement.

Madame Bordin appeared rather cold to Pécuchet. However he wished to know whether everything had been shown to them.

"It seems to me so." And pointing towards the wall: "Ah! pray excuse us; there is an object which we may restore in a moment."

The widow and Marescot thereupon took their leave. The two friends conceived the idea of counterfeiting a competition. They set out on a race after each other; one giving the other the start. Pécuchet won the helmet.

Bouvard congratulated him upon it, and received praises from his friend on the subject of the wrapper.

Mélie arranged it with cords, in the fashion of a gown. They took turns about in receiving visits.

They had visits from Girbal, Foureau, and Captain Heurtaux, and then from inferior persons — Langlois, Beljambe, their husbandmen, and even the servant-girls of their neighbours; and, on each occasion, they went over the same explanations, showed the place where the chest would be, affected a tone of modesty, and claimed indulgence for the obstruction.

Pécuchet on these days wore the Zouave's cap which he had formerly in Paris, considering it more in harmony with an artistic environment. At a particular moment, he would put the helmet on his head, and incline it over the back of his neck, in order to have his face free. Bouvard did not forget the movement with the halberd; finally, with one glance, they would ask each other whether the visitor was worthy of having "the monk of the Middle Ages" represented.

What a thrill they felt when M. de Faverges' carriage drew up before the garden gate! He had only a word to say to them. This was the occasion of his visit:

Hurel, his man of business, had informed him that, while searching everywhere for documents, they had bought up old papers at the farm of Aubrye.

That was perfectly true.

Had they not discovered some letters of Baron de Gonneval, a former aide-de-camp of the Duke of Angoulême, who had stayed at Aubrye? He wished to have this correspondence for family reasons.

They had not got it in the house, but they had in their possession something that would interest him if he would be good enough to follow them into their library.

Never before had such well-polished boots creaked in the corridor. They knocked against the sarcophagus. He even went near smashing several tiles, moved an armchair about, descended two steps; and, when they reached the second chamber, they showed him under the canopy, in front of the St. Peter, the butter-pot made at Noron.

Bouvard and Pécuchet thought that the date might some time be of use. Through politeness, the nobleman inspected their museum. He kept repeating, "Charming! very nice!" all the time giving his mouth little taps with the handle of his switch; and said that, for his part, he thanked them for having rescued those remains of the Middle Ages, an epoch of religious faith and chivalrous devotion. He loved progress, and would have given himself up like them to these interesting studies, but that politics, the General Council, agriculture, a veritable whirlwind, drove him away from them.

"After you, however, one would have merely gleanings, for soon you will have captured all the curiosities of the department."

"Without vanity, we think so," said Pécuchet.

However, one might still discover some at Chavignolles; for example, there was, close to the cemetery wall in the lane, a holy-water basin buried under the grass from time immemorial.

They were pleased with the information, then exchanged a significant glance — "Is it worth the trouble?" — but already the Count was opening the door.

Mélie, who was behind it, fled abruptly.

As he passed out of the house into the grounds, he observed Gorju smoking his pipe with folded arms.

"You employ this fellow? I would not put much confidence in him in a time of disturbance."

And M. de Faverges sprang lightly into his tilbury.

Why did their servant-maid seem to be afraid of him?

They questioned her, and she told them she had been employed on his farm. She was that little girl who poured out drink for the harvesters when they came there two years before. They had taken her on as a help at the château, and dismissed her in consequence of false reports.

As for Gorju, how could they find fault with him? He was very handy, and showed the utmost consideration for them.

Next day, at dawn, they repaired to the cemetery. Bouvard felt with his walking-stick at the spot indicated. They heard the sound of a hard substance. They pulled up some nettles, and discovered a stone basin, a baptismal font, out of which plants were sprouting. It is not usual, however, to bury baptismal fonts outside churches.

Pécuchet made a sketch of it; Bouvard wrote out a description of it; and they sent both to Laroneur. His reply came immediately.

"Victory, my dear associates! Unquestionably, it is a druidical bowl!"

However, let them be careful about the matter. The axe was doubtful; and as much for his sake as for their own, he pointed out a series of works to be consulted.

In a postscript, Laroneur confessed his longing to have a look at this bowl, which opportunity would be afforded him in a few days, when he would be starting on a trip from Brittany.

Then Bouvard and Pécuchet plunged into Celtic archæology.

According to this science, the ancient Gauls, our ancestors, adored Kirk and Kron, Taranis Esus, Nelalemnia, Heaven and Earth, the Wind, the Waters, and, above all, the great Teutates, who is the Saturn of the Pagans; for Saturn, when he reigned in Phœnicia, wedded a nymph named Anobret, by whom he had a child called Jeüd. And Anobret presents the same traits as Sara; Jeüd was sacrificed (or near being so), like Isaac; therefore, Saturn is Abraham; whence the conclusion must be drawn that the religion of the Gauls had the same principles as that of the Jews.

Their society was very well organised. The first class of persons amongst them included the people, the nobility, and the king; the second, the jurisconsults; and in the third, the highest, were ranged, according to Taillepied, "the various kinds of philosophers," that is to say, the Druids or Saronides, themselves divided into Eubages, Bards, and Vates.

One section of them prophesied, another sang, while a third gave instruction in botany, medicine, history, and literature, in short, all the arts of their time.

Pythagoras and Plato were their pupils. They taught metaphysics to the Greeks, sorcery to the Persians, aruspicy to the Etruscans, and to the Romans the plating of copper and the traffic in hams.

But of this people, who ruled the ancient world, there remain only stones either isolated or in groups of three, or placed together so as to resemble a rude chamber, or forming enclosures.

Bouvard and Pécuchet, filled with enthusiasm, studied in succession the stone on the Post-farm at Ussy, the Coupled Stone at Quest, the Standing Stone near L'Aigle, and others besides.

All these blocks, of equal insignificance, speedily bored them; and one day, when they had just seen the menhir at Passais, they were about to return from it when their guide led them into a beech wood, which was blocked up with masses of granite, like pedestals or monstrous tortoises. The most remarkable of them is hollowed like a basin. One of its sides rises, and at the further end two channels run down to the ground; this must have been for the flowing of blood — impossible to doubt it! Chance does not make these things.

The roots of the trees were intertwined with these rugged pedestals. In the distance rose columns of fog like huge phantoms. It was easy to imagine under the leaves the priests in golden tiaras and white robes, and their human victims with arms bound behind their backs, and at the side of the bowl the Druidess watching the red stream, whilst around her the multitude yelled, to the accompaniment of cymbals and of trumpets made from the horns of the wild bull.

Immediately they decided on their plan. And one night, by the light of the moon, they took the road to the cemetery, stealing in like thieves, in the shadows of the houses. The shutters were fastened, and quiet reigned around every dwelling-place; not a dog barked.

Gorju accompanied them. They set to work. All that could be heard was the noise of stones knocking against the spade as it dug through the soil.

The vicinity of the dead was disagreeable to them. The church clock struck with a rattling sound, and the rosework on its tympanum looked like an eye spying a sacrilege. At last they carried off the bowl.

They came next morning to the cemetery to see the traces of the operation.

The abbé, who was taking the air at his door, begged of them to do him the honour of a visit, and, having introduced them into his breakfast-parlour, he gazed at them in a singular fashion.

In the middle of the sideboard, between the plates, was a soup-tureen decorated with yellow bouquets.

Pécuchet praised it, at a loss for something to say.

"It is old Rouen," returned the curé; "an heirloom. Amateurs set a high value on it — M. Marescot especially." As for him, thank God, he had no love of curiosities; and, as they appeared not to understand, he declared that he had seen them himself stealing the baptismal font.

The two archæologists were quite abashed. The article in question was not in actual use.

No matter! they should give it back.

No doubt! But, at least, let them be permitted to get a painter to make a drawing of it.

"Be it so, gentlemen."

"Between ourselves, is it not?" said Bouvard, "under the seal of confession."

The ecclesiastic, smiling, reassured them with a gesture.

It was not he whom they feared, but rather Larsonneur. When he would be passing through Chavignolles, he would feel a hankering after the bowl; and his chatterings might reach the ears of the Government. Out of prudence they kept it hidden in the bakehouse, then in the arbour, in the trunk, in a cupboard. Gorju was tired of dragging it about.

The possession of such a rare piece of furniture bound them the closer to the Celticism of Normandy.

Its sources were Egyptian. Séez, in the department of the Orne, is sometimes written Saïs, like the city of the Delta. The Gauls swore by the bull, an idea derived from the bull Apis. The Latin name of Bellocastes, which was that of the people of Bayeux, comes from Beli Casa, dwelling, sanctuary of Belus — Belus and Osiris, the same divinity!

"There is nothing," says Mangou de la Londe, "opposed to the idea that druidical monuments existed near Bayeux." "This country," adds M. Roussel, "is like the country in which the Egyptians built the temple of Jupiter Ammon."

So then there was a temple in which riches were shut up. All the Celtic monuments contain them.

"In 1715," relates Dom Martin, "one Sieur Heribel exhumed in the vicinity of Bayeux, several argil vases full of bones, and concluded (in accordance with tradition and authorities which had disappeared) that this place, a necropolis, was the Mount Faunus in which the Golden Calf is buried."

In the first place, where is Mount Faunus? The authors do not point it out. The natives know nothing about it. It would be necessary to devote themselves to excavations, and with that view they forwarded a petition to the prefect, to which they got no response.

Perhaps Mount Faunus had disappeared, and was not a hill but a barrow?

Several of them contain skeletons that have the position of the foetus in the mother's womb. This meant that for them the tomb was, as it were, a second gestation, preparing them for another life. Therefore the barrow symbolises the female organ, just as the raised stone is the male organ.

In fact, where menhirs are found, an obscene creed has persisted. Witness what took place at Guerande, at Chichebouche, at Croissic, at Livarot. In former times the towers, the pyramids, the wax tapers, the boundaries of roads, and even the trees had a phallic meaning. Bouvard and Pécuchet collected whipple-trees of carriages, legs of armchairs, bolts of cellars, apothecaries' pestles. When people came to see them they would ask, "What do you think that is like?" and then they would confide the secret. And, if anyone uttered an exclamation, they would shrug their shoulders in pity.

One evening as they were dreaming about the dogmas of the Druids, the abbé cautiously stole in.

Immediately they showed the museum, beginning with the church window; but they longed to reach the new compartment — that of the phallus. The ecclesiastic stopped them, considering the exhibition indecent. He came to demand back his baptismal font.

Bouvard and Pécuchet begged for another fortnight, the time necessary for taking a moulding of it.

"The sooner the better," said the abbé.

Then he chatted on general topics.

Pécuchet, who had left the room a minute, on coming back slipped a napoleon into his hand.

The priest made a backward movement.

"Oh! for your poor!"

And, colouring, M. Jeufroy crammed the gold piece into his cassock.

To give back the bowl, the bowl for sacrifices! Never, while they lived! They were even anxious to learn Hebrew, which is the mother-tongue of Celtic, unless indeed the former language be derived from it! And they had planned a journey into Brittany, commencing with Rennes, where they had an appointment with Larsonneur, with a view of studying that urn mentioned in the Memorials of the Celtic Academy, which appeared to have contained the ashes of Queen Artimesia, when the mayor entered unceremoniously with his hat on, like the boorish individual he was.

"All this won't do, my fine fellows! You must give it up!"

"What, pray?"

"Rogues! I know well you are concealing it!"

Someone had betrayed them.

They replied that they had the curé's permission to keep it.

"We'll soon see that!"

Foureau went away. An hour later he came back.

They were obstinate.

In the first place, this holy-water basin was not wanted, as it really was not a holy-water basin at all. They would prove this by a vast number of scientific reasons. Next, they offered to acknowledge in their will that it belonged to the parish. They even proposed to buy it.

"And, besides, it is my property," Pécuchet asseverated.

The twenty francs accepted by M. Jeufroy furnished a proof of the contract, and if he compelled them to go before a justice of the peace, so much the worse: he would be taking a false oath!

During these disputes he had again seen the soup-tureen many times, and in his soul had sprung up the desire, the thirst for possession of this piece of earthenware. If the curé was willing to give it to him, he would restore the bowl, otherwise not.

Through weariness or fear of scandal, M. Jeufroy yielded it up. It was placed amongst their collection near the Cauchoise cap. The bowl decorated the church porch; and they consoled themselves for the loss of it with the reflection that the people of Chavignolles were ignorant of its value.

But the soup-tureen inspired them with a taste for earthenware — a new subject for study and for explorations through the country.

It was the period when persons of good position were looking out for old Rouen dishes. The notary possessed a few of them, and derived from the fact, as it were, an artistic reputation which was prejudicial to his profession, but for which he made up by the serious side of his character.

When he learned that Bouvard and Pécuchet had got the soup-tureen, he came to propose to them an exchange.

Pécuchet would not consent to this.

"Let us say no more about it!" and Marescot proceeded to examine their ceramic collection.

All the specimens hung up along the wall were blue on a background of dirty white, and some showed their horn of plenty in green or reddish tones. There were shaving-dishes, plates and saucers, objects long sought for, and brought back in the recesses of one's frock-coat close to one's heart.

Marescot praised them, and then talked about other kinds of faïence, the Hispano-Arabian, the Dutch, the English, and the Italian, and having dazzled them with his erudition:

"Might I see your soup-tureen again?"

He made it ring by rapping on it with his fingers, then he contemplated the two S's painted on the lid.

"The mark of Rouen!" said Pécuchet.

"Ho! ho! Rouen, properly speaking, would not have any mark. When Moutiers was unknown, all the French faïence came from Nevers. So with Rouen to-day. Besides, they imitate it to perfection at El-bœuf."

"It isn't possible!"

"Majolica is cleverly imitated. Your specimen is of no value; and as for me, I was about to do a downright foolish thing."

When the notary had gone, Pécuchet sank into an armchair in a state of nervous prostration.

"We shouldn't have given back the bowl," said Bouvard; "but you get excited, and always lose your head."

"Yes, I do lose my head"; and Pécuchet, snatching up the soup-tureen, flung it some distance away from him against the sarcophagus.

Bouvard, more self-possessed, picked up the broken pieces one by one; and some time afterwards this idea occurred to him: "Marescot, through jealousy, might have been making fools of us!"

"How?"

"There's nothing to show me that the soup-tureen was not genuine! Whereas the other specimens which he pretended to admire are perhaps counterfeit."

And so the day closed with uncertainties and regrets.

This was no reason for abandoning their tour into Brittany.

They even purposed to take Gorju along with them to assist them in their excavations.

For some time past, he had slept at the house, in order to finish the more quickly the repairing of the chest.

The prospect of a change of place annoyed him, and when they talked about menhirs and barrows which they calculated on seeing: "I know better ones," said he to them; "in Algeria, in the South, near the sources of Bou-Moursoug, you meet quantities of them." He then gave a description of a tomb which chanced to be open right in front of him, and which contained a skeleton squatting like an ape with its two arms around its legs.

Larsonneur, when they informed him of the circumstance, would not believe a word of it.

Bouvard sifted the matter, and started the question again.

How does it happen that the monuments of the Gauls are shapeless, whereas these same Gauls were civilised in the time of Julius Cæsar? No doubt they were traceable to a more ancient people.

Such a hypothesis, in Larsonneur's opinion, betrayed a lack of patriotism.

No matter; there is nothing to show that these monuments are the work of Gauls. "Show us a text!"

The Academician was displeased, and made no reply; and they were very glad of it, so much had the Druids bored them.

If they did not know what conclusion to arrive at as to earthenware and as to Celticism, it was because they were ignorant of history, especially the history of France.

The work of Anquetil was in their library; but the series of "do-nothing kings" amused them very little. The villainy of the mayors of the Palace did not excite their indignation, and they gave Anquetil up, repelled by the ineptitude of his reflections.

Then they asked Dumouchel, "What is the best history of France?"

Dumouchel subscribed, in their names, to a circulating library, and forwarded to them the work of Augustin Thierry, together with two volumes of M. de Genoude.

According to Genoude, royalty, religion, and the national assemblies — here are "the principles" of the French nation, which go back to the Merovingians. The Carlovingians fell away from them. The Capetians, being in accord with the people, made an effort to maintain them. Absolute power was established under Louis XIII., in order to conquer Protestantism, the final effort of feudalism; and '89 is a return to the constitution of our ancestors.

Pécuchet admired his ideas. They excited Bouvard's pity, as he had read Augustin Thierry first: "What trash you talk with your French nation, seeing that France did not exist! nor the national assemblies! and the Carlovingians usurped nothing at all! and the kings did not set free the communes! Read for yourself."

Pécuchet gave way before the evidence, and surpassed him in scientific strictness. He would have considered himself dishonoured if he had said "Charlemagne" and not "Karl the Great," "Clovis" in place of "Clodowig."

Nevertheless he was beguiled by Genoude, deeming it a clever thing to join together both ends of French history, so that the middle period becomes rubbish; and, in order to ease their minds about it, they took up the collection of Buchez and Roux.

But the fustian of the preface, that medley of Socialism and Catholicism, disgusted them; and the excessive accumulation of details prevented them from grasping the whole.

They had recourse to M. Thiers.

It was during the summer of 1845, in the garden beneath the arbour. Pécuchet, his feet resting on a small chair, read aloud in his cavernous voice, without feeling tired, stopping to plunge his fingers into his snuff-box. Bouvard listened, his pipe in his mouth, his legs wide apart, and the upper part of his trousers unbuttoned.

Old men had spoken to them of '93, and recollections that were almost personal gave life to the prosy descriptions of the author. At that time the high-roads were covered with soldiers singing the "Marseillaise." At the thresholds of doors women sat sewing canvas to make tents. Sometimes came a wave of men in red caps, bending forward a pike, at the end of which could be seen a discoloured head with the hair hanging down. The lofty tribune of the Convention looked down upon a cloud of dust, amid which wild faces were yelling cries "Death!" Anyone who passed, at midday, close to the basin of the Tuileries could hear each blow of the guillotine, as if they were cutting up sheep.

And the breeze moved the vine-leaves of the arbour; the ripe barley swayed at intervals; a blackbird was singing. And, casting glances around them, they relished this tranquil scene.

What a pity that from the beginning they had failed to understand one another! For if the royalists had reflected like the patriots, if the court had exhibited more candour, and its adversaries less violence, many of the calamities would not have happened.

By force of chattering in this way they roused themselves into a state of excitement. Bouvard, being liberal-minded and of a sensitive nature, was a Constitutionalist, a Girondist, a Thermidorian; Pécuchet, being of a bilious temperament and a lover of authority, declared himself a sans-culotte, and even a Robespierrist. He expressed approval of the condemnation of the King, the most violent decrees, the worship of the Supreme Being. Bouvard preferred that of Nature. He would have saluted with pleasure the image of a big woman pouring out from her breasts to her adorers not water but Chambertin.

In order to have more facts for the support of their arguments they procured other works: Montgaillard, Prudhomme, Gallois, Lacretelle, etc.; and the contradictions of these books in no way embarrassed them. Each took from them what might vindicate the cause that he espoused.

Thus Bouvard had no doubt that Danton accepted a hundred thousand crowns to bring forward motions that would destroy the Republic; while in Pécuchet's opinion Vergniaud would have asked for six thousand francs a month.

"Never! Explain to me, rather, why Robespierre's sister had a pension from Louis XVIII."

"Not at all! It was from Bonaparte. And, since you take it that way, who is the person that a few months before Égalité's death had a secret conference with him? I wish they would reinsert in the Memoirs of La Campan the suppressed paragraphs. The death of the Dauphin appears to me equivocal. The powder magazine at Grenelle by exploding killed two thousand persons. The cause was unknown, they tell us: what nonsense!" For Pécuchet was not far from understanding it, and threw the blame for every crime on the manœuvres of the aristocrats, gold, and the foreigner.

In the mind of Bouvard there could be no dispute as to the use of the words, "Ascend to heaven, son of St. Louis," as to the incident about the virgins of Verdun, or as to the culottes clothed in human skin. He accepted Prudhomme's lists, a million of victims, exactly.

But the Loire, red with gore from Saumur to Nantes, in a line of eighteen leagues, made him wonder. Pécuchet in the same degree entertained doubts, and they began to distrust the historians.

For some the Revolution is a Satanic event; others declare it to be a sublime exception. The vanquished on each side naturally play the part of martyrs.

Thierry demonstrates, with reference to the Barbarians, that it is foolish to institute an inquiry as to whether such a prince was good or was bad. Why not follow this method in the examination of more recent epochs? But history must needs avenge morality: we feel grateful to Tacitus for having lacerated Tiberius. After all, whether the Queen had lovers; whether Dumouriez, since Valmy, intended to betray her; whether in Prairial it was the Mountain or the Girondist party that began, and in Thermidor the Jacobins or the Plain; what matters it to the development of the Revolution, of which the causes were far to seek and the results incalculable?

Therefore it was bound to accomplish itself, to be what it was; but, suppose the flight of the King without impediment, Robespierre escaping or Bonaparte assassinated — chances which depended upon an innkeeper proving less scrupulous, a door being left open, or a sentinel falling asleep — and the progress of the world would have taken a different direction.

They had no longer on the men and the events of that period a single well-balanced idea. In order to form an impartial judgment upon it, it would have been necessary to have read all the histories, all the memoirs, all the newspapers, and all the manuscript productions, for through the least omission might arise an error, which might lead to others without limit.

They abandoned the subject. But the taste for history had come to them, the need of truth for its own sake.

Perhaps it is easier to find it in more ancient epochs? The authors, being far removed from the events, ought to speak of them without passion. And they began the good Rollin.

"What a heap of rubbish!" exclaimed Bouvard, after the first chapter.

"Wait a bit," said Pécuchet, rummaging at the end of their library, where lay heaped up the books of the last proprietor, an old lawyer, an accomplished man with a mania for literature; and, having put out of their places a number of novels and plays, together with an edition of Montesquieu and translations of Horace, he obtained what he was looking for — Beaufort's work on Roman History.

Titus Livius attributes the foundation of Rome to Romulus; Sallust gives the credit of it to the Trojans under Æneas. Coriolanus died in exile, according to Fabius Pictor; through the stratagems of Attius Tullius, if we may believe Dionysius. Seneca states that Horatius Cocles came back victorious; and Dionysius that he was wounded in the leg. And La Mothe le Vayer gives expression to similar doubts with reference to other nations.

There is no agreement as to the antiquity of the Chaldeans, the age of Homer, the existence of Zoroaster, the two empires of Assyria. Quintus Curtius has manufactured fables. Plutarch gives the lie to Herodotus. We should have a different idea of Cæsar if Vercingetorix had written his Commentaries.

Ancient history is obscure through want of documents. There is an abundance of them in modern history; and Bouvard and Pécuchet came back to France, and began Sismondi.

The succession of so many men filled them with a desire to understand them more thoroughly, to enter into their lives. They wanted to read the originals — Gregory of Tours, Monstrelet, Commynes, all those whose names were odd or agreeable. But the events got confused through want of knowledge of the dates.

Fortunately they possessed Dumouchel's work on mnemonics, a duodecimo in boards with this epigraph: "To instruct while amusing."

It combined the three systems of Allevy, of Pâris, and of Fenaigle.

Allevy transforms numbers into external objects, the number 1 being expressed by a tower, 2 by a bird, 3 by a camel, and so on. Pâris strikes the imagination by means of rebuses: an armchair garnished with clincher-nails will give "Clou, vis — Clovis"; and, as the sound of frying makes "ric, ric," whittings in a stove will recall "Chilperic." Fenaigle divides the universe into houses, which contain rooms, each having four walls with nine panels, and each panel bearing an emblem. A pharos on a mountain will tell the name of "Phar-a-mond" in Pâris's system; and, according to Allevy's directions, by placing above a mirror, which signifies 4, a bird 2, and a hoop 0, we shall obtain 420, the date of that prince's accession.

For greater clearness, they took as their mnemotechnic basis their own house, their domicile, associating a distinct fact with each part of it; and the courtyard, the garden, the outskirts, the entire country, had for them no meaning any longer except as objects for facilitating memory. The boundaries in the fields defined certain epochs; the apple trees were genealogical stems, the bushes battles; everything became symbolic. They sought for quantities of absent things on their walls, ended by seeing them, but lost the recollection of what dates they represented.

Besides the dates are not always authentic. They learned out of a manual for colleges that the birth of Jesus ought to be carried back five years earlier than the date usually assigned for it; that there were amongst the Greeks three ways of counting the Olympiads, and eight amongst the Latin of making the year begin. So many opportunities for mistakes outside of those which result from the zodiacs, from the epochs, and from the different calendars!

And from carelessness as to dates they passed to contempt for facts.

What is important is the philosophy of history!

Bouvard could not finish the celebrated discourse of Bossuet.

"The eagle of Meaux is a farce-actor! He forgets China, the Indies, and America; but is careful to let us know that Theodosius was 'the joy of the universe,' that Abraham 'treated kings as his equals,' and that the philosophy of the Greeks has come down from the Hebrews. His preoccupation with the Hebrews provokes me."

Pécuchet shared this opinion, and wished to make him read Vico.

"Why admit," objected Bouvard, "that fables are more true than the truths of historians?"

Pécuchet tried to explain myths, and got lost in the Scienza Nuova.

"Will you deny the design of Providence?"

"I don't know it!" said Bouvard. And they decided to refer to Dumouchel.

The professor confessed that he was now at sea on the subject of history.

"It is changing every day. There is a controversy as to the kings of Rome and the journeys of Pythagoras. Doubts have been thrown on Belisarius, William Tell, and even on the Cid, who has become, thanks to the latest discoveries, a common robber. It is desirable that no more discoveries should be made, and the Institute ought even to lay down a kind of canon prescribing what it is necessary to believe!"

In a postscript he sent them some rules of criticism taken from Daunou's course of lectures:

"To cite by way of proof the testimony of multitudes is a bad method of proof; they are not there to reply.

"To reject impossible things. Pausanias was shown the stone swallowed by Saturn.

"Architecture may lie: instance, the arch of the Forum, in which Titus is called the first conqueror of Jerusalem, which had been conquered before him by Pompey.

"Medals sometimes deceive. Under Charles IX. money was minted from the coinage of Henry II.

"Take into account the skill of forgers and the interestedness of apologists and calumniators."

Few historians have worked in accordance with these rules, but all in view of one special cause, of one religion, of one nation, of one party, of one system, in order to curb kings, to advise the people, or to offer moral examples.

The others, who pretend merely to narrate, are no better; for everything cannot be told — some selection must be made. But in the selection of documents some special predilection will have the upper hand, and, as this varies according to the conditions under which the writer views the matter, history will never be fixed.

"It is sad," was their reflection. However, one might take a subject, exhaust the sources of information concerning it, make a good analysis of them, then condense it into a narrative, which would be, as it were, an epitome of the facts reflecting the entire truth.

"Do you wish that we should attempt to compose a history?"

"I ask for nothing better. But of what?"

"Suppose we write the life of the Duke of Angoulême?"

"But he was an idiot!" returned Bouvard.

"What matter? Personages of an inferior mould have sometimes an enormous influence, and he may have controlled the machinery of public affairs."

The books would furnish them with information; and M. de Faverges, no doubt, would have them himself, or could procure them from some elderly gentleman of his acquaintance.

They thought over this project, discussed it, and finally determined to spend a fortnight at the municipal library at Caen in making researches there.

The librarian placed at their disposal some general histories and some pamphlets with a coloured lithograph portrait representing at three-quarters' length Monseigneur the Duke of Angoulême.

The blue cloth of his uniform disappeared under the epaulets, the stars, and the large red ribbon of the Legion of Honour; a very high collar surrounded his long neck; his pear-shaped head was framed by the curls of his hair and by his scanty whiskers and heavy eyelashes; and a very big nose and thick lips gave his face an expression of commonplace good-nature.

When they had taken notes, they drew up a programme:

"Birth and childhood but slightly interesting. One of his tutors is the Abbé Guénée, Voltaire's enemy. At Turin he is made to cast a cannon; and he studies the campaigns of Charles VIII. Also he is nominated, despite his youth, colonel of a regiment of noble guards.

"1797. — His marriage.

"1814. — The English take possession of Bordeaux. He runs up behind them and shows his person to the inhabitants. Description of the prince's person.

"1815. — Bonaparte surprises him. Immediately he appeals to the King of Spain; and Toulon, were it not for Masséna, would have been surrendered to England.

"Operations in the South. He is beaten, but released under the promise to restore the crown diamonds carried off at full gallop by the King, his uncle.

"After the Hundred Days he returns with his parents and lives in peace. Several years glide away.

"War with Spain. Once he has crossed the Pyrenees, victories everywhere follow the grandson of Henry IV. He takes the Trocadéro, reaches the pillars of Hercules, crushes the factions, embraces Ferdinand, and returns.

"Triumphal arches; flowers presented by young girls; dinners at the Prefecture; 'Te Deum' in the cathedrals. The Parisians are at the height of intoxication. The city offers him a banquet. Songs containing allusions to the hero are sung at the theatre.

"The enthusiasm diminishes; for in 1827 a ball organised by subscription proves a failure.

"As he is High Admiral of France, he inspects the fleet, which is going to start for Algiers.

"July 1830. — Marmont informs him of the state of affairs. Then he gets into such a rage that he wounds himself in the hand with the general's sword. The King entrusts him with the command of all the forces.

"He meets detachments of the line in the Bois de Boulogne, and has not a word to say to them.

"From St. Cloud he flies to the bridge of Sèvres. Coldness of the troops. That does not shake him. The Royal family leave Trianon. He sits down at the foot of an oak, unrolls a map, meditates, remounts his horse, passes in front of St. Cyr, and sends to the students words of hope.

"At Rambouillet the bodyguards bid him good-bye. He embarks, and during the entire passage is ill. End of his career.

"The importance possessed by the bridges ought here to be noticed. First, he exposes himself needlessly on the bridge of the Inn; he carries the bridge St. Esprit and the bridge of Lauriol; at Lyons the two bridges are fatal to him, and his fortune dies before the bridge of Sèvres.

"List of his virtues. Needless to praise his courage, to which he joined a far-seeing policy. For he offered every soldier sixty francs to desert the Emperor, and in Spain he tried to corrupt the Constitutionals with ready money.

"His reserve was so profound that he consented to the marriage arranged between his father and the Queen of Etruria, to the formation of a new cabinet after the Ordinances, to the abdication in favour of Chambord — to everything that they asked him.

"Firmness, however, was not wanting in him. At Angers, he cashiered the infantry of the National Guard, who, jealous of the cavalry, had succeeded by means of a stratagem in forming his escort, so that his Highness found himself jammed into the ranks at the cost of having his knees squeezed. But he censured the cavalry, the cause of the disorder, and pardoned the infantry — a veritable judgment of Solomon.

"His piety manifested itself by numerous devotions, and his clemency by obtaining the pardon of General Debelle, who had borne arms against him.

"Intimate details; characteristics of the Prince:

"At the château of Beauregard, in his childhood, he took pleasure in deepening, along with his brother, a sheet of water, which may still be seen. On one occasion, he visited the barracks of the chasseurs, called for a glass of wine, and drank the King's health.

"While walking, in order to mark the step, he used to keep repeating to himself: 'One, two — one, two — one, two!'

"Some of his sayings have been preserved: —

"To a deputation from Bordeaux:

"'What consoles me for not being at Bordeaux is to find myself amidst you.'

"To the Protestants of Nismes:

"I am a good Catholic, but I shall never forget that my distinguished ancestor was a Protestant.'

"To the pupils of St. Cyr, when all was lost:

"Right, my friends! The news is good! This is right — all right!"

"After Charles X.'s abdication:

"Since they don't want me, let them settle it themselves.'

"And in 1814, at every turn, in the smallest village:

"No more war; no more conscription; no more united rights.'

"His style was as good as his utterance. His proclamations surpassed everything.

"The first, of the Count of Artois, began thus:

"Frenchmen, your King's brother has arrived!"

"That of the prince:

"I come. I am the son of your kings. You are Frenchmen!"

"Order of the day, dated from Bayonne:

"Soldiers, I come!"

"Another, in the midst of disaffection:

"Continue to sustain with the vigour which befits the French soldier the struggle which you have begun. France expects it of you.'

"Lastly, at Rambouillet:

"The King has entered into an arrangement with the government established at Paris, and everything brings us to believe that this arrangement is on the point of being concluded.'

"Everything brings us to believe' was sublime."

"One thing vexed me," said Bouvard, "that there is no mention of his love affairs!" And they made a marginal note: "To search for the prince's amours."

At the moment when they were taking their leave, the librarian, bethinking himself of it, showed them another portrait of the Duke of Angoulême.

In this one he appeared as a colonel of cuirassiers, on a vaulting-horse, his eyes still smaller, his mouth open, and his hair straight.

How were they to reconcile the two portraits? Had he straight hair, or rather crisped — unless he carried affectation so far as to get it curled?

A grave question, from Pécuchet's point of view, for the mode of wearing the hair indicates the temperament, and the temperament the individual.

Bouvard considered that we know nothing of a man as long as we are ignorant of his passions; and in order to clear up these two points, they presented themselves at the château of Faverges. The count was not there; this retarded their work. They returned home annoyed.

The door of the house was wide open; there was nobody in the kitchen. They went upstairs, and who should they see in the middle of Bouvard's room but Madame Bordin, looking about her right and left!

"Excuse me," she said, with a forced laugh, "I have for the last hour been searching for your cook, whom I wanted for my preserves."

They found her in the wood-house on a chair fast asleep. They shook her. She opened her eyes.

"What is it now? You are always prodding at me with your questions!"

It was clear that Madame Bordin had been putting some to her in their absence.

Germaine got out of her torpor, and complained of indigestion.

"I am remaining to take care of you," said the widow.

Then they perceived in the courtyard a big cap, the lappets of which were fluttering. It was Madame Castillon, proprietress of a neighbouring farm. She was calling out: "Gorju! Gorju!"

And from the corn-loft the voice of their little servant-maid answered loudly:

"He is not there!"

At the end of five minutes she came down, with her cheeks flushed and looking excited. Bouvard and Pécuchet reprimanded her for having been so slow. She unfastened their gaiters without a murmur.

Then they went to look at the chest. The bakehouse was covered with its scattered fragments; the carvings were damaged, the leaves broken.

At this sight, in the face of this fresh disaster, Bouvard had to keep back his tears, and Pécuchet got a fit of nervous shivering.

Gorju, making his appearance almost immediately, explained the matter. He had just put the chest outside in order to varnish it, when a wandering cow knocked it down on the ground.

"Whose cow?" said Pécuchet.

"I don't know."

"Ah! you left the door open, as you did some time ago. It is your fault."

At any rate, they would have nothing more to do with him. He had been trifling with them too long, and they wanted no more of him or his work.

"These gentlemen were wrong. The damage was not so great. It would be all settled before three weeks." And Gorju accompanied them into the kitchen, where Germaine was seen dragging herself along to see after the dinner.

They noticed on the table a bottle of Calvados, three quarters emptied.

"By you, no doubt," said Pécuchet to Gorju.

"By me! never!"

Bouvard met his protest by observing:

"You are the only man in the house."

"Well, and what about the women?" rejoined the workman, with a side wink.

Germaine caught him up:

"You'd better say 'twas I!"

"Certainly it was you."

"And perhaps 'twas I smashed the press?"

Gorju danced about.

"Don't you see that she's drunk?"

Then they squabbled violently with each other, he with a pale face and a biting manner, she purple with rage, tearing tufts of grey hair from under her cotton cap. Madame Bordin took Germaine's part, while Mélie took Gorju's.

The old woman burst out:

"Isn't it an abomination that you two should be spending days together in the grove, not to speak of the nights? — a sort of Parisian, eating up honest women, who comes to our master's house to play tricks on them!"

Bouvard opened his eyes wide.

"What tricks?"

"I tell you he's making fools of you!"

"Nobody can make a fool of me!" exclaimed Pécuchet, and, indignant at her insolence, exasperated by the mortification inflicted on him, he dismissed her, telling her to go and pack. Bouvard did not oppose this decision, and they went out, leaving Germaine in sobs over her misfortune, while Madame Bordin was trying to console her.

In the course of the evening, as they grew calmer, they went over these occurrences, asked themselves who had drunk the Calvados, how the chest got broken, what Madame Castillon wanted when she was calling Gorju, and whether he had dishonoured Mélie.

"We are not able to tell," said Bouvard, "what is happening in our own household, and we lay claim to discover all about the hair and the love affairs of the Duke of Angoulême."

Pécuchet added: "How many questions there are in other respects important and still more difficult!"

Whence they concluded that external facts are not everything. It is necessary to complete them by means of psychology. Without imagination, history is defective.

"Let us send for some historical romances!"

CHAPTER V.

Romance and the Drama.

They first read Walter Scott.

It was like the surprise of a new world.

The men of the past who had for them been only phantoms or names, became living beings, kings, princes, wizards, footmen, gamekeepers, monks, gipsies, merchants, and soldiers, who deliberate, fight, travel, trade, eat and drink, sing and pray, in the armouries of castles, on the blackened benches of inns, in the winding streets of cities, under the sloping roofs of booths, in the cloisters of monasteries. Landscapes artistically arranged formed backgrounds for the narratives, like the scenery of a theatre. You follow with your eyes a horseman galloping along the strand; you breathe amid the heather the freshness of the wind; the moon shines on the lake, over which a boat is skimming; the sun glitters on the breast-plates; the rain falls over leafy huts. Without having any knowledge of the models, they thought these pictures lifelike and the illusion was complete.

And so the winter was spent.

When they had breakfasted, they would instal themselves in the little room, one at each side of the chimney-piece, and, facing each other, book in hand, they would begin to read in silence. When the day wore apace, they would go out for a walk along the road, then, having snatched a hurried dinner, they would resume their reading far into the night. In order to protect himself from the lamp, Bouvard wore blue spectacles, while Pécuchet kept the peak of his cap drawn over his forehead.

Germaine had not gone, and Gorju now and again came to dig in the garden; for they had yielded through indifference, forgetful of material things.

After Walter Scott, Alexandre Dumas diverted them after the fashion of a magic-lantern. His personages, active as apes, strong as bulls, gay as chaffinches, enter on the scene and talk abruptly, jump off roofs to the pavement, receive frightful wounds from which they recover, are believed to be dead, and yet reappear. There are trap-doors under the boards, antidotes, disguises; and all things get entangled, hurry along, and are finally unravelled without a minute for reflection. Love observes the proprieties, fanaticism is cheerful, and massacres excite a smile.

Rendered hard to please by these two masters, they could not tolerate the balderdash of the Belisaire, the foolery of the Numa Pompilius, of Marchangy, and Vicomte d'Arlincourt. The colouring of Frédéric Soulié (like that of the book-lover Jacob) appeared to them insufficient; and M. Villemain scandalised them by showing at page 85 of his Lascaris, a Spaniard smoking a pipe — a long Arab pipe — in the middle of the fifteenth century.

Pécuchet consulted the Biographie Universelle, and undertook to revise Dumas from the point of view of science.

The author in Les Deux Dianas makes a mistake with regard to dates. The marriage of the Dauphin, Francis, took place on the 15th of October, 1548, and not on the 20th of May, 1549. How does he know (see Le Page du Duc de Savoie) that Catherine de Medicis, after her husband's death, wished to resume the war? It is not very probable that the Duke of Anjou was crowned at night in a church, an episode which adorns La Dame de Montsoreau. La Reine Margot especially swarms with errors. The Duke of Nevers was not absent. He gave his opinion at the council before the feast of St. Bartholomew, and Henry of Navarre did not follow the procession four days after. Henry III. did not come back from Poland so quickly. Besides, how many flimsy devices! The miracle of the hawthorn, the balcony of Charles IX., the poisoned glass of Jeanne d'Albret — Pécuchet no longer had any confidence in Dumas.

He even lost all respect for Walter Scott on account of the oversights in his Quentin Durward. The murder of the Archbishop of Liège is anticipated by fifteen years. The wife of Robert de Lamarck was Jeanne d'Arschel and not Hameline de Croy. Far from being killed by a soldier, he was put to death by Maximilian; and the face of Temeraire, when his corpse was found, did not express any menace, inasmuch as the wolves had half devoured it.

None the less, Bouvard went on with Walter Scott, but ended by getting weary of the repetition of the same effects. The heroine usually lives in the country with her father, and the lover, a plundered heir, is re-established in his rights and triumphs over his rivals. There are always a mendicant philosopher, a morose nobleman, pure young girls, facetious retainers, and interminable dialogues, stupid prudishness, and an utter absence of depth.

In his dislike to bric-à-brac, Bouvard took up George Sand.

He went into raptures over the beautiful adulteresses and noble lovers, would have liked to be Jacques, Simon, Lélío, and to have lived in Venice. He uttered sighs, did not know what was the matter with him, and felt himself changed.

Pécuchet, who was working up historical literature studied plays. He swallowed two Pharamonds, three Clovises, four Charlemagnes, several Philip Augustuses, a crowd of Joan of Arcs, many Marquises de Pompadours, and some Conspiracies of Cellamare.

Nearly all of them appeared still more stupid than the romances. For there exists for the stage a conventional history which nothing can destroy. Louis XI. will not fail to kneel before the little images in his hat; Henry IV. will be constantly jovial, Mary Stuart tearful, Richelieu cruel; in short, all the characters seem taken from a single block, from love of simplicity and regard for ignorance, so that the playwright, far from elevating, lowers, and, instead of instructing, stupefies.

As Bouvard had spoken eulogistically to him about George Sand, Pécuchet proceeded to read Consuelo, Horace, and Mauprat, was beguiled by the author's vindication of the oppressed, the socialistic and republican aspect of her works, and the discussions contained in them.

According to Bouvard, however, these elements spoiled the story, and he asked for love-tales at the circulating library.

They read aloud, one after the other, La Nouvelle Héloïse, Delphine, Adolphe, and Ourika. But the listener's yawns proved contagious, for the book slipped out of the reader's hand to the floor.

They found fault with the last-mentioned works for making no reference to the environment, the period, the costume of the various personages. The heart alone is the theme — nothing but sentiment! as if there were nothing else in the world.

They next went in for novels of the humorous order, such as the Voyage autour de ma Chambre, by Xavier de Maistre, and Sous les Tilleuls, by Alphonse Karr. In books of this description the author must interrupt the narrative in order to talk about his dog, his slippers, or his mistress.

A style so free from formality charmed them at first, then appeared stupid to them, for the author effaces his work while displaying in it his personal surroundings.

Through need of the dramatic element, they plunged into romances of adventure. The more entangled, extraordinary, and impossible the plot was, the more it interested them. They did their best to foresee the dénouement, became very excited over it, and tired themselves out with a piece of child's play unworthy of serious minds.

The work of Balzac amazed them like a Babylon, and at the same time like grains of dust under the microscope.

In the most commonplace things arise new aspects. They never suspected that there were such depths in modern life.

"What an observer!" exclaimed Bouvard.

"For my part I consider him chimerical," Pécuchet ended by declaring. "He believes in the occult sciences, in monarchy, in rank; is dazzled by rascals; turns up millions for you like centimes; and middle-class people are not with him middle-class people at all, but giants. Why inflate what is unimportant, and waste description on silly things? He wrote one novel on chemistry, another on banking, another on printing-machines, just as one Ricard produced The Cabman, The Water-Carrier and The Cocoa-Nut Seller. We should soon have books on every trade and on every province; then on every town and on the different stories of every house, and on every individual — which would be no longer literature but statistics or ethnography."

The process was of little consequence in Bouvard's estimation. He wanted to get information — to acquire a deeper knowledge of human nature. He read Paul de Kock again, and ran through the Old Hermits of the Chaussée d'Antin.

"Why lose one's time with such absurdities?" said Pécuchet.

"But they might be very interesting as a series of documents."

"Go away with your documents! I want something to lift me up, and take me away from the miseries of this world."

And Pécuchet, craving for the ideal, led Bouvard unconsciously towards tragedy.

The far-off times in which the action takes place, the interests with which it is concerned, and the high station of its leading personages impressed them with a certain sense of grandeur.

One day Bouvard took up Athalie, and recited the dream so well that Pécuchet wished to attempt it in his turn. From the opening sentence his voice got lost in a sort of humming sound. It was monotonous and, though strong, indistinct.

Bouvard, full of experience, advised him, in order to render it well-modulated, to roll it out from the lowest tone to the highest, and to draw it back by making use of an ascending and descending scale; and he himself went through this exercise every morning in bed, according to the precept of the Greeks. Pécuchet, at the time mentioned, worked in the same fashion: each had his door closed, and they went on bawling separately.

The features that pleased them in tragedy were the emphasis, the political declamations, and the maxims on the perversity of things.

They learned by heart the most celebrated dialogues of Racine and Voltaire, and they used to declaim them in the corridor. Bouvard, as if he were at the Théâtre Français, strutted, with his hand on Pécuchet's shoulder, stopping at intervals; and, with rolling eyes, he would open wide his arms, and accuse the Fates. He would give forth fine bursts of grief from the Philoctète of La Harpe, a nice death-rattle from Gabrielle de Vergy, and, when he played Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, the way in which he represented that personage gazing at his son while exclaiming, "Monster, worthy of me!" was indeed terrible. Pécuchet forgot his part in it. The ability, and not the will, was what he lacked.

On one occasion, in the Cléopâtre of Marmontel, he fancied that he could reproduce the hissing of the asp, just as the automaton invented for the purpose by Vaucanson might have done it. The abortive effort made them laugh all the evening. The tragedy sank in their estimation.

Bouvard was the first to grow tired of it, and, dealing frankly with the subject, demonstrated how artificial and limping it was, the silliness of its incidents, and the absurdity of the disclosures made to confidants.

They then went in for comedy, which is the school for fine shading. Every sentence must be dislocated, every word must be underlined, and every syllable must be weighed. Pécuchet could not manage it, and got quite stranded in Celimène. Moreover, he thought the lovers very cold, the disputes a bore, and the valets intolerable — Clitandre and Sganarelle as unreal as Ægistheus and Agamemnon.

There remained the serious comedy or tragedy of everyday life, where we see fathers of families afflicted, servants saving their masters, rich men offering others their fortunes, innocent seamstresses and villainous corrupters, a species which extends from Diderot to Pixérécourt. All these plays preaching about virtue disgusted them by their triviality.

The drama of 1830 fascinated them by its movement, its colouring, its youthfulness. They made scarcely any distinction between Victor Hugo, Dumas, or Bouchardy, and the diction was no longer to be pompous or fine, but lyrical, extravagant.

One day, as Bouvard was trying to make Pécuchet understand Frédéric Lemaître's acting, Madame Bordin suddenly presented herself in a green shawl, carrying with her a volume of Pigault-Lebrun, the two gentlemen being so polite as to lend her novels now and then.

"But go on!" for she had been a minute there already, and had listened to them with pleasure.

They hoped she would excuse them. She insisted.

"Faith!" said Bouvard, "there's nothing to prevent — —"

Pécuchet, through bashfulness, remarked that he could not act unprepared and without costume.

"To do it effectively, we should need to disguise ourselves!"

And Bouvard looked about for something to put on, but found only the Greek cap, which he snatched up.

As the corridor was not big enough, they went down to the drawing-room. Spiders crawled along the walls, and the geological specimens that encumbered the floor had whitened with their dust the velvet of the armchairs. On the chair which had least dirt on it they spread a cover, so that Madame Bordin might sit down.

It was necessary to give her something good.

Bouvard was in favour of the Tour de Nesle. But Pécuchet was afraid of parts which called for too much action.

"She would prefer some classical piece! Phèdre, for instance."

"Be it so."

Bouvard set forth the theme: "It is about a queen whose husband has a son by another wife. She has fallen madly in love with the young man. Are we there? Start!

"Yes, prince! for Theseus I grow faint, I burn — I love him!"

And, addressing Pécuchet's side-face, he gushed out admiration of his port, his visage, "that charming head"; grieved at not having met him with the Greek fleet; would have gladly been lost with him in the labyrinth.

The border of the red cap bent forward amorously, and his trembling voice and his appealing face begged of the cruel one to take pity on a hopeless flame.

Pécuchet, turning aside, breathed hard to emphasise his emotion.

Madame Bordin, without moving, kept her eyes wide open, as if gazing at people whirling round; Mélie was listening behind the door; Gorju, in his shirt-sleeves, was staring at them through the window. Bouvard made a dash into the second part. His acting gave expression to the delirium of the senses, remorse, despair; and he flung himself on the imaginary sword of Pécuchet with such violence that, slipping over some of the stone specimens, he was near tumbling on the ground.

"Pay no attention! Then Theseus arrives, and she poisons herself."

"Poor woman!" said Madame Bordin.

After this they begged of her to choose a piece for them.

She felt perplexed about making a selection. She had seen only three pieces: Robert le Diable in the capital, Le Jeune Mari at Rouen, and another at Falaise which was very funny, and which was called La Brouette du Vinaigrier.

Finally, Bouvard suggested to her the great scene of Tartuffe in the second act.

Pécuchet thought an explanation was desirable:

"You must know that Tartuffe — —"

Madame Bordin interrupted him: "We know what a Tartuffe is."

Bouvard had wished for a robe for a certain passage.

"I see only the monk's habit," said Pécuchet.

"No matter; bring it here."

He reappeared with it and a copy of Molière.

The opening was tame, but at the place where Tartuffe caresses Elmire's knees, Pécuchet assumed the tone of a gendarme:

"What is your hand doing there?"

Bouvard instantly replied in a sugary voice:

"I am feeling your dress; the stuff of it is marrowy."

And he shot forth glances from his eyes, bent forward his mouth, sniffed with an exceedingly lecherous air, and ended by even addressing himself to Madame Bordin.

His impassioned gaze embarrassed her, and when he stopped, humble and palpitating, she almost sought for something to say in reply.

Pécuchet took refuge in the book: "The declaration is quite gallant."

"Ha! yes," cried she; "he is a bold wheedler."

"Is it not so?" returned Bouvard confidently. "But here's another with a more modern touch about it." And, having opened his coat, he squatted over a piece of ashlar, and, with his head thrown back, burst forth:

"Your eyes' bright flame my vision floods with joy. Sing me some song like those, in bygone years, You sang at eve, your dark eye filled with tears."

"That is like me," she thought.

"Drink and be merry! let the wine-cup flow: Give me this hour, and all the rest may go!"

"How droll you are!" And she laughed with a little laugh, which made her throat rise up, and exposed her teeth.

"Ah! say, is it not sweet To love and see your lover at your feet?"

He knelt down.

"Finish, then."

"Oh! let me sleep and dream upon thy breast, My beauty, Doña Sol, my love!"

"Here the bells are heard, and they are disturbed by a mountaineer."

"Fortunately; for, but for that — — " And Madame Bordin smiled, in place of finishing the sentence.

It was getting dark. She arose.

It had been raining a short time before, and the path through the beech grove not being dry enough, it was more convenient to return across the fields. Bouvard accompanied her into the garden, in order to open the gate for her.

At first they walked past the trees cut like distaffs, without a word being spoken on either side. He was still moved by his declamation, and she, at the bottom of her heart, felt a certain kind of fascination, a charm which was generated by the influence of literature. There are occasions when art excites commonplace natures; and worlds may be unveiled by the clumsiest interpreters.

The sun had reappeared, making the leaves glisten, and casting luminous spots here and there amongst the brakes. Three sparrows with little chirpings hopped on the trunk of an old linden tree which had fallen to the ground. A hawthorn in blossom exhibited its pink sheath; lilacs drooped, borne down by their foliage.

"Ah! that does one good!" said Bouvard, inhaling the air till it filled his lungs.

"You are so painstaking."

"It is not that I have talent; but as for fire, I possess some of that."

"One can see," she returned, pausing between the words, "that you — were in love — in your early days."

"Only in my early days, you believe?"

She stopped. "I know nothing about it."

"What does she mean?" And Bouvard felt his heart beating.

A little pool in the middle of the gravel obliging them to step aside, they got up on the hedgerow.

Then they chatted about the recital.

"What is the name of your last piece?"

"It is taken from Hernani, a drama."

"Ha!" then slowly and as if in soliloquy, "it must be nice to have a gentleman say such things to you — in downright earnest."

"I am at your service," replied Bouvard.

"You?"

"Yes, I."

"What a joke!"

"Not the least in the world!"

And, having cast a look about him, he caught her from behind round the waist and kissed the nape of her neck vigorously.

She became very pale as if she were going to faint, and leaned one hand against a tree, then opened her eyes and shook her head.

"It is past."

He looked at her in amazement.

The grating being open, she got up on the threshold of the little gateway.

There was a water-channel at the opposite side. She gathered up all the folds of her petticoat and stood on the brink hesitatingly.

"Do you want my assistance?"

"Unnecessary."

"Why not?"

"Ha! you are too dangerous!" And as she jumped down, he could see her white stocking.

Bouvard blamed himself for having wasted an opportunity. Bah! he should have one again — and then not all women are alike. With some of them you must be blunt, while audacity destroys you with others. In short, he was satisfied with himself — and he did not confide his hope to Pécuchet; this was through fear of the remarks that would be passed, and not at all through delicacy.

From that time forth they used to recite in the presence of Mélie and Gorju, all the time regretting that they had not a private theatre.

The little servant-girl was amused without understanding a bit of it, wondering at the language, charmed at the roll of the verses. Gorju applauded the philosophic passages in the tragedies, and everything in the people's favour in the melodramas, so that, delighted at his good taste, they thought of giving him lessons, with a view to making an actor of him subsequently. This prospect dazzled the workman.

Their performances by this time became the subject of general gossip. Vaucorbeil spoke to them about the matter in a sly fashion. Most people regarded their acting with contempt.

They only prided themselves the more upon it. They crowned themselves artists. Pécuchet wore moustaches, and Bouvard thought he could not do anything better, with his round face and his bald patch, than to give himself a head à la Béranger. Finally, they determined to write a play.

The subject was the difficulty. They searched for it while they were at breakfast, and drank coffee, a stimulant indispensable for the brain, then two or three little glasses. They would next take a nap on their beds, after which they would make their way down to the fruit garden and take a turn there; and at length they would leave the house to find inspiration outside, and, after walking side by side, they would come back quite worn out.

Or else they would shut themselves up together. Bouvard would sweep the table, lay down paper in front of him, dip his pen, and remain with his eyes on the ceiling; whilst Pécuchet, in the armchair, would be plunged in meditation, with his legs stretched out and his head down.

Sometimes they felt a shivering sensation, and, as it were, the passing breath of an idea, but at the very moment when they were seizing it, it had vanished.

But methods exist for discovering subjects. You take a title at random, and a fact trickles out of it. You develop a proverb; you combine a number of adventures so as to form only one. None of these devices came to anything. In vain they ran through collections of anecdotes, several volumes of celebrated trials, and a heap of historical works.

And they dreamed of being acted at the Odéon, had their thoughts fixed on theatrical performances, and sighed for Paris.

"I was born to be an author instead of being buried in the country!" said Bouvard.

"And I likewise," chimed in Pécuchet.

Then came an illumination to their minds. If they had so much trouble about it, the reason was their ignorance of the rules.

They studied them in the Pratique du Théâtre, by D'Aubignac, and in some works not quite so old-fashioned.

Important questions are discussed in them: Whether comedy can be written in verse; whether tragedy does not go outside its limits by taking its subject from modern history; whether the heroes ought to be virtuous; what kinds of villains it allows; up to what point horrors are permissible in it; that the details should verge towards a single end; that the interest should increase; that the conclusion should harmonise with the opening — these were unquestionable propositions.

"Invent resorts that can take hold of me," says Boileau. By what means were they to "invent resorts?"

"So that in all your speeches passion's dart May penetrate, and warm, and move the heart."

How were they to "warm the heart?"

Rules, therefore, were not sufficient; there was need, in addition, for genius. And genius is not sufficient either. Corneille, according to the French Academy, understands nothing about the stage; Geoffroy disparaged Voltaire; Souigny scoffed at Racine; La Harpe blushed at Shakespeare's name.

Becoming disgusted with the old criticism, they wished to make acquaintance with the new, and sent for the notices of plays in the newspapers.

What assurance! What obstinacy! What dishonesty! Outrages on masterpieces; respect shown for platitudes; the gross ignorance of those who pass for scholars, and the stupidity of others whom they describe as witty.

Perhaps it is to the public that one must appeal.

But works that have been applauded sometimes displeased them, and amongst plays that were hissed there were some that they admired.

Thus the opinions of persons of taste are unreliable, while the judgment of the multitude is incomprehensible.

Bouvard submitted the problem to Barberou. Pécuchet, on his side, wrote to Dumouchel.

The ex-commercial traveller was astonished at the effeminacy engendered by provincial life. His old Bouvard was turning into a blockhead; in short, "he was no longer in it at all."

"The theatre is an article of consumption like any other. It is advertised in the newspapers. We go to the theatre to be amused. The good thing is the thing that amuses."

"But, idiot," exclaimed Pécuchet, "what amuses you is not what amuses me; and the others, as well as yourself, will be weary of it by and by. If plays are written expressly to be acted, how is it that the best of them can be always read?"

And he awaited Dumouchel's reply. According to the professor, the immediate fate of a play proved nothing. The Misanthrope and Athalie are dying out. Zaïre is no longer understood. Who speaks to-day of Ducange or of Picard? And he recalled all the great contemporary successes from Fanchon la Vielleuse to Gaspardo le Pêcheur, and deplored the decline of our stage. The cause of it is the contempt for literature, or rather for style; and, with the aid of certain authors mentioned by Dumouchel, they learned the secret of the various styles; how we get the majestic, the temperate, the ingenuous, the touches that are noble and the expressions that are low. "Dogs" may be heightened by "devouring"; "to vomit" is to be used only figuratively; "fever" is applied to the passions; "valiance" is beautiful in verse.

"Suppose we made verses?" said Pécuchet.

"Yes, later. Let us occupy ourselves with prose first."

A strict recommendation is given to choose a classic in order to mould yourself upon it; but all of them have their dangers, and not only have they sinned in point of style, but still more in point of phraseology.

This assertion disconcerted Bouvard and Pécuchet, and they set about studying grammar.

Has the French language, in its idiomatic structure definite articles and indefinite, as in Latin? Some think that it has, others that it has not. They did not venture to decide.

The subject is always in agreement with the verb, save on the occasions when the subject is not in agreement with it.

There was formerly no distinction between the verbal adjective and the present participle; but the Academy lays down one not very easy to grasp.

They were much pleased to learn that the pronoun leur is used for persons, but also for things, while où and en are used for things and sometimes for persons.

Ought we to say Cette femme a l'air bon or l'air bonne? — une bûche de bois sec, or de bois sèche? — ne pas laisser de, or que de? — une troupe de voleurs survint, or survinrent?

Other difficulties: Autour and à l'entour of which Racine and Boileau did not see the difference; imposer, or en imposer, synonyms with Massillon and Voltaire; croasser and coasser, confounded by La Fontaine, who knew, however, how to distinguish a crow from a frog.

The grammarians, it is true, are at variance. Some see a beauty where others discover a fault. They admit principles of which they reject the consequences, announce consequences of which they repudiate the principles, lean on tradition, throw over the masters, and adopt whimsical refinements.

Ménage, instead of lentilles and cassonade, approves of nentilles and castonade; Bonhours, jérarchie and not hiérarchie and M. Chapsal speaks of les œils de la soupe.

Pécuchet was amazed above all at Jénin. What! z'annetons would be better than hannetons, z'aricots than haricots! and, under Louis XIV., the pronunciation was Roume and Monsieur de Lioune, instead of Rome and Monsieur de Lionne!

Litré gave them the finishing stroke by declaring that there never had been, and never could be positive orthography. They concluded that syntax is a whim and grammar an illusion.

At this period, moreover, a new school of rhetoric declared that we should write as we speak, and that all would be well so long as we felt and observed.

As they had felt and believed that they had observed, they considered themselves qualified to write. A play is troublesome on account of the narrowness of its framework, but the novel has more freedom. In order to write one they searched among their personal recollections.

Pécuchet recalled to mind one of the head-clerks in his own office, a very nasty customer, and he felt a longing to take revenge on him by means of a book.

Bouvard had, at the smoking saloon, made the acquaintance of an old writing-master, who was a miserable drunkard. Nothing could be so ludicrous as this character.

At the end of the week, they imagined that they could fuse these two subjects into one. They left off there, and passed on to the following: a woman who causes the unhappiness of a family; a wife, her husband, and her lover; a woman who would be virtuous through a defect in her conformation; an ambitious man; a bad priest. They tried to bind together with these vague conceptions things supplied by their memory, and then made abridgments or additions.

Pécuchet was for sentiment and ideality, Bouvard for imagery and colouring; and they began to understand each other no longer, each wondering that the other should be so shallow.

The science which is known as æsthetics would perhaps settle their differences. A friend of Dumouchel, a professor of philosophy, sent them a list of works on the subject. They worked separately and communicated their ideas to one another.

In the first place, what is the Beautiful?

For Schelling, it is the infinite expressing itself through the finite; for Reid, an occult quality; for Jouffroy, an indecomposable fact; for De Maistre, that which is pleasing to virtue; for P. André, that which agrees with reason.

And there are many kinds of beauty: a beauty in the sciences — geometry is beautiful; a beauty in morals — it cannot be denied that the death of Socrates was beautiful; a beauty in the animal kingdom — the beauty of the dog consists in his sense of smell. A pig could not be beautiful, having regard to his dirty habits; no more could a serpent, for it awakens in us ideas of vileness. The flowers, the butterflies, the birds may be beautiful. Finally, the first condition of beauty is unity in variety: there is the principle.

"Yet," said Bouvard, "two squint eyes are more varied than two straight eyes, and produce an effect which is not so good — as a rule."

They entered upon the question of the Sublime.

Certain objects are sublime in themselves: the noise of a torrent, profound darkness, a tree flung down by the storm. A character is beautiful when it triumphs, and sublime when it struggles.

"I understand," said Bouvard; "the Beautiful is the beautiful, and the Sublime the very beautiful."

But how were they to be distinguished?

"By means of tact," answered Pécuchet.

"And tact — where does that come from?"

"From taste."

"What is taste?"

It is defined as a special discernment, a rapid judgment, the power of distinguishing certain relationships.

"In short, taste is taste; but all that does not tell the way to have it."

It is necessary to observe the proprieties. But the proprieties vary; and, let a work be ever so beautiful, it will not be always irreproachable. There is, however, a beauty which is indestructible, and of whose laws we are ignorant, for its genesis is mysterious.

Since an idea cannot be interpreted in every form, we ought to recognise limits amongst the arts, and in each of the arts many forms; but combinations arise in which the style of one will enter into another without the ill result of deviating from the end — of not being true.

The too rigid application of truth is hurtful to beauty, and preoccupation with beauty impedes truth. However, without an ideal there is no truth; this is why types are of a more continuous reality than portraits. Art, besides, only aims at verisimilitude; but verisimilitude depends on the observer, and is a relative and transitory thing.

So they got lost in discussions. Bouvard believed less and less in æsthetics.

"If it is not a humbug, its correctness will be demonstrated by examples. Now listen."

And he read a note which had called for much research on his part:

"Bouhours accuses Tacitus of not having the simplicity which history demands. M. Droz, a professor, blames Shakespeare for his mixture of the serious and the comic. Nisard, another professor, thinks that André Chénier is, as a poet, beneath the seventeenth century. Blair, an Englishman, finds fault with the picture of the harpies in Virgil. Marmontel groans over the liberties taken by Homer. Lamotte does not admit the immortality of his heroes. Vida is indignant at his similes. In short, all the makers of rhetorics, poetics, and æsthetics, appear to me idiots."

"You are exaggerating," said Pécuchet.

He was disturbed by doubts; for, if (as Longinus observes) ordinary minds are incapable of faults, the faults must be associated with the masters, and we are bound to admire them. This is going too far. However, the masters are the masters. He would have liked to make the doctrines harmonise with the works, the critics with the poets, to grasp the essence of the Beautiful; and these questions exercised him so much that his bile was stirred up. He got a jaundice from it.

It was at its crisis when Marianne, Madame Bordin's cook, came with a request from her mistress for an interview with Bouvard.

The widow had not made her appearance since the dramatic performance. Was this an advance? But why should she employ Marianne as an intermediary? And all night Bouvard's imagination wandered.

Next day, about two o'clock, he was walking in the corridor, and glancing out through the window from time to time. The door-bell rang. It was the notary.

He crossed the threshold, ascended the staircase, and seated himself in the armchair, and, after a preliminary exchange of courtesies, said that, tired of waiting for Madame Bordin, he had started before her.

She wished to buy the Ecalles from him.

Bouvard experienced a kind of chilling sensation, and he hurried towards Pécuchet's room.

Pécuchet did not know what reply to make. He was in an anxious frame of mind, as M. Vaucorbeil was to be there presently.

At length Madame Bordin arrived. The delay was explained by the manifest attention she had given to her toilette, which consisted of a cashmere frock, a hat, and fine kid gloves — a costume befitting a serious occasion.

After much frivolous preliminary talk she asked whether a thousand crown-pieces would not be sufficient.

"One acre! A thousand crown-pieces! Never!"

She half closed her eyes. "Oh! for me!"

And all three remained silent.

M. de Faverges entered. He had a morocco case under his arm, like a solicitor; and, depositing it on the table, said:

"These are pamphlets! They deal with reform — a burning question; but here is a thing which no doubt belongs to you."

And he handed Bouvard the second volume of the Mémoires du Diable.

Mélie, just now, had been reading it in the kitchen; and, as one ought to watch over the morals of persons of that class, he thought he was doing the right thing in confiscating the book.

Bouvard had lent it to his servant-maid. They chatted about novels. Madame Bordin liked them when they were not dismal.

"Writers," said M. de Faverges, "paint life in colours that are too flattering."

"It is necessary to paint," urged Bouvard.

"Then nothing can be done save to follow the example."

"It is not a question of example."

"At least, you will admit that they might fall into the hands of a young daughter. I have one."

"And a charming one!" said the notary, with the expression of countenance he wore on the days of marriage contracts.

"Well, for her sake, or rather for that of the persons that surround her, I prohibit them in my house, for the people, my dear sir — —"

"What have the people done?" said Vaucorbeil, appearing suddenly at the door.

Pécuchet, who had recognised his voice, came to mingle with the company.

"I maintain," returned the count, "that it is necessary to prevent them from reading certain books."

Vaucorbeil observed: "Then you are not in favour of education?"

"Yes, certainly. Allow me — —"

"When every day," said Marescot, "an attack is made on the government."

"Where's the harm?"

And the nobleman and the physician proceeded to disparage Louis Philippe, recalling the Pritchard case, and the September laws against the liberty of the press:

"And that of the stage," added Pécuchet.

Marescot could stand this no longer.

"It goes too far, this stage of yours!"

"That I grant you," said the count — "plays that glorify suicide."

"Suicide is a fine thing! Witness Cato," protested Pécuchet.

Without replying to the argument, M. de Faverges stigmatised those works in which the holiest things are scoffed at: the family, property, marriage.

"Well, and Molière?" said Bouvard.

Marescot, a man of literary taste, retorted that Molière would not pass muster any longer, and was, furthermore, a little overrated.

"Finally," said the count, "Victor Hugo has been pitiless — yes, pitiless — towards Marie Antoinette, by dragging over the hurdle the type of the Queen in the character of Mary Tudor."

"What!" exclaimed Bouvard, "I, an author, I have no right — —"

"No, sir, you have no right to show us crime without putting beside it a corrective — without presenting to us a lesson."

Vaucorbeil thought also that art ought to have an object — to aim at the improvement of the masses. "Let us chant science, our discoveries, patriotism," and he broke into admiration of Casimir Delavigne.

Madame Bordin praised the Marquis de Foudras.

The notary replied: "But the language — are you thinking of that?"

"The language? How?"

"He refers to the style," said Pécuchet. "Do you consider his works well written?"

"No doubt, exceedingly interesting."

He shrugged his shoulders, and she blushed at the impertinence.

Madame Bordin had several times attempted to come back to her own business transaction. It was too late to conclude it. She went off on Marescot's arm.

The count distributed his pamphlets, requesting them to hand them round to other people.

Vaucorbeil was leaving, when Pécuchet stopped him.

"You are forgetting me, doctor."

His yellow physiognomy was pitiable, with his moustaches and his black hair, which was hanging down under a silk handkerchief badly fastened.

"Purge yourself," said the doctor. And, giving him two little slaps as if to a child: "Too much nerves, too much artist!"

"No, surely!"

They summed up what they had just heard. The morality of art is contained for every person in that which flatters that person's interests. No one has any love for literature.

After this they turned over the count's pamphlets.

They found in all of a demand for universal suffrage.

"It seems to me," said Pécuchet, "that we shall soon have some squabbling."

For he saw everything in dark colours, perhaps on account of his jaundice.

CHAPTER VI.

Revolt of the People.

In the morning of the 25th of February, 1848, the news was brought to Chavignolles, by a person who had come from Falaise, that Paris was covered with barricades, and the next day the proclamation of the Republic was posted up outside the mayor's office.

This great event astonished the inhabitants.

But when they learned that the Court of Cassation, the Court of Appeal, the Court of Exchequer, the Chamber of Notaries, the order of advocates, the Council of State, the University, the generals, and M. de la Roche-Jacquelein himself had given promise of their adherence to the provisional government, their breasts began to expand; and, as trees of liberty were planted at Paris, the municipal council decided that they ought to have them at Chavignolles.

Bouvard made an offer of one, his patriotism exulting in the triumph of the people; as for Pécuchet, the fall of royalty confirmed his anticipations so exactly that he must needs be satisfied.

Gorju, obeying them with zeal, removed one of the poplar trees that skirted the meadow above La Butte, and transported it to "the Cows' Pass," at the entrance of the village, the place appointed for the purpose.

Before the hour for the ceremony, all three awaited the procession. They heard a drum beating, and then beheld a silver cross. After this appeared two torches borne by the chanters, then the curé, with stole, surplice, cope, and biretta. Four altar-boys escorted him, a fifth carried the holy-water basin, and in the rear came the sacristan. He got up on the raised edge of the hole in which stood the poplar tree, adorned with tri-coloured ribbons. On the opposite side could be seen the mayor and his two deputies, Beljambe and Marescot; then the principal personages of the district, M. de Faverges, Vaucorbeil, Coulon, the justice of the peace, an old foggy with a sleepy face. Heurtaux wore a foraging-cap, and Alexandre Petit, the new schoolmaster, had put on his frock-coat, a threadbare green garment — his Sunday coat. The firemen, whom Girbal commanded, sword in hand, stood in single file.

On the other side shone the white plates of some old shakos of the time of Lafayette — five or six, no more — the National Guard having fallen into desuetude at Chavignolles. Peasants and their wives, workmen from neighbouring factories, and village brats, crowded together in the background; and Placquevent, the keeper, five feet eight inches in height, kept them in check with a look as he walked to and fro with folded arms.

The curé's speech was like that of other priests in similar circumstances. After thundering against kings, he glorified the Republic. "Do we not say 'the republic of letters,' 'the Christian republic'? What more innocent than the one, more beautiful than the other? Jesus Christ formulated our sublime device: the tree of the people was the tree of the Cross. In order that religion may give her fruits, she has need of charity." And, in the name of charity, the ecclesiastic implored his brethren not to commit any disorder; to return home peaceably.

Then he sprinkled the tree while he invoked the blessing of God. "May it grow, and may it recall to us our enfranchisement from all servitude, and that fraternity more bountiful than the shade of its branches. Amen."

Some voices repeated "Amen"; and, after an interval of drum-beating, the clergy, chanting a Te Deum, returned along the road to the church.

Their intervention had produced an excellent effect. The simple saw in it a promise of happiness, the patriotic a mark of deference, a sort of homage rendered to their principles.

Bouvard and Pécuchet thought they should have been thanked for their present, or at least that an allusion should have been made to it; and they unbosomed themselves on the subject to Faverges and the doctor.

What mattered wretched considerations of that sort? Vaucorbeil was delighted with the Revolution; so was the count. He execrated the Orléans family. They would never see them any more! Good-bye to them! All for the people henceforth! And followed by Hurel, his factotum, he went to meet the curé.

Foureau was walking with his head down, between the notary and the innkeeper, irritated by the ceremony, as he was apprehensive of a riot; and instinctively he turned round towards Placquevent, who, together with the captain, gave vent to loud regrets at Girbal's unsatisfactoriness and the sorry appearance of his men.

Some workmen passed along the road singing the "Marseillaise," with Gorju among them brandishing a stick; Petit was escorting them, with fire in his eyes.

"I don't like that!" said Marescot. "They are making a great outcry, and getting too excited."

"Oh, bless my soul!" replied Coulon; "young people must amuse themselves."

Foureau heaved a sigh. "Queer amusement! and then the guillotine at the end of it!" He had visions of the scaffold, and was anticipating horrors.

Chavignolles felt the rebound of the agitation in Paris. The villagers subscribed to the newspapers. Every morning people crowded to the post-office, and the postmistress would not have been able to get herself free from them had it not been for the captain, who sometimes assisted her. Then would follow a chat on the green.

The first violent discussion was on the subject of Poland.

Heurtaux and Bouvard called for its liberation.

M. de Faverges took a different view.

"What right have we to go there? That would be to let loose Europe against us. No imprudence!"

And everybody approving of this, the two Poles held their tongues.

On another occasion, Vaucorbeil spoke in favour of Ledru-Rollin's circulars.

Foureau retorted with a reference to the forty-five centimes.

"But the government," said Pécuchet, "has suppressed slavery."

"What does slavery matter to me?"

"Well, what about the abolition of the death-penalty in political cases?"

"Faith," replied Foureau, "they would like to abolish everything. However, who knows? the tenants are already showing themselves very exacting."

"So much the better! The proprietors," according to Pécuchet, "had been too much favoured. He that owns an estate — —"

Foureau and Marescot interrupted him, exclaiming that he was a communist.

"I — a communist!"

And all kept talking at the same time. When Pécuchet proposed to establish a club, Foureau had the hardihood to reply that they would never see such a thing at Chavignolles.

After this, Gorju demanded guns for the National Guard, the general opinion having fixed on him as instructor. The only guns in the place were those of the firemen. Girbal had possession of them. Foureau did not care to deliver them up.

Gorju looked at him.

"You will find, however, that I know how to use them."

For he added to his other occupations that of poaching, and the innkeeper often bought from him a hare or a rabbit.

"Faith! take them!" said Foureau.

The same evening they began drilling. It was under the lawn, in front of the church. Gorju, in a blue smock-frock, with a neckcloth around his loins, went through the movements in an automatic fashion. When he gave the orders, his voice was gruff.

"Draw in your bellies!"

And immediately, Bouvard, keeping back his breath, drew in his stomach, and stretched out his buttocks.

"Good God! you're not told to make an arch."

Pécuchet confused the ranks and the files, half-turns to the right and half-turns to the left; but the most pitiable sight was the schoolmaster: weak and of a slim figure, with a ring of fair beard around his neck, he staggered under the weight of his gun, the bayonet of which incommoded his neighbours.

They wore trousers of every colour, dirty shoulder-belts, old regimentals that were too short, leaving their shirts visible over their flanks; and each of them pretended that he had not the means of doing otherwise. A subscription was started to clothe the poorest of them. Foureau was niggardly, while women made themselves conspicuous. Madame Bordin gave five francs, in spite of her hatred of the Republic. M. de Faverges equipped a dozen men, and was not missing at the drill. Then he took up his quarters at the grocer's, and gave those who came in first a drink.

The powerful then began fawning on the lower class. Everyone went after the working-men. People intrigued for the favour of being associated with them. They became nobles.

Those of the canton were, for the most part, weavers; others worked in the cotton mills or at a paper factory lately established.

Gorju fascinated them by his bluster, taught them the shoe trick, and brought those whom he treated as chums to Madame Castillon's house for a drink.

But the peasants were more numerous, and on market days M. de Faverges would walk about the green, make inquiries as to their wants, and try to convert them to his own ideas. They listened without answering, like Père Gouy, ready to accept any government so long as it reduced the taxes.

By dint of babbling, Gorju was making a name for himself. Perhaps they might send him into the Assembly!

M. de Faverges also was thinking of it, while seeking not to compromise himself.

The Conservatives oscillated between Foureau and Marescot, but, as the notary stuck to his office, Foureau was chosen — a boor, an idiot. The doctor waxed indignant. Rejected in the competition, he regretted Paris, and the consciousness of his wasted life gave him a morose air. A more distinguished career was about to open for him — what a revenge! He drew up a profession of faith, and went to read it to MM. Bouvard and Pécuchet.

They congratulated him upon it. Their opinions were identical with his. However, they wrote better, had a knowledge of history, and could cut as good a figure as he in the Chamber. Why not? But which of them ought to offer himself? And they entered upon a contest of delicacy.

Pécuchet preferred that it should be his friend rather than himself.

"No, it suits you better! you have a better deportment!"

"Perhaps so," returned Bouvard, "but you have a better tuft of hair!" And, without solving the difficulty, they arranged their plans of conduct.

This vertigo of deputyship had seized on others. The captain dreamed of it under his foraging-cap while puffing at his pipe, and the schoolmaster too in his school, and the curé also between two prayers, so that he sometimes surprised himself with his eyes towards heaven, in the act of saying, "Grant, O my God, that I may be a deputy!"

The doctor having received some encouragement, repaired to the house of Heurtaux, and explained to him what his chances were. The captain did not stand on ceremony about it. Vaucorbeil was known, undoubtedly, but little liked by his professional brethren, especially in the case of chemists. Everyone would bark at him; the people did not want a gentleman; his best patients would leave him. And, when he weighed these arguments, the physician regretted his weakness.

As soon as he had gone, Heurtaux went to see Placquevent. Between old soldiers there should be mutual courtesy, but the rural guard, devoted though he was to Foureau, flatly refused to help him.

The curé demonstrated to M. de Faverges that the hour had not come. It was necessary to give the Republic time to get used up.

Bouvard and Pécuchet represented to Gorju that he would never be strong enough to overcome the coalition of the peasants and the village shop-keepers, filled him with uncertainty, and deprived him of all confidence.

Petit, through pride, had allowed his ambition to be seen. Beljambe warned him that, if he failed, his dismissal was certain.

Finally, the curé got orders from the bishop to keep quiet.

Then, only Foureau remained.

Bouvard and Pécuchet opposed him, bringing up against him his unfriendly attitude about the guns, his opposition to the club, his reactionary views, his avarice; and even persuaded Gouy that he wished to bring back the old régime. Vague as was the meaning of this word to the peasant's mind, he execrated it with a hatred that had accumulated in the souls of his forefathers throughout ten centuries; and he turned all his relatives, and those of his wife, brothers-in-law, cousins, grand-nephews (a horde of them), against Foureau.

Gorju, Vaucorbeil, and Petit kept working for the overthrow of the mayor; and, the ground being thus cleared, Bouvard and Pécuchet, without any doubt, were likely to succeed.

They drew lots to know which would present himself. The drawing decided nothing, and they went to consult the doctor on the subject.

He had news for them: Flacardoux, editor of Le Calvados, had announced his candidature. The two friends had a keen sense of having been deceived. Each felt the other's disappointment more than his own.

But politics had an exciting influence on them. When the election-day arrived they went to inspect the urns. Flacardoux had carried it!

M. de Faverges had fallen back on the National Guard, without obtaining the epaulet of commander. The people of Chavignolles contrived to get Beljambe nominated.

This favouritism on the part of the public, so whimsical and unforeseen, dismayed Heurtaux. He had neglected his duties, confining himself to inspecting the military operations now and then, and giving utterance to a few remarks. No matter! He considered it a monstrous thing that an innkeeper should be preferred to one who had been formerly a captain in the Imperial service, and he said, after the invasion of the Chamber on the 15th of May: "If the military grades give themselves away like that in the capital, I shall be no longer astonished at what may happen."

The reaction began.

People believed in Louis Blanc's pineapple soup, in Flocon's bed of gold, and Ledru-Rollin's royal orgies; and as the province pretends to know everything that happens in Paris, the inhabitants of Chavignolles had no doubt about these inventions, and gave credence to the most absurd reports.

M. de Faverges one evening came to look for the curé, in order to tell him that the Count de Chambord had arrived in Normandy.

Joinville, according to Foureau, had made preparations with his sailors to put down "these socialists of yours." Heurtaux declared that Louis Napoleon would shortly be consul.

The factories had stopped. Poor people wandered in large groups about the country.

One Sunday (it was in the early days of June) a gendarme suddenly started in the direction of Falaise. The workmen of Acqueville, Liffard, Pierre-Pont, and Saint-Rémy were marching on Chavignolles. The sheds were shut up. The municipal council assembled and passed a resolution, to prevent catastrophes, that no resistance should be offered. The gendarmes were kept in, and orders were given to them not to show themselves. Soon was heard, as it were, the rumbling of a storm. Then the song of the Girondists shook the windows, and men, arm in arm, passed along the road from Caen, dusty, sweating, in rags. They filled up the entire space in front of the council chamber, and a great hurly-burly arose.

Gorju and two of his comrades entered the chamber. One of them was lean and wretched-looking, with a knitted waistcoat, the ribbons of which were hanging down; the other, black as coal — a machinist, no doubt — with hair like a brush, thick eyebrows, and old list shoes. Gorju, like a hussar, wore his waistcoat slung over his shoulder.

All three remained standing, and the councillors, seated round the table, which was covered with a blue cloth, gazed at their faces, pale from privation.

"Citizens!" said Gorju, "we want work."

The mayor trembled. He could not find his voice.

Marescot replied from the place where he sat that the council would consider the matter directly; and when the comrades had gone out they discussed several suggestions.

The first was to have stones drawn.

In order to utilise the stones, Girbal proposed a road from Angleville to Tournebu.

That from Bayeux had positively rendered the same service.

They could clear out the pond! This was not sufficient as a public work. Or rather, dig a second pond! But in what place?

Langlois' advice was to construct an embankment along the Mortins as a protection against an inundation. It would be better, Beljambe thought, to clear away the heather.

It was impossible to arrive at any conclusion. To appease the crowd, Coulon went down over the peristyle and announced that they were preparing charity workshops.

"Charity! Thanks!" cried Gorju. "Down with the aristocrats! We want the right to work!"

It was the question of the time. He made use of it as a source of popularity. He was applauded.

In turning round he elbowed Bouvard, whom Pécuchet had dragged to the spot, and they entered into conversation. Nothing could keep them back; the municipal building was surrounded; the council could not escape.

"Where shall you get money?" said Bouvard.

"In the rich people's houses. Besides, the government will give orders for public works."

"And if works are not wanted?"

"They will have them made in advance."

"But wages will fall," urged Pécuchet. "When work happens to be lacking, it is because there are too many products; and you demand to have them increased!"

Gorju bit his moustache. "However, with the organisation of labour — —"

"Then the government will be the master!"

Some of those around murmured:

"No, no! no more masters!"

Gorju got angry. "No matter! Workers should be supplied with capital, or rather credit should be established."

"In what way?"

"Ah! I don't know; but credit ought to be established."

"We've had enough of that," said the machinist. "They are only plaguing us, these farce-actors!"

And he climbed up the steps, declaring that he would break open the door.

There he was met by Placquevent, with his right knee bent and his fists clenched:

"Advance one inch further!"

The machinist recoiled. The shouting of the mob reached the chamber. All arose with the desire to run away. The help from Falaise had not arrived. They bewailed the count's absence. Marescot kept twisting a pen; Père Coulon groaned; Heurtaux lashed himself into a fury to make them send for the gendarmes.

"Command them to come!" said Foureau.

"I have no authority."

The noise, however, redoubled. The whole green was covered with people, and they were all staring at the first story of the building when, at the window in the middle, under the clock, Pécuchet made his appearance.

He had ingeniously gone up by the back-stairs, and, wishing to be like Lamartine, he began a harangue to the populace:

"Citizens! — —"

But his cap, his nose, his frock-coat, his entire personality lacked distinction.

The man in the knitted waistcoat asked him:

"Are you a workman?"

"No."

"A master, then?"

"Nor that either."

"Well, take yourself off, then."

"Why?" returned Pécuchet, haughtily.

And the next moment he disappeared, in the machinist's clutch, into the recess of the window.

Gorju came to his assistance. "Let him alone! He's a decent fellow." They clenched.

The door flew open, and Marescot, on the threshold, announced the decision of the council. Hurel had suggested his doing so.

The road from Tournebu would have a branch road in the direction of Angleville and leading towards the château of Faverges.

It was a sacrifice which the commune took upon itself in the interest of the working-men.

They dispersed.

When Bouvard and Pécuchet re-entered their house, women's voices fell upon their ears. The servants and Madame Bordin were breaking into exclamations, the widow's screams being the loudest; and at sight of them she cried:

"Ha! this is very fortunate! I have been waiting for you for the last three hours! My poor garden has not a single tulip left! Filth everywhere on the grass! No way of getting rid of him!"

"Who is it?"

"Père Gouy."

He had come with a cartload of manure, and had scattered it pell-mell over the grass.

"He is now digging it up. Hurry on and make him stop."

"I am going with you," said Bouvard.

At the bottom of the steps outside, a horse in the shafts of a dung-cart was gnawing at a bunch of oleanders. The wheels, in grazing the flower borders, had bruised the box trees, broken a rhododendron, knocked down the dahlias; and clods of black muck, like molehills, embossed the green sward. Gouy was vigorously digging it up.

One day Madame Bordin had carelessly said to him that she would like to have it turned up. He set about the job, and, in spite of her orders to desist, went on with it. This was the way that he interpreted the right to work, Gorju's talk having turned his brain.

He went away only after violent threats from Bouvard.

Madame Bordin, by way of compensation, did not pay for the manual labour, and kept the manure. She was wise: the doctor's wife, and even the notary's, though of higher social position, respected her for it.

The charity workshops lasted a week. No trouble occurred. Gorju left the neighbourhood.

Meanwhile, the National Guard was always on foot: on Sunday, a review; military promenades, occasionally; and, every night, patrols. They disturbed the village. They rang the bells of houses for fun; they made their way into the bedrooms where married couples were snoring on the same bolster; then they uttered broad jokes, and the husband, rising, would go and get them a glass each. Afterwards, they would return to the guard-house to play a hundred of dominoes, would consume a quantity of cider there, and eat cheese, while the sentinel, worn out, would keep opening the door every other minute. There was a prevailing absence of discipline, owing to Beljambe's laxity.

When the days of June came, everyone was in favour of "flying to the relief of Paris"; but Foureau could not leave the mayoral premises, Marescot his office, the doctor his patients, or Girbal his firemen. M. de Faverges was at Cherbourg. Beljambe kept his bed. The captain grumbled: "They did not want me; so much the worse!" — and Bouvard had the wisdom to put restraint on Pécuchet.

The patrols throughout the country were extended farther. They were panic-stricken by the shadow of a haystack, or by the forms of branches. On one occasion the entire National Guard turned and ran. In the moonlight they had observed, under an apple tree, a man with a gun, taking aim at them. At another time, on a dark night, the patrol halting under the beech trees, heard some one close at hand.

"Who is there?"

No answer.

They allowed the person to pursue his course, following him at a distance, for he might have a pistol or a tomahawk; but when they were in the village, within reach of help, the dozen men of the company rushed together upon him, exclaiming:

"Your papers!" They pulled him about and overwhelmed him with insults. The men at the guard-house had gone out. They dragged him there; and by the light of the candle that was burning on top of the stove they at last recognised Gorju.

A wretched greatcoat of lasting was flapping over his shoulders. His toes could be seen through the holes in his boots. Scratches and bruises stained his face with blood. He was fearfully emaciated, and rolled his eyes about like a wolf.

Foureau, coming up speedily, questioned him as to how he chanced to be under the beech trees, what his object was in coming back to Chavignolles, and also as to the employment of his time for the past six weeks.

"That is no business of yours. I have my liberty."

Placquevent searched him to find out whether he had cartridges about him.

They were about to imprison him provisionally.

Bouvard interposed.

"No use," replied the mayor; "we know your opinions."

"Nevertheless — —"

"Ha! be careful; I give you warning. Be careful."

Bouvard persisted no further.

Gorju then turned towards Pécuchet: "And you, master, have you not a word to say for me?"

Pécuchet hung down his head, as if he had a suspicion against his innocence.

The poor wretch smiled bitterly.

"I protected you, all the same."

At daybreak, two gendarmes took him to Falaise.

He was not tried before a court-martial, but was sentenced by the civil tribunal to three months' imprisonment for the misdemeanour of language tending towards the destruction of society. From Falaise he wrote to his former employers to send him soon a certificate of good life and morals, and as their signature required to be legalised by the mayor or the deputy, they preferred to ask Marescot to do this little service for them.

They were introduced into a dining-room, decorated with dishes of fine old earthenware; a Boule clock occupied the narrowest shelf. On the mahogany table, without a cloth, were two napkins, a teapot and finger-glasses. Madame Marescot crossed the room in a dressing-gown of blue cashmere. She was a Parisian who was bored with the country. Then the notary came in, with his cap in one hand, a newspaper in the other; and at once, in the most polite fashion, he affixed his seal, although their protégé was a dangerous man.

"Really," said Bouvard, "for a few words — —"

"But words lead to crimes, my dear sir, give me leave to say."

"And yet," said Pécuchet, "what line of demarcation can you lay down between innocent and guilty phrases? The thing that just now is prohibited may be subsequently applauded." And he censured the harshness with which the insurgents had been treated.

Marescot naturally rested his case on the necessity of protecting society, the public safety — the supreme law.

"Pardon me!" said Pécuchet, "the right of a single individual is as much entitled to respect as those of all, and you have nothing to oppose to him but force if he turns your axiom upon yourself."

Instead of replying, Marescot lifted his brows disdainfully. Provided that he continued to draw up legal documents, and to live among his plates, in his comfortable little home, injustices of every kind might present themselves without affecting him. Business called him away. He excused himself.

His theory of public safety excited their indignation. The Conservatives now talked like Robespierre.

Another matter for astonishment: Cavaignac was flagging; the Garde Mobile was exposing itself to suspicion. Ledru-Rollin had ruined himself even in Vaucorbeil's estimation. The debates on the Constitution interested nobody, and on the 10th of December all the inhabitants of Chavignolles voted for Bonaparte. The six millions of votes made Pécuchet grow cold with regard to the people, and Bouvard and he proceeded to study the question of universal suffrage.

As it belongs to everybody, it cannot possess intelligence. One ambitious man will always be the leader; the others will follow him like a flock of sheep, the electors not being compelled even to know how to read. This was the reason, in Bouvard's opinion, that there were so many frauds at presidential elections.

"None," replied Bouvard; "I believe rather in the gullibility of the people. Think of all who buy the patent health-restorer, the Dupuytren pomatum, the Châtelaine's water, etc. Those boobies constitute the majority of the electorate, and we submit to their will. Why cannot an income of three thousand francs be made out of rabbits? Because the overcrowding of them is a cause of death. In the same way, through the mere fact of its being a multitude, the germs of stupidity contained in it are developed, and thence result consequences that are incalculable."

"Your scepticism frightens me," said Pécuchet.

At a later period, in the spring, they met M. de Faverges, who apprised them of the expedition to Rome. We should not attack the Italians, but we should require guaranties. Otherwise our influence would be destroyed. Nothing would be more legitimate than this intervention.

Bouvard opened his eyes wide. "On the subject of Poland, you expressed a contrary opinion."

"It is no longer the same thing." It was now a question of the Pope.

And M. de Faverges, when he said, "We wish," "We shall do," "We calculate clearly," represented a group.

Bouvard and Pécuchet were disgusted with the minority quite as much as with the majority. The common people, in short, were just the same as the aristocracy.

The right of intervention appeared dubious to them. They sought for its principles in Calvo, Martens, Vattel; and Bouvard's conclusion was this:

"There may be intervention to restore a prince to the throne, to emancipate a people, or, for the sake of precaution, in view of a public danger. In other cases it is an outrage on the rights of others, an abuse of force, a piece of hypocritical violence."

"And yet," said Pécuchet, "peoples have a solidarity as well as men."

"Perhaps so." And Bouvard sank into a reverie.

The expedition to Rome soon began.

At home, through hatred of revolutionary ideas, the leaders of the Parisian middle class got two printing-offices sacked. The great party of order was formed.

It had for its chiefs in the arrondissement the count, Foureau, Marescot, and the curé. Every day, about four o'clock, they walked from one end of the green to the other, and talked over the events of the day. The principal business was the distribution of pamphlets. The titles did not lack attractiveness: "God will be pleased with it"; "The sharing"; "Let us get out of the mess"; "Where are we going?" The finest things among them were the dialogues in the style of villagers, with oaths and bad French, to elevate the mental faculties of the peasants. By a new law, the hawking of pamphlets would be in the hands of the prefects; and they had just crammed Proudhon into St. Pélagie — gigantic triumph!

The trees of liberty were generally torn down. Chavignolles obeyed orders. Bouvard saw with his own eyes the fragments of his poplar on a wheelbarrow. They helped to warm the gendarmes, and the stump was offered to the curé, who had blessed it. What a mockery!

The schoolmaster did not hide his way of thinking.

Bouvard and Pécuchet congratulated him on it one day as they were passing in front of his door. Next day he presented himself at their residence.

At the end of the week they returned his visit.

The day was declining. The brats had just gone home, and the schoolmaster, in half-sleeves, was sweeping the yard. His wife, with a neckerchief tied round her head, was suckling a baby. A little girl was hiding herself behind her petticoat; a hideous-looking child was playing on the ground at her feet. The water from the washing she had been doing in the kitchen was flowing to the lower end of the house.

"You see," said the schoolmaster, "how the government treats us."

And forthwith he began finding fault with capital as an infamous thing. It was necessary to democratise it, to enfranchise matter.

"I ask for nothing better," said Pécuchet.

At least, they ought to have recognised the right to assistance.

"One more right!" said Bouvard.

No matter! The provisional government had acted in a flabby fashion by not ordaining fraternity.

"Then try to establish it."

As there was no longer daylight, Petit rudely ordered his wife to carry a candle to his study.

The lithograph portraits of the orators of the Left were fastened with pins to the plaster walls. A bookshelf stood above a deal writing-desk. There were a chair, stool, and an old soap-box for persons to sit down upon. He made a show of laughing. But want had laid its traces on his cheeks, and his narrow temples indicated the stubbornness of a ram, an intractable pride. He never would yield.

"Besides, see what sustains me!"

It was a pile of newspapers on a shelf, and in feverish phrases he explained the articles of his faith: disarmament of troops, abolition of the magistracy, equality of salaries, a levelling process by which the golden age was to be brought about under the form of the Republic, with a dictator at its head — a fellow that would carry this out for us briskly!

Then he reached for a bottle of aniseed cordial and three glasses, in order to propose the toast of the hero, the immortal victim, the great Maximilian.

On the threshold appeared the black cassock of the priest. Having saluted those present in an animated fashion, he addressed the schoolmaster, speaking almost in a whisper:

"Our business about St. Joseph, what stage is it at?"

"They have given nothing," replied the schoolmaster.

"That is your fault!"

"I have done what I could."

"Ha! really?"

Bouvard and Pécuchet discreetly rose. Petit made them sit down again, and addressing the curé:

"Is that all?"

The Abbé Jeufroy hesitated. Then, with a smile which tempered his reprimand:

"It is supposed that you are rather negligent about sacred history."

"Oh, sacred history!" interrupted Bouvard.

"What fault have you to find with it, sir?"

"I — none. Only there are perhaps more useful things to be learned than the anecdote of Jonas and the story of the kings of Israel."

"You are free to do as you please," replied the priest drily.

And without regard for the strangers, or on account of their presence:

"The catechism hour is too short."

Petit shrugged his shoulders.

"Mind! You will lose your boarders!"

The ten francs a month for these pupils formed the best part of his remuneration. But the cassock exasperated him.

"So much the worse; take your revenge!"

"A man of my character does not revenge himself," said the priest, without being moved. "Only I would remind you that the law of the fifteenth of March assigns us to the superintendence of primary education."

"Ah! I know that well," cried the schoolmaster. "It is given even to colonels of gendarmes. Why not to the rural guard? That would complete the thing!"

And he sank upon the stool, biting his fingers, repressing his rage, stifled by the feeling of his own powerlessness.

The priest touched him lightly on the shoulder.

"I did not intend to annoy you, my friend. Keep yourself quiet. Be a little reasonable. Here is Easter close at hand; I hope you will show an example by going to communion along with the others."

"That is too much! I — I submit to such absurdities!"

At this blasphemy the curé turned pale, his eyeballs gleamed, his jaw quivered.

"Silence, unhappy man! silence! And it is his wife who looks after the church linen!"

"Well, what then? What has she done to you?"

"She always stays away from mass. Like yourself, for that matter!"

"Oh! a schoolmaster is not sent away for a thing of that kind!"

"He can be removed."

The priest said no more.

He was at the end of the room, in the shadow.

Petit was thinking, with his head resting on his chest.

They would arrive at the other end of France, their last sou eaten up by the journey, and they would again find down there, under different names, the same curé, the same superintendent, the same prefect — all, even to the minister, were like links in a chain dragging him down. He had already had one warning — others would follow. After that? — and in a kind of hallucination he saw himself walking along a high-road, a bag on his back, those whom he loved by his side, and his hand held out towards a post-chaise.

At that moment his wife was seized with a fit of coughing in the kitchen, the new-born infant began to squeal, and the boy was crying.

"Poor children!" said the priest in a softened voice.

The father thereupon broke into sobs:

"Yes, yes! whatever you require!"

"I count upon it," replied the curé.

And, having made the customary bow:

"Well, good evening to you, gentlemen."

The schoolmaster remained with his face in his hands.

He pushed away Bouvard. "No! let me alone. I feel as if I'd like to die. I am an unfortunate man."

The two friends, when they reached their own house, congratulated themselves on their independence. The power of the clergy terrified them.

It was now employed for the purpose of strengthening public order. The Republic was about to disappear.

Three millions of electors found themselves excluded from universal suffrage. The security required from newspapers was raised; the press censorship was re-established. It was even suggested that it should be put in force against the fiction columns. Classical philosophy was considered dangerous. The commercial classes preached the dogma of material interests; and the populace seemed satisfied.

The country-people came back to their old masters.

M. de Faverges, who had estates in Eure, was declared a member of the Legislative Assembly, and his re-election for the general council of Calvados was certain beforehand.

He thought proper to invite the leading personages in the district to a luncheon.

The vestibule in which three servants were waiting to take their overcoats, the billiard-room and the pair of drawing-rooms, the plants in china vases, the bronzes on the mantel-shelves, the gold wands on the panelled walls, the heavy curtains, the wide armchairs — this display of luxury struck them at once as a mark of courtesy towards them; and, when they entered the dining-room, at the sight of the table laden with meats in silver dishes, together with the row of glasses before each plate, the side-dishes here and there, and a salmon in the middle, every face brightened up.

The party numbered seventeen, including two sturdy agriculturists, the sub-prefect of Bayeux and one person from Cherbourg. M. de Faverges begged his guests to excuse the countess, who was absent owing to a headache; and, after some commendations of the pears and grapes, which filled four baskets at the corners, he asked about the great news — the project of a descent on England by Changarnier.

Heurtaux desired it as a soldier, the curé through hatred of the Protestants, and Foureau in the interests of commerce.

"You are giving expression," said Pécuchet, "to the sentiments of the Middle Ages."

"The Middle Ages had their good side," returned Marescot. "For instance, our cathedrals."

"However, sir, the abuses — —"

"No matter — the Revolution would not have come."

"Ha! the Revolution — there's the misfortune," said the ecclesiastic with a sigh.

"But everyone contributed towards it, and (excuse me, Monsieur le Comte) the nobles themselves by their alliance with the philosophers."

"What is it you want? Louis XVIII. legalised spoliation. Since that time the parliamentary system is sapping the foundations."

A joint of roast beef made its appearance, and for some minutes nothing was heard save the sounds made by forks and moving jaws, and by the servants crossing the floor with the two words on their lips, which they repeated continually:

"Madeira! Sauterne!"

The conversation was resumed by the gentleman from Cherbourg:

"How were they to stop on the slope of an abyss?"

"Amongst the Athenians," said Marescot — "amongst the Athenians, towards whom we bear certain resemblances, Solon checkmated the democrats by raising the electoral census."

"It would be better," said Hurel, "to suppress the Chamber: every disorder comes from Paris."

"Let us decentralise," said the notary.

"On a large scale," added the count.

In Foureau's opinion, the communal authorities should have absolute control, even to the extent of prohibiting travellers from using their roads, if they thought fit.

And whilst the dishes followed one another — fowl with gravy, lobsters, mushrooms, salads, roast larks — many topics were handled: the best system of taxation, the advantages of the large system of land cultivation, the abolition of the death penalty. The sub-prefect did not forget to cite that charming witticism of a clever man: "Let Messieurs the Assassins begin!"

Bouvard was astonished at the contrast between the surroundings and the remarks that reached his ears; for one would think that the language used should always harmonise with the environment, and that lofty ceilings should be made for great thoughts. Nevertheless, he was flushed at dessert, and saw the fruit-dishes as if through a fog. Bordeaux, Burgundy, and Malaga were amongst the wines sent round. M. de Faverges, who knew the people he had to deal with, made the champagne flow. The guests, touching glasses, drank to his success at the election; and more than three hours elapsed before they passed out into the smoking-room, where coffee was served.

A caricature from Charivari was trailing on the floor between some copies of the Univers. It represented a citizen the skirts of whose frock-coat allowed a tail to be seen with an eye at the end of it. Marescot explained it amid much laughter.

They swallowed their liqueurs, and the ashes of their cigars fell on the paddings of the furniture.

The abbé, desirous to convince Girbal, began an attack on Voltaire. Coulon fell asleep. M. de Faverges avowed his devotion to Chambord.

"The bees furnish an argument for monarchy."

"But the ants for the Republic." However, the doctor adhered to it no longer.

"You are right," said the sub-prefect; "the form of government matters little."

"With liberty," suggested Pécuchet.

"An honest man has no need of it," replied Foureau. "I make no speeches, for my part. I am not a journalist. And I tell you that France requires to be governed with a rod of iron."

All called for a deliverer. As they were going out, Bouvard and Pécuchet heard M. de Faverges saying to the Abbé Jeufroy:

"We must re-establish obedience. Authority perishes if it be made the subject of discussion. The Divine Right — there is nothing but that!"

"Exactly, Monsieur le Comte."

The pale rays of an October sun were lengthening out behind the woods. A moist wind was blowing, and as they walked over the dead leaves they breathed like men who had just been set free.

All that they had not found the opportunity of saying escaped from them in exclamations:

"What idiots!"

"What baseness!"

"How is it possible to imagine such obstinacy!"

"In the first place, what is the meaning of the Divine Right?"

Dumouchel's friend, that professor who had supplied them with instruction on the subject of æsthetics, replied to their inquiries in a learned letter.

"The theory of Divine Right was formulated in the reign of Charles II. by the Englishman Filmer. Here it is:

"The Creator gave the first man dominion over the world. It was transmitted to his descendants, and the power of the king emanates from God.'

"'He is His image,' writes Bossuet. 'The paternal empire accustoms us to the domination of one alone. Kings have been made after the model of parents.'

"Locke refuted this doctrine: 'The paternal power is distinguished from the monarchic, every subject having the same right over his children that the monarch has over his own. Royalty exists only through the popular choice; and even the election was recalled at the ceremony of coronation, in which two bishops, pointing towards the king, asked both nobles and peasants whether they accepted him as such.'

"Therefore, authority comes from the people.

"'They have the right to do what they like,' says Helvetius; to 'change their constitution,' says Vattel; to 'revolt against injustice,' according to the contention of Glafey, Hotman, Mably, and others; and St. Thomas Aquinas authorises them to 'deliver themselves from a tyrant.' 'They are even,' says Jurieu, 'dispensed from being right.'"

Astonished at the axiom, they took up Rousseau's Contrat Social. Pécuchet went through to the end. Then closing his eyes, and throwing back his head, he made an analysis of it.

"A convention is assumed whereby the individual gives up his liberty.

"The people at the same time undertook to protect him against the inequalities of nature, and made him owner of the things he had in his possession."

"Where is the proof of the contract?"

"Nowhere! And the community does not offer any guaranty. The citizens occupy themselves exclusively with politics. But as callings are necessary, Rousseau is in favour of slavery. 'The sciences have destroyed the human race. The theatre is corrupting, money fatal, and the state ought to impose a religion under the penalty of death.'"

"What!" said they, "here is the pontiff of democracy."

All the champions of reform had copied him; and they procured the Examen du Socialisme, by Morant.

The first chapter explained the doctrine of Saint-Simon.

At the top the Father, at the same time Pope and Emperor.

Abolition of inheritance; all property movable and immovable forming a social fund, which should be worked on a hierarchical basis. The manufacturers are to govern the public fortune. But there is nothing to be afraid of; they will have as a leader the "one who loves the most."

One thing is lacking: woman. On the advent of woman depends the salvation of the world.

"I do not understand."

"Nor I."

And they turned to Fourierism:

"All misfortunes come from constraint. Let the attraction be free, and harmony will be established.

"In our souls are shut up a dozen leading passions: five egoistical, four animistic, and three distributive. The first class have reference to individuals, the second to groups, the last to groups of groups, or series, of which the whole forms a phalanx, a society of eighteen hundred persons dwelling in a palace. Every morning carriages convey the workers into the country, and bring them back in the evening.

Standards are carried, festivities are held, cakes are eaten. Every woman, if she desires it, can have three men — the husband, the lover, and the procreator. For celibates, the Bayadère system is established — —"

"That fits me!" said Bouvard. And he lost himself in dreams of the harmonious world.

"By the restoration of climates, the earth will become more beautiful; by the crossing of races, human life will become longer. The clouds will be guided as the thunderbolt is now: it will rain at night in the cities so that they will be clean. Ships will cross the polar seas, thawed beneath the Aurora Borealis. For everything is produced by the conjunction of two fluids, male and female, gushing out from the poles, and the northern lights are a symptom of the blending of the planets — a prolific emission."

"This is beyond me!" said Pécuchet.

After Saint-Simon and Fourier the problem resolves itself into questions of wages.

Louis Blanc, in the interests of the working class, wishes to abolish external commerce; Lafarelle to tax machinery; another to take off the drink duties, to restore trade wardenships, or to distribute soups.

Proudhon conceives the idea of a uniform tariff, and claims for the state the monopoly of sugar.

"These socialists," said Bouvard, "always call for tyranny."

"Oh, no!"

"Yes, indeed!"

"You are absurd!"

"Well, I am shocked at you!"

They sent for the works of which they had only summaries. Bouvard noted a number of passages, and, pointing them out, said:

"Read for yourself. They offer as examples to us the Essenes, the Moravian Brethren, the Jesuits of Paraguay, and even the government of prisons."

"Amongst the Icarians breakfast was over in twenty minutes; women were delivered at the hospitals. As for books, it was forbidden to print them without the authorisation of the Republic."

"But Cabet is an idiot."

"Here, now, we have from Saint-Simon: 'The publicists should submit their works to a committee of manufacturers.'

"And from Pierre Leroux: 'The law will compel the citizens to listen to an orator.'

"And from Auguste Comte: 'The priests will educate the youth, will exercise supervision over literary works, and will reserve to themselves the power of regulating procreation.'"

These quotations troubled Pécuchet. In the evening, at dinner, he replied:

"I admit that there are absurdities in the works of the inventors of Utopias; nevertheless they deserve our sympathy. The hideousness of the world tormented them, and, in order to make it beautiful, they endured everything. Recall to mind More decapitated, Campanella put seven times to the torture, Buonarrotti with a chain round his neck, Saint-Simon dying of want; many others. They might have lived in peace; but no! they marched on their way with their heads towards the sky, like heroes."

"Do you believe," said Bouvard, "that the world will change, thanks to the theories of some particular gentleman?"

"What does it matter?" said Pécuchet; "it is time to cease stagnating in selfishness. Let us look out for the best system."

"Then you expect to find it?"

"Certainly."

"You?"

And, in the fit of laughter with which Bouvard was seized, his shoulders and stomach kept shaking in harmony. Redder than the jams before them, with his napkin under his armpits, he kept repeating, "Ha! ha! ha!" in an irritating fashion.

Pécuchet left the room, slamming the door after him.

Germaine went all over the house to call him, and he was found at the end of his own apartment in an easy chair, without fire or candle, his cap drawn over his eyes. He was not unwell, but had given himself up to his own broodings.

When the quarrel was over they recognised that a foundation was needed for their studies — political economy.

They inquired into supply and demand, capital and rent, importation and prohibition.

One night Pécuchet was awakened by the creaking of a boot in the corridor. The evening before, according to custom, he had himself drawn all the bolts; and he called out to Bouvard, who was fast asleep.

They remained motionless under the coverlets. The noise was not repeated.

The servants, on being questioned, said they had heard nothing.

But, while walking through the garden, they remarked in the middle of a flower-bed, near the gateway, the imprint of a boot-sole, and two of the sticks used as supports for the trees were broken. Evidently some one had climbed over.

It was necessary to give notice of it to the rural guard.

As he was not at the municipal building, Pécuchet thought of going to the grocer's shop.

Who should they see in the back shop, beside Placquevent, in the midst of the toppers, but Gorju — Gorju, rigged out like a well-to-do citizen, entertaining the company!

This meeting was taken as a matter of course.

So on they lapsed into a discussion about progress.

Bouvard had no doubt it existed in the domain of science. But in that of literature it was not so manifest; and if comfort increases, the poetic side of life disappears.

Pécuchet, in order to bring home conviction on the point, took a piece of paper: "I trace across here an undulating line. Those who happen to travel over it, whenever it sinks, can no longer see the horizon. It rises again nevertheless, and, in spite of its windings, they reach the top. This is an image of progress."

Madame Bordin entered at this point.

It was the 3rd of December, 1851. She had the newspaper in her hand.

They read very quickly, side by side, the news of the appeal to the people, the dissolution of the Chamber, and the imprisonment of the deputies.

Pécuchet turned pale. Bouvard gazed at the widow.

"What! have you nothing to say?"

"What do you wish me to do here?" (They had forgotten to offer her a seat.) "I came here simply out of courtesy towards you, and you are scarcely civil to-day."

And out she went, disgusted at their want of politeness.

The astonishing news had struck them dumb. Then they went about the village venting their indignation.

Marescot, whom they found surrounded by a pile of deeds, took a different view. The babbling of the Chamber was at an end, thank Heaven! Henceforth they would have a business policy.

Beljambe knew nothing about the occurrences, and, furthermore, he laughed at them.

In the market-place they stopped Vaucorbeil.

The physician had got over all that. "You are very foolish to bother yourselves."

Foureau passed them by, remarking with a sly air, "The democrats are swamped."

And the captain, with Girbal's arm in his, exclaimed from a distance, "Long live the Emperor!"

But Petit would be sure to understand them, and Bouvard having tapped at a window-pane, the schoolmaster quitted his class.

He thought it a good joke to have Thiers in prison. This would avenge the people.

"Ha! ha! my gentlemen deputies, your turn now!"

The volley of musketry on the boulevards met with the approval of the people of Chavignolles. No mercy for the vanquished, no pity for the victims! Once you revolt, you are a scoundrel!

"Let us be grateful to Providence," said the curé, "and under Providence to Louis Bonaparte. He gathers around him the most distinguished men. The Count de Faverges will be made a senator."

Next day they had a visit from Placquevent.

"These gentlemen" had talked a great deal. He required a promise from them to hold their tongues.

"Do you wish to know my opinion?" said Pécuchet. "Since the middle class is ferocious and the working-men jealous-minded, whilst the people, after all, accept every tyrant, so long as they are allowed to keep their snouts in the mess, Napoleon has done right. Let him gag them, the rabble, and exterminate them — this will never be too much for their hatred of right, their cowardice, their incapacity, and their blindness."

Bouvard mused: "Hey! progress! what humbug!" He added: "And politics, a nice heap of dirt!"

"It is not a science," returned Pécuchet. "The military art is better: you can tell what will happen — we ought to turn our hands to it."

"Oh, thanks," was Bouvard's answer. "I am disgusted with everything. Better for us to sell our barrack, and go in the name of God's thunder amongst the savages."

"Just as you like."

Mélie was drawing water out in the yard.

The wooden pump had a long lever. In order to make it work, she bent her back, so that her blue stockings could be seen as high as the calf of her legs. Then, with a rapid movement, she raised her right arm, while she turned her head a little to one side; and Pécuchet, as he gazed at her, felt quite a new sensation, a charm, a thrill of intense delight.

CHAPTER VII.

"Unlucky in Love."

And now the days began to be sad. They studied no longer, fearing lest they might be disillusioned. The inhabitants of Chavignolles avoided them. The newspapers they tolerated gave them no information; and so their solitude was unbroken, their time completely unoccupied.

Sometimes they would open a book, and then shut it again — what was the use of it? On other days they would be seized with the idea of cleaning up the garden: at the end of a quarter of an hour they would be fatigued; or they would set out to have a look at the farm, and come back disenchanted; or they tried to interest themselves in household affairs, with the result of making Germaine break out into lamentations. They gave it up.

Bouvard wanted to draw up a catalogue for the museum, and declared their curios stupid.

Pécuchet borrowed Langlois' duck-gun to shoot larks with; the weapon burst at the first shot, and was near killing him.

Then they lived in the midst of that rural solitude so depressing when the grey sky covers in its monotony a heart without hope. The step of a man in wooden shoes is heard as he steals along by the wall, or perchance it is the rain dripping from the roof to the ground. From time to time a dead leaf just grazes one of the windows, then whirls about and flies away. The indistinct echoes of some funeral bell are borne to the ear by the wind. From a corner of the stable comes the lowing of a cow. They yawned in each other's faces, consulted the almanac, looked at the clock, waited for meal-time; and the horizon was ever the same — fields in front, the church to the right, a screen of poplars to the left, their tops swaying incessantly in the hazy atmosphere with a melancholy air.

Habits which they formerly tolerated now gave them annoyance. Pécuchet became quite a bore from his mania for putting his handkerchief on the tablecloth. Bouvard never gave up his pipe, and would keep twisting himself about while he was talking. They started disputes about the dishes, or about the quality of the butter; and while they were chatting face to face each was thinking of different things.

A certain occurrence had upset Pécuchet's mind.

Two days after the riot at Chavignolles, while he was airing his political grievance, he had reached a road covered with tufted elms, and heard behind his back a voice exclaiming, "Stop!"

It was Madame Castillon. She was rushing across from the opposite side without perceiving him.

A man who was walking along in front of her turned round. It was Gorju; and they met some six feet away from Pécuchet, the row of trees separating them from him.

"Is it true," said she, "you are going to fight?"

Pécuchet slipped behind the ditch to listen.

"Well, yes," replied Gorju; "I am going to fight. What has that to do with you?"

"He asks me such a question!" cried she, flinging her arms about him. "But, if you are killed, my love! Oh! remain!"

And her blue eyes appealed to him, still more than her words.

"Let me alone. I have to go."

There was an angry sneer on her face.

"The other has permitted it, eh?"

"Don't speak of her."

He raised his fist.

"No, dear; no. I don't say anything." And big tears trickled down her cheeks as far as the frilling of her collarette.

It was midday. The sun shone down upon the fields covered with yellow grain. Far in the distance carriage-wheels softly slipped along the road. There was a torpor in the air — not a bird's cry, not an insect's hum. Gorju cut himself a switch and scraped off the bark.

Madame Castillon did not raise her head again. She, poor woman, was thinking of her vain sacrifices for him, the debts she had paid for him, her future liabilities, and her lost reputation. Instead of complaining, she recalled for him the first days of their love, when she used to go every night to meet him in the barn, so that her husband on one occasion, fancying it was a thief, fired a pistol-shot through the window. The bullet was in the wall still. "From the moment I first knew you, you seemed to me as handsome as a prince. I love your eyes, your voice, your walk, your smell," and in a lower tone she added: "and as for your person, I am fairly crazy about it."

He listened with a smile of gratified vanity.

She clasped him with both hands round the waist, her head bent as if in adoration.

"My dear heart! my dear love! my soul! my life! Come! speak! What is it you want? Is it money? We'll get it. I was in the wrong. I annoyed you. Forgive me; and order clothes from the tailor, drink champagne — enjoy yourself. I will allow everything — everything."

She murmured with a supreme effort, "Even her — as long as you come back to me."

He just touched her lips with his, drawing one arm around her to prevent her from falling; and she kept murmuring, "Dear heart! dear love! how handsome you are! My God! how handsome you are!"

Pécuchet, without moving an inch, his chin just touching the top of the ditch, stared at them in breathless astonishment.

"Come, no swooning," said Gorju. "You'll only have me missing the coach. A glorious bit of devilment is getting ready, and I'm in the swim; so just give me ten sous to stand the conductor a drink."

She took five francs out of her purse. "You will soon give them back to me. Have a little patience. He has been a good while paralysed. Think of that! And, if you liked, we could go to the chapel of Croix-Janval, and there, my love, I would swear before the Blessed Virgin to marry you as soon as he is dead."

"Ah! he'll never die — that husband of yours."

Gorju had turned on his heel. She caught hold of him again, and clinging to his shoulders:

"Let me go with you. I will be your servant. You want some one. But don't go away! don't leave me! Death rather! Kill me!"

She crawled towards him on her knees, trying to seize his hands in order to kiss them. Her cap fell off, then her comb, and her hair got dishevelled. It was turning white around her ears, and, as she looked up at him, sobbing bitterly, with red eyes and swollen lips, he got quite exasperated, and pushed her back.

"Be off, old woman! Good evening."

When she had got up, she tore off the gold cross that hung round her neck, and flinging it at him, cried:

"There, you ruffian!"

Gorju went off, lashing the leaves of the trees with his switch.

Madame Castillon ceased weeping. With fallen jaw and tear-dimmed eyes she stood motionless, petrified with despair; no longer a being, but a thing in ruins.

What he had just chanced upon was for Pécuchet like the discovery of a new world — a world in which there were dazzling splendours, wild blossomings, oceans, tempests, treasures, and abysses of infinite depth. There was something about it that excited terror; but what of that? He dreamed of love, desired to feel it as she felt it, to inspire it as he inspired it.

However, he execrated Gorju, and could hardly keep from giving information about him at the guard-house.

Pécuchet was mortified by the slim waist, the regular curls, and the smooth beard of Madame Castillon's lover, as well as by the air of a conquering hero which the fellow assumed, while his own hair was pasted to his skull like a soaked wig, his torso wrapped in a greatcoat resembled a bolster, two of his front teeth were out, and his physiognomy had a harsh expression. He thought that Heaven had dealt unkindly with him, and felt that he was one of the disinherited; moreover, his friend no longer cared for him.

Bouvard deserted him every evening. Since his wife was dead, there was nothing to prevent him from taking another, who, by this time, might be coddling him up and looking after his house. And now he was getting too old to think of it.

But Bouvard examined himself in the glass. His cheeks had kept their colour; his hair curled just the same as of yore; not a tooth was loose; and, at the idea that he had still the power to please, he felt a return of youthfulness. Madame Bordin rose in his memory. She had made advances to him, first on the occasion of the burning of the stacks, next at the dinner which they gave, then in the museum at the recital, and lastly, without resenting any want of attention on his part, she had called three Sundays in succession. He paid her a return visit, and repeated it, making up his mind to woo and win her.

Since the day when Pécuchet had watched the little servant-maid drawing water, he had frequently talked to her, and whether she was sweeping the corridor or spreading out the linen, or taking up the saucepans, he could never grow tired of looking at her — surprised himself at his emotions, as in the days of adolescence. He had fevers and languors on account of her, and he was stung by the picture left in his memory of Madame Castillon straining Gorju to her breast.

He was about to clasp her in his arms

He questioned Bouvard as to the way libertines set about seducing women.

"They make them presents; they bring them to restaurants for supper."

"Very good. But after that?"

"Some of them pretend to faint, in order that you may carry them over to a sofa; others let their handkerchiefs fall on the ground. The best of them plainly make an appointment with you." And Bouvard launched forth into descriptions which inflamed Pécuchet's imagination, like engravings of voluptuous scenes.

"The first rule is not to believe what they say. I have known those who, under the appearance of saints, were regular Messalinas. Above all, you must be bold."

But boldness cannot be had to order.

From day to day Pécuchet put off his determination, and besides he was intimidated by the presence of Germaine.

Hoping that she would ask to have her wages paid, he exacted additional work from her, took notice every time she got tipsy, referred in a loud voice to her want of cleanliness, her quarrelsomeness, and did it all so effectively that she had to go.

Then Pécuchet was free! With what impatience he waited for Bouvard to go out! What a throbbing of the heart he felt as soon as the door closed!

Mélie was working at a round table near the window by the light of a candle; from time to time she broke the threads with her teeth, then she half-closed her eyes while adjusting it in the slit of the needle. At first he asked her what kind of men she liked. Was it, for instance, Bouvard's style?

"Oh, no." She preferred thin men.

He ventured to ask her if she ever had had any lovers.

"Never."

Then, drawing closer to her, he surveyed her piquant nose, her small mouth, her charmingly-rounded figure. He paid her some compliments, and exhorted her to prudence.

In bending over her he got a glimpse, under her corsage, of her white skin, from which emanated a warm odour that made his cheeks tingle. One evening he touched with his lips the wanton hairs at the back of her neck, and he felt shaken even to the marrow of his bones. Another time he kissed her on the chin, and had to restrain himself from putting his teeth in her flesh, so savoury was it. She returned his kiss. The apartment whirled round; he no longer saw anything.

He made her a present of a pair of lady's boots, and often treated her to a glass of aniseed cordial.

To save her trouble he rose early, chopped up the wood, lighted the fire, and was so attentive as to clean Bouvard's shoes.

Mélie did not faint or let her handkerchief fall, and Pécuchet did not know what to do, his passion increasing through the fear of satisfying it.

Bouvard was assiduously paying his addresses to Madame Bordin. She used to receive him rather cramped in her gown of shot silk, which creaked like a horse's harness, all the while fingering her long gold chain to keep herself in countenance.

Their conversations turned on the people of Chavignolles or on "the dear departed," who had been an usher at Livarot.

Then she inquired about Bouvard's past, curious to know something of his "youthful freaks," the way in which he had fallen heir to his fortune, and the interests by which he was bound to Pécuchet.

He admired the appearance of her house, and when he came to dinner there was struck by the neatness with which it was served and the excellent fare placed on the table. A succession of dishes of the most savoury description, which intermingled at regular intervals with a bottle of old Pomard, brought them to the dessert, at which they remained a long time sipping their coffee; and, with dilating nostrils, Madame Bordin dipped into her saucer her thick lip, lightly shaded with a black down.

One day she appeared in a low dress. Her shoulders fascinated Bouvard. As he sat in a little chair before her, he began to pass his hands along her arms. The widow seemed offended. He did not repeat this attention, but he pictured to himself those ample curves, so marvellously smooth and fine.

Any evening when he felt dissatisfied with Mélie's cooking, it gave him pleasure to enter Madame Bordin's drawing-room. It was there he should have lived.

The globe of the lamp, covered with a red shade, shed a tranquil light. She was seated close to the fire, and his foot touched the hem of her skirt.

After a few opening words the conversation flagged.

However, she kept gazing at him, with half-closed lids, in a languid fashion, but unbending withal.

Bouvard could not stand it any longer, and, sinking on his knees to the floor, he stammered:

"I love you! Marry me!"

Madame Bordin drew a strong breath; then, with an ingenuous air, said he was jesting; no doubt he was trying to have a laugh at her expense — it was not fair. This declaration stunned her.

Bouvard returned that she did not require anyone's consent. "What's to hinder you? Is it the trousseau? Our linen has the same mark, a B — we'll unite our capital letters!"

The idea caught her fancy. But a more important matter prevented her from arriving at a decision before the end of the month. And Bouvard groaned.

She had the politeness to accompany him to the gate, escorted by Marianne, who carried a lantern.

The two friends kept their love affairs hidden from each other.

Pécuchet counted on always cloaking his intrigue with the servant-maid. If Bouvard made any opposition to it, he could carry her off to other places, even though it were to Algeria, where living is not so dear. But he rarely indulged in such speculations, full as he was of his passion, without thinking of the consequences.

Bouvard conceived the idea of converting the museum into the bridal chamber, unless Pécuchet objected, in which case he might take up his residence at his wife's house.

One afternoon in the following week — it was in her garden; the buds were just opening, and between the clouds there were great blue spaces — she stopped to gather some violets, and said as she offered them to him:

"Salute Madame Bouvard!"

"What! Is it true?"

"Perfectly true."

He was about to clasp her in his arms. She kept him back. "What a man!" Then, growing serious, she warned him that she would shortly be asking him for a favour.

"'Tis granted."

They fixed the following Thursday for the formality of signing the marriage contract.

Nobody should know anything about it up to the last moment.

"Agreed."

And off he went, looking up towards the sky, nimble as a roebuck.

Pécuchet on the morning of the same day said in his own mind that he would die if he did not obtain the favours of his little maid, and he followed her into the cellar, hoping the darkness would give him courage.

She tried to go away several times, but he detained her in order to count the bottles, to choose laths, or to look into the bottoms of casks — and this occupied a considerable time.

She stood facing him under the light that penetrated through an air-hole, with her eyes cast down, and the corner of her mouth slightly raised.

"Do you love me?" said Pécuchet abruptly.

"Yes, I do love you."

"Well, then prove it to me."

And throwing his left arm around her, he embraced her with ardour.

"You're going to do me some harm."

"No, my little angel. Don't be afraid."

"If Monsieur Bouvard — —"

"I'll tell him nothing. Make your mind easy."

There was a heap of faggots behind them. She sank upon them, and hid her face under one arm; — and another man would have understood that she was no novice.

Bouvard arrived soon for dinner.

The meal passed in silence, each of them being afraid of betraying himself, while Mélie attended them with her usual impassiveness.

Pécuchet turned away his eyes to avoid hers; and Bouvard, his gaze resting on the walls, pondered meanwhile on his projected improvements.

Eight days after he came back in a towering rage.

"The damned traitress!"

"Who, pray?"

"Madame Bordin."

And he related how he had been so infatuated as to offer to make her his wife, but all had come to an end a quarter of an hour since at Marescot's office. She wished to have for her marriage portion the Ecalles meadow, which he could not dispose of, having partly retained it, like the farm, with the money of another person.

"Exactly," said Pécuchet.

"I had had the folly to promise her any favour she asked — and this was what she was after! I attribute her obstinacy to this; for if she loved me she would have given way to me."

The widow, on the contrary, had attacked him in insulting language, and referred disparagingly to his physique, his big paunch.

"My paunch! Just imagine for a moment!"

Meanwhile Pécuchet had risen several times, and seemed to be in pain.

Bouvard asked him what was the matter, and thereupon Pécuchet, having first taken the precaution to shut the door, explained in a hesitating manner that he was affected with a certain disease.

"What! You?"

"I — myself."

"Oh, my poor fellow! And who is the cause of this?"

Pécuchet became redder than before, and said in a still lower tone:

"It can be only Mélie."

Bouvard remained stupefied.

The first thing to do was to send the young woman away.

She protested with an air of candour.

Pécuchet's case was, however, serious; but he was ashamed to consult a physician.

Bouvard thought of applying to Barberou.

They gave him particulars about the matter, in order that he might communicate with a doctor who would deal with the case by correspondence.

Barberou set to work with zeal, believing it was Bouvard's own case, and calling him an old dotard, even though he congratulated him about it.

"At my age!" said Pécuchet. "Is it not a melancholy thing? But why did she do this?"

"You pleased her."

"She ought to have given me warning."

"Does passion reason?" And Bouvard renewed his complaints about Madame Bordin.

Often had he surprised her before the Ecalles, in Marescot's company, having a gossip with Germaine. So many manœuvres for a little bit of land!

"She is avaricious! That's the explanation."

So they ruminated over their disappointments by the fireside in the breakfast parlour, Pécuchet swallowing his medicines and Bouvard puffing at his pipe; and they began a discussion about women.

"Strange want! — or is it a want?" "They drive men to crime — to heroism as well as to brutishness." "Hell under a petticoat," "paradise in a kiss," "the turtle's warbling," "the serpent's windings," "the cat's claws," "the sea's treachery," "the moon's changeableness." They repeated all the commonplaces that have been uttered about the sex.

It was the desire for women that had suspended their friendship. A feeling of remorse took possession of them. "No more women. Is not that so? Let us live without them!" And they embraced each other tenderly.

There should be a reaction; and Bouvard, when Pécuchet was better, considered that a course of hydropathic treatment would be beneficial.

Germaine, who had come back since the other servant's departure, carried the bathing-tub each morning into the corridor.

The two worthies, naked as savages, poured over themselves big buckets of water; they then rushed back to their rooms. They were seen through the garden fence, and people were scandalised.

CHAPTER VIII.

New Diversions.

Satisfied with their regimen, they desired to improve their constitutions by gymnastics; and taking up the Manual of Amoros, they went through its atlas. All those young lads squatting, lying back, standing, bending their legs, lifting weights, riding on beams, climbing ladders, cutting capers on trapezes — such a display of strength and agility excited their envy.

However, they were saddened by the splendour of the gymnasium described in the preface; for they would never be able to get a vestibule for the equipages, a hippodrome for the races, a sweep of water for the swimming, or a "mountain of glory" — an artificial hillock over one hundred feet in height.

A wooden vaulting-horse with the stuffing would have been expensive: they abandoned the idea. The linden tree, thrown down in the garden, might have been used as a horizontal pole; and, when they were skilful enough to go over it from one end to the other, in order to have a vertical one, they set up a beam of counter-espaliers. Pécuchet clambered to the top; Bouvard slipped off, always fell back, finally gave it up.

The "orthosomatic sticks" pleased him better; that is to say, two broomsticks bound by two cords, the first of which passes under the armpits, and the second over the wrists; and for hours he would remain in this apparatus, with his chin raised, his chest extended, and his elbows close to his sides.

For want of dumbbells, the wheelwright turned out four pieces of ash resembling sugar-loaves with necks of bottles at the ends. These should be carried to the right and to the left, to the front and to the back; but being too heavy they fell out of their hands, at the risk of bruising their legs. No matter! They set their hearts on Persian clubs, and even fearing lest they might break, they rubbed them every evening with wax and a piece of cloth.

Then they looked out for ditches. When they found one suitable for their purpose, they rested a long pole in the centre, sprang forward on the left foot, reached the opposite side, and then repeated the performance. The country being flat, they could be seen at a distance; and the villagers asked one another what were these extraordinary things skipping towards the horizon.

When autumn arrived they went in for chamber gymnastics, which completely bored them. Why had they not the indoor apparatus or post-armchair invented in Louis XIV.'s time by the Abbé of St. Pierre? How was it made? Where could they get the information?

Dumouchel did not deign to answer their letter on the subject.

Then they erected in the bakehouse a brachial weighing-machine. Over two pulleys attached to the ceiling a rope was passed, holding a crossbeam at each end. As soon as they had caught hold of it one pushed against the ground with his toes, while the other lowered his arms to a level with the floor; the first by his weight would draw towards him the second, who, slackening his rope a little, would ascend in his turn. In less than five minutes their limbs were dripping with perspiration.

In order to follow the prescriptions of the Manual, they tried to make themselves ambidextrous, even to the extent of depriving themselves for a time of the use of their right hands. They did more: Amoros points out certain snatches of verse which ought to be sung during the manœuvres, and Bouvard and Pécuchet, as they proceeded, kept repeating the hymn No. 9: "A king, a just king is a blessing on earth."

When they beat their breast-bones: "Friends, the crown and the glory," etc.

At the various steps of the race:

"Let us catch the beast that cowers! Soon the swift stag shall be ours! Yes! the race shall soon be won, Come, run! come, run! come, run!"

And, panting more than hounds, they cheered each other on with the sounds of their voices.

One side of gymnastics excited their enthusiasm — its employment as a means of saving life. But they would have required children in order to learn how to carry them in sacks, and they begged the schoolmaster to furnish them with some. Petit objected that their families would be annoyed at it. They fell back on the succour of the wounded. One pretended to have swooned: the other rolled him away in a wheelbarrow with the utmost precaution.

As for military escalades, the author extols the ladder of Bois-Rosé, so called from the captain who surprised Fécamp in former days by climbing up the cliff.

In accordance with the engraving in the book, they trimmed a rope with little sticks and fixed it under the cart-shed. As soon as the first stick is bestridden and the third grasped, the limbs are thrown out in order that the second, which a moment before was against the chest, might be directly under the thighs. The climber then springs up and grasps the fourth, and so goes on.

In spite of prodigious strainings of the hips, they found it impossible to reach the second step. Perhaps there is less trouble in hanging on to stones with your hands, just as Bonaparte's soldiers did at the attack of Fort Chambray? and to make one capable of such an action, Amoros has a tower in his establishment.

The wall in ruins might do as a substitute for it. They attempted the assault with it. But Bouvard, having withdrawn his foot too quickly from a hole, got frightened, and was seized with dizziness.

Pécuchet blamed their method for it. They had neglected that which relates to the phalanxes, so that they should go back to first principles.

His exhortations were fruitless; and then, in his pride and presumption, he went in for stilts.

Nature seemed to have destined him for them, for he immediately made use of the great model with flat boards four feet from the ground, and, balanced thereon, he stalked over the garden like a gigantic stork taking exercise.

Bouvard, at the window, saw him stagger and then flop down all of a heap over the kidney-beans, whose props, giving way as he descended, broke his fall.

He was picked up covered with mould, his nostrils bleeding — livid; and he fancied that he had strained himself.

Decidedly, gymnastics did not agree with men of their age. They abandoned them, did not venture to move about any longer for fear of accidents, and they remained the whole day sitting in the museum dreaming of other occupations.

This change of habits had an influence on Bouvard's health. He became very heavy, puffed like a whale after his meals, tried to make himself thin, ate less, and began to grow weak.

Pécuchet, in like manner, felt himself "undermined," had itchings in his skin and lumps in his throat.

"This won't do," said they; "this won't do."

Bouvard thought of going to select at the inn some bottles of Spanish wine in order to put his bodily machinery in order.

As he was going out, Marescot's clerk and three men brought from Beljambe a large walnut table. "Monsieur" was much obliged to him for it. It had been conveyed in perfect order.

Bouvard in this way learned about the new fashion of table-turning. He joked about it with the clerk.

However, all over Europe, America, Australia and the Indies, millions of mortals passed their lives in making tables turn; and they discovered the way to make prophets of canaries, to give concerts without instruments, and to correspond by means of snails. The press, seriously offering these impostures to the public, increased its credulity.

The spirit-rappers had alighted at the château of Faverges, and thence had spread through the village; and the notary questioned them particularly.

Shocked at Bouvard's scepticism, he invited the two friends to an evening party at table-turning.

Was this a trap? Madame Bordin was to be there. Pécuchet went alone.

There were present as spectators the mayor, the tax-collector, the captain, other residents and their wives, Madame Vaucorbeil, Madame Bordin, of course, besides Mademoiselle Laverrière, Madame Marescot's former schoolmistress, a rather squint-eyed lady with her hair falling over her shoulders in the corkscrew fashion of 1830. In an armchair sat a cousin from Paris, attired in a blue coat and wearing an air of insolence.

The two bronze lamps, the whatnot containing a number of curiosities, ballads embellished with vignettes on the piano, and small water-colours in huge frames, had always excited astonishment in Chavignolles. But this evening all eyes were directed towards the mahogany table. They would test it by and by, and it had the importance of things which contain a mystery. A dozen guests took their places around it with outstretched hands and their little fingers touching one another. Only the ticking of the clock could be heard. The faces indicated profound attention. At the end of ten minutes several complained of tinglings in the arms.

Pécuchet was incommoded.

"You are pushing!" said the captain to Foureau.

"Not at all."

"Yes, you are!"

"Ah! sir."

The notary made them keep quiet.

By dint of straining their ears they thought they could distinguish cracklings of wood.

An illusion! Nothing had budged.

The other day when the Aubert and Lorraine families had come from Lisieux and they had expressly borrowed Beljambe's table for the occasion, everything had gone on so well. But this to-day exhibited a certain obstinacy. Why?

The carpet undoubtedly counteracted it, and they changed to the dining-room.

The round table, which was on rollers, glided towards the right-hand side. The operators, without displacing their fingers, followed its movements, and of its own accord it made two turns. They were astounded.

Then M. Alfred articulated in a loud voice:

"Spirit, how do you find my cousin?"

The table, slowly oscillating, struck nine raps. According to a slip of paper, in which the number of raps were translated by letters, this meant "Charming."

A number of voices exclaimed "Bravo!"

Then Marescot, to tease Madame Bordin, called on the spirit to declare her exact age.

The foot of the table came down with five taps.

"What? five years!" cried Girbal.

"The tens don't count," replied Foureau.

The widow smiled, though she was inwardly annoyed.

The replies to the other questions were missing, so complicated was the alphabet.

Much better was the plane table — an expeditious medium of which Mademoiselle Laverrière had made use for the purpose of noting down in an album the direct communications of Louis XII., Clémence Isaure, Franklin, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and others. These mechanical contrivances are sold in the Rue d'Aumale. M. Alfred promised one of them; then addressing the schoolmistress: "But for a quarter of an hour we should have a little music; don't you think so? A mazurka!"

Two metal chords vibrated. He took his cousin by the waist, disappeared with her, and came back again.

The sweep of her dress, which just brushed the doors as they passed, cooled their faces. She flung back her head; he curved his arms. The gracefulness of the one, the playful air of the other, excited general admiration; and, without waiting for the rout cakes, Pécuchet took himself off, amazed at the evening's exhibition.

In vain did he repeat: "But I have seen it! I have seen it!"

Bouvard denied the facts, but nevertheless consented to make an experiment himself.

For a fortnight they spent every afternoon facing each other, with their hands over a table, then over a hat, over a basket, and over plates. All these remained motionless.

The phenomenon of table-turning is none the less certain. The common herd attribute it to spirits; Faraday to prolonged nervous action; Chevreuil to unconscious efforts; or perhaps, as Segouin admits, there is evolved from the assembly of persons an impulse, a magnetic current.

This hypothesis made Pécuchet reflect. He took into his library the Magnetiser's Guide, by Montcabère, read it over attentively, and initiated Bouvard in the theory: All animated bodies receive and communicate the influence of the stars — a property analogous to the virtue of the loadstone. By directing this force we may cure the sick; there is the principle. Science has developed since Mesmer; but it is always an important thing to pour out the fluid and to make passes, which, in the first place, must have the effect of inducing sleep.

"Well! send me to sleep," said Bouvard.

"Impossible!" replied Pécuchet: "in order to be subject to the magnetic action, and to transmit it, faith is indispensable."

Then, gazing at Bouvard: "Ah! what a pity!"

"How?"

"Yes, if you wished, with a little practice, there would not be a magnetiser anywhere like you."

For he possessed everything that was needed: easiness of access, a robust constitution, and a solid mind.

The discovery just made of such a faculty in himself was flattering to Bouvard. He took a plunge into Montcabère's book on the sly.

Then, as Germaine used to feel buzzings in her ears that deafened her, he said to her one evening in a careless tone:

"Suppose we try magnetism?"

She did not make any objection to it. He sat down in front of her, took her two thumbs in his hands, and looked fixedly at her, as if he had not done anything else all his life.

The old dame, with her feet on a footwarmer, began by bending her neck; her eyes closed, and quite gently she began to snore. At the end of an hour, during which they had been staring at her, Pécuchet said in a low tone:

"What do you feel?"

She awoke.

Later, no doubt, would come lucidity.

This success emboldened them, and, resuming with self-confidence, the practice of medicine, they nursed Chamberlan, the beadle, for pains in his ribs; Migraine the mason, who had a nervous affection of the stomach; Mère Varin, whose encephaloid under the collar-bone required, in order to nourish her, plasters of meat; a gouty patient, Père Lemoine, who used to crawl by the side of taverns; a consumptive; a person afflicted with hemiplegia, and many others. They also treated corns and chilblains.

After an investigation into the disease, they cast questioning glances at each other to determine what passes to use, whether the currents should be large or small, ascending or descending, longitudinal, transversal, bidigital, tridigital, or even quindigital.

When the one had had too much of it, the other replaced him. Then, when they had come back to their own house, they noted down their observation in their diary of treatment.

Their suave manners captivated everyone. However, Bouvard was liked better, and his reputation spread as far as Falaise, where he had cured La Barbée, the daughter of Père Barbée, a retired captain of long standing.

She had felt something like a nail in the back of her head, spoke in a hoarse voice, often remained several days without eating, and then would devour plaster or coal. Her nervous crises, beginning with sobs, ended in floods of tears; and every kind of remedy, from diet-drinks to moxas, had been employed, so that, through sheer weariness, she accepted Bouvard's offer to cure her.

When he had dismissed the servant-maid and bolted the door, he began rubbing her abdomen, while leaning over the seat of the ovaries. A sense of relief manifested itself by sighs and yawns. He placed his finger between her eyebrows and the top of her nose: all at once she became inert. If one lifted her arms, they fell down again. Her head remained in whatever attitude he wished, and her lids, half closed, vibrating with a spasmodic movement, allowed her eyeballs to be seen rolling slowly about; they riveted themselves on the corners convulsively.

Bouvard asked her if she were in pain. She replied that she was not. Then he inquired what she felt now. She indicated the inside of her body.

"What do you see there?"

"A worm."

"What is necessary in order to kill it?"

She wrinkled her brow. "I am looking for — I am not able! I am not able!"

At the second sitting she prescribed for herself nettle-broth; at the third, catnip. The crises became mitigated, then disappeared. It was truly a miracle. The nasal addigitation did not succeed with the others, and, in order to bring on somnambulism, they projected the construction of a mesmeric tub. Pécuchet already had even collected the filings and cleaned a score of bottles, when a scruple made him hesitate.

Amongst the patients there would be persons of the other sex.

"And what are we to do if this should give rise to an outburst of erotic mania?"

This would not have proved any impediment to Bouvard; but for fear of impostures and attempts to extort hush-money, it was better to put aside the project. They contented themselves with a collection of musical glasses, which they carried about with them to the different houses, so as to delight the children.

One day, when Migraine was worse, they had recourse to the musical glasses. The crystalline sounds exasperated him; but Deleuze enjoins that one should not be frightened by complaints; and so they went on with the music.

"Enough! enough!" he cried.

"A little patience!" Bouvard kept repeating.

Pécuchet tapped more quickly on the glass plates, and the instrument was vibrating in the midst of the poor man's cries when the doctor appeared, attracted by the hubbub.

"What! you again?" he exclaimed, enraged at finding them always with his patients.

They explained their magnetic method of curing. Then he declaimed against magnetism — "a heap of juggleries, whose effects came only from the imagination."

However, animals are magnetised. Montcabère so states, and M. Fontaine succeeded in magnetising a lion. They had not a lion, but chance had offered them another animal.

For on the following day a ploughboy came to inform them that they were wanted up at the farm for a cow in a hopeless condition.

They hurried thither. The apple trees were in bloom, and the herbage in the farmyard was steaming under the rays of the rising sun.

At the side of a pond, half covered with a cloth, a cow was lowing, while she shivered under the pails of water that were being emptied over her body, and, enormously swollen, she looked like a hippopotamus.

Without doubt she had got "venom" while grazing amid the clover. Père Gouy and his wife were afflicted because the veterinary surgeon was not able to come, and the wheelwright who had a charm against swelling did not choose to put himself out of his way; but "these gentlemen, whose library was famous, must know the secret."

Having tucked up their sleeves, they placed themselves one in front of the horns, the other at the rump, and, with great internal efforts and frantic gesticulations, they spread wide their fingers in order to scatter streams of fluid over the animal, while the farmer, his wife, their son, and the neighbours regarded them almost with terror.

The rumblings which were heard in the cow's belly caused borborygms in the interior of her bowels. She emitted wind.

Pécuchet thereupon said: "This is an opening door for hope — an outlet, perhaps."

The outlet produced its effect: the hope gushed forth in a bundle of yellow stuff, bursting with the force of a shell. The hide got loose; the cow got rid of her swelling. An hour later there was no longer any sign of it.

This was certainly not the result of imagination. Therefore the fluid contained some special virtue. It lets itself be shut up in the objects to whom it is given without being impaired. Such an expedient saves displacements. They adopted it; and they sent their clients magnetised tokens, magnetised handkerchiefs, magnetised water, and magnetised bread.

Then, continuing their studies, they abandoned the passes for the system of Puységur, which replaces the magnetiser by means of an old tree, about the trunk of which a cord is rolled.

A pear tree in their fruit garden seemed made expressly for the purpose. They prepared it by vigorously encircling it with many pressures. A bench was placed underneath. Their clients sat in a row, and the results obtained there were so marvellous that, in order to get the better of Vaucorbeil, they invited him to a séance along with the leading personages of the locality.

Not one failed to attend. Germaine received them in the breakfast-room, making excuses on behalf of her masters, who would join them presently.

From time to time they heard the bell ringing. It was the patients whom she was bringing in by another way. The guests nudged one another, drawing attention to the windows covered with dust, the stains on the panels, the frayed pictures; and the garden, too, was in a wretched state. Dead wood everywhere! The orchard was barricaded with two sticks thrust into a gap in the wall.

Pécuchet made his appearance. "At your service, gentlemen."

And they saw at the end of the garden, under the Edouin pear tree, a number of persons seated.

Chamberlan, clean-shaven like a priest, in a short cassock of lasting, with a leathern cap, gave himself up to the shivering sensations engendered by the pains in his ribs. Migraine, whose stomach was always tormenting him, made wry faces close beside him. Mère Varin, to hide her tumour, wore a shawl with many folds. Père Lemoine, his feet stockingless in his old shoes, had his crutches under his knees; and La Barbée, who wore her Sunday clothes, looked exceedingly pale.

At the opposite side of the tree were other persons. A woman with an albino type of countenance was sponging the suppurating glands of her neck; a little girl's face half disappeared under her blue glasses; an old man, whose spine was deformed by a contraction, with his involuntary movements knocked against Marcel, a sort of idiot clad in a tattered blouse and a patched pair of trousers. His hare-lip, badly stitched, allowed his incisors to be seen, and his jaw, which was swollen by an enormous inflammation, was muffled up in linen.

They were all holding in their hands pieces of twine that hung down from the tree. The birds were singing, and the air was impregnated with the refreshing smell of grass. The sun played with the branches, and the ground was smooth as moss.

Meanwhile, instead of going to sleep, the subjects of the experiment were straining their eyes.

"Up to the present," said Foureau, "it is not funny. Begin. I am going away for a minute."

And he came back smoking an Abd-el-Kader, the last that was left from the gate with the pipes.

Pécuchet recalled to mind an admirable method of magnetising. He put into his mouth the noses of all the patients in succession, and inhaled their breath, in order to attract the electricity to himself; and at the same time Bouvard clasped the tree, with the object of augmenting the fluid.

The mason interrupted his hiccoughs; the beadle was agitated; the man with the contraction moved no more. It was possible now to approach them, and make them submit to all the tests.

The doctor, with his lancet, pricked Chamberlan's ear, which trembled a little. Sensibility in the case of the others was manifest. The gouty man uttered a cry. As for La Barbée, she smiled, as if in a dream, and a stream of blood trickled under her jaw.

Foureau, in order to make the experiment himself, would fain have seized the lancet, but the doctor having refused, he vigorously pinched the invalid.

The captain tickled her nostrils with a feather; the tax-collector plunged a pin under her skin.

"Let her alone now," said Vaucorbeil; "it is nothing astonishing, after all. Simply a hysterical female! The devil will have his pains for nothing."

"That one there," said Pécuchet, pointing towards Victoire, the scrofulous woman, "is a physician. She recognises diseases, and indicates the remedies."

Langlois burned to consult her about his catarrh; but Coulon, more courageous, asked her for something for his rheumatism.

She had assisted in an apothecary's shop at Bayeux. Vaucorbeil drew the inference that what she wanted to say was album Græcum a term which is to be found in pharmacy.

Then they accosted Père Lemoine, who, according to Bouvard, could see objects through opaque bodies. He was an ex-schoolmaster, who had sunk into debauchery. White hairs were scattered about his face, and, with his back against the tree and his palms open, he was sleeping in the broad sunlight in a majestic fashion.

The physician drew over his eyes a double neckcloth; and Bouvard, extending a newspaper towards him, said imperiously:

"Read!"

He lowered his brow, moved the muscles of his face, then threw back his head, and ended by spelling out:

"Cons-ti-tu-tion-al."

But with skill the muffler could be slipped off!

These denials by the physician roused Pécuchet's indignation. He even ventured to pretend that La Barbée could describe what was actually taking place in his own house.

"May be so," returned the doctor.

Then, taking out his watch:

"What is my wife occupying herself with?"

For a long time La Barbée hesitated; then with a sullen air:

"Hey! what? I am there! She is sewing ribbons on a straw hat."

Vaucorbeil snatched a leaf from his note-book and wrote a few lines on it, which Marescot's clerk hastened to deliver.

The séance was over. The patients went away.

Bouvard and Pécuchet, on the whole, had not succeeded. Was this due to the temperature, or to the smell of tobacco, or to the Abbé Jeufroy's umbrella, which had a lining of copper, a metal unfavourable to the emission of the fluid?

Vaucorbeil shrugged his shoulders. However, he could not deny the honesty of MM. Deleuze, Bertrand, Morin, Jules Cloquet. Now these masters lay down that somnambulists have predicted events, and submitted without pain to cruel operations.

The abbé related stories more astonishing. A missionary had seen Brahmins rushing, heads down, through a street; the Grand Lama of Thibet rips open his bowels in order to deliver oracles.

"Are you joking?" said the physician.

"By no means."

"Come, now, what tomfoolery that is!"

And the question being dropped, each of them furnished an anecdote.

"As for me," said the grocer, "I had a dog who was always sick when the month began on a Friday."

"We were fourteen children," observed the justice of the peace. "I was born on the 14th, my marriage took place on the 14th, and my saint's-day falls on the 14th. Explain this to me."

Beljambe had often reckoned in a dream the number of travellers he would have next day at his inn; and Petit told about the supper of Cazotte.

The curé then made this reflection:

"Why do we not see into it quite easily?"

"The demons — is that what you say?" asked Vaucorbeil.

Instead of again opening his lips, the abbé nodded his head.

Marescot spoke of the Pythia of Delphi.

"Beyond all question, miasmas."

"Oh! miasmas now!"

"As for me, I admit the existence of a fluid," remarked Bouvard.

"Nervoso-siderial," added Pécuchet.

"But prove it, show it, this fluid of yours! Besides, fluids are out of fashion. Listen to me."

Vaucorbeil moved further up to get into the shade. The others followed him.

"If you say to a child, 'I am a wolf; I am going to eat you,' he imagines that you are a wolf, and he is frightened. Therefore, this is a vision conjured up by words. In the same way the somnambulist accepts any fancies that you desire him to accept. He recollects instead of imagining, and has merely sensations when he believes that he is thinking. In this manner it is possible for crimes to be suggested, and virtuous people may see themselves ferocious beasts, and involuntarily become cannibals."

Glances were cast towards Bouvard and Pécuchet. Their scientific pursuits were fraught with dangers to society.

Marescot's clerk reappeared in the garden flourishing a letter from Madame Vaucorbeil.

The doctor tore it open, turned pale, and finally read these words:

"I am sewing ribbons on a straw hat."

Amazement prevented them from bursting into a laugh.

"A mere coincidence, deuce take it! It proves nothing."

And as the two magnetisers wore looks of triumph, he turned round at the door to say to them:

"Don't go further. These are risky amusements."

The curé, while leading away his beadle, reproved them sternly:

"Are you mad? Without my permission! Practices forbidden by the Church!"

They had all just taken their leave; Bouvard and Pécuchet were talking to the schoolmaster on the hillock, when Marcel rushed from the orchard, the bandage of his chin undone, and stuttered:

"Cured! cured! good gentlemen."

"All right! enough! Let us alone."

Petit, a man of advanced ideas, thought the doctor's explanation commonplace and unenlightened. Science is a monopoly in the hands of the rich. She excludes the people. To the old-fashioned analysis of the Middle Ages it is time that a large and ready-witted synthesis should succeed. Truth should be arrived at through the heart. And, declaring himself a spiritualist, he pointed out several works, no doubt imperfect, but the heralds of a new dawn.

They sent for them.

Spiritualism lays down as a dogma the fated amelioration of our species. Earth will one day become Heaven. And this is the reason why the doctrine fascinated the schoolmaster. Without being Catholic, it was known to St. Augustine and St. Louis. Allan Kardec even has published some fragments dictated by them which are in accordance with contemporary opinions. It is practical as well as benevolent, and reveals to us, like the telescope, the supernal worlds.

Spirits, after death and in a state of ecstasy, are transported thither. But sometimes they descend upon our globe, where they make furniture creak, mingle in our amusements, taste the beauties of Nature, and the pleasures of the arts.

Nevertheless, there are amongst us many who possess an astral trunk — that is to say, behind the ear a long tube which ascends from the hair to the planets, and permits us to converse with the spirits of Saturn. Intangible things are not less real, and from the earth to the stars, from the stars to the earth, a see-saw motion takes place, a transmission, a continual change of place.

Then Pécuchet's heart swelled with extravagant aspirations, and when night had come Bouvard surprised him at the window contemplating those luminous spaces which are peopled with spirits.

Swedenborg made rapid journeys to them. For in less than a year he explored Venus, Mars, Saturn, and, twenty-three times, Jupiter. Moreover, he saw Jesus Christ in London; he saw St. Paul; he saw St. John; he saw Moses; and in 1736 he saw the Last Judgment.

He has also given us descriptions of Heaven.

Flowers, palaces, market-places, and churches are found there, just as with us. The angels, who were formerly human beings, lay their thoughts upon leaves, chat about domestic affairs or else on spiritual matters; and the ecclesiastical posts are assigned to those who, in their earthly career, cultivated the Holy Scripture.

As for Hell, it is filled with a nauseous smell, with hovels, heaps of filth, quagmires, and ill-clad persons.

And Pécuchet racked his brain in order to comprehend what was beautiful in these revelations. To Bouvard they seemed the delirium of an imbecile. All such matters transcend the bounds of Nature. Who, however, can know anything about them? And they surrendered themselves to the following reflections:

Jugglers can cause illusions amongst a crowd; a man with violent passions can excite other people by them; but how can the will alone act upon inert matter? A Bavarian, it is said, was able to ripen grapes; M. Gervais revived a heliotrope; one with greater power scattered the clouds at Toulouse.

It is necessary to admit an intermediary substance between the universe and ourselves? The od, a new imponderable, a sort of electricity, is perhaps nothing else. Its emissions explain the light that those who have been magnetised believe they see: the wandering flames in cemeteries, the forms of phantoms.

These images would not, therefore, be illusions, and the extraordinary gifts of persons who are possessed, like those of clairvoyants, would have a physical cause.

Whatever be their origin, there is an essence, a secret and universal agent. If we could take possession of it, there would be no need of force, of duration. That which requires ages would develop in a minute; every miracle would be practicable, and the universe would be at our disposal.

Magic springs from this eternal yearning of the human mind. Its value has no doubt been exaggerated, but it is not a falsehood. Some Orientals who are skilled in it perform prodigies. All travellers have vouched for its existence, and at the Palais Royal M. Dupotet moves with his finger the magnetic needle.

How to become magicians? This idea appeared to them foolish at first, but it returned, tormented them, and they yielded to it, even while affecting to laugh.

A course of preparation is indispensable.

In order to excite themselves the better, they kept awake at night, fasted, and, wishing to convert Germaine into a more delicate medium, they limited her diet. She indemnified herself by drinking, and consumed so much brandy that she speedily ended in becoming intoxicated. Their promenades in the corridor awakened her. She confused the noise of their footsteps with the hummings in her ears and the voices which she imagined she heard coming from the walls. One day, when she had put a plaice into the pantry, she was frightened on seeing it covered with flame; she became worse than ever after that, and ended by believing that they had cast a spell over her.

Hoping to behold visions, they pressed the napes of each other's necks; they made themselves little bags of belladonna; finally they adopted the magic box, out of which rises a mushroom bristling with nails, to be worn over the heart by means of a ribbon attached to the breast. Everything proved unsuccessful. But they might make use of the sphere of Dupotet!

Pécuchet, with a piece of charcoal, traced on the ground a black shield, in order to enclose within its compass the animal spirits whose duty it is to assist the ambient spirits, and rejoicing at having the mastery over Bouvard, he said to him, with a pontifical air:

"I defy you to cross it!"

Bouvard viewed this circular space. Soon his heart began throbbing, his eyes became clouded.

"Ha! let us make an end of it!" And he jumped over it, to get rid of an inexpressible sense of unpleasantness.

Pécuchet, whose exultation was increasing, desired to make a corpse appear.

Under the Directory a man in the Rue de l'Échiquier exhibited the victims of the Terror. There are innumerable examples of persons coming back from the other world. Though it may be a mere appearance, what matter? The thing was to produce the effect.

The nearer to us we feel the phantom, the more promptly it responds to our appeal. But he had no relic of his family — ring, miniature, or lock of hair — while Bouvard was in a position to conjure up his father; but, as he testified a certain repugnance on the subject, Pécuchet asked him:

"What are you afraid of?"

"I? Oh! nothing at all! Do what you like."

They kept Chamberlan in their pay, and he supplied them by stealth with an old death's-head. A seamster cut out for them two long black robes with hoods attached, like monks' habits. The Falaise coach brought them a large parcel in a wrapper. Then they set about the work, the one interested in executing it, the other afraid to believe in it.

The museum was spread out like a catafalque. Three wax tapers burned at the side of the table pushed against the wall beneath the portrait of Père Bouvard, above which rose the death's-head. They had even stuffed a candle into the interior of the skull, and rays of light shot out through the two eyeholes.

In the centre, on a chafing-dish, incense was smoking. Bouvard kept in the background, and Pécuchet, turning his back to him, cast handfuls of sulphur into the fireplace.

Before invoking a corpse the consent of the demons is required. Now, this day being a Friday — a day which is assigned to Béchet — they should occupy themselves with Béchet first of all.

Bouvard, having bowed to the right and to the left, bent his chin, and raised his arms, began:

"In the names of Ethaniel, Anazin, Ischyros — — "

He forgot the rest.

Pécuchet rapidly breathed forth the words, which had been jotted down on a piece of pasteboard:

"Ischyros, Athanatos, Adonai, Sadaï, Eloy, Messiasös" (the litany was a long one), "I implore thee, I look to thee, I command thee, O Béchet!"

Then, lowering his voice:

"Where art thou, Béchet? Béchet! Béchet! Béchet! Béchet!"

Bouvard sank into the armchair, and he was very pleased at not seeing Béchet, a certain instinct reproaching him with making an experiment which was a kind of sacrilege.

Where was his father's soul? Could it hear him? What if, all at once, it were about to appear?

The curtains slowly moved under the wind, which made its way in through a cracked pane of glass, and the wax-tapers caused shadows to oscillate above the corpse's skull and also above the painted face. An earthy colour made them equally brown. The cheek-bones were consumed by mouldiness, the eyes no longer possessed any lustre; but a flame shone above them in the eyeholes of the empty skull. It seemed sometimes to take the other's place, to rest on the collar of the frock-coat, to have a beard on it; and the canvas, half unfastened, swayed and palpitated.

Little by little they felt, as it were, the sensation of being touched by a breath, the approach of an impalpable being. Drops of sweat moistened Pécuchet's forehead, and Bouvard began to gnash his teeth: a cramp gripped his epigastrium; the floor, like a wave, seemed to flow under his heels; the sulphur burning in the chimney fell down in spirals. At the same moment bats flitted about. A cry arose. Who was it?

And their faces under their hoods presented such a distorted aspect that, gazing at each other, they were becoming more frightened than before, not venturing either to move or to speak, when behind the door they heard groans like those of a soul in torture.

At length they ran the risk. It was their old housekeeper, who, espying them through a slit in the partition, imagined she saw the devil, and, falling on her knees in the corridor, kept repeatedly making the sign of the Cross.

All reasoning was futile. She left them the same evening, having no desire to be employed by such people.

Germaine babbled. Chamberlan lost his place, and he formed against them a secret coalition, supported by the Abbé Jeufroy, Madame Bordin, and Foureau.

Their way of living, so unlike that of other people, gave offence. They became objects of suspicion, and even inspired a vague terror.

What destroyed them above all in public opinion was their choice of a servant. For want of another, they had taken Marcel.

His hare-lip, his hideousness, and the gibberish he talked made people avoid him. A deserted child, he had grown up, the sport of chance, in the fields, and from his long-continued privations he became possessed by an insatiable appetite. Animals that had died of disease, putrid bacon, a crushed dog — everything agreed with him so long as the piece was thick; and he was as gentle as a sheep, but utterly stupid.

Gratitude had driven him to offer himself as a servant to MM. Bouvard and Pécuchet; and then, believing that they were wizards, he hoped for extraordinary gains.

Soon after the first days of his employment with them, he confided to them a secret. On the heath of Poligny a man had formerly found an ingot of gold. The anecdote is related by the historians of Falaise; they were ignorant of its sequel: Twelve brothers, before setting out on a voyage, had concealed twelve similar ingots along the road from Chavignolles to Bretteville, and Marcel begged of his masters to begin a search for them over again. These ingots, said they to each other, had perhaps been buried just before emigration.

This was a case for the use of the divining-rod. Its virtues are doubtful. They studied the question, however, and learned that a certain Pierre Garnier gives scientific reasons to vindicate its claims: springs and metals throw out corpuscles which have an affinity with the wood.

"This is scarcely probable. Who knows, however? Let us make the attempt."

They cut themselves a forked branch from a hazel tree, and one morning set forth to discover the treasure.

"It must be given up," said Bouvard.

"Oh, no! bless your soul!"

After they had been three hours travelling, a thought made them draw up: "The road from Chavignolles to Bretteville! — was it the old or the new road? It must be the old!"

They went back, and rushed through the neighbourhood at random, the direction of the old road not being easy to discover.

Marcel went jumping from right to left, like a spaniel running at field-sports. Bouvard was compelled to call him back every five minutes. Pécuchet advanced step by step, holding the rod by the two branches, with the point upwards. Often it seemed to him that a force and, as it were, a cramp-iron drew it towards the ground; and Marcel very rapidly made a notch in the neighbouring trees, in order to find the place later.

Pécuchet, however, slackened his pace. His mouth was open; the pupils of his eyes were contracted. Bouvard questioned him, caught hold of his shoulders, and shook him. He did not stir, and remained inert, exactly like La Barbée. Then he said he felt around his heart a kind of compression, a singular experience, arising from the rod, no doubt, and he no longer wished to touch it.

They returned next day to the place where the marks had been made on the trees. Marcel dug holes with a spade; nothing, however, came of it, and each time they felt exceedingly sheepish. Pécuchet sat down by the side of a ditch, and while he mused, with his head raised, striving to hear the voices of the spirits through his astral body, asking himself whether he even had one, he fixed his eyes on the peak of his cap; the ecstasy of the previous day once more took possession of him. It lasted a long time, and became dreadful.

Above some oats in a by-path appeared a felt hat: it was that of M. Vaucorbeil on his mare.

Bouvard and Marcel called out to him.

The crisis was drawing to an end when the physician arrived. In order to examine Pécuchet he lifted his cap, and perceiving a forehead covered with coppery marks:

"Ha! ha! Fructus belli! Those are love-spots, my fine fellow! Take care of yourself. The deuce! let us not trifle with love."

Pécuchet, ashamed, again put on his cap, a sort of head-piece that swelled over a peak shaped like a half-moon, the model of which he had taken from the Atlas of Amoros.

The doctor's words astounded him. He kept thinking of them with his eyes staring before him, and suddenly had another seizure.

Vaucorbeil watched him, then, with a fillip, knocked off his cap.

Pécuchet recovered his faculties.

"I suspected as much," said the physician; "the glazed peak hypnotises you like a mirror; and this phenomenon is not rare with persons who look at a shining substance too attentively."

He pointed out how the experiment might be made on hens, then mounted his nag, and slowly disappeared from their view.

Half a league further on they noticed, in a farmyard, a pyramidal object stretched out towards the horizon. It might have been compared to an enormous bunch of black grapes marked here and there with red dots. It was, in fact, a long pole, garnished, according to the Norman custom, with cross-bars, on which were perched turkeys bridling in the sunshine.

"Let us go in." And Pécuchet accosted the farmer, who yielded to their request.

They traced a line with whiting in the middle of the press, tied down the claws of a turkey-cock, then stretched him flat on his belly, with his beak placed on the line. The fowl shut his eyes, and soon presented the appearance of being dead. The same process was gone through with the others. Bouvard passed them quickly across to Pécuchet, who ranged them on the side on which they had become torpid.

The people about the farm-house exhibited uneasiness. The mistress screamed, and a little girl began to cry.

Bouvard loosened all the turkeys. They gradually revived; but one could not tell what might be the consequences.

At a rather tart remark of Pécuchet, the farmer grasped his pitchfork tightly.

"Clear out, in God's name, or I'll smash your head!"

They scampered off.

No matter! the problem was solved: ecstasy is dependent on material causes.

What, then, is matter? What is spirit? Whence comes the influence of the one on the other, and the reciprocal exchange of influence?

In order to inform themselves on the subject, they made researches in the works of Voltaire, Bossuet, Fénelon; and they renewed their subscription to a circulating library.

The ancient teachers were inaccessible owing to the length of their works, or the difficulty of the language; but Jouffroy and Damiron initiated them into modern philosophy, and they had authors who dealt with that of the last century.

Bouvard derived his arguments from Lamettrie, Locke, and Helvetius; Pécuchet from M. Cousin, Thomas Reid, and Gérando. The former adhered to experience; for the latter, the ideal was everything. The one belonged to the school of Aristotle, the other to that of Plato; and they proceeded to discuss the subject.

"The soul is immaterial," said Pécuchet.

"By no means," said his friend. "Lunacy, chloroform, a bleeding will overthrow it; and, inasmuch as it is not always thinking, it is not a substance which does nothing but think."

"Nevertheless," rejoined Pécuchet, "I have in myself something superior to my body, which sometimes confutes it."

"A being in a being — homo duplex! Look here, now! Different tendencies disclose opposite motives. That's all!"

"But this something, this soul, remains identical amid all changes from without. Therefore, it is simple, indivisible, and thus spiritual."

"If the soul were simple," replied Bouvard, "the newly-born would recollect, would imagine, like the adult. Thought, on the contrary, follows the development of the brain. As to its being indivisible, neither the perfume of a rose nor the appetite of a wolf, any more than a volition or an affirmation, is cut in two."

"That makes no difference," said Pécuchet. "The soul is exempt from the qualities of matter."

"Do you admit weight?" returned Bouvard. "Now, if matter can fall, it can in the same way think. Having had a beginning, the soul must come to an end, and as it is dependent on certain organs, it must disappear with them."

"For my part, I maintain that it is immortal. God could not intend — —"

"But if God does not exist?"

"What?" And Pécuchet gave utterance to the three Cartesian proofs: "Primo: God is comprehended in the idea that we have of Him; secundo: Existence is possible to Him; tertio: How can I, a finite being, have an idea of the Infinite? And, since we have this idea, it comes to us from God; therefore, God exists."

He passed on to the testimony of conscience, the traditions of different races, and the need of a Creator.

"When I see a clock — —"

"Yes! yes! That's a well-known argument. But where is the clockmaker's father?"

"However, a cause is necessary."

Bouvard was doubtful about causes. "From the fact that one phenomenon succeeds another phenomenon, the conclusion is drawn that it is caused by the first. Prove it."

"But the spectacle of the universe indicates an intention and a plan."

"Why? Evil is as perfectly organised as good. The worm that works its way into a sheep's head and causes it to die, is as valuable from an anatomical point of view as the sheep itself. Abnormalities surpass the normal functions. The human body could be better constructed. Three fourths of the globe are sterile. That celestial lamp-post, the moon, does not always show itself! Do you think the ocean was destined for ships, and the wood of trees for fuel for our houses?"

Pécuchet answered: "Yet the stomach is made to digest, the leg to walk, the eye to see, although there are dyspepsias, fractures, and cataracts. No arrangements without an end. The effects came on at the exact time or at a later period. Everything depends on laws; therefore, there are final causes."

Bouvard imagined that perhaps Spinoza would furnish him with some arguments, and he wrote to Dumouchel to get him Saisset's translation.

Dumouchel sent him a copy belonging to his friend Professor Varelot, exiled on the 2nd of December.

Ethics terrified them with its axioms, its corollaries. They read only the pages marked with pencil, and understood this:

"The substance is that which is of itself, by itself, without cause, without origin. This substance is God. He alone is extension, and extension is without bounds."

"What can it be bound with?"

"But, though it be infinite, it is not the absolute infinite, for it contains only one kind of perfection, and the Absolute contains all."

They frequently stopped to think it out the better. Pécuchet took pinches of snuff, and Bouvard's face glowed with concentrated attention.

"Does this amuse you?"

"Yes, undoubtedly. Go on forever."

"God displays Himself in an infinite number of attributes which express, each in its own way, the infinite character of His being. We know only two of them — extension and thought.

"From thought and extension flow innumerable modes, which contain others. He who would at the same time embrace all extension and all thought would see there no contingency, nothing accidental, but a geometrical succession of terms, bound amongst themselves by necessary laws."

"Ah! that would be beautiful!" exclaimed Bouvard.

"If God had a will, an end, if He acted for a cause, that would mean that He would have some want, that He would lack some one perfection. He would not be God.

"Thus our world is but one point in the whole of things, and the universe, impenetrable by our knowledge, is a portion of an infinite number of universes emitting close to ours infinite modifications. Extension envelops our universe, but is enveloped by God, who contains in His thought all possible universes, and His thought itself is enveloped in His substance."

It appeared to them that this substance was filled at night with an icy coldness, carried away in an endless course towards a bottomless abyss, leaving nothing around them but the Unseizable, the Immovable, the Eternal.

This was too much for them, and they renounced it. And wishing for something less harsh, they bought the course of philosophy, by M. Guesnier, for the use of classes.

The author asks himself what would be the proper method, the ontological or the psychological.

The first suited the infancy of societies, when man directed his attention towards the external world. But at present, when he turns it in upon himself, "we believe the second to be more scientific."

The object of psychology is to study the acts which take place in our own breasts. We discover them by observation.

"Let us observe." And for a fortnight, after breakfast, they regularly searched their consciousness at random, hoping to make great discoveries there — and made none, which considerably astonished them.

"One phenomenon occupies the ego, viz., the idea. What is its nature? It has been supposed that the objects are put into the brain, and that the brain transmits these images to our souls, which gives us the knowledge of them."

But if the idea is spiritual, how are we to represent matter? Thence comes scepticism as to external perceptions. If it is material, spiritual objects could not be represented. Thence scepticism as to the reality of internal notions.

"For another reason let us here be careful. This hypothesis will lead us to atheism."

For an image, being a finite thing, cannot possibly represent the Infinite.

"Yet," argued Bouvard, "when I think of a forest, of a person, of a dog, I see this forest, this person, this dog. Therefore the ideas do represent them."

And they proceeded to deal with the origin of ideas.

According to Locke, there are two originating causes — sensation and reflection; and Condillac reduces everything to sensation.

But then reflection will lack a basis. It has need of a subject, of a sentient being; and it is powerless to furnish us with the great fundamental truths: God, merit and demerit, the Just, the Beautiful — ideas which are all innate, that is to say, anterior to facts, and to experience, and universal.

"If they were universal we should have them from our birth."

"By this word is meant dispositions to have them; and Descartes —

"Your Descartes is muddled, for he maintains that the fœtus possesses them, and he confesses in another place that this is in an implied fashion."

Pécuchet was astonished. "Where is this found?"

"In Gérando." And Bouvard tapped him lightly on the stomach.

"Make an end of it, then," said Pécuchet.

Then, coming to Condillac:

"Our thoughts are not metamorphoses of sensation. It causes them, puts them in play. In order to put them in play a motive power is necessary, for matter of itself cannot produce movement.' And I found that in your Voltaire," Pécuchet added, making a low bow to him.

Thus they repeated again and again the same arguments, each treating the other's opinion with contempt, without persuading his companion that his own was right.

But philosophy elevated them in their own estimation. They recalled with disdain their agricultural and political preoccupations.

At present they were disgusted with the museum. They would have asked nothing better than to sell the articles of virtù contained in it. So they passed on to the second chapter: "Faculties of the Soul."

"They are three in number, no more: that of feeling, that of knowing, and that of willing.

"In the faculty of feeling we should distinguish physical sensibility from moral sensibility. Physical sensations are naturally classified into five species, being transmitted through the medium of the senses. The facts of moral sensibility, on the contrary, owe nothing to the body. What is there in common between the pleasure of Archimedes in discovering the laws of weight and the filthy gratification of Apicius in devouring a wild-boar's head?

"This moral sensibility has five genera, and its second genus, moral desires, is divided into five species, and the phenomena of the fourth genus, affection, are subdivided into two other species, amongst which is the love of oneself — a legitimate propensity, no doubt, but one which, when it becomes exaggerated, takes the name of egoism.

"In the faculty of knowing we find rational perception, in which there are two principal movements and four degrees.

"Abstraction may present perils to whimsical minds.

"Memory brings us into contact with the past, as foresight does with the future.

"Imagination is rather a special faculty, sui generis."

So many intricacies in order to demonstrate platitudes, the pedantic tone of the author, and the monotony of his forms of expression —

"We are prepared to acknowledge it," "Far from us be the thought,"

"Let us interrogate our consciousness" — the sempiternal eulogy on Dugald Stewart; in short, all this verbiage, disgusted them so much that, jumping over the faculty of willing, they went into logic.

It taught them the nature of analysis, synthesis, induction, deduction, and the principal causes of our errors.

Nearly all come from the misuse of words.

"The sun is going to bed." "The weather is becoming brown," "The winter is drawing near" — vicious modes of speech which would make us believe in personal entities, when it is only a question of very simple occurrences. "I remember such an object," "such an axiom," "such a truth" — illusion! These are ideas and not at all things which remain in me; and the rigour of language requires, "I remember such an act of my mind by which I perceived that object," "whereby I have deduced that axiom," "whereby I have admitted this truth."

As the term that describes an incident does not embrace it in all its aspects, they try to employ only abstract words, so that in place of saying, "Let us make a tour," "It is time to dine," "I have the colic," they give utterance to the following phrases: "A promenade would be salutary," "This is the hour for absorbing aliments," "I experience a necessity for disburdenment."

Once masters of logic, they passed in review the different criterions; first, that of common sense.

If the individual can know nothing, why should all individuals know more? An error, were it a hundred thousand years old, does not by the mere fact of its being old constitute truth. The multitude invariably pursues the path of routine. It is, on the contrary, the few who are guided by progress.

Is it better to trust to the evidence of the senses? They sometimes deceive, and never give information save as to externals. The innermost core escapes them.

Reason offers more safeguards, being immovable and impersonal; but in order that it may be manifested it is necessary that it should incarnate itself. Then, reason becomes my reason; a rule is of little value if it is false. Nothing can show such a rule to be right.

We are recommended to control it with the senses; but they may make the darkness thicker. From a confused sensation a defective law will be inferred, which, later, will obstruct the clear view of things.

Morality remains.

This would make God descend to the level of the useful, as if our wants were the measure of the Absolute.

As for the evidence — denied by the one, affirmed by the other — it is its own criterion. M. Cousin has demonstrated it.

"I see no longer anything but revelation," said Bouvard. "But, to believe it, it is necessary to admit two preliminary cognitions — that of the body which has felt, and that of the intelligence which has perceived; to admit sensation and reason. Human testimonies! and consequently open to suspicion."

Pécuchet reflected — folded his arms. "But we are about to fall into the frightful abyss of scepticism."

In Bouvard's opinion it frightened only weak brains.

"Thank you for the compliment," returned Pécuchet. "However, there are indisputable facts. We can arrive at truth within a certain limit."

"Which? Do two and two always make four? Is that which is contained in some degree less than that which contains it? What is the meaning of nearly true, a fraction of God, the part of an indivisible thing?"

"Oh, you are a mere sophist!" And Pécuchet, annoyed, remained for three days in a sulk.

They employed themselves in running through the contents of several volumes. Bouvard smiled from time to time, and renewing the conversation, said:

"The fact is, it is hard to avoid doubt; thus, for the existence of God, Descartes', Kant's, and Leibnitz's proofs are not the same, and mutually destroy one another. The creation of the world by atoms, or by a spirit, remains inconceivable. I feel myself, at the same time, matter and thought, while all the time I am ignorant of what one or the other really is. Impenetrability, solidity, weight, seem to me to be mysteries just as much as my soul, and, with much stronger reason, the union of the soul and the body. In order to explain it, Leibnitz invented his harmony, Malebranche premotion, Cudworth a mediator, and Bossuet sees in it a perpetual miracle."

"Exactly," said Pécuchet. And they both confessed that they were tired of philosophy. Such a number of systems confused them. Metaphysics is of no use: one can live without it. Besides, their pecuniary embarrassments were increasing. They owed one bill to Beljambe for three hogsheads of wine, another to Langlois for two stone of sugar, a sum of one hundred francs to the tailor, and sixty to the shoemaker.

Their expenditures were continuous, of course, and meantime Maître Gouy did not pay up.

They went to Marescot to ask him to raise money for them, either by the sale of the Ecalles meadow, or by a mortgage on their farm, or by giving up their house on the condition of getting a life annuity and keeping the usufruct.

In Marescot's opinion this would be an impracticable course; but a better means might be devised, and they should be informed about it.

After this they thought of their poor garden. Bouvard undertook the pruning of the row of elms and Pécuchet the trimming of the espalier. Marcel would have to dig the borders.

At the end of a quarter of an hour they stopped. The one closed his pruning-knife, the other laid down his scissors, and they began to walk to and fro quietly, Bouvard in the shade of the linden trees, with his waistcoat off, his chest held out and his arms bare; Pécuchet close to the wall, with his head hanging down, his arms behind his back, the peak of his cap turned over his neck for precaution; and thus they proceeded in parallel lines without even seeing Marcel, who was resting at the side of the hut eating a scrap of bread.

In this reflective mood thoughts arose in their minds. They grasped at them, fearing to lose them; and metaphysics came back again — came back with respect to the rain and the sun, the gravel in their shoes, the flowers on the grass — with respect to everything. When they looked at the candle burning, they asked themselves whether the light is in the object or in our eyes. Since stars may have disappeared by the time their radiance has reached us, we admire, perhaps, things that have no existence.

Having found a Raspail cigarette in the depths of a waistcoat, they crumbled it over some water, and the camphor moved about. Here, then, is movement in matter. One degree more of movement might bring on life!

But if matter in movement were sufficient to create beings, they would not be so varied. For in the beginning lands, water, men, and plants had no existence. What, then, is this primordial matter, which we have never seen, which is no portion of created things, and which yet has produced them all?

Sometimes they wanted a book. Dumouchel, tired of assisting them, no longer answered their letters. They enthusiastically took up the new question, especially Pécuchet. His need of truth became a burning thirst.

Moved by Bouvard's preachings, he gave up spiritualism, but soon resumed it again only to abandon it once more, and, clasping his head with his hands, he would exclaim:

"Oh, doubt! doubt! I would much prefer nothingness."

Bouvard perceived the insufficiency of materialism, and tried to stop at that, declaring, however, that he had lost his head over it.

They began with arguments on a solid basis, but the basis gave way; and suddenly they had no longer a single idea — just as a bird takes wing the moment we wish to catch it.

During the winter evenings they chatted in the museum at the corner of the fire, staring at the coals. The wind, whistling in the corridor, shook the window-panes; the black masses of trees swayed to and fro, and the dreariness of the night intensified the seriousness of their thoughts.

Bouvard from time to time walked towards the further end of the apartment and then came back. The torches and the pans on the walls threw slanting shadows on the ground; and the St. Peter, seen in profile, showed on the ceiling the silhouette of his nose, resembling a monstrous hunting-horn.

They found it hard to move about amongst the various articles, and Bouvard, by not taking precautions, often knocked against the statue. With its big eyes, its drooping lip, and its air of a drunkard, it also annoyed Pécuchet. For a long time he had wished to get rid of it, but through carelessness put it off from day to day.

One evening, in the middle of a dispute on the monad, Bouvard hit his big toe against St. Peter's thumb, and turning on him in a rage, exclaimed:

"He plagues me, this jackanapes! Let us toss him out!"

It was difficult to do this over the staircase. They flung open the window, and gently tried to tip St. Peter over the edge. Pécuchet, on his knees, attempted to raise his heels, while Bouvard pressed against his shoulders. The old codger in stone did not budge. After this they had recourse to the halberd as a lever, and finally succeeded in stretching him out quite straight. Then, after a see-saw motion, he dashed into the open space, his tiara going before him. A heavy crash reached their ears, and next day they found him broken into a dozen pieces in the old pit for composts.

An hour afterwards the notary came in, bringing good news to them. A lady in the neighbourhood was willing to advance a thousand crown-pieces on the security of a mortgage of their farm, and, as they were expressing their satisfaction at the proposal:

"Pardon me. She adds, as a condition, that you should sell her the Ecalles meadow for fifteen hundred francs. The loan will be advanced this very day. The money is in my office."

They were both disposed to give way.

Bouvard ended by saying: "Good God! be it so, then."

"Agreed," said Marescot. And then he mentioned the lender's name: it was Madame Bordin.

"I suspected 'twas she!" exclaimed Pécuchet.

Bouvard, who felt humiliated, had not a word to say.

She or some one else — what did it matter? The principal thing was to get out of their difficulties.

When they received the money (they were to get the sum for the Ecalles later) they immediately paid all their bills; and they were returning to their abode when, at the corner of the market-place, they were stopped by Farmer Gouy.

He had been on his way to their house to apprise them of a misfortune. The wind, the night before, had blown down twenty apple trees into the farmyard, overturned the boilery, and carried away the roof of the barn.

They spent the remainder of the afternoon in estimating the amount of the damage, and they continued the inquiry on the following day with the assistance of the carpenter, the mason, and the slater. The repairs would cost at least about eighteen hundred francs.

Then, in the evening, Gouy presented himself. Marianne herself had, a short time before, told him all about the sale of the Ecalles meadow — a piece of land with a splendid yield, suitable in every way, and scarcely requiring any cultivation at all, the best bit in the whole farm! — and he asked for a reduction.

The two gentlemen refused it. The matter was submitted to the justice of the peace, who decided in favour of the farmer. The loss of the Ecalles, which was valued at two thousand francs per acre, caused him an annual depreciation of seventy, and he was sure to win in the courts.

Their fortune was diminished. What were they to do? And soon the question would be, How were they to live?

They both sat down to table full of discouragement. Marcel knew nothing about it in the kitchen. His dinner this time was better than theirs.

The soup was like dish-water, the rabbit had a bad smell, the kidney-beans were underdone, the plates were dirty, and at dessert Bouvard burst into a passion and threatened to break everything on Marcel's head.

"Let us be philosophers," said Pécuchet. "A little less money, the intrigues of a woman, the clumsiness of a servant — what is it but this? You are too much immersed in matter."

"But when it annoys me?" said Bouvard.

"For my part, I don't admit it," rejoined Pécuchet.

He had recently been reading an analysis of Berkeley, and added:

"I deny extension, time, space, even substance! for the true substance is the mind-perceiving qualities."

"Quite so," said Bouvard; "but get rid of the world, and you'll have no proof left of God's existence."

Pécuchet uttered a cry, and a long one too, although he had a cold in his head, caused by the iodine of potassium, and a continual feverishness increased his excitement. Bouvard, being uneasy about him, sent for the doctor.

Vaucorbeil ordered orange-syrup with the iodine, and for a later stage cinnabar baths.

"What's the use?" replied Pécuchet. "One day or another the form will die out. The essence does not perish."

"No doubt," said the physician, "matter is indestructible. However — —"

"Ah, no! — ah, no! The indestructible thing is being. This body which is there before me — yours, doctor — prevents me from knowing your real self, and is, so to speak, only a garment, or rather a mask."

Vaucorbeil believed he was mad.

"Good evening. Take care of your mask."

Pécuchet did not stop. He procured an introduction to the Hegelian philosophy, and wished to explain it to Bouvard.

"All that is rational is real. There is not even any reality save the idea. The laws of the mind are laws of the universe; the reason of man is identical with that of God."

Bouvard pretended to understand.

"Therefore the absolute is, at the same time, the subject and the object, the unity whereby all differences come to be settled. Thus, things that are contradictory are reconciled. The shadow permits the light; heat and cold intermingled produce temperature. Organism maintains itself only by the destruction of organism; everywhere there is a principle that disunites, a principle that connects."

They were on the hillock, and the curé was walking past the gateway with his breviary in his hand.

Pécuchet asked him to come in, as he desired to finish the explanation of Hegel, and to get some notion of what the curé would say about it.

The man of the cassock sat down beside them, and Pécuchet broached the question of Christianity.

"No religion has established this truth so well: 'Nature is but a moment of the idea.'"

"A moment of the idea!" murmured the priest in astonishment.

"Why, yes. God in taking a visible envelope showed his consubstantial union with it."

"With nature — oh! oh!"

"By His decease He bore testimony to the essence of death; therefore, death was in Him, made and makes part of God."

The ecclesiastic frowned.

"No blasphemies! it was for the salvation of the human race that He endured sufferings."

"Error! We look at death in the case of the individual, where, no doubt, it is a calamity; but with relation to things it is different. Do not separate mind from matter."

"However, sir, before the Creation — —"

"There was no Creation. It has always existed. Otherwise this would be a new being adding itself to the Divine idea, which is absurd."

The priest arose; business matters called him elsewhere.

"I flatter myself I've floored him!" said Pécuchet. "One word more. Since the existence of the world is but a continual passage from life to death, and from death to life, so far from everything existing, nothing is. But everything is becoming — do you understand?"

"Yes; I do understand — or rather I don't."

Idealism in the end exasperated Bouvard.

"I don't want any more of it. The famous cogito stupefies me. Ideas of things are taken for the things themselves. What we understand very slightly is explained by means of words which we don't understand at all — substance, extension, force, matter, and soul. So much abstraction, imagination. As for God, it is impossible to know in what way He is, if He is at all. Formerly, He used to cause the wind, the thunderstorms, revolutions. At present, He is diminishing. Besides, I don't see the utility of Him."

"And morality — in this state of affairs."

"Ah! so much the worse."

"It lacks a foundation in fact," said Pécuchet.

And he remained silent, driven into a corner by premises which he had himself laid down. It was a surprise — a crushing bit of logic.

Bouvard no longer even believed in matter.

The certainty that nothing exists (deplorable though it may be) is none the less a certainty. Few persons are capable of possessing it. This transcendency on their part inspired them with pride, and they would have liked to make a display of it. An opportunity presented itself.

One morning, while they were going to buy tobacco, they saw a crowd in front of Langlois' door. The public conveyance from Falaise was surrounded, and there was much excitement about a convict named Touache, who was wandering about the country. The conductor had met him at Croix-Verte between two gendarmes, and the people of Chavignolles breathed a sigh of relief.

Girbal and the captain remained on the green; then the justice of the peace made his appearance, curious to obtain information, and after him came M. Marescot in a velvet cap and sheepskin slippers.

Langlois invited them to honour his shop with their presence; they would be more at their ease; and in spite of the customers and the loud ringing of the bell, the gentlemen continued their discussion as to Touache's offences.

"Goodness gracious!" said Bouvard, "he had bad instincts. That was the whole of it!"

"They are conquered by virtue," replied the notary.

"But if a person has not virtue?"

And Bouvard positively denied free-will.

"Yet," said the captain, "I can do what I like. I am free, for instance, to move my leg."

"No, sir, for you have a motive for moving it."

The captain looked out for something to say in reply, and found nothing. But Girbal discharged this shaft:

"A Republican speaking against liberty. That is funny."

"A droll story," chimed in Langlois.

Bouvard turned on him with this question:

"Why don't you give all you possess to the poor?"

The grocer cast an uneasy glance over his entire shop.

"Look here, now, I'm not such an idiot! I keep it for myself."

"If you were St. Vincent de Paul, you would act differently, since you would have his character. You obey your own. Therefore, you are not free."

"That's a quibble!" replied the company in chorus.

Bouvard did not flinch, and said, pointing towards the scales on the counter:

"It will remain motionless so long as each scale is empty. So with the will; and the oscillation of the scales between two weights which seem equal represents the strain on our mind when it is hesitating between different motives, till the moment when the more powerful motive gets the better of it and leads it to a determination."

"All that," said Girbal, "makes no difference for Touache, and does not prevent him from being a downright vicious rogue."

Pécuchet addressed the company:

"Vices are properties of Nature, like floods, tempests."

The notary stopped, and raising himself on tiptoe at every word:

"I consider your system one of complete immorality. It gives scope to every kind of excess, excuses crimes, and declares the guilty innocent."

"Exactly," replied Bouvard; "the wretch who follows his appetites is right from his own point of view just as much as the honest man who listens to reason."

"Do not defend monsters!"

"Wherefore monsters? When a person is born blind, an idiot, a homicide, this appears to us to be opposed to order, as if order were known to us, as if Nature were striving towards an end."

"You then raise a question about Providence?"

"I do raise a question about it."

"Look rather to history," exclaimed Pécuchet. "Recall to mind the assassinations of kings, the massacres amongst peoples, the dissensions in families, the affliction of individuals."

"And at the same time," added Bouvard, for they mutually excited each other, "this Providence takes care of little birds, and makes the claws of crayfishes grow again. Oh! if by Providence you mean a law which rules everything, I am of the same opinion, and even more so."

"However, sir," said the notary, "there are principles."

"What stuff is that you're talking? A science, according to Condillac, is so much the better the less need it has of them. They do nothing but summarise acquired knowledge, and they bring us back to those conceptions which are exactly the disputable ones."

"Have you, like us," went on Pécuchet, "scrutinised and explored the arcana of metaphysics?"

"It is true, gentlemen — it is true!"

Then the company broke up.

But Coulon, drawing them aside, told them in a paternal tone that he was no devotee certainly, and that he even hated the Jesuits. However, he did not go as far as they did. Oh, no! certainly not. And at the corner of the green they passed in front of the captain, who, as he lighted his pipe, growled:

"All the same, I do what I like, by God!"

Bouvard and Pécuchet gave utterance on other occasions to their scandalous paradoxes. They threw doubt on the honesty of men, the chastity of women, the intelligence of government, the good sense of the people — in short, they sapped the foundations of everything.

Foureau was provoked by their behaviour, and threatened them with imprisonment if they went on with such discourses.

The evidence of their own superiority caused them pain. As they maintained immoral propositions, they must needs be immoral: calumnies were invented about them. Then a pitiable faculty developed itself in their minds, that of observing stupidity and no longer tolerating it. Trifling things made them feel sad: the advertisements in the newspapers, the profile of a shopkeeper, an idiotic remark overheard by chance. Thinking over what was said in their own village, and on the fact that there were even as far as the Antipodes other Coulons, other Marescots, other Foureaus, they felt, as it were, the heaviness of all the earth weighing down upon them.

They no longer went out of doors, and received no visitors.

One afternoon a dialogue arose, outside the front entrance, between Marcel and a gentleman who wore dark spectacles and a hat with a large brim. It was the academician Larsonneur. He observed a curtain half-opening and doors being shut. This step on his part was an attempt at reconciliation; and he went away in a rage, directing the man-servant to tell his masters that he regarded them as a pair of common fellows.

Bouvard and Pécuchet did not care about this. The world was diminishing in importance, and they saw it as if through a cloud that had descended from their brains over their eyes.

Is it not, moreover, an illusion, a bad dream? Perhaps, on the whole, prosperity and misfortune are equally balanced. But the welfare of the species does not console the individual.

"And what do others matter to me?" said Pécuchet.

His despair afflicted Bouvard. It was he who had brought his friend to this pass, and the ruinous condition of their house kept their grief fresh by daily irritations.

In order to revive their spirits they tried discussions, and prescribed tasks for themselves, but speedily fell back into greater sluggishness, into more profound discouragement.

At the end of each meal they would remain with their elbows on the table groaning with a lugubrious air.

Marcel would give them a scared look, and then go back to his kitchen, where he stuffed himself in solitude.

About the middle of midsummer they received a circular announcing the marriage of Dumouchel with Madame Olympe-Zulma Poulet, a widow.

"God bless him!"

And they recalled the time when they were happy.

Why were they no longer following the harvesters? Where were the days when they went through the different farm-houses looking everywhere for antiquities? Nothing now gave them such hours of delight as those which were occupied with the distillery and with literature. A gulf lay between them and that time. It was irrevocable.

They thought of taking a walk as of yore through the fields, wandered too far, and got lost. The sky was dotted with little fleecy clouds, the wind was shaking the tiny bells of the oats; a stream was purling along through a meadow — and then, all at once, an infectious odour made them halt, and they saw on the pebbles between the thorn trees the putrid carcass of a dog.

The four limbs were dried up. The grinning jaws disclosed teeth of ivory under the bluish lips; in place of the stomach there was a mass of earth-coloured flesh which seemed to be palpitating with the vermin that swarmed all over it. It writhed, with the sun's rays falling on it, under the gnawing of so many mouths, in this intolerable stench — a stench which was fierce and, as it were, devouring.

Yet wrinkles gathered on Bouvard's forehead, and his eyes filled with tears.

Pécuchet said in a stoical fashion, "One day we shall be like that."

The idea of death had taken hold of them. They talked about it on their way back.

After all, it has no existence. We pass away into the dew, into the breeze, into the stars. We become part of the sap of trees, the brilliance of precious stones, the plumage of birds. We give back to Nature what she lent to each of us, and the nothingness before us is not a bit more frightful than the nothingness behind us.

They tried to picture it to themselves under the form of an intense night, a bottomless pit, a continual swoon. Anything would be better than such an existence — monotonous, absurd, and hopeless.

They enumerated their unsatisfied wants. Bouvard had always wished for horses, equipages, a big supply of Burgundy, and lovely women ready to accommodate him in a splendid habitation. Pécuchet's ambition was philosophical knowledge. Now, the vastest of problems, that which contains all others, can be solved in one minute. When would it come, then? "As well to make an end of it at once."

"Just as you like," said Bouvard.

And they investigated the question of suicide.

Where is the evil of casting aside a burden which is crushing you? and of doing an act harmful to nobody? If it offended God, should we have this power? It is not cowardice, though people say so, and to scoff at human pride is a fine thing, even at the price of injury to oneself — the thing that men regard most highly.

They deliberated as to the different kinds of death. Poison makes you suffer. In order to cut your throat you require too much courage. In the case of asphyxia, people often fail to effect their object.

Finally, Pécuchet carried up to the garret two ropes belonging to their gymnastic apparatus. Then, having fastened them to the same cross-beam of the roof, he let a slip-knot hang down from the end of each, and drew two chairs underneath to reach the ropes.

This method was the one they selected.

They asked themselves what impression it would cause in the district, what would become of their library, their papers, their collections. The thought of death made them feel tenderly about themselves. However, they did not abandon their project, and by dint of talking about it they grew accustomed to the idea.

On the evening of the 24th of December, between ten and eleven o'clock, they sat thinking in the museum, both differently attired. Bouvard wore a blouse over his knitted waistcoat, and Pécuchet, through economy, had not left off his monk's habit for the past three months.

As they were very hungry (for Marcel, having gone out at daybreak, had not reappeared), Bouvard thought it would be a healthful thing for him to drink a quart bottle of brandy, and for Pécuchet to take some tea.

While he was lifting up the kettle he spilled some water on the floor.

"Awkward!" exclaimed Bouvard.

Then, thinking the infusion too small, he wanted to strengthen it with two additional spoonfuls.

"This will be execrable," said Pécuchet.

"Not at all."

And while each of them was trying to draw the work-box closer to himself, the tray upset and fell down. One of the cups was smashed — the last of their fine porcelain tea-service.

Bouvard turned pale.

"Go on! Confusion! Don't put yourself about!"

"Truly, a great misfortune! I attribute it to my father."

"Your natural father," corrected Pécuchet, with a sneer.

"Ha! you insult me!"

"No; but I am tiring you out! I see it plainly! Confess it!"

And Pécuchet was seized with anger, or rather with madness. So was Bouvard. The pair began shrieking, the one excited by hunger, the other by alcohol. Pécuchet's throat at length emitted no sound save a rattling.

"It is infernal, a life like this. I much prefer death. Adieu!"

He snatched up the candlestick and rushed out, slamming the door behind him.

Bouvard, plunged in darkness, found some difficulty in opening it. He ran after Pécuchet, and followed him up to the garret.

The candle was on the floor, and Pécuchet was standing on one of the chairs, with a rope in his hand. The spirit of imitation got the better of Bouvard.

"Wait for me!"

And he had just got up on the other chair when, suddenly stopping:

"Why, we have not made our wills!"

"Hold on! That's quite true!"

Their breasts swelled with sobs. They leaned against the skylight to take breath.

The air was chilly and a multitude of stars glittered in a sky of inky blackness.

The whiteness of the snow that covered the earth was lost in the haze of the horizon.

They perceived, close to the ground, little lights, which, as they drew near, looked larger, all reaching up to the side of the church.

Curiosity drove them to the spot. It was the midnight mass. These lights came from shepherds' lanterns. Some of them were shaking their cloaks under the porch.

The serpent snorted; the incense smoked. Glasses suspended along the nave represented three crowns of many-coloured flames; and, at the end of the perspective at the two sides of the tabernacle, immense wax tapers were pointed with red flames. Above the heads of the crowd and the broad-brimmed hats of the women, beyond the chanters, the priest could be distinguished in his chasuble of gold. To his sharp voice responded the strong voices of the men who filled up the gallery, and the wooden vault quivered above its stone arches. The walls were decorated with the stations of the Cross. In the midst of the choir, before the altar, a lamb was lying down, with its feet under its belly and its ears erect.

The warm temperature imparted to them both a strange feeling of comfort, and their thoughts, which had been so tempestuous only a short time before, became peaceful, like waves when they are calmed.

They listened to the Gospel and the Credo, and watched the movements of the priest. Meanwhile, the old, the young, the beggar women in rags, the mothers in high caps, the strong young fellows with tufts of fair down on their faces, were all praying, absorbed in the same deep joy, and saw the body of the Infant Christ shining, like a sun, upon the straw of a stable. This faith on the part of others touched Bouvard in spite of his reason, and Pécuchet in spite of the hardness of his heart.

There was a silence; every back was bent, and, at the tinkling of a bell, the little lamb bleated.

The host was displayed by the priest, as high as possible between his two hands. Then burst forth a strain of gladness inviting the whole world to the feet of the King of Angels. Bouvard and Pécuchet involuntarily joined in it, and they felt, as it were, a new dawn rising in their souls.

Comme il faisait une chaleur de 33 degrés, le boulevard Bourdon se trouvait absolument désert.

Plus bas le canal Saint-Martin, fermé par les deux écluses étalait en ligne droite son eau couleur d'encre. Il y avait au milieu, un bateau plein de bois, et sur la berge deux rangs de barriques.

Au delà du canal, entre les maisons que séparent des chantiers le grand ciel pur se découpait en plaques d'outremer, et sous la réverbération du soleil, les façades blanches, les toits d'ardoises, les quais de granit éblouissaient. Une rumeur confuse montait du loin dans l'atmosphère tiède ; et tout semblait engourdi par le désœuvrement du dimanche et la tristesse des jours d'été.

Deux hommes parurent.

L'un venait de la Bastille, l'autre du Jardin des Plantes. Le plus grand, vêtu de toile, marchait le chapeau en arrière, le gilet déboutonné et sa cravate à la main. Le plus petit, dont le corps disparaissait dans une redingote marron, baissait la tête sous une casquette à visière pointue.

Quand ils furent arrivés au milieu du boulevard, ils s'assirent à la même minute, sur le même banc.

Pour s'essuyer le front, ils retirèrent leurs coiffures, que chacun posa près de soi ; et le petit homme aperçut écrit dans le chapeau de son voisin : Bouvard ; pendant que celui-ci distinguait aisément dans la casquette du particulier en redingote le mot : Pécuchet.

— Tiens ! dit-il nous avons eu la même idée, celle d'inscrire notre nom dans nos couvre-chefs.

— Mon Dieu, oui ! on pourrait prendre le mien à mon bureau !

— C'est comme moi, je suis employé.

Alors ils se considérèrent.

L'aspect aimable de Bouvard charma de suite Pécuchet.

Ses yeux bleuâtres, toujours entreclos, souriaient dans son visage colore. Un pantalon à grand-pont, qui godait par le bas sur des souliers de castor, moulait son ventre, faisait bouffer sa chemise à la ceinture ; — et ses cheveux blonds, frisés d'eux-mêmes en boucles légères, lui donnaient quelque chose d'enfantin.

Il poussait du bout des lèvres une espèce de sifflement continu.

L'air sérieux de Pécuchet frappa Bouvard.

On aurait dit qu'il portait une perruque, tant les mèches garnissant son crâne élevé étaient plates et noires. Sa figure semblait tout en profil, à cause du nez qui descendait très bas. Ses jambes prises dans des tuyaux de lasting manquaient de proportion avec la longueur du buste ; et il avait une voix forte, caverneuse.

Cette exclamation lui échappa : — Comme on serait bien à la campagne !

Mais la banlieue, selon Bouvard, était assommante par le tapage des guinguettes. Pécuchet pensait de même. Il commençait néanmoins à se sentir fatigué de la capitale, Bouvard aussi.

Et leurs yeux erraient sur des tas de pierres à bâtir, sur l'eau hideuse où une botte de paille flottait, sur la cheminée d'une usine se dressant à l'horizon ; des miasmes d'égout s'exhalaient. Ils se tournèrent de l'autre côté. Alors, ils eurent devant eux les murs du Grenier d'abondance.

Décidément (et Pécuchet en était surpris) on avait encore plus chaud dans les rues que chez soi !

Bouvard l'engagea à mettre bas sa redingote. Lui, il se moquait du qu'en dira-t-on !

Tout à coup un ivrogne traversa en zigzag le trottoir ; — et à propos des ouvriers, ils entamèrent une conversation politique. Leurs opinions étaient les mêmes, bien que Bouvard fût peut-être plus libéral.

Un bruit de ferrailles sonna sur le pavé, dans un tourbillon de poussière. C'étaient trois calèches de remise qui s'en allaient vers Bercy, promenant une mariée avec son bouquet, des bourgeois en cravate blanche, des dames enfouies jusqu'aux aisselles dans leur jupon, deux ou trois petites filles, un collégien. La vue de cette noce amena Bouvard et Pécuchet à parler des femmes, — qu'ils déclarèrent frivoles, acariâtres, têtues. Malgré cela, elles étaient souvent meilleures que les hommes ; d'autres fois elles étaient pires. Bref, il valait mieux vivre sans elles ; aussi Pécuchet était resté célibataire.

— Moi je suis veuf dit Bouvard et sans enfants !

— C'est peut-être un bonheur pour vous ? Mais la solitude à la longue était bien triste.

Puis, au bord du quai, parut une fille de joie, avec un soldat. Blême, les cheveux noirs et marquée de petite vérole, elle s'appuyait sur le bras du militaire, en traînant ses savates et balançant les hanches.

Quand elle fut plus loin, Bouvard se permit une réflexion obscène. Pécuchet devint très rouge, et sans doute pour s'éviter de répondre, lui désigna du regard un prêtre qui s'avancait.

L'ecclésiastique descendit avec lenteur l'avenue des maigres ormeaux jalonnant le trottoir, et Bouvard dès qu'il n'aperçut plus le tricorne, se déclara soulagé car il exécrait les jésuites. Pécuchet, sans les absoudre, montra quelque déférence pour la religion.

Cependant le crépuscule tombait et des persiennes en face s'étaient relevées. Les passants devinrent plus nombreux. Sept heures sonnèrent.

Leurs paroles coulaient intarissablement, les remarques succédant aux anecdotes, les aperçus philosophiques aux considérations individuelles. Ils dénigrèrent le corps des Ponts et chaussées, la régie des tabacs, le commerce, les théâtres, notre marine et tout le genre humain, comme des gens qui ont subi de grands déboires. Chacun en écoutant l'autre retrouvait des parties de lui-même oubliées ; — et bien qu'ils eussent passé l'âge des émotions naïves, ils éprouvaient un plaisir nouveau, une sorte d'épanouissement, le charme des tendresses à leur début.

Vingt fois ils s'étaient levés, s'étaient rassis et avaient fait la longueur du boulevard depuis l'écluse d'amont jusqu'à l'écluse d'aval, chaque fois voulant s'en aller, n'en ayant pas la force, retenus par une fascination.

Ils se quittaient pourtant, et leurs mains étaient jointes, quand Bouvard dit tout à coup :

— Ma foi ! si nous dînions ensemble ?

— J'en avais l'idée ! reprit Pécuchet mais je n'osais pas vous le proposer !

Et il se laissa conduire en face de l'Hôtel de Ville, dans un petit restaurant où l'on serait bien.

Bouvard commanda le menu.

Pécuchet avait peur des épices comme pouvant lui incendier le corps. Ce fut l'objet d'une discussion médicale. Ensuite, ils glorifièrent les avantages des sciences : que de choses à connaître ! que de recherches — si on avait le temps ! Hélas, le gagne-pain l'absorbait ; et ils levèrent les bras d'étonnement, ils faillirent s'embrasser par-dessus la table en découvrant qu'ils étaient tous les deux copistes, Bouvard dans une maison de commerce, Pécuchet au ministère de la marine, — ce qui ne l'empêchait pas de consacrer, chaque soir, quelques moments à l'étude. Il avait noté des fautes dans l'ouvrage de M. Thiers et il parla avec le plus grand respect d'un certain Dumouchel, professeur.

Bouvard l'emportait par d'autres côtés. Sa chaîne de montre en cheveux et la manière dont il battait la rémoulade décelaient le roquentin plein d'expérience ; et il mangeait le coin de la serviette dans l'aisselle, en débitant des choses qui faisaient rire Pécuchet. C'était un rire particulier, une seule note très basse, toujours la même, poussée à de longs intervalles. Celui de Bouvard était continu, sonore, découvrait ses dents, lui secouait les épaules, et les consommateurs à la porte s'en retournaient.

Le repas fini, ils allèrent prendre le café dans un autre établissement. Pécuchet en contemplant les becs de gaz gémit sur le débordement du luxe, puis d'un geste dédaigneux écarta les journaux. Bouvard était plus indulgent à leur endroit. Il aimait tous les écrivains en général, et avait eu dans sa jeunesse des dispositions pour être acteur !

Il voulut faire des tours d'équilibre avec une queue de billard et deux boules d'ivoire comme en exécutait Barberou, un de ses amis. Invariablement, elles tombaient, et roulant sur le plancher entre les jambes des personnes allaient se perdre au loin. Le garçon qui se levait toutes les fois pour les chercher à quatre pattes sous les banquettes finit par se plaindre. Pécuchet eut une querelle avec lui ; le limonadier survint, il n'écouta pas ses excuses et même chicana sur la consommation.

Il proposa ensuite de terminer la soirée paisiblement dans son domicile qui était tout près, rue Saint-Martin.

À peine entré, il endossa une manière de camisole en indienne et fit les honneurs de son appartement.

Un bureau de sapin placé juste dans le milieu incommodait par ses angles ; et tout autour, sur des planchettes, sur les trois chaises, sur le vieux fauteuil et dans les coins se trouvaient pêle-mêle plusieurs volumes de l'Encyclopédie Roret, le Manuel du magnétiseur, un Fénelon, d'autres bouquins, — avec des tas de paperasses, deux noix de coco, diverses médailles, un bonnet turc — et des coquilles, rapportées du Havre par Dumouchel. Une couche de poussière veloutait les murailles autrefois peintes en jaune. La brosse pour les souliers traînait au bord du lit dont les draps pendaient. On voyait au plafond une grande tache noire, produite par la fumée de la lampe.

Bouvard, à cause de l'odeur sans doute, demanda la permission d'ouvrir la fenêtre.

— Les papiers s'envoleraient ! s'écria Pécuchet qui redoutait, en plus, les courants d'air.

Cependant, il haletait dans cette petite chambre chauffée depuis le matin par les ardoises de la toiture.

Bouvard lui dit : — À votre place, j'ôterais ma flanelle !

— Comment ! et Pécuchet baissa la tête, s'effrayant à l'hypothèse de ne plus avoir son gilet de santé.

— Faites-moi la conduite reprit Bouvard l'air extérieur vous rafraîchira.

Enfin Pécuchet repassa ses bottes, en grommelant : Vous m'ensorcelez ma parole d'honneur ! — et malgré la distance, il l'accompagna jusque chez lui au coin de la rue de Béthune, en face le pont de la Tournelle.

La chambre de Bouvard, bien cirée, avec des rideaux de percale et des meubles en acajou, jouissait d'un balcon ayant vue sur la rivière. Les deux ornements principaux étaient un porte-liqueurs au milieu de la commode, et le long de la glace des daguerréotypes représentant des amis ; une peinture à l'huile occupait l'alcôve.

— Mon oncle ! dit Bouvard, et le flambeau qu'il tenait éclaira un monsieur.

Des favoris rouges élargissaient son visage surmonté d'un toupet frisant par la pointe. Sa haute cravate avec le triple col de la chemise, du gilet de velours, et de l'habit noir l'engonçaient. On avait figuré des diamants sur le jabot. Ses yeux étaient bridés aux pommettes, et il souriait d'un petit air narquois.

Pécuchet ne put s'empêcher de dire : — On le prendrait plutôt pour votre père !

— C'est mon parrain répliqua Bouvard, négligemment, ajoutant qu'il s'appelait de ses noms de baptême François, Denys, Bartholomée. Ceux de Pécuchet étaient Juste, Romain, Cyrille ; — et ils avaient le même âge : quarante-sept ans ! Cette coïncidence leur fit plaisir ; mais les surprit, chacun ayant cru l'autre beaucoup moins jeune. Ensuite, ils admirèrent la Providence dont les combinaisons parfois sont merveilleuses. — Car, enfin, si nous n'étions pas sortis tantôt pour nous promener, nous aurions pu mourir avant de nous connaître ! et s'étant donné l'adresse de leurs patrons, ils se souhaitèrent une bonne nuit.

— N'allez pas voir les dames ! cria Bouvard dans l'escalier.

Pécuchet descendit les marches sans répondre à la gaudriole.

Le lendemain, dans la cour de MM. Descambos frères, — tissus d'Alsace rue Hautefeuille 92, une voix appela : — Bouvard ! Monsieur Bouvard !

Celui-ci passa la tête par les carreaux et reconnut Pécuchet qui articula plus fort.

— Je ne suis pas malade ! Je l'ai retirée !

— Quoi donc !

— Elle ! dit Pécuchet, en désignant sa poitrine.

Tous les propos de la journée, avec la température de l'appartement et les labeurs de la digestion l'avaient empêché de dormir, si bien que n'y tenant plus, il avait rejeté loin de lui sa flanelle. — Le matin, il s'était rappelé son action heureusement sans conséquence, et il venait en instruire Bouvard qui, par là, fut placé dans son estime à une prodigieuse hauteur.

Il était le fils d'un petit marchand, et n'avait pas connu sa mère, morte très jeune. On l'avait, à quinze ans, retiré de pension pour le mettre chez un huissier. Les gendarmes y survinrent ; et le patron fut envoyé aux galères, histoire farouche qui lui causait encore de l'épouvante. Ensuite, il avait essayé de plusieurs états, maître d'études, élève en pharmacie, comptable sur un des paquebots de la haute Seine. Enfin un chef de division séduit par son écriture, l'avait engagé comme expéditionnaire ; mais la conscience d'une instruction défectueuse, avec les besoins d'esprit qu'elle lui donnait, irritaient son humeur ; et il vivait complètement seul sans parents, sans maîtresse. Sa distraction était, le dimanche, d'inspecter les travaux publics.

Les plus vieux souvenirs de Bouvard le reportaient sur les bords de la Loire dans une cour de ferme. Un homme qui était son oncle, l'avait emmené à Paris pour lui apprendre le commerce. À sa majorité, on lui versa quelques mille francs. Alors il avait pris femme et ouvert une boutique de confiseur. Six mois plus tard, son épouse disparaissait, en emportant la caisse. Les amis, la bonne chère, et surtout la paresse avaient promptement achevé sa ruine. Mais il eut l'inspiration d'utiliser sa belle main ; et depuis douze ans, il se tenait dans la même place, MM. Descambos frères, tissus, rue Hautefeuille 92. Quant à son oncle, qui autrefois lui avait expédié comme souvenir le fameux portrait, Bouvard ignorait même sa résidence et n'en attendait plus rien. Quinze cents livres de revenu et ses gages de copiste lui permettaient d'aller, tous les soirs, faire un somme dans un estaminet.

Ainsi leur rencontre avait eu l'importance d'une aventure. Ils s'étaient, tout de suite, accrochés par des fibres secrètes. D'ailleurs, comment expliquer les sympathies ? Pourquoi telle particularité, telle imperfection indifférente ou odieuse dans celui-ci enchante-t-elle dans celui-là ? Ce qu'on appelle le coup de foudre est vrai pour toutes les passions. Avant la fin de la semaine, ils se tutoyèrent.

Souvent, ils venaient se chercher à leur comptoir. Dès que l'un paraissait, l'autre fermait son pupitre et ils s'en allaient ensemble dans les rues. Bouvard marchait à grandes enjambées, tandis que Pécuchet multipliant les pas, avec sa redingote qui lui battait les talons semblait glisser sur des roulettes. De même leurs goûts particuliers s'harmonisaient. Bouvard fumait la pipe, aimait le fromage, prenait régulièrement sa demi-tasse. Pécuchet prisait, ne mangeait au dessert que des confitures et trempait un morceau de sucre dans le café. L'un était confiant, étourdi, généreux. L'autre discret, méditatif, économe.

Pour lui être agréable, Bouvard voulut faire faire à Pécuchet la connaissance de Barberou. C'était un ancien commis-voyageur, actuellement boursier, très bon enfant, patriote, ami des dames, et qui affectait le langage faubourien. Pécuchet le trouva déplaisant et il conduisit Bouvard chez Dumouchel. Cet auteur — (car il avait publié une petite mnémotechnie) donnait des leçons de littérature dans un pensionnat de jeunes personnes, avait des opinions orthodoxes et la tenue sérieuse. Il ennuya Bouvard.

Aucun des deux n'avait caché à l'autre son opinion. Chacun en reconnut la justesse. Leurs habitudes changèrent ; et quittant leur pension bourgeoise, ils finirent par dîner ensemble tous les jours.

Ils faisaient des réflexions sur les pièces de théâtre dont on parlait, sur le gouvernement, la cherté des vivres, les fraudes du commerce. De temps à autre l'histoire du Collier ou le procès de Fualdès revenait dans leurs discours ; — et puis, ils cherchaient les causes de la Révolution.

Ils flânaient le long des boutiques de bric-à-brac. Ils visitèrent le Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, Saint-Denis, les Gobelins, les Invalides, et toutes les collections publiques. Quand on demandait leur passeport, ils faisaient mine de l'avoir perdu, se donnant pour deux étrangers, deux Anglais.

Dans les galeries du Muséum, ils passèrent avec ébahissement devant les quadrupèdes empaillés, avec plaisir devant les papillons, avec indifférence devant les métaux ; les fossiles les firent rêver, la conchyliologie les ennuya. Ils examinèrent les serres chaudes par les vitres, et frémirent en songeant que tous ces feuillages distillaient des poisons. Ce qu'ils admirèrent du cèdre, c'est qu'on l'eût rapporté dans un chapeau.

Ils s'efforcèrent au Louvre de s'enthousiasmer pour Raphaël. À la grande bibliothèque ils auraient voulu connaître le nombre exact des volumes.

Une fois, ils entrèrent au cours d'arabe du Collège de France ; et le professeur fut étonné de voir ces deux inconnus qui tâchaient de prendre des notes. Grâce à Barberou, ils pénétrèrent dans les coulisses d'un petit théâtre. Dumouchel leur procura des billets pour une séance de l'Académie. Ils s'informaient des découvertes, lisaient les prospectus et par cette curiosité leur intelligence se développa. Au fond d'un horizon plus lointain chaque jour, ils apercevaient des choses à la fois confuses et merveilleuses.

En admirant un vieux meuble, ils regrettaient de n'avoir pas vécu à l'époque où il servait, bien qu'ils ignorassent absolument cette époque-là. D'après de certains noms, ils imaginaient des pays d'autant plus beaux qu'ils n'en pouvaient rien préciser. Les ouvrages dont les titres étaient pour eux inintelligibles leur semblaient contenir un mystère.

Et ayant plus d'idées, ils eurent plus de souffrances. Quand une malle-poste les croisait dans les rues, ils sentaient le besoin de partir avec elle. Le quai aux Fleurs les faisait soupirer pour la campagne.

Un dimanche ils se mirent en marche dès le matin ; et passant par Meudon, Bellevue, Suresnes, Auteuil, tout le long du jour ils vagabondèrent entre les vignes, arrachèrent des coquelicots au bord des champs, dormirent sur l'herbe, burent du lait, mangèrent sous les acacias des guinguettes, et rentrèrent fort tard, poudreux, exténués, ravis. Ils renouvelèrent souvent ces promenades. Les lendemains étaient si tristes qu'ils finirent par s'en priver.

La monotonie du bureau leur devenait odieuse. Continuellement le grattoir et la sandaraque, le même encrier, les mêmes plumes et les mêmes compagnons ! Les jugeant stupides, ils leur parlaient de moins en moins ; cela leur valut des taquineries. Ils arrivaient tous les jours après l'heure, et reçurent des semonces.

Autrefois, ils se trouvaient presque heureux. Mais leur métier les humiliait depuis qu'ils s'estimaient davantage ; — et ils se renforçaient dans ce dégoût, s'exaltaient mutuellement, se gâtaient. Pécuchet contracta la brusquerie de Bouvard, Bouvard prit quelque chose de la morosité de Pécuchet.

— J'ai envie de me faire saltimbanque sur les places publiques ! disait l'un.

— Autant être chiffonnier s'écriait l'autre.

Quelle situation abominable ! Et nul moyen d'en sortir ! Pas même d'espérance !

Un après-midi (c'était le 20 janvier 1839) Bouvard étant à son comptoir reçut une lettre, apportée par le facteur.

Ses bras se levèrent, sa tête peu à peu se renversait, et il tomba évanoui sur le carreau.

Les commis se précipitèrent ; on lui ôta sa cravate ; on envoya chercher un médecin.

Il rouvrit les yeux — puis aux questions qu'on lui faisait : — Ah !... c'est que... c'est que... un peu d'air me soulagera. Non ! laissez-moi ! permettez ! et malgré sa corpulence, il courut tout d'une haleine jusqu'au ministère de la marine, se passant la main sur le front, croyant devenir fou, tâchant de se calmer.

Il fit demander Pécuchet.

Pécuchet parut.

— Mon oncle est mort ! j'hérite !

— Pas possible !

Bouvard montra les lignes suivantes :

ÉTUDE DE Me TARDIVEL, NOTAIRE. Savigny-en-Septaine 14

janvier 39.

« Monsieur,

« Je vous prie de vous rendre en mon étude, pour y prendre connaissance du testament de votre père naturel M. François, Denys, Bartholomée Bouvard, ex-négociant dans la ville de Nantes, décédé en cette commune le 10 du présent mois. Ce testament contient en votre faveur une disposition très importante.

« Agréez, Monsieur, l'assurance de mes respects.

« TARDIVEL, notaire. »

Pécuchet fut obligé de s'asseoir sur une borne dans la cour. Puis, il rendit le papier en disant lentement :

— Pourvu... que ce ne soit pas... quelque farce ?

— Tu crois que c'est une farce ! reprit Bouvard d'une voix étranglée, pareille à un râle de moribond.

Mais le timbre de la poste, le nom de l'étude en caractères d'imprimerie, la signature du notaire, tout prouvait l'authenticité de la nouvelle ; — et ils se regardèrent avec un tremblement du coin de la bouche et une larme qui roulait dans leurs yeux fixes.

L'espace leur manquait. Ils allèrent jusqu'à l'Arc de Triomphe, revinrent par le bord de l'eau, dépassèrent Notre-Dame. Bouvard était très rouge. Il donna à Pécuchet des coups de poing dans le dos, et pendant cinq minutes déraisonna complètement.

Ils ricanaient malgré eux. Cet héritage, bien sûr, devait se monter... ? — Ah ! ce serait trop beau ! n'en parlons plus. Ils en reparlaient.

Rien n'empêchait de demander tout de suite des explications. Bouvard écrivit au notaire pour en avoir.

Le notaire envoya la copie du testament, lequel se terminait ainsi : En conséquence je donne à François, Denys, Bartholomée Bouvard mon fils naturel reconnu, la portion de mes biens disponible par la loi.

Le bonhomme avait eu ce fils dans sa jeunesse, mais il l'avait tenu à l'écart soigneusement, le faisant passer pour un neveu ; et le neveu l'avait toujours appelé mon oncle, bien que sachant à quoi s'en tenir. Vers la quarantaine, M. Bouvard s'était marié, puis était devenu veuf. Ses deux fils légitimes ayant tourné contrairement à ses vues, un remords l'avait pris sur l'abandon où il laissait depuis tant d'années son autre enfant. Il l'eût même fait venir chez lui, sans l'influence de sa cuisinière. Elle le quitta grâce aux manoeuvres de la famille — et dans son isolement près de mourir, il voulut réparer ses torts en léguant au fruit de ses premières amours tout ce qu'il pouvait de sa fortune. Elle s'élevait à la moitié d'un million, ce qui faisait pour le copiste deux cent cinquante mille francs. L'aîné des frères, M. Étienne, avait annoncé qu'il respecterait le testament.

Bouvard tomba dans une sorte d'hébétude. Il répétait à voix basse, en souriant du sourire paisible des ivrognes :

— Quinze mille livres de rente ! et Pécuchet, dont la tête pourtant était plus forte, n'en revenait pas.

Ils furent secoués brusquement par une lettre de Tardivel. L'autre fils, M. Alexandre, déclarait son intention de régler tout devant la justice, et même d'attaquer le legs s'il le pouvait, exigeant au préalable scellés, inventaire, nomination d'un séquestre, etc. ! Bouvard en eut une maladie bilieuse. À peine convalescent, il s'embarqua pour Savigny — d'où il revint, sans conclusion d'aucune sorte et déplorant ses frais de voyage.

Puis ce furent des insomnies, des alternatives de colère et d'espoir, d'exaltation et d'abattement. Enfin, au bout de six mois, le sieur Alexandre s'apaisant, Bouvard entra en possession de l'héritage.

Son premier cri avait été : — Nous nous retirerons à la campagne ! et ce mot qui liait son ami à son bonheur, Pécuchet l'avait trouvé tout simple. Car l'union de ces deux hommes était absolue et profonde.

Mais comme il ne voulait point vivre aux crochets de Bouvard, il ne partirait pas avant sa retraite. Encore deux ans ; n'importe ! Il demeura inflexible et la chose fut décidée.

Pour savoir où s'établir, ils passèrent en revue toutes les provinces. Le Nord était fertile mais trop froid, le Midi enchanteur par son climat, mais incommode vu les moustiques, et le Centre franchement n'avait rien de curieux. La Bretagne leur aurait convenu sans l'esprit cagot des habitants. Quant aux régions de l'Est, à cause du patois germanique, il n'y fallait pas songer. Mais il y avait d'autres pays. Qu'était-ce par exemple que le Forez, le Bugey, le Roumois ? Les cartes de géographie n'en disaient rien. Du reste, que leur maison fût dans tel endroit ou dans tel autre, l'important c'est qu'ils en auraient une.

Déjà, ils se voyaient en manches de chemise, au bord d'une plate-bande émondant des rosiers, et bêchant, binant, maniant de la terre, dépotant des tulipes. Ils se réveilleraient au chant de l'alouette, pour suivre les charrues, iraient avec un panier cueillir des pommes, regarderaient faire le beurre, battre le grain, tondre les moutons, soigner les ruches, et se délecteraient au mugissement des vaches et à la senteur des foin coupés. Plus d'écritures ! plus de chefs ! plus même de terme à payer ! — Car ils posséderaient un domicile à eux ! et ils mangeraient les poules de leur basse-cour, les légumes de leur jardin, et dîneraient en gardant leurs sabots ! — Nous ferons tout ce qui nous plaira ! nous laisserons pousser notre barbe !

Ils s'achetèrent des instruments horticoles, puis un tas de choses qui pourraient peut-être servir telles qu'une boîte à outils (il en faut toujours dans une maison), ensuite des balances, une chaîne d'arpenteur, une baignoire en cas qu'ils ne fussent malades, un thermomètre, et même un baromètre système Gay-Lussac pour des expériences de physique, si la fantaisie leur en prenait. Il ne serait pas mal, non plus (car on ne peut pas toujours travailler dehors), d'avoir quelques bons ouvrages de littérature ; — et ils en cherchèrent, — fort embarrassés parfois de savoir si tel livre était vraiment un livre de bibliothèque. Bouvard tranchait la question.

— Eh ! nous n'aurons pas besoin de bibliothèque.

— D'ailleurs, j'ai la mienne disait Pécuchet.

D'avance, ils s'organisaient. Bouvard emporterait ses meubles, Pécuchet sa grande table noire ; on tirerait parti des rideaux et avec un peu de batterie de cuisine ce serait bien suffisant. Ils s'étaient juré de taire tout cela ; mais leur figure rayonnait. Aussi leurs collègues les trouvaient drôles. Bouvard, qui écrivait étalé sur son pupitre et les coudes en dehors pour mieux arrondir sa bâtarde, poussait son espèce de sifflement tout en clignant d'un air malin ses lourdes paupières. Pécuchet huché sur un grand tabouret de paille soignait toujours les jambages de sa longue écriture — mais en gonflant les narines pinçait les lèvres, comme s'il avait peur de lâcher son secret.

Après dix-huit mois de recherches, ils n'avaient rien trouvé. Ils firent des voyages dans tous les environs de Paris, et depuis Amiens jusqu'à Évreux, et de Fontainebleau jusqu'au Havre. Ils voulaient une campagne qui fût bien la campagne, sans tenir précisément à un site pittoresque, mais un horizon borné les attristait. Ils fuyaient le voisinage des habitations et redoutaient pourtant la solitude.

Quelquefois, ils se décidaient, puis craignant de se repentir plus tard, ils changeaient d'avis, l'endroit leur ayant paru malsain, ou exposé au vent de mer, ou trop près d'une manufacture ou d'un abord difficile.

Barberou les sauva.

Il connaissait leur rêve, et un beau jour vint leur dire qu'on lui avait parlé d'un domaine à Chavignolles, entre Caen et Falaise. Cela consistait en une ferme de trente-huit hectares, avec une manière de château et un jardin en plein rapport.

Ils se transportèrent dans le Calvados ; et ils furent enthousiasmés. Seulement, tant de la ferme que de la maison (l'une ne serait pas vendue sans l'autre) on exigeait cent quarante-trois mille francs. Bouvard n'en donnait que cent vingt mille.

Pécuchet combattit son entêtement, le pria de céder, enfin déclara qu'il compléterait le surplus. C'était toute sa fortune, provenant du patrimoine de sa mère et de ses économies. Jamais il n'en avait soufflé mot, réservant ce capital pour une grande occasion.

Tout fut payé vers la fin de 1840, six mois avant sa retraite.

Bouvard n'était plus copiste. D'abord, il avait continué ses fonctions par défiance de l'avenir, mais s'en était démis, une fois certain de l'héritage. Cependant il retournait volontiers chez les Messieurs Descambos, et la veille de son départ il offrit un punch à tout le comptoir.

Pécuchet, au contraire, fut maussade pour ses collègues, et sortit le dernier jour, en claquant la porte brutalement.

Il avait à surveiller les emballages, faire un tas de commissions, d'emplètes encore, et prendre congé de Dumouchel !

Le professeur lui proposa un commerce épistolaire, où il le tiendrait au courant de la Littérature ; et après des félicitations nouvelles lui souhaita une bonne santé. Barberou se montra plus sensible en recevant l'adieu de Bouvard. Il abandonna exprès une partie de dominos, promit d'aller le voir là-bas, commanda deux anisettes et l'embrassa.

Bouvard, rentré chez lui, aspira sur son balcon une large bouffée d'air en se disant : Enfin. Les lumières des quais tremblaient dans l'eau, le roulement des omnibus au loin s'apaisait. Il se rappela des jours heureux passés dans cette grande ville, des pique-niques au restaurant, des soirs au théâtre, les commérages de sa portière, toutes ses habitudes ; et il sentit une défaillance de coeur, une tristesse qu'il n'osait pas s'avouer.

Pécuchet jusqu'à deux heures du matin se promena dans sa chambre. Il ne reviendrait plus là ; tant mieux ! et cependant, pour laisser quelque chose de lui, il grava son nom sur le plâtre de la cheminée.

Le plus gros du bagage était parti dès la veille. Les instruments de jardin, les couchettes, les matelas, les tables, les chaises, un caléfacteur, la baignoire et trois fûts de Bourgogne iraient par la Seine, jusqu'au Havre, et de là seraient expédiés sur Caen, où Bouvard qui les attendrait les ferait parvenir à Chavignolles. Mais le portrait de son père, les fauteuils, la cave à liqueurs, les bouquins, la pendule, tous les objets précieux furent mis dans une voiture de déménagement qui s'acheminerait par Nonancourt, Verneuil et Falaise. Pécuchet voulut l'accompagner.

Il s'installa auprès du conducteur, sur la banquette, et couvert de sa plus vieille redingote, avec un cache-nez, des mitaines et sa chancelière de bureau, le dimanche 20 mars, au petit jour, il sortit de la Capitale.

Le mouvement et la nouveauté du voyage l'occupèrent les premières heures. Puis les chevaux se ralentirent, ce qui amena des disputes avec le conducteur et le charretier. Ils choisissaient d'exécrables auberges et bien qu'ils répondissent de tout, Pécuchet par excès de prudence couchait dans les mêmes gîtes. Le lendemain on repartait dès l'aube ; et la route, toujours la même, s'allongeait en montant jusqu'au bord de l'horizon. Les mètres de cailloux se succédaient, les fossés étaient pleins d'eau, la campagne s'étalait par grandes surfaces d'un vert monotone et froid, des nuages couraient dans le ciel, de temps à autre la pluie tombait. Le troisième jour des bourrasques s'élevèrent. La bâche du chariot, mal attachée, claquait au vent comme la voile d'un navire. Pécuchet baissait la figure sous sa casquette, et chaque fois qu'il ouvrait sa tabatière, il lui fallait, pour garantir ses yeux, se retourner complètement. Pendant les cahots, il entendait osciller derrière lui tout son bagage et prodiguait les recommandations. Voyant qu'elles ne servaient à rien, il changea de tactique ; il fit le bon enfant, eut des complaisances ; dans les montées pénibles, il poussait à la roue avec les hommes ; il en vint jusqu'à leur payer le gloria après les repas. Ils filèrent dès lors plus lestement, si bien qu'aux environs de Gauburge l'essieu se rompit et le chariot resta penché. Pécuchet visita tout de suite l'intérieur ; les tasses de porcelaine gisaient en morceaux. Il leva les bras, en grinçant des dents, maudit ces deux imbéciles ; et la journée suivante fut perdue, à cause du charretier qui se grisa ; mais il n'eut pas la force de se plaindre, la coupe d'amertume étant remplie.

Bouvard n'avait quitté Paris que le surlendemain, pour dîner encore une fois avec Barberou. Il arriva dans la cour des messageries à la dernière minute, puis se réveilla devant la cathédrale de Rouen ; il s'était trompé de diligence.

Le soir toutes les places pour Caen étaient retenues ; ne sachant que faire, il alla au Théâtre des Arts, et il souriait à ses voisins, disant qu'il était retiré du négoce et nouvellement acquéreur d'un domaine aux alentours. Quand il débarqua le vendredi à Caen ses ballots n'y étaient pas. Il les reçut le dimanche, et les expédia sur une charrette, ayant prévenu le fermier qu'il les suivrait de quelques heures.

À Falaise, le neuvième jour de son voyage, Pécuchet prit un cheval de renfort, et jusqu'au coucher du soleil on marcha bien. Au delà de Bretteville, ayant quitté la grande route, il s'engagea dans un chemin de traverse, croyant voir à chaque minute le pignon de Chavignolles. Cependant les ornières s'effaçaient, elles disparurent, et ils se trouvèrent au milieu des champs labourés. La nuit tombait. Que devenir ? Enfin Pécuchet abandonna le chariot, et pataugeant dans la boue, s'avança devant lui à la découverte. Quand il approchait des fermes, les chiens aboyaient. Il criait de toutes ses forces pour demander sa route. On ne répondait pas. Il avait peur et regagnait le large. Tout à coup deux lanternes brillèrent. Il aperçut un cabriolet, s'élança pour le rejoindre. Bouvard était dedans.

Mais où pouvait être la voiture du déménagement ? Pendant une heure, ils la hélèrent dans les ténèbres. Enfin, elle se retrouva, et ils arrivèrent à Chavignolles.

Un grand feu de broussailles et de pommes de pin flambait dans la salle. Deux couverts y étaient mis. Les meubles arrivés sur la charrette encombraient le vestibule. Rien ne manquait. Ils s'attablèrent.

On leur avait préparé une soupe à l'oignon, un poulet, du lard et des oeufs durs. La vieille femme qui faisait la cuisine venait de temps à autre s'informer de leurs goûts. Ils répondaient : Oh très bon ! très bon ! et le gros pain difficile à couper, la crème, les noix, tout les délecta ! Le carrelage avait des trous, les murs suintaient. Cependant, ils promenaient autour d'eux un regard de satisfaction, en mangeant sur la petite table où brûlait une chandelle. Leurs figures étaient rougies par le grand air. Ils tendaient leur ventre, ils s'appuyaient sur le dossier de leur chaise, qui en craquait, et ils se répétaient : — Nous y voilà donc ! quel bonheur ! il me semble que c'est un rêve !

Bien qu'il fût minuit, Pécuchet eut l'idée de faire un tour dans le jardin. Bouvard ne s'y refusa pas. Ils prirent la chandelle, et l'abritant avec un vieux journal, se promenèrent le long des plates-bandes.

Ils avaient plaisir à nommer tout haut les légumes : Tiens : des carottes !

Ah ! des choux.

Ensuite, ils inspectèrent les espaliers. Pécuchet tâcha de découvrir des bourgeons. Quelquefois une araignée fuyait tout à coup sur le mur ; — et les deux ombres de leur corps s'y dessinaient agrandies, en répétant leurs gestes. Les pointes des herbes dégouttelaient de rosée. La nuit était complètement noire ; et tout se tenait immobile dans un grand silence, une grande douceur. Au loin, un coq chanta.

Leurs deux chambres avaient entre elles une petite porte que le papier de la tenture masquait. En la heurtant avec une commode, on venait d'en faire sauter les clous. Ils la trouvèrent béante. Ce fut une surprise.

Déshabillés et dans leur lit, ils bavardèrent quelque temps, puis s'endormirent ; Bouvard sur le dos, la bouche ouverte, tête nue, Pécuchet sur le flanc droit, les genoux au ventre, affublé d'un bonnet de coton ; — et tous les deux ronflaient sous le clair de la lune, qui entrait par les fenêtres.

CHAPITRE II

Quelle joie, le lendemain en se réveillant ! Bouvard fuma une pipe, et Pécuchet huma une prise, qu'ils déclarèrent la meilleure de leur existence. Puis ils se mirent à la croisée, pour voir le paysage.

On avait en face de soi les champs, à droite une grange, avec le clocher de l'église, — et à gauche un rideau de peupliers.

Deux allées principales, formant la croix, divisaient le jardin en quatre morceaux. Les légumes étaient compris dans les plates-bandes, où se dressaient, de place en place, des cyprès nains et des quenouilles. D'un côté, une tonnelle aboutissait à un vigneau, de l'autre un mur soutenait les espaliers ; — et une claire-voie, dans le fond, donnait sur la campagne. Il y avait au delà du mur un verger, après la charmille un bosquet, derrière la claire-voie un petit chemin.

Ils contemplaient cet ensemble, quand un homme à chevelure grisonnante et vêtu d'un paletot noir, longea le sentier, en raclant avec sa canne tous les barreaux de la claire-voie. La vieille servante leur apprit que c'était M. Vaucorbeil, un docteur fameux dans l'arrondissement.

Les autres notables étaient le comte de Faverges, autrefois député, et dont on citait les vacheries, le maire M. Foureau qui vendait du bois, du plâtre, toute espèce de choses, M. Marescot le notaire, l'abbé Jeufroy, et Mme veuve Bordin, vivant de son revenu. — Quant à elle, on l'appelait la Germaine, à cause de feu Germain son mari. Elle faisait des journées mais aurait voulu passer au service de ces messieurs. Ils l'acceptèrent, et partirent pour leur ferme, située à un kilomètre de distance.

Quand ils entrèrent dans la cour, le fermier, maître Gouy, vociférait contre un garçon et la fermière sur un escabeau, serrait entre ses jambes une dinde qu'elle empâtait avec des gobes de farine. L'homme avait le front bas, le nez fin, le regard en dessous, et les épaules robustes. La femme était très blonde, avec les pommettes tachetées de son, et cet air de simplicité que l'on voit aux manants sur le vitrail des églises.

Dans la cuisine, des bottes de chanvre étaient suspendues au plafond. Trois vieux fusils s'échelonnaient sur la haute cheminée. Un dressoir chargé de faïences à fleurs occupait le milieu de la muraille ; — et les carreaux en verre de bouteille jetaient sur les ustensiles de fer-blanc et de cuivre rouge une lumière blafarde.

Les deux Parisiens désiraient faire leur inspection, n'ayant vu la propriété qu'une fois, sommairement. Maître Gouy et son épouse les escortèrent ; — et la kyrielle des plaintes commença.

Tous les bâtiments, depuis la charreterie jusqu'à la bouillerie, avaient besoin de réparations. Il aurait fallu construire une succursale pour les fromages, mettre aux barrières des ferrements neufs, relever les hauts-bords, creuser la mare et replanter considérablement de pommiers dans les trois cours.

Ensuite, on visita les cultures. Maître Gouy les déprécia. Elles mangeaient trop de fumier ; les charrois étaient dispendieux, — impossible d'extraire les cailloux, la mauvaise herbe empoisonnait les prairies ; — et ce dénigrement de sa terre atténua le plaisir que Bouvard sentait à marcher dessus.

Ils s'en revinrent par la cavée, sous une avenue de hêtres. La maison montrait de ce côté-là, sa cour d'honneur et sa façade.

Elle était peinte en blanc, avec des réchamps de couleur jaune. Le hangar et le cellier, le fournil et le bûcher faisaient en retour deux ailes plus basses. La cuisine communiquait avec une petite salle. On rencontrait ensuite le vestibule, une deuxième salle plus grande, et le salon. Les quatre chambres au premier s'ouvraient sur le corridor qui regardait la cour. Pécuchet en prit une pour ses collections ; la dernière fut destinée à la bibliothèque ; et comme ils ouvraient les armoires, ils trouvèrent d'autres bouquins, mais n'eurent pas la fantaisie d'en lire les titres. Le plus pressé, c'était le jardin.

Bouvard, en passant près de la charmille découvrit sous les branches une dame en plâtre. Avec deux doigts, elle écartait sa jupe, les genoux pliés, la tête sur l'épaule, comme craignant d'être surprise. — Ah ! pardon ! ne vous gênez pas ! — et cette plaisanterie les amusa tellement que vingt fois par jour pendant plus de trois semaines, ils la répétèrent.

Cependant, les bourgeois de Chavignolles désiraient les connaître — on venait les observer par la claire-voie. Ils en bouchèrent les ouvertures avec des planches. La population fut contrariée.

Pour se garantir du soleil, Bouvard portait sur la tête un mouchoir noué en turban, Pécuchet sa casquette ; et il avait un grand tablier avec une poche par devant, dans laquelle ballottaient un sécateur, son foulard et sa tabatière. Les bras nus, et côte à côte, ils labouraient, sarclaient, émondaient, s'imposaient des tâches, mangeaient le plus vite possible ; — mais allaient prendre le café sur le vigneau, pour jouir du point de vue.

S'ils rencontraient un limaçon, ils s'approchaient de lui, et l'écrasaient en faisant une grimace du coin de la bouche, comme pour casser une noix. Ils ne sortaient pas sans leur louchet, — et coupaient en deux les vers blancs d'une telle force que le fer de l'outil s'en enfonçait de trois pouces. Pour se délivrer des chenilles, ils battaient les arbres, à grands coups de gaule, furieusement.

Bouvard planta une pivoine au milieu du gazon — et des pommes d'amour qui devaient retomber comme des lustres, sous l'arceau de la tonnelle.

Pécuchet fit creuser devant la cuisine, un large trou, et le disposa en trois compartiments, où il fabriquerait des composts qui feraient pousser un tas de choses dont les détritrus amèneraient d'autres récoltes, procurant d'autres engrais, tout cela indéfiniment ; — et il rêvait au bord de la fosse, apercevant dans l'avenir, des montagnes de fruits, des débordements de fleurs, des avalanches de légumes. Mais le fumier de cheval si utile pour les couches lui manquait. Les cultivateurs n'en vendaient pas ; les aubergistes en refusèrent. Enfin, après beaucoup de recherches, malgré les instances de Bouvard, et abjurant toute pudeur, il prit le parti d'aller lui-même au crottin !

C'est au milieu de cette occupation que Mme Bordin, un jour, l'accosta sur la grande route. Quand elle l'eut complimenté, elle s'informa de son ami. Les yeux noirs de cette personne, très brillants bien que petits, ses hautes couleurs, son aplomb (elle avait même un peu de moustache) intimidèrent Pécuchet. Il répondit brièvement et tourna le dos — impolitesse que blâma Bouvard.

Puis les mauvais jours survinrent, la neige, les grands froids. Ils s'installèrent dans la cuisine, et faisaient du treillage ; ou bien parcouraient les chambres, causaient au coin du feu, regardaient la pluie tomber.

Dès la mi-carême, ils guettèrent le printemps, et répétaient chaque matin : tout part. Mais la saison fut tardive ; et ils consolaient leur impatience, en disant : tout va partir.

Ils virent enfin lever les petits pois. Les asperges donnèrent beaucoup.

La vigne promettait.

Puisqu'ils s'entendaient au jardinage, ils devaient réussir dans l'agriculture ; — et l'ambition les prit de cultiver leur ferme. Avec du bon sens et de l'étude ils s'en tireraient, sans aucun doute.

D'abord, il fallait voir comment on opérait chez les autres ; — et ils rédigèrent une lettre, où ils demandaient à M. de Faverges l'honneur de visiter son exploitation. Le Comte leur donna tout de suite un rendez-vous.

Après une heure de marche, ils arrivèrent sur le versant d'un coteau qui domine la vallée de l'Orne. La rivière coulait au fond, avec des sinuosités. Des blocs de grès rouge s'y dressaient de place en place, et des roches plus grandes formaient au loin comme une falaise surplombant la campagne, couverte de blés mûrs. En face, sur l'autre colline, la verdure était si abondante qu'elle cachait les maisons. Des arbres la divisaient en carrés inégaux, se marquant au milieu de l'herbe par des lignes plus sombres.

L'ensemble du domaine apparut tout à coup. Des toits de tuiles indiquaient la ferme. Le château à façade blanche se trouvait sur la droite avec un bois au delà, et une pelouse descendait jusqu'à la rivière où des platanes alignés reflétaient leur ombre.

Les deux amis entrèrent dans une luzerne qu'on fanait. Des femmes portant des chapeaux de paille, des marmottes d'indienne ou des visières de papier, soulevaient avec des râteaux le foin laissé par terre — et à l'autre bout de la plaine, auprès des meules, on jetait des bottes vivement dans une longue charrette, attelée de trois chevaux. M. le Comte s'avança suivi de son régisseur.

Il avait un costume de basin, la taille raide et les favoris en côtelette, l'air à la fois d'un magistrat et d'un dandy. Les traits de sa figure, même quand il parlait, ne remuaient pas.

Les premières politesses échangées, il exposa son système relativement aux fourrages ; on retournait les andains sans les éparpiller, les meules devaient être coniques, et les bottes faites immédiatement sur place, puis entassées par dizaines. Quant au râteleur anglais, la prairie était trop inégale pour un pareil instrument.

Une petite fille les pieds nus dans des savates, et dont le corps se montrait par les déchirures de sa robe, donnait à boire aux femmes, en versant du cidre d'un broc, qu'elle appuyait contre sa hanche. Le comte demanda d'où venait cet enfant ; on n'en savait rien. Les faneuses l'avaient recueillie pour les servir pendant la moisson. Il haussa les épaules, et tout en s'éloignant proféra quelques plaintes sur l'immoralité de nos campagnes.

Bouvard fit l'éloge de sa luzerne. Elle était assez bonne, en effet, malgré les ravages de la cuscute ; les futurs agronomes ouvrirent les yeux au mot cuscute. Vu le nombre de ses bestiaux, il s'appliquait aux prairies artificielles ; c'était d'ailleurs un bon précédent pour les autres récoltes, ce qui n'a pas toujours lieu avec les racines fourragères. — Cela du moins me paraît incontestable.

Bouvard et Pécuchet reprirent ensemble : Oh ! incontestable.

Ils étaient sur la limite d'un champ tout plat, soigneusement ameubli. Un cheval que l'on conduisait à la main traînait un large coffre monté sur trois roues. Sept coutres, disposés en bas, ouvraient parallèlement des raies fines, dans lesquelles le grain tombait par des tuyaux descendant jusqu'au sol.

— Ici dit le comte je sème des turneps. Le turnep est la base de ma culture quadriennale et il entamait la démonstration du semoir. Mais un domestique vint le chercher. On avait besoin de lui, au château.

Son régisseur le remplaça, homme à figure chafouine et de façons obséquieuses.

Il conduisit ces messieurs vers un autre champ, où quatorze moissonneurs, la poitrine nue et les jambes écartées, fauchaient des seigles. Les fers sifflaient dans la paille qui se versait à droite. Chacun décrivait devant soi un large demi-cercle, et tous sur la même ligne, ils avançaient en même temps. Les deux Parisiens admirèrent leurs bras et se sentaient pris d'une vénération presque religieuse pour l'opulence de la terre.

Ils longèrent ensuite plusieurs pièces en labour. Le crépuscule tombait ; des corneilles s'abattaient dans les sillons.

Puis ils rencontrèrent le troupeau. Les moutons, çà et là, pâturaient et on entendait leur continuel broutement. Le berger, assis sur un tronc d'arbre, tricotait un bas de laine, ayant son chien près de lui.

Le régisseur aida Bouvard et Pécuchet à franchir un échelier, et ils traversèrent deux mesures, où des vaches ruminaient sous les pommiers.

Tous les bâtiments de la ferme étaient contigus et occupaient les trois côtés de la cour. Le travail s'y faisait à la mécanique, au moyen d'une turbine, utilisant un ruisseau qu'on avait, exprès, détourné. Des bandelettes de cuir allaient d'un toit dans l'autre, et au milieu du fumier une pompe de fer manoeuvrait.

Le régisseur fit observer dans les bergeries de petites ouvertures à ras du sol, et dans les cases aux cochons, des portes ingénieuses, pouvant d'elles mêmes se fermer.

La grange était voûtée comme une cathédrale avec des arceaux de briques reposant sur des murs de pierre.

Pour divertir les messieurs, une servante jeta devant les poules des poignées d'avoine. L'arbre du pressoir leur parut gigantesque, et ils montèrent dans le pigeonnier. La laiterie spécialement les émerveilla. Des robinets dans les coins fournissaient assez d'eau pour inonder les dalles ; et en entrant, une fraîcheur vous surprenait. Des jarres brunes, alignées sur des claires-voies étaient pleines de lait jusqu'aux bords. Des terrines moins profondes contenaient de la crème. Les pains de beurre se suivaient, pareils aux tronçons d'une colonne de cuivre, et de la mousse débordait les seaux de fer-blanc, qu'on venait de poser par terre.

Mais le bijou de la ferme c'était la bouverie. Des barreaux de bois scellés perpendiculairement dans toute sa longueur la divisaient en deux sections, la première pour le bétail, la seconde pour le service. On y voyait à peine, toutes les meurtrières étant closes. Les boeufs mangeaient attachés à des chaînettes et leurs corps exhalaient une chaleur, que le plafond bas rabattait. Mais quelqu'un donna du jour. Un filet d'eau, tout à coup se répandit dans la rigole qui bordait les râteliers. Des mugissements s'élevèrent. Les cornes faisaient comme un cliquetis de bâtons. Tous les boeufs avancèrent leurs mufles entre les barreaux et buvaient lentement.

Les grands attelages entrèrent dans la cour et des poulains hennirent. Au rez-de-chaussée, deux ou trois lanternes s'allumèrent, puis disparurent. Les gens de travail passaient en traînant leurs sabots sur les cailloux — et la cloche pour le souper tinta.

Les deux visiteurs s'en allèrent.

Tout ce qu'ils avaient vu les enchantait. Leur décision fut prise. Dès le soir, ils tirèrent de leur bibliothèque les quatre volumes de la Maison Rustique, se firent expédier le cours de Gasparin, et s'abonnèrent à un journal d'agriculture.

Pour se rendre aux foires plus commodément, ils achetèrent une carriole que Bouvard conduisait.

Habillés d'une blouse bleue, avec un chapeau à larges bords, des guêtres jusqu'aux genoux et un bâton de maquignon à la main, ils rôdaient autour des bestiaux, questionnaient les laboureurs, et ne manquaient pas d'assister à tous les comices agricoles.

Bientôt, ils fatiguèrent maître Gouy de leurs conseils, déplorant principalement son système de jachères. Mais le fermier tenait à sa routine. Il demanda la remise d'un terme sous prétexte de la grêle. Quant aux redevances, il n'en fournit aucune. Devant les réclamations les plus justes, sa femme poussait des cris. Enfin, Bouvard déclara son intention de ne pas renouveler le bail.

Dès lors maître Gouy épargna les fumures, laissa pousser les mauvaises herbes, ruina le fonds. Et il s'en alla d'un air farouche qui indiquait des plans de vengeance.

Bouvard avait pensé que vingt mille francs, c'est-à-dire plus de quatre fois le prix du fermage, suffirait au début. Son notaire de Paris les envoya.

Leur exploitation comprenait quinze hectares en cours et prairies, vingt-trois en terres arables, et cinq en friche situés sur un monticule couvert de cailloux et qu'on appelait la Butte.

Ils se procurèrent tous les instruments indispensables, quatre chevaux, douze vaches, six porcs, cent soixante moutons — et comme personnel, deux charretiers, deux femmes, un valet, un berger, de plus un gros chien.

Pour avoir tout de suite de l'argent ils vendirent leurs fourrages ; — on les paya chez eux ; l'or des napoléons comptés sur le coffre à l'avoine leur parut plus reluisant qu'un autre, extraordinaire et meilleur.

Au mois de novembre ils brassèrent du cidre. C'était Bouvard qui fouettait le cheval et Pécuchet monté dans l'auge retournait le marc avec une pelle. Ils haletaient en serrant la vis, puchaient dans la cuve, surveillaient les bondes, portaient de lourds sabots, s'amusaient énormément.

Partant de ce principe qu'on ne saurait avoir trop de blé, ils supprimèrent la moitié environ de leurs prairies artificielles, et comme ils n'avaient pas d'engrais ils se servirent de tourteaux qu'ils enterrèrent sans les concasser, — si bien que le rendement fut pitoyable.

L'année suivante, ils firent les semailles très dru. Des orages survinrent. Les épis versèrent.

Néanmoins, ils s'acharnaient au froment ; et ils entreprirent d'épierrer la Butte ; un bannau emportait les cailloux. Tout le long de l'année, du matin jusqu'au soir, par la pluie, par le soleil, on voyait l'éternel bannau avec le même homme et le même cheval, gravir, descendre et remonter la petite colline. Quelquefois Bouvard marchait derrière, faisant des haltes à mi-côte pour s'éponger le front.

Ne se fiant à personne, ils traitaient eux-mêmes les animaux, leur administraient des purgations, des clystères.

De graves désordres eurent lieu. La fille de basse-cour devint enceinte. Ils prirent des gens mariés ; les enfants pullulèrent, les cousins, les cousines, les oncles, les belles-soeurs. Une horde vivait à leurs dépens ; — et ils résolurent de coucher dans la ferme, à tour de rôle.

Mais le soir, ils étaient tristes. La malpropreté de la chambre les offusquait ; — et Germaine qui apportait les repas, grommelait à chaque voyage. On les dupait de toutes les façons. Les batteurs en grange fourraient du blé dans leur cruche à boire. Pécuchet en surprit un, et s'écria, en le poussant dehors par les épaules :

— Misérable ! tu es la honte du village qui t'a vu naître !

Sa personne n'inspirait aucun respect. — D'ailleurs, il avait des remords à l'encontre du jardin. Tout son temps ne serait pas de trop pour le tenir en bon état. — Bouvard s'occuperait de la ferme. Ils en délibérèrent ; et cet arrangement fut décidé.

Le premier point était d'avoir de bonnes couches. Pécuchet en fit construire une, en briques. Il peignit lui-même les châssis, et redoutant les coups de soleil barbouilla de craie toutes les cloches.

Il eut la précaution pour les boutures d'enlever les têtes avec les feuilles. Ensuite, il s'appliqua aux marcottages. Il essaya plusieurs sortes de greffes, greffes en flûte, en couronne, en écusson, greffe herbacée, greffe anglaise. Avec quel soin, il ajustait les deux libers ! comme il serrait les ligatures ! quel amas d'onguent pour les recouvrir !

Deux fois par jour, il prenait son arrosoir et le balançait sur les plantes, comme s'il les eût encensées. À mesure qu'elles verdissaient sous l'eau qui tombait en pluie fine, il lui semblait se désaltérer et renaître avec elles. Puis cédant à une ivresse il arrachait la pomme de l'arrosoir, et versait à plein goulot, copieusement.

Au bout de la charmille près de la dame en plâtre, s'élevait une manière de cahute faite en rondins. Pécuchet y enfermait ses instruments ; et il passait là des heures délicieuses à éplucher les graines, à écrire des étiquettes, à mettre en ordre ses petits pots. Pour se reposer, il s'asseyait devant la porte, sur une caisse, et alors projetait des embellissements.

Il avait créé au bas du perron deux corbeilles de géraniums ; entre les cyprès et les quenouilles, il planta des tournesols ; — et comme les plates-bandes étaient couvertes de boutons d'or, et toutes les allées de sable neuf, le jardin éblouissait par une abondance de couleurs jaunes.

Mais la couche fourmilla de larves ; — et malgré les réchauds de feuilles mortes, sous les châssis peints et sous les cloches barbouillées, il ne poussa que des végétations rachitiques. Les boutures ne reprirent pas ; les greffes se décollèrent ; la sève des marcottes s'arrêta, les arbres avaient le blanc dans leurs racines ; les semis furent une désolation. Le vent s'amusait à jeter bas les rames des haricots. L'abondance de la gadoue nuisit aux fraisiers, le défaut de pinçage aux tomates.

Il manqua les brocolis, les aubergines, les navets — et du cresson de fontaine, qu'il avait voulu élever dans un baquet. Après le dégel, tous les artichauts étaient perdus.

Les choux le consolèrent. Un, surtout, lui donna des espérances. Il s'épanouissait, montait, finit par être prodigieux, et absolument incontestable. N'importe ! Pécuchet fut content de posséder un monstre.

Alors il tenta ce qui lui semblait être le summum de l'art : l'élève du melon.

Il sema les graines de plusieurs variétés dans des assiettes remplies de terreau, qu'il enfouit dans sa couche. Puis, il dressa une autre couche ; et quand elle eut jeté son feu repiqua les plants les plus beaux, avec des cloches par-dessus. Il fit toutes les tailles suivant les préceptes du bon jardinier, respecta les fleurs, laissa se nouer les fruits, en choisit un sur chaque bras, supprima les autres ; et dès qu'ils eurent la grosseur d'une noix, il glissa sous leur écorce une planchette pour les empêcher de pourrir au contact du crottin. Il les bassinait, les aéraït, enlevait avec son mouchoir la brume des cloches — et si des nuages paraissaient, il apportait vivement des paillassons. La nuit, il n'en dormait pas. Plusieurs fois même, il se releva ; et pieds nus dans ses bottes, en chemise, grelottant, il traversait tout le jardin pour aller mettre sur les bâches la couverture de son lit.

Les cantaloups mûrirent.

Au premier, Bouvard fit la grimace. Le second ne fut pas meilleur, le troisième non plus ; Pécuchet trouvait pour chacun une excuse nouvelle, jusqu'au dernier qu'il jeta par la fenêtre, déclarant n'y rien comprendre.

En effet, comme il avait cultivé les unes près des autres des espèces différentes, les sucrons s'étaient confondus avec les maraîchers, le gros Portugal avec le grand Mogol — et le voisinage des pommes d'amour complétant l'anarchie, il en était résulté d'abominables mulets qui avaient le goût de citrouilles.

Alors Pécuchet se tourna vers les fleurs. Il écrivit à Dumouchel pour avoir des arbustes avec des graines, acheta une provision de terre de bruyère et se mit à l'oeuvre résolument.

Mais il planta des passiflores à l'ombre, des pensées au soleil, couvrit de fumier les jacinthes, arrosa les lys après leur floraison, détruisit les rhododendrons par des excès d'abattage, stimula les fuchsias avec de la colle forte, et rôtit un grenadier, en l'exposant au feu dans la cuisine.

Aux approches du froid, il abrita les églantiers sous des dômes de papier fort enduits de chandelle ; cela faisait comme des pains de sucre, tenus en l'air par des bâtons. Les tuteurs des dahlias étaient gigantesques ; — et on apercevait, entre ces lignes droites les rameaux tortueux d'un sophora-japonica qui demeurerait immuable, sans dépérir, ni sans pousser.

Cependant, puisque les arbres les plus rares prospèrent dans les jardins de la capitale, ils devaient réussir à Chavignolles ? et Pécuchet se procura le lilas des Indes, la rose de Chine et l'Eucalyptus, alors dans la primeur de sa réputation. Toutes les expériences ratèrent. Il était chaque fois fort étonné.

Bouvard, comme lui, rencontrait des obstacles. Ils se consultaient mutuellement, ouvraient un livre, passaient à un autre, puis ne savaient que résoudre devant la divergence des opinions.

Ainsi, pour la marne, Puvis la recommande ; le manuel Roret la combat.

Quant au plâtre, malgré l'exemple de Franklin, Rieffel et M. Rigaud n'en paraissent pas enthousiasmés.

Les jachères, selon Bouvard, étaient un préjugé gothique. Cependant, Leclerc note les cas où elles sont presque indispensables. Gasparin cite un Lyonnais qui pendant un demi-siècle a cultivé des céréales sur le même champ ; cela renverse la théorie des assolements. Tull exalte les labours au préjudice des engrais ; et voilà le major Beatson qui supprime les engrais, avec les labours !

Pour se connaître aux signes du temps, ils étudièrent les nuages d'après la classification de Luke-Howard. Ils contemplaient ceux qui s'allongent comme des crinières, ceux qui ressemblent à des îles, ceux qu'on prendrait pour des montagnes de neige — tâchant de distinguer les nimbus des cirrus, les stratus des cumulus ; les formes changeaient avant qu'ils eussent trouvé les noms.

Le baromètre les trompa ; le thermomètre n'apprenait rien ; et ils recoururent à l'expédient imaginé sous Louis XV, par un prêtre de Touraine. Une sangsue dans un bocal devait monter en cas de pluie, se tenir au fond par beau fixe, s'agiter aux menaces de la tempête. Mais l'atmosphère presque toujours contredit la sangsue. Ils en mirent trois autres, avec celle-là. Toutes les quatre se comportèrent différemment.

Après force méditations, Bouvard reconnut qu'il s'était trompé. Son domaine exigeait la grande culture, le système intensif, et il aventura ce qui lui restait de capitaux disponibles : trente mille francs.

Excité par Pécuchet, il eut le délire de l'engrais. Dans la fosse aux composts furent entassés des branchages, du sang, des boyaux, des plumes, tout ce qu'il pouvait découvrir. Il employa la liqueur belge, le lisier suisse, la lessive, des harengs saurs, du varech, des chiffons, fit venir du guano, tâcha d'en fabriquer — et poussant jusqu'au bout ses principes, ne tolérât pas qu'on perdît l'urine ; il supprima les lieux d'aisances. On apportait dans sa cour des cadavres d'animaux, dont il fumait ses terres. Leurs charognes dépecées parsemaient la campagne.

Bouvard souriait au milieu de cette infection. Une pompe installée dans un tombereau crachait du purin sur les récoltes. À ceux qui avaient l'air dégoûté, il disait : Mais c'est de l'or ! c'est de l'or. — Et il regrettait de n'avoir pas encore plus de fumiers. Heureux les pays où l'on trouve des grottes naturelles pleines d'excréments d'oiseaux !

Le colza fut chétif, l'avoine médiocre ; et le blé se vendit fort mal, à cause de son odeur. Une chose étrange, c'est que la Butte enfin épierrée donnait moins qu'autrefois.

Il crut bon de renouveler son matériel. Il acheta un scarificateur Guillaume, un extirpateur Valcourt, un semoir anglais et le grand araire de Mathieu de Dombasle. Le charretier le dénigra.

— Apprends à t'en servir !

— Eh bien, montrez-moi !

Il essayait de montrer, se trompait, et les paysans ricanaient.

Jamais il ne put les astreindre au commandement de la cloche. Sans cesse, il criait derrière eux, courait d'un endroit à l'autre, notait ses observations sur un calepin, donnait des rendez-vous, n'y pensait plus — et sa tête bouillonnait d'idées industrielles. Il se promettait de cultiver le pavot en vue de l'opium, et surtout l'astragale qu'il vendrait sous le nom de café des familles.

Afin d'engraisser plus vite ses boeufs, il les saignait tous les quinze jours.

Il ne tua aucun de ses cochons et les gorgeait d'avoine salée. Bientôt la porcherie fut trop étroite. Ils embarrassaient la cour, défonçaient les clôtures, mordaient le monde.

Durant les grandes chaleurs, vingt-cinq moutons se mirent à tourner, et peu de temps après, crevèrent.

La même semaine, trois boeufs expiraient, conséquence des phlébotomies de Bouvard.

Il imagina pour détruire les mans d'enfermer des poules dans une cage à roulettes, que deux hommes poussaient derrière la charrue — ce qui ne manqua point de leur briser les pattes.

Il fabriqua de la bière avec des feuilles de petit chêne, et la donna aux moissonneurs en guise de cidre. Des maux d'entrailles se déclarèrent. Les enfants pleuraient, les femmes geignaient, les hommes étaient furieux. Ils menaçaient tous de partir ; et Bouvard leur céda.

Cependant, pour les convaincre de l'innocuité de son breuvage, il en absorba devant eux plusieurs bouteilles, se sentit gêné, mais cacha ses douleurs, sous un air d'enjouement. Il fit même transporter la mixture chez lui. Il en buvait le soir avec Pécuchet, et tous deux s'efforçaient de la trouver bonne. D'ailleurs, il ne fallait pas qu'elle fût perdue.

Les coliques de Bouvard devenant trop fortes, Germaine alla chercher le docteur.

C'était un homme sérieux, à front convexe, et qui commença par effrayer son malade. La cholérine de Monsieur devait tenir à cette bière dont on parlait dans le pays. Il voulut en savoir la composition, et la blâma en termes scientifiques, avec des haussements d'épaule. Pécuchet qui avait fourni la recette fut mortifié.

En dépit des chaulages pernicious, des binages épargnés et des échardonnages intempestifs, Bouvard, l'année suivante, avait devant lui une belle récolte de froment. Il imagina de le dessécher par la fermentation, genre hollandais, système Clap-Mayer ; c'est-à-dire qu'il le fit abattre d'un seul coup, et tasser en meules, qui seraient démolies dès que le gaz s'en échapperait, puis exposées au grand air ; après quoi, Bouvard se retira sans la moindre inquiétude.

Le lendemain, pendant qu'ils dînaient, ils entendirent sous la hêtrée le battement d'un tambour. Germaine sortit pour voir ce qu'il y avait ; mais l'homme était déjà loin ; presque aussitôt la cloche de l'église tinta violemment.

Une angoisse saisit Bouvard et Pécuchet. Ils se levèrent, et impatientes d'être renseignés, s'avancèrent tête nue, du côté de Chavignolles.

Une vieille femme passa. Elle ne savait rien. Ils arrêtaient un petit garçon qui répondit : — Je crois que c'est le feu ? et le tambour continuait à battre, la cloche tintait plus fort. Enfin, ils atteignirent les premières maisons du village. L'épicier leur cria de loin : — Le feu est chez vous !

Pécuchet prit le pas gymnastique ; et il disait à Bouvard courant du même train à son côté : — Une, deux ; une, deux ; — en mesure ! comme les chasseurs de Vincennes.

La route qu'ils suivaient montait toujours ; le terrain en pente leur cachait l'horizon. Ils arrivèrent en haut, près de la Butte ; — et, d'un seul coup d'oeil, le désastre leur apparut.

Toutes les meules, çà et là, flambaient comme des volcans — au milieu de la plaine dénudée, dans le calme du soir.

Il y avait, autour de la plus grande, trois cents personnes peut-être ; et sous les ordres de M. Foureau, le maire, en écharpe tricolore, des gars avec des perches et des crocs tiraient la paille du sommet, afin de préserver le reste.

Bouvard dans son empressement faillit renverser Mme Bordin qui se trouvait là. Puis, apercevant un de ses valets, il l'accabla d'injures pour ne l'avoir pas averti. Le valet au contraire, par excès de zèle avait d'abord couru à la maison, à l'église, puis chez Monsieur, et était revenu par l'autre route.

Bouvard perdait la tête. Ses domestiques l'entouraient parlant à la fois ; — et il défendait d'abattre les meules, suppliait qu'on le secourût, exigeait de l'eau, réclamait des pompiers !

— Est-ce que nous en avons ! s'écria le maire.

— C'est de votre faute ! reprit Bouvard. Il s'emportait, proféra des choses inconvenantes ; — et tous admirèrent la patience de M. Foureau qui était brutal cependant, comme l'indiquaient ses grosses lèvres et sa mâchoire de bouledogue.

La chaleur des meules devint si forte qu'on ne pouvait plus en approcher. Sous les flammes dévorantes la paille se tordait avec des crépitations, les grains de blé vous cinglaient la figure comme des grains de plomb. Puis, la meule s'écroulait par terre en un large brasier, d'où s'envolaient des étincelles ; — et des moires ondulaient sur cette masse rouge, qui offrait dans les alternances de sa couleur, des parties roses comme du vermillon, et d'autres brunes comme du sang caillé. La nuit était venue ; le vent soufflait ; des tourbillons de fumée enveloppaient la foule ; — une flammèche, de temps à autre, passait sur le ciel noir.

Bouvard contemplait l'incendie, en pleurant doucement. Ses yeux disparaissaient sous leurs paupières gonflées ; — et il avait tout le visage comme élargi par la douleur. Mme Bordin, en jouant avec les franges de son châle vert l'appelait pauvre Monsieur, tâchait de le consoler. Puisqu'on n'y pouvait rien, il devait se faire une raison.

Pécuchet ne pleurait pas. Très pâle ou plutôt livide, la bouche ouverte et les cheveux collés par la sueur froide, il se tenait à l'écart, dans ses réflexions. — Mais le curé, survenu tout à coup, murmura d'une voix câline : — Ah ! quel malheur, véritablement ; c'est bien fâcheux ! Soyez sûr que je participe !...

Les autres n'affectaient aucune tristesse. Ils causaient en souriant, la main étendue devant les flammes. Un vieux ramassa des brins qui brûlaient pour allumer sa pipe. Des enfants se mirent à danser. Un polisson s'écria même que c'était bien amusant.

— Oui ! il est beau, l'amusement ! reprit Pécuchet qui venait de l'entendre.

Le feu diminua. Les tas s'abaissèrent ; — et une heure après, il ne restait plus que des cendres, faisant sur la plaine des marques rondes et noires. Alors on se retira.

Mme Bordin et l'abbé Jeufroy reconduisirent Messieurs Bouvard et Pécuchet jusqu'à leur domicile.

Pendant la route, la veuve adressa à son voisin des reproches fort aimables sur sa sauvagerie — et l'ecclésiastique exprima toute sa surprise de n'avoir pu connaître jusqu'à présent un de ses paroissiens aussi distingué.

Seul à seul, ils cherchèrent la cause de l'incendie — et au lieu de reconnaître avec tout le monde que la paille humide s'était enflammée spontanément, ils soupçonnèrent une vengeance. Elle venait, sans doute, de maître Gouy, ou peut-être du taupier ? Six mois auparavant Bouvard avait refusé ses services, et même soutenu dans un cercle d'auditeurs que son industrie étant funeste, le gouvernement la devait interdire. L'homme, depuis ce temps-là, rôdait aux environs. Il portait sa barbe entière, et leur semblait effrayant, surtout le soir quand il apparaissait au bord des cours, en secouant sa longue perche, garnie de taupes suspendues.

Le dommage était considérable, et pour se reconnaître dans leur situation, Pécuchet pendant huit jours travailla les registres de Bouvard qui lui parurent un véritable labyrinthe. Après avoir collationné le journal, la correspondance et le grand livre couvert de notes au crayon et de renvois, il découvrit la vérité : pas de marchandises à vendre, aucun effet à recevoir, et en caisse, zéro ; le capital se marquait par un déficit de trente-trois mille francs.

Bouvard n'en voulut rien croire, et plus de vingt fois, ils recommencèrent les calculs. Ils arrivaient toujours à la même conclusion. Encore deux ans d'une agronomie pareille, leur fortune y passait !

Le seul remède était de vendre.

Au moins fallait-il consulter un notaire. La démarche était trop pénible ; Pécuchet s'en chargea.

D'après l'opinion de M. Marescot, mieux valait ne point faire d'affiches. Il parlerait de la ferme à des clients sérieux et laisserait venir leurs propositions.

— Très bien ! dit Bouvard on a du temps devant soi ! Il allait prendre un fermier ; ensuite, on verrait. Nous ne serons pas plus malheureux qu'autrefois ! seulement nous voilà forcés à des économies !

Elles contrariaient Pécuchet à cause du jardinage, et quelques jours après, il dit :

— Nous devrions nous livrer exclusivement à l'arboriculture, non pour le plaisir, mais comme spéculation ! — Une poire qui revient à trois sols est quelquefois vendue dans la capitale jusqu'à des cinq et six francs ! Des jardiniers se font avec les abricots vingt-cinq mille livres de rentes ! À Saint Pétersbourg pendant l'hiver, on paie le raisin un napoléon la grappe ! C'est une belle industrie, tu en conviendras ! Et qu'est-ce que ça coûte ? des soins, du fumier, et le repassage d'une serpette !

Il monta tellement l'imagination de Bouvard, que tout de suite, ils cherchèrent dans leurs livres une nomenclature de plants à acheter ; — et ayant choisi des noms qui leur paraissaient merveilleux, ils s'adressèrent à un pépiniériste de Falaise, lequel s'empressa de leur fournir trois cents tiges dont il ne trouvait pas le placement.

Ils avaient fait venir un serrurier pour les tuteurs, un quincaillier pour les raidisseurs, un charpentier pour les supports. Les formes des arbres étaient d'avance dessinées. Des morceaux de latte sur le mur figuraient des candélabres. Deux poteaux à chaque bout des plates-bandes guindaient horizontalement des fils de fer ; — et dans le verger, des cerceaux indiquaient la structure des vases, des baguettes en cône celle des pyramides — si bien qu'en arrivant chez eux, on croyait voir les pièces de quelque machine inconnue, ou la carcasse d'un feu d'artifice.

Les trous étant creusés, ils coupèrent l'extrémité de toutes les racines, bonnes ou mauvaises, et les enfouirent dans un compost. Six mois après, les plants étaient morts. Nouvelles commandes au pépinieriste, et plantations nouvelles, dans des trous encore plus profonds ! Mais la pluie détrempant le sol, les greffes d'elles-mêmes s'enterrèrent et les arbres s'affranchirent.

Le printemps venu, Pécuchet se mit à la taille des poiriers. Il n'abattit pas les flèches, respecta les lambourdes ; — et s'obstinant à vouloir coucher d'équerre les duchesses qui devaient former les cordons unilatéraux, il les cassait ou les arrachait, invariablement. Quant aux pêchers, il s'embrouilla dans les sur-mères, les sous-mères, et les deuxièmes sous-mères. Des vides et des pleins se présentaient toujours où il n'en fallait pas ; — et impossible d'obtenir sur l'espalier un rectangle parfait, avec six branches à droite et six à gauche, — non compris les deux principales, le tout formant une belle arête de poisson.

Bouvard tâcha de conduire les abricotiers. Ils se révoltèrent. Il abattit leurs troncs à ras du sol ; aucun ne repoussa. Les cerisiers, auxquels il avait fait des entailles, produisirent de la gomme.

D'abord ils taillèrent très long, ce qui éteignait les yeux de la base, puis trop court, ce qui amenait des gourmands : et souvent ils hésitaient ne sachant pas distinguer les boutons à bois des boutons à fleurs. Ils s'étaient réjouis d'avoir des fleurs : mais ayant reconnu leur faute, ils en arrachaient les trois quarts, pour fortifier le reste.

Incessamment, ils parlaient de la sève et du cambium, du palissage, du cassage, de l'éborgnage. Ils avaient au milieu de leur salle à manger, dans un cadre, la liste de leurs élèves, avec un numéro qui se répétait dans le jardin, sur un petit morceau de bois, au pied de l'arbre.

Levés dès l'aube, ils travaillaient jusqu'à la nuit, le porte-jonc à la ceinture. Par les froides matinées de printemps Bouvard gardait sa veste de tricot sous sa blouse, Pécuchet sa vieille redingote sous sa serpillière ; — et les gens qui passaient le long de la claire-voie les entendaient tousser dans le brouillard.

Quelquefois Pécuchet tirait de sa poche son manuel ; et il en étudiait un paragraphe, debout, avec sa bêche auprès de lui, dans la pose du jardinier qui décorait le frontispice du livre. Cette ressemblance le flatta même beaucoup. Il en conçut plus d'estime pour l'auteur.

Bouvard était continuellement juché sur une haute échelle devant les pyramides. Un jour, il fut pris d'un étourdissement — et n'osant plus descendre, cria pour que Pécuchet vînt à son secours.

Enfin des poires parurent ; et le verger avait des prunes. Alors ils employèrent contre les oiseaux tous les artifices recommandés. Mais les fragments de glace miroitaient à éblouir, la cliquette du moulin à vent les réveillait pendant la nuit — et les moineaux perchaient sur le mannequin. Ils en firent un second, et même un troisième, dont ils varièrent le costume, inutilement.

Cependant, ils pouvaient espérer quelques fruits. Pécuchet venait d'en remettre la note à Bouvard quand tout à coup le tonnerre retentit et la pluie tomba, — une pluie lourde et violente. Le vent, par intervalles, secouait toute la surface de l'espalier. Les tuteurs s'abattaient l'un après l'autre — et les malheureuses quenouilles en se balançant entrechoquaient leurs poires.

Pécuchet surpris par l'averse s'était réfugié dans la cahute. Bouvard se tenait dans la cuisine. Ils voyaient tourbillonner devant eux, des éclats de bois, des branches, des ardoises ; — et les femmes de marin qui sur la côte, à dix lieues de là regardaient la mer, n'avaient pas l'oeil plus tendu et le coeur plus serré. Puis tout à coup, les supports et les barres des contre-espaliers avec le treillage, s'abattirent sur les plates-bandes.

Quel tableau, quand ils firent leur inspection ! Les cerises et les prunes couvraient l'herbe entre les grêlons qui fondaient. Les passe-colmar étaient perdus, comme le Bési-des-vétérans et les Triomphes-de-Jodoigne. À peine, s'il restait parmi les pommes quelques bons-papas. Et douze Tétons-de-Vénus, toute la récolte des pêches, roulaient dans les flaques d'eau, au bord des buis déracinés.

Après le dîner, où ils mangèrent fort peu, Pécuchet dit avec douceur :

— Nous ferions bien de voir à la ferme, s'il n'est pas arrivé quelque chose ?

— Bah ! pour découvrir encore des sujets de tristesse !

— Peut-être ? car nous ne sommes guère favorisés ! — et ils se plaignirent de la Providence et de la Nature.

Bouvard, le coude sur la table, poussait sa petite susurration — et, comme toutes les douleurs se tiennent, les anciens projets agricoles lui revinrent à la mémoire, particulièrement la féculerie et un nouveau genre de fromages.

Pécuchet respirait bruyamment ; — et tout en se fourrant dans les narines des prises de tabac, il songeait que si le sort l'avait voulu, il ferait maintenant partie d'une société d'agriculture, brillerait aux expositions, serait cité dans les journaux.

Bouvard promena autour de lui des yeux chagrins.

— Ma foi ! j'ai envie de me débarrasser de tout cela, pour nous établir autre part !

— Comme tu voudras dit Pécuchet ; — et un moment après :

— Les auteurs nous recommandent de supprimer tout canal direct. La sève, par là, se trouve contrariée, et l'arbre forcément en souffre. Pour se bien porter, il faudrait qu'il n'eût pas de fruits. Cependant, ceux qu'on ne taille et qu'on ne fume jamais en produisent — de moins gros, c'est vrai, mais de plus savoureux. J'exige qu'on m'en donne la raison ! — et, non seulement, chaque espèce réclame des soins particuliers, mais encore chaque individu, suivant le climat, la température, un tas de choses ! où est la règle, alors ? et quel espoir avons-nous d'aucun succès ou bénéfice ?

Bouvard lui répondit :

— Tu verras dans Gasparin que le bénéfice ne peut dépasser le dixième du capital. Donc on ferait mieux de placer ce capital dans une maison de banque ; au bout de quinze ans, par l'accumulation des intérêts, on aurait le double sans s'être foulé le tempérament.

Pécuchet baissa la tête.

— L'arboriculture pourrait bien être une blague ?

— Comme l'agronomie ! répliqua Bouvard.

Ensuite, ils s'accusèrent d'avoir été trop ambitieux — et ils résolurent de ménager désormais leur peine et leur argent. Un émondage de temps à autre suffirait au verger. Les contre-espaliers furent proscrits, et ils ne remplaceraient pas les arbres morts — mais il allait se présenter des intervalles fort vilains, à moins de détruire tous les autres qui restaient debout. Comment s'y prendre ?

Pécuchet fit plusieurs épures, en se servant de sa boîte de mathématiques. Bouvard lui donnait des conseils. Ils n'arrivaient à rien de satisfaisant. Heureusement qu'ils trouvèrent dans leur bibliothèque l'ouvrage de Boitard, intitulé L'Architecte des Jardins.

L'auteur les divise en une infinité de genres. Il y a, d'abord, le genre mélancolique et romantique, qui se signale par des immortelles, des ruines, des tombeaux, et un ex-voto à la Vierge, indiquant la place où un seigneur est tombé sous le fer d'un assassin ; on compose le genre terrible avec des rocs suspendus, des arbres fracassés, des cabanes incendiées, le genre exotique en plantant des cierges du Pérou pour faire naître des souvenirs à un colon ou à un voyageur. Le genre grave doit offrir, comme Ermenonville, un temple à la philosophie. Les obélisques et les arcs de triomphe caractérisent le genre majestueux, de la mousse et des grottes le genre mystérieux, un lac le genre rêveur. Il y a même le genre fantastique, dont le plus beau spécimen se voyait naguère dans un jardin wurtembergeois — car, on y rencontrait successivement, un sanglier, un ermite, plusieurs sépulcres, et une barque se détachant d'elle-même du rivage, pour vous conduire dans un boudoir, où des jets d'eau vous inondaient, quand on se posait sur le sofa.

Devant cet horizon de merveilles, Bouvard et Pécuchet eurent comme un éblouissement. Le genre fantastique leur parut réservé aux princes. Le temple à la philosophie serait encombrant. L'ex-voto à la madone n'aurait pas de signification, vu le manque d'assassins, et, tant pis pour les colons et les voyageurs, les plantes américaines coûtaient trop cher. Mais les rocs étaient possibles comme les arbres fracassés, les immortelles et la mousse ; — et dans un enthousiasme progressif, après beaucoup de tâtonnements, avec l'aide d'un seul valet, et pour une somme minime, ils se fabriquèrent une résidence qui n'avait pas d'analogue dans tout le département.

La charmille ouverte çà et là donnait jour sur le bosquet, rempli d'allées sinueuses en façon de labyrinthe. Dans le mur de l'espallier, ils avaient voulu faire un arceau sous lequel on découvrirait la perspective. Comme le chaperon ne pouvait se tenir suspendu, il en était résulté une brèche énorme, avec des ruines par terre.

Ils avaient sacrifié les asperges pour bâtir à la place un tombeau étrusque c'est-à-dire un quadrilatère en plâtre noir, ayant six pieds de hauteur, et l'apparence d'une niche à chien. Quatre sapinettes aux angles flanquaient ce monument, qui serait surmonté par une urne et enrichi d'une inscription.

Dans l'autre partie du potager une espèce de Rialto enjambait un bassin, offrant sur ses bords des coquilles de moules incrustées. La terre buvait l'eau, n'importe ! Il se formerait un fond de glaise, qui la retiendrait.

La cahute avait été transformée en cabane rustique, grâce à des verres de couleur. Au sommet du vigneau six arbres équarris supportaient un chapeau de fer-blanc à pointes retroussées, et le tout signifiait une pagode chinoise.

Ils avaient été sur les rives de l'Orne, choisir des granits, les avaient cassés, numérotés, rapportés eux-mêmes dans une charrette, puis avaient joint les morceaux avec du ciment, en les accumulant les uns par-dessus les autres ; et au milieu du gazon se dressait un rocher, pareil à une gigantesque pomme de terre.

Quelque chose manquait au delà pour compléter l'harmonie. Ils abattirent le plus gros tilleul de la charmille (aux trois quarts mort, du reste) et le couchèrent dans toute la longueur du jardin, de telle sorte qu'on pouvait le croire apporté par un torrent, ou renversé par la foudre.

La besogne finie, Bouvard qui était sur le perron, cria de loin :

— Ici ! on voit mieux !

— Voit mieux fut répété dans l'air.

Pécuchet répondit :

— J'y vais !

— Y vais !

— Tiens ! un écho !

— Écho !

Le tilleul, jusqu'alors l'avait empêché de se produire ; — et il était favorisé par la pagode, faisant face à la grange, dont le pignon surmontait la charmille.

Pour essayer l'écho, ils s'amusèrent à lancer des mots plaisants.

Bouvard en hurla d'obscènes.

Il avait été plusieurs fois à Falaise, sous prétexte d'argent à recevoir — et il en revenait toujours avec de petits paquets qu'il enfermait dans sa commode. Pécuchet partit un matin, pour se rendre à Bretteville, et rentra fort tard, avec un panier qu'il cacha sous son lit.

Le lendemain, à son réveil, Bouvard fut surpris. Les deux premiers ifs de la grand allée (qui la veille encore, étaient sphériques) avaient la forme de paons — et un cornet avec deux boutons de porcelaine figuraient le bec et les yeux. Pécuchet s'était levé dès l'aube ; et tremblant d'être découvert, il avait taillé les deux arbres à la mesure des appendices expédiés par Dumouchel. Depuis six mois, les autres derrière ceux-là imitaient, plus ou moins, des pyramides, des cubes, des cylindres, des cerfs ou des fauteuils. Mais rien n'égalait les paons, Bouvard le reconnut, avec de grands éloges.

Sous prétexte d'avoir oublié sa bêche, il entraîna son compagnon dans le labyrinthe. Car il avait profité de l'absence de Pécuchet, pour faire, lui aussi, quelque chose de sublime.

La porte des champs était recouverte d'une couche de plâtre, sur laquelle s'alignaient en bel ordre cinq cents fourneaux de pipes, représentant des Abd-el-Kader, des nègres, des turcos, des femmes nues, des pieds de cheval, et des têtes de mort !

— Comprends-tu mon impatience !

— Je crois bien !

Et dans leur émotion, ils s'embrassèrent.

Comme tous les artistes, ils eurent le besoin d'être applaudis — et Bouvard songea à offrir un grand dîner.

— Prends garde ! dit Pécuchet tu vas te lancer dans les réceptions. C'est un gouffre !

La chose pourtant, fut décidée.

Depuis qu'ils habitaient le pays, ils se tenaient à l'écart. — Tout le monde, par désir de les connaître, accepta leur invitation, sauf le comte de Faverges, appelé dans la capitale pour affaires. Ils se rabattirent sur M. Hurel, son factotum.

Beljambe l'aubergiste, ancien chef à Lisieux devait cuisiner certains plats. Il fournissait un garçon. Germaine avait requis la fille de basse-cour. Marianne la servante de Mme Bordin viendrait aussi. Dès quatre heures la grille était grande ouverte, et les deux propriétaires, pleins d'impatience, attendaient leurs convives.

Hurel s'arrêta sous la hêtrée pour remettre sa redingote. Puis, le curé s'avança revêtu d'une soutane neuve, et un moment après M. Foureau, avec un gilet de velours. Le Docteur donnait le bras à sa femme qui marchait péniblement en s'abritant sous son ombrelle. Un flot de rubans roses s'agita derrière eux ; c'était le bonnet de Mme Bordin, habillée d'une belle robe de soie gorge de pigeon. La chaîne d'or de sa montre lui battait sur la poitrine, et les bagues brillaient à ses deux mains, couvertes de mitaines noires. — Enfin parut le notaire, un panama sur la tête, un lorgnon dans l'oeil ; car l'officier ministériel n'étouffait pas en lui l'homme du monde.

Le salon était ciré à ne pouvoir s'y tenir debout. Les huit fauteuils d'Utrecht s'adossaient le long de la muraille, une table ronde dans le milieu supportait la cave à liqueurs, et on voyait au-dessus de la cheminée le portrait du père Bouvard. Les embus reparaissant à contre-jour faisaient grimacer la bouche, loucher les yeux, et un peu de moisissure aux pommettes ajoutait à l'illusion des favoris. Les invités lui trouvèrent une ressemblance avec son fils, et Mme Bordin ajouta, en regardant Bouvard, qu'il avait dû être un fort bel homme.

Après une heure d'attente, Pécuchet annonça qu'on pouvait passer dans la salle.

Les rideaux de calicot blanc à bordure rouge étaient, comme ceux du salon, complètement tirés devant les fenêtres ; — et le soleil, traversant la toile, jetait une lumière blonde sur le lambris, qui avait pour tout ornement, un baromètre.

Bouvard plaça les deux dames auprès de lui, Pécuchet le maire à sa gauche, le curé à sa droite ; — et l'on entama les huîtres. Elles sentaient la vase. Bouvard fut désolé, prodigua les excuses ; et Pécuchet se leva pour aller dans la cuisine faire une scène à Beljambe.

Pendant tout le premier service, composé d'une barbue entre un vol-au-vent et des pigeons en compote, la conversation roula sur la manière de fabriquer le cidre. Après quoi on en vint aux mets digestes ou indigestes. Le Docteur, naturellement fut consulté. Il jugeait les choses avec scepticisme, comme un homme qui a vu le fond de la science, et cependant ne tolérait pas la moindre contradiction.

En même temps que l'aloyau, on servit du bourgogne. Il était trouble. Bouvard attribuant cet accident au rinçage de la bouteille, en fit goûter trois autres, sans plus de succès — puis versa du Saint-Julien, trop jeune, évidemment ; et tous les convives se turent. Hurel souriait sans discontinuer ; les pas lourds du garçon résonnaient sur les dalles.

Mme Vaucorbeil, courtaude et l'air bougon (elle était d'ailleurs vers la fin de sa grossesse), avait gardé un mutisme absolu. Bouvard ne sachant de quoi l'entretenir lui parla du théâtre de Caen.

— Ma femme ne va jamais au spectacle reprit le docteur.

M. Marescot, quand il habitait Paris, ne fréquentait que les Italiens.

— Moi dit Bouvard je me payais quelquefois un parterre au

Vaudeville, pour entendre des farces !

Foureau demanda à Mme Bordin si elle aimait les farces ?

— Ça dépend de quelle espèce répondit-elle.

Le maire la lutinait. Elle ripostait aux plaisanteries. Ensuite elle indiqua une recette pour les cornichons. Du reste, ses talents de ménagère étaient connus, et elle avait une petite ferme admirablement soignée.

Foureau interpella Bouvard : — Est-ce que vous êtes dans l'intention de vendre la vôtre ?

— Mon Dieu, jusqu'à présent, je ne sais trop...

— Comment ! pas même la pièce des Écalles ? reprit le notaire ce serait à votre convenance, madame Bordin.

La veuve répliqua, en minaudant : — Les prétentions de M. Bouvard seraient trop fortes !

On pouvait, peut-être, l'attendrir.

— Je n'essaierai pas !

— Bah ! si vous l'embrassiez ?

— Essayons tout de même ! dit Bouvard — et il la baisa sur les deux joues, aux applaudissements de la société.

Presque aussitôt on déboucha le champagne, dont les détonations amenèrent un redoublement de joie. Pécuchet fit un signe. Les rideaux s'ouvrirent, et le jardin apparut.

C'était dans le crépuscule, quelque chose d'effrayant. Le rocher comme une montagne occupait le gazon, le tombeau faisait un cube au milieu des épinards, le pont vénitien un accent circonflexe par-dessus les haricots — et la cabane, au delà, une grande tache noire ; car ils avaient incendié son toit pour la rendre plus poétique. Les ifs en forme de cerfs ou de fauteuils se suivaient, jusqu'à l'arbre foudroyé, qui s'étendait transversalement de la charmille à la tonnelle, où des pommes d'amour pendaient comme des stalactites. Un tournesol, çà et là, étalait son disque jaune. La pagode chinoise peinte en rouge semblait un phare sur le vigneau. Les becs des paons frappés par le soleil se renvoyaient des feux, et derrière la claire-voie, débarrassée de ses planches, la campagne toute plate terminait l'horizon.

Devant l'étonnement de leurs convives Bouvard et Pécuchet ressentirent une véritable jouissance.

Mme Bordin surtout admira les paons. Mais le tombeau ne fut pas compris, ni la cabane incendiée, ni le mur en ruines. Puis, chacun à tour de rôle, passa sur le pont. Pour emplir le bassin, Bouvard et Pécuchet avaient charrié de l'eau pendant toute la matinée. Elle avait fui entre les pierres du fond, mal jointes, et de la vase les recouvrait.

Tout en se promenant on se permit des critiques : — À votre place j'aurais fait cela. — Les petits pois sont en retard. — Ce coin franchement n'est pas propre. — Avec une taille pareille, jamais vous n'obtiendrez de fruits.

Bouvard fut obligé de répondre qu'il se moquait des fruits.

Comme on longea la charmille, il dit d'un air finaud :

— Ah ! voilà une personne que nous dérangeons ! mille excuses !

La plaisanterie ne fut pas relevée. Tout le monde connaissait la dame en plâtre !

Après plusieurs détours dans le labyrinthe, on arriva devant la porte aux pipes. Des regards de stupéfaction s'échangèrent. Bouvard observait le visage de ses hôtes, — et impatient de connaître leur opinion :

— Qu'en dites-vous ?

Mme Bordin éclata de rire : Tous firent comme elle. Le curé poussait une sorte de gloussement, Hurel toussait, le Docteur en pleurait, sa femme fut prise d'un spasme nerveux, — et Foureau, homme sans gêne, cassa un Abd-el-Kader qu'il mit dans sa poche, comme souvenir.

Quand on fut sorti de la charmille, Bouvard pour étonner son monde avec l'écho, cria de toutes ses forces :

— Serviteur ! Mesdames !

Rien ! pas d'écho. Cela tenait à des réparations faites à la grange, le pignon et la toiture étant démolis.

Le café fut servi sur le vigneau — et les Messieurs allaient commencer une partie de boules, quand ils virent en face derrière la claire-voie un homme qui les regardait.

Il était maigre et hâlé, avec un pantalon rouge en lambeaux, une veste bleue sans chemise, la barbe noire taillée en brosse ; et il articula d'une voix rauque :

— Donnez-moi un verre de vin !

Le maire et l'abbé Jeufroy l'avaient tout de suite reconnu. C'était un ancien menuisier de Chavignolles.

— Allons Gorju ! éloignez-vous dit M. Foureau. On ne demande pas l'aumône.

— Moi ? l'aumône ! s'écria l'homme exaspéré. J'ai fait sept ans la guerre en Afrique. Je relève de l'hôpital. Pas d'ouvrage ! Faut-il que j'assassine ? nom d'un nom !

Sa colère d'elle-même tomba — et les deux poings sur les hanches, il considérait les bourgeois d'un air mélancolique et gouailleur. La fatigue des bivouacs, l'absinthe et les fièvres, toute une existence de misère et de crapule se révélait dans ses yeux troubles. Ses lèvres pâles tremblaient en lui découvrant les gencives. Le grand ciel empourpré l'enveloppait d'une lueur sanglante — et son obstination à rester là causait une sorte d'effroi.

Bouvard, pour en finir, alla chercher le fond d'une bouteille. Le vagabond l'absorba gloutonnement ; puis disparut dans les avoines, en gesticulant.

Ensuite on blâma M. Bouvard. De telles complaisances favorisaient le désordre. Mais Bouvard irrité par l'insuccès de son jardin prit la défense du peuple ; — tous parlèrent à la fois.

Foureau exaltait le gouvernement. Hurel ne voyait dans le monde que la propriété foncière. L'abbé Jeufroy se plaignit de ce qu'on ne protégeait pas la religion. Pécuchet attaqua les impôts. Mme Bordin criait par intervalle : — Moi d'abord, je déteste la République et le docteur se déclara pour le progrès. Car enfin, monsieur, nous avons besoin de réformes.

— Possible ! répondit Foureau ; mais toutes ces idées-là nuisent aux affaires.

— Je me fiche des affaires ! s'écria Pécuchet.

Vaucorbeil poursuivit : — Au moins, donnez nous l'adjonction des capacités. Bouvard n'allait pas jusque-là.

— C'est votre opinion ? reprit le docteur. Vous êtes toisé ! Bonsoir ! et je vous souhaite un déluge pour naviguer dans votre bassin !

— Moi aussi, je m'en vais dit un moment après M. Foureau ; et désignant sa poche où était l'Abd-el-Kader : Si j'ai besoin d'un autre, je reviendrai.

Le curé, avant de partir confia timidement à Pécuchet qu'il ne trouvait pas convenable ce simulacre de tombeau au milieu des légumes. Hurel, en se retirant salua très bas la compagnie. M.

Marescot avait disparu après le dessert.

Mme Bordin recommença le détail de ses cornichons, promit une seconde recette pour les prunes à l'eau-de-vie — et fit encore trois tours dans la grande allée ; — mais en passant près du tilleul le bas de sa robe s'accrocha ; et ils l'entendirent qui murmurait : — Mon Dieu ! quelle bêtise que cet arbre !

Jusqu'à minuit, les deux amphitryons, sous la tonnelle, exhâlèrent leur ressentiment.

Sans doute, on pouvait reprendre dans le dîner deux ou trois petites choses par-ci, par-là ; et cependant les convives s'étaient gorgés comme des ogres, preuve qu'il n'était pas si mauvais. Mais pour le jardin, tant de dénigrement provenait de la plus basse jalousie ; et s'échauffant tous les deux :

— Ah ! l'eau manque dans le bassin ! Patience, on y verra jusqu'à un cygne et des poissons !

— À peine s'ils ont remarqué la pagode !

— Prétendre que les ruines ne sont pas propres est une opinion d'imbécile !

— Et le tombeau une inconvenance ! Pourquoi inconvenance ? Est-ce qu'on n'a pas le droit d'en construire un dans son domaine ? Je veux même m'y faire enterrer !

— Ne parle pas de ça ! dit Pécuchet.

Puis, ils passèrent en revue les convives.

— Le médecin m'a l'air d'un joli poseur !

— As-tu observé le ricanement de Marescot devant le portrait ?

— Quel goujat que M. le maire ! Quand on dîne dans une maison, que diable ! on respecte les curiosités.

— Mme Bordin dit Bouvard.

— Eh ! c'est une intrigante ! Laisse-moi tranquille.

Dégoutés du monde, ils résolurent de ne plus voir personne, de vivre exclusivement chez eux, pour eux seuls.

Et ils passaient des jours dans la cave à enlever le tartre des bouteilles, revernirent tous les meubles, encaustiquèrent les chambres. Chaque soir, en regardant le bois brûler, ils dissertaient sur le meilleur système de chauffage.

Ils tâchèrent par économie de fumer des jambons, de couler eux-mêmes la lessive. Germaine qu'ils incommodaient haussait les épaules.

À l'époque des confitures, elle se fâcha, et ils s'établirent dans le fournil.

C'était une ancienne buanderie, où il y avait sous les fagots, une grande cuve maçonnée excellente pour leurs projets, l'ambition leur étant venue de fabriquer des conserves.

Quatorze bocaux furent remplis de tomates et de petits pois ; ils en lutèrent les bouchons avec de la chaux vive et du fromage, appliquèrent sur les bords des bandelettes de toile, puis les plongèrent dans l'eau bouillante. Elle s'évaporait ; ils en versèrent de la froide ; la différence de température fit éclater les bocaux. Trois seulement furent sauvés.

Ensuite, ils se procurèrent de vieilles boîtes à sardines, y mirent des côtelettes de veau et les enfoncèrent dans le bain-marie. Elles sortirent rondes comme des ballons ; le refroidissement les aplatirait. Pour continuer l'expérience, ils enfermèrent dans d'autres boîtes, des oeufs, de la chicorée, du homard, une matelote, un potage ! — et ils s'applaudissaient, comme M. Appert d'avoir fixé les saisons ; de pareilles découvertes, selon Pécuchet, l'emportaient sur les exploits des conquérants.

Ils perfectionnèrent les achars de Mme Bordin, en épiçant le vinaigre avec du poivre ; et leurs prunes à l'eau-de-vie étaient bien supérieures ! Ils obtinrent par la macération des ratafias de framboise et d'absinthe. Avec du miel et de l'angélique dans un tonneau de Bagnols, ils voulurent faire du vin de Malaga ; et ils entreprirent également la confection d'un champagne ! Les bouteilles de chablis, coupées de moût, éclatèrent d'elles-mêmes. Alors, ils ne doutèrent plus de la réussite.

Leurs études se développant, ils en vinrent à soupçonner des fraudes dans toutes les denrées alimentaires.

Ils chicanèrent le boulanger sur la couleur de son pain. Ils se firent un ennemi de l'épicier, en lui soutenant qu'il adultérait ses chocolats. Ils se transportèrent à Falaise, pour demander du jujube ; — et sous les yeux même du pharmacien soumirent sa pâte à l'épreuve de l'eau. Elle prit l'apparence d'une couenne de lard, ce qui dénotait de la gélatine.

Après ce triomphe, leur orgueil s'exalta. Ils achetèrent le matériel d'un distillateur en faillite — et bientôt arrivèrent dans la maison, des tamis, des barils, des entonnoirs, des écumoirs, des chausses et des balances, sans compter une sèbile à boulet et un alambic tête-de-maure, lequel exigea un fourneau réflecteur, avec une hotte de cheminée.

Ils apprirent comment on clarifie le sucre, et les différentes sortes de cuite : le grand et le petit perlé, le soufflé, le boulé, la morve et le caramel. Mais il leur tardait d'employer l'alambic ; et ils abordèrent les liqueurs fines, en commençant par l'anisette. Le liquide presque toujours entraînait avec lui les substances, ou bien elles se collaient dans le fond ; d'autres fois, ils s'étaient trompés sur le dosage. Autour d'eux les grandes bassines de cuivre reluisaient, les matras avançaient leur bec pointu, les poêlons décoraient le mur. Souvent l'un triait des herbes sur la table, tandis que l'autre faisait osciller le boulet de canon dans la sèbile suspendue. Ils mouvaient les cuillers ; ils dégustaient les mélanges.

Bouvard, toujours en sueur, n'avait pour vêtement que sa chemise et son pantalon tiré jusqu'au creux de l'estomac par ses courtes bretelles ; mais étourdi comme un oiseau, il oubliait le diaphragme de la cucurbite, ou exagérait le feu. Pécuchet marmottait des calculs, immobile dans sa longue blouse, une espèce de sarrau d'enfant avec des manches ; et ils se considéraient comme des gens très sérieux, occupés de choses utiles.

Enfin ils rêvèrent une crème, qui devait enfoncer toutes les autres. Ils y mettraient de la coriandre comme dans le kummel, du kirsch comme dans le marasquin, de l'hysope comme dans la chartreuse, de l'ambrette comme dans le vespetro, du calamus aromaticus comme dans le krambambuli ; — et elle serait colorée en rouge avec du bois de santal. Mais sous quel nom l'offrir au commerce ? Car il fallait un nom facile à retenir, et pourtant bizarre. Ayant longtemps cherché, ils décidèrent qu'elle se nommerait la Bouvarine !

Vers la fin de l'automne, des taches parurent dans les trois bocaux de conserves. Les tomates et les petits pois étaient pourris. Cela devait dépendre du bouchage ? Alors le problème du bouchage les tourmenta. Pour essayer les méthodes nouvelles ils manquaient d'argent. Leur ferme les rongait.

Plusieurs fois, des tenanciers s'étaient offerts. Bouvard n'en avait pas voulu. Mais son premier garçon cultivait d'après ses ordres, avec une épargne dangereuse, si bien que les récoltes diminuaient, tout périlclitait ; et ils causaient de leur embarras, quand maître Gouy entra dans le laboratoire, escorté de sa femme qui se tenait en arrière, timidement.

Grâce à toutes les façons qu'elles avaient reçues, les terres s'étaient améliorées — et il venait pour reprendre la ferme. Il la déprécia. Malgré tous leurs travaux les bénéfices étaient chanceux, bref s'il la désirait c'était par amour du pays et regret d'aussi bons maîtres. On le congédia d'une manière froide. Il revint le soir même.

Pécuchet avait sermonné Bouvard ; ils allaient fléchir ; Gouy demanda une diminution de fermage ; et comme les autres se récriaient, il se mit à beugler plutôt qu'à parler, attestant le Bon Dieu, énumérant ses peines, vantant ses mérites. Quand on le sommait de dire son prix, il baissait la tête au lieu de répondre. Alors sa femme, assise près de la porte avec un grand panier sur les genoux recommençait les mêmes protestations, en piaillant d'une voix aiguë comme une poule blessée.

Enfin le bail fut arrêté aux conditions de trois mille francs par an, un tiers de moins qu'autrefois.

Séance tenante, maître Gouy proposa d'acheter le matériel ; — et les dialogues recommencèrent.

L'estimation des objets dura quinze jours. Bouvard s'en mourait de fatigue. Il lâcha tout pour une somme tellement dérisoire que Gouy, d'abord en écarquilla les yeux et s'écriant : — Convenu, lui frappa dans la main.

Après quoi, les propriétaires suivant l'usage offrirent de casser une croûte à la maison ; et Pécuchet ouvrit une des bouteilles de son malaga, moins par générosité que dans l'espoir d'en obtenir des éloges.

Mais le laboureur dit en rechignant : — C'est comme du sirop de réglisse, et sa femme pour se faire passer le goût implora un verre d'eau-de-vie.

Une chose plus grave les occupait ! Tous les éléments de la Bouvarine étaient enfin rassemblés.

Ils les entassèrent dans la cucurbite, avec de l'alcool, allumèrent le feu et attendirent. Cependant, Pécuchet tourmenté par la mésaventure du malaga prit dans l'armoire les boîtes de fer-blanc, fit sauter le couvercle de la première, puis de la seconde, de la troisième. Il les rejetait avec fureur, et appela Bouvard.

Bouvard ferma le robinet du serpentin pour se précipiter vers les conserves. La désillusion fut complète. Les tranches de veau ressemblaient à des semelles bouillies ; un liquide fangeux remplaçait le homard ; on ne reconnaissait plus la matelote. Des champignons avaient poussé sur le potage — et une intolérable odeur empestait le laboratoire.

Tout à coup, avec un bruit d'obus, l'alambic éclata en vingt morceaux, qui bondirent jusqu'au plafond, crevant les marmites, aplatissant les écumoirs, fracassant les verres ; le charbon s'éparpilla, le fourneau fut démoli — et le lendemain, Germaine retrouva une spatule dans la cour.

La force de la vapeur avait rompu l'instrument, d'autant que la cucurbite se trouvait boulonnée au chapiteau.

Pécuchet, tout de suite, s'était accroupi derrière la cuve, et Bouvard comme écroulé sur un tabouret. Pendant dix minutes, ils demeurèrent dans cette posture, n'osant se permettre un seul mouvement, pâles de terreur, au milieu des tessons. Quand ils purent recouvrer la parole, ils se demandèrent quelle était la cause de tant d'infortunes, de la dernière surtout ? — et ils n'y comprenaient rien, sinon qu'ils avaient manqué périr. Pécuchet termina par ces mots :

— C'est que, peut-être, nous ne savons pas la chimie !

CHAPITRE III

Pour savoir la chimie, ils se procurèrent le cours de Regnault — et apprirent d'abord que les corps simples sont peut-être composés.

On les distingue en métalloïdes et en métaux, — différence qui n'a rien d'absolu, dit l'auteur. De même pour les acides et les bases, un corps pouvant se comporter à la manière des acides ou des bases, suivant les circonstances.

La notation leur parut baroque. — Les Proportions multiples troublèrent

Pécuchet.

— Puisqu'une molécule de A, je suppose, se combine avec plusieurs parties de B, il me semble que cette molécule doit se diviser en autant de parties ; mais si elle se divise, elle cesse d'être l'unité, la molécule primordiale. Enfin, je ne comprends pas.

— Moi, non plus ! disait Bouvard.

Et ils recoururent à un ouvrage moins difficile, celui de Girardin — où ils acquirent la certitude que dix litres d'air pèsent cent grammes, qu'il n'entre pas de plomb dans les crayons, que le diamant n'est que du carbone.

Ce qui les ébahit par-dessus tout, c'est que la terre comme élément n'existe pas.

Ils saisirent la manoeuvre du chalumeau, l'or, l'argent, la lessive du linge, l'étamage des casseroles ; puis sans le moindre scrupule, Bouvard et Pécuchet se lancèrent dans la chimie organique.

Quelle merveille que de retrouver chez les êtres vivants les mêmes substances qui composent les minéraux. Néanmoins, ils éprouvaient une sorte d'humiliation à l'idée que leur individu contenait du phosphore comme les allumettes, de l'albumine comme les blancs d'oeufs, du gaz hydrogène comme les réverbères.

Après les couleurs et les corps gras, ce fut le tour de la fermentation.

Elle les conduisit aux acides — et la loi des équivalents les embarrassa encore une fois. Ils tâchèrent de l'élucider avec la théorie des atomes, ce qui acheva de les perdre.

Pour entendre tout cela, selon Bouvard, il aurait fallu des instruments.

La dépense était considérable ; et ils en avaient trop fait.

Mais le docteur Vaucorbeil pouvait, sans doute, les éclairer.

Ils se présentèrent au moment de ses consultations.

— Messieurs, je vous écoute ! quel est votre mal ?

Pécuchet répliqua qu'ils n'étaient pas malades, et ayant exposé le but de leur visite :

— Nous désirons connaître premièrement l'atomicité supérieure.

Le médecin rougit beaucoup, puis les blâma de vouloir apprendre la chimie.

— Je ne nie pas son importance, soyez-en sûrs ! mais actuellement, on la fourre partout ! Elle exerce sur la médecine une action déplorable. Et l'autorité de sa parole se renforçait au spectacle des choses environnantes.

Du diachylum et des bandes traînaient sur la cheminée. La boîte chirurgicale posait au milieu du bureau. Des sondes emplissaient une cuvette dans un coin — et il y avait contre le mur, la représentation d'un écorché.

Pécuchet en fit compliment au Docteur.

— Ce doit être une belle étude que l'Anatomie ?

M. Vaucorbeil s'étendit sur le charme qu'il éprouvait autrefois dans les dissections ; — et Bouvard demanda quels sont les rapports entre l'intérieur de la femme et celui de l'homme.

Afin de le satisfaire, le médecin tira de sa bibliothèque un recueil de planches anatomiques.

— Emportez-les ! Vous les regarderez chez vous plus à votre aise !

Le squelette les étonna par la proéminence de sa mâchoire, les trous de ses yeux, la longueur effrayante de ses mains. — Un ouvrage explicatif leur manquait ; ils retournèrent chez M. Vaucorbeil, et grâce au manuel d'Alexandre Lauth ils apprirent les divisions de la charpente, en s'ébahissant de l'épine dorsale, seize fois plus forte, dit-on, que si le Créateur l'eût fait droite. — Pourquoi seize fois, précisément ?

Les métacarpiens désolèrent Bouvard ; — Pécuchet acharné sur le crâne, perdit courage devant le sphénoïde, bien qu'il ressemble à une selle turque, ou turquesque.

Quant aux articulations, trop de ligaments les cachaient — et ils attaquèrent les muscles.

Mais les insertions n'étaient pas commodes à découvrir — et parvenus aux gouttières vertébrales, ils y renoncèrent complètement.

Pécuchet dit, alors :

— Si nous reprenions la chimie ? — ne serait ce que pour utiliser le laboratoire !

Bouvard protesta ; et il crut se rappeler que l'on fabriquait à l'usage des pays chauds des cadavres postiches.

Barberou, auquel il écrivit, lui donna là-dessus des renseignements. — Pour dix francs par mois, on pouvait avoir un des bonshommes de M. Auzoux — et la semaine suivante, le messenger de Falaise déposa devant leur grille une caisse oblongue.

Ils la transportèrent dans le fournil, pleins d'émotion. Quand les planches furent déclouées, la paille tomba, les papiers de soie glissèrent, le mannequin apparut.

Il était couleur de brique, sans chevelure, sans peau, avec d'innombrables filets bleus, rouges et blancs le bariolant. Cela ne ressemblait point à un cadavre, mais à une espèce de joujou, fort vilain, très propre et qui sentait le vernis.

Puis ils enlevèrent le thorax ; et ils aperçurent les deux poumons pareils à deux éponges, le cœur tel qu'un gros oeuf, un peu de côté par derrière, le diaphragme, les reins, tout le paquet des entrailles.

— À la besogne ! dit Pécuchet.

La journée et le soir y passèrent.

Ils avaient mis des blouses, comme font les carabins dans les amphithéâtres, et à la lueur de trois chandelles, ils travaillaient leurs morceaux de carton, quand un coup de poing heurta la porte. — Ouvrez !

C'était M. Foureau, suivi du garde champêtre.

Les maîtres de Germaine s'étaient plu à lui montrer le bonhomme. Elle avait couru de suite chez l'épicière, pour conter la chose ; et tout le village croyait maintenant qu'ils recelaient dans leur maison un véritable mort. Foureau, cédant à la rumeur publique, venait s'assurer du fait. Des curieux se tenaient dans la cour.

Le mannequin, quand il entra, reposait sur le flanc ; et les muscles de la face étant décrochés, l'oeil faisait une saillie monstrueuse, avait quelque chose d'effrayant.

— Qui vous amène ? dit Pécuchet.

Foureau balbutia : — Rien ! rien du tout ! et prenant une des pièces sur la table : — Qu'est-ce que c'est ?

— Le buccinateur ! répondit Bouvard.

Foureau se tut — mais souriait d'une façon narquoise, jaloux de ce qu'ils avaient un divertissement au-dessus de sa compétence.

Les deux anatomistes feignaient de poursuivre leurs investigations. Les gens qui s'ennuyaient sur le seuil avaient pénétré dans le fournil — et comme on se poussait un peu, la table trembla.

— Ah ! c'est trop fort ! s'écria Pécuchet. Débarrassez-nous du public !

Le garde champêtre fit partir les curieux.

— Très bien ! dit Bouvard ! nous n'avons besoin de personne !

Foureau comprit l'allusion ; et lui demanda s'ils avaient le droit, n'étant pas médecins, de détenir un objet pareil ? Il allait, du reste, en écrire au Préfet. — Quel pays ! on n'était pas plus inepte, sauvage et rétrograde ! La comparaison qu'ils firent d'eux-mêmes avec les autres les consola. — Ils ambitionnaient de souffrir pour la science.

Le Docteur aussi vint les voir. Il dénigra le mannequin comme trop éloigné de la nature ; mais profita de la circonstance pour faire une leçon.

Bouvard et Pécuchet furent charmés ; et sur leur désir, M. Vaucorbeil leur prêta plusieurs volumes de sa bibliothèque, affirmant toutefois qu'ils n'iraient pas jusqu'au bout.

Ils prirent en note dans le Dictionnaire des Sciences médicales, les exemples d'accouchement, de longévité, d'obésité et de constipation extraordinaires. Que n'avaient-ils connu le fameux Canadien de Beaumont, les polyphages Tarare et Bijoux, la femme hydropique du département de l'Eure, le Piémontais qui allait à la garde-robe tous les vingt jours, Simorre de Mirepoix mort ossifié, et cet ancien maire d'Angoulême, dont le nez pesait trois livres !

Le cerveau leur inspira des réflexions philosophiques. Ils distinguaient fort bien dans l'intérieur, le septum lucidum composé de deux lamelles et la glande pinéale, qui ressemble à un petit pois rouge. Mais il y avait des pédoncules et des ventricules, des arcs, des piliers, des étages, des ganglions, et des fibres de toutes les sortes, et le foramen de Pacchioni, et le corps de Pacini, bref un amas inextricable, de quoi user leur existence.

Quelquefois dans un vertige, ils démontraient complètement le cadavre, puis se trouvaient embarrassés pour remettre en place les morceaux.

Cette besogne était rude, après le déjeuner surtout ! et ils ne tardaient pas à s'endormir, Bouvard le menton baissé, l'abdomen en avant, Pécuchet la tête dans les mains, avec ses deux coudes sur la table.

Souvent à ce moment-là, M. Vaucorbeil, qui terminait ses premières visites, entr'ouvrait la porte.

— Eh bien, les confrères, comment va l'anatomie ?

— Parfaitement ! répondaient-ils.

Alors il posait des questions pour le plaisir de les confondre.

Quand ils étaient las d'un organe, ils passaient à un autre — abondant ainsi et délaissant tour à tour le coeur, l'estomac, l'oreille, les intestins ; — car le bonhomme de carton les assommait, malgré leurs efforts pour s'y intéresser. Enfin le Docteur les surprit comme ils le reclouaient dans sa boîte.

— Bravo ! Je m'y attendais. On ne pouvait à leur âge entreprendre ces études ; — et le sourire accompagnant ses paroles les blessa profondément.

De quel droit les juger incapables ? est-ce que la science appartenait à ce monsieur ! Comme s'il était lui-même un personnage bien supérieur !

Donc acceptant son défi, ils allèrent jusqu'à Bayeux pour y acheter des livres. Ce qui leur manquait, c'était la physiologie ; — et un bouquiniste leur procura les traités de Richerand et d'Adelon, célèbres à l'époque.

Tous les lieux communs sur les âges, les sexes et les tempéraments leur semblèrent de la plus haute importance. Ils furent bien aises de savoir qu'il y a dans le tartre des dents trois espèces d'animalcules, que le siège du goût est sur la langue, et la sensation de la faim dans l'estomac.

Pour en saisir mieux les Fonctions, ils regrettaient de n'avoir pas la faculté de ruminer, comme l'avaient eue Montègre, M. Gosse, et le frère de Bérard ; — et ils mâchaient avec lenteur, trituraient, insalivaient, accompagnant de la pensée le bol alimentaire dans leurs entrailles, le suivaient même jusqu'à ses dernières conséquences, pleins d'un scrupule méthodique, d'une attention presque religieuse.

Afin de produire artificiellement des digestions, ils tassèrent de la viande dans une fiole, où était le suc gastrique d'un canard — et ils la portèrent sous leurs aisselles durant quinze jours, sans autre résultat que d'infecter leurs personnes.

On les vit courir le long de la grande route, revêtus d'habits mouillés et à l'ardeur du soleil. C'était pour vérifier si la soif s'apaise par l'application de l'eau sur l'épiderme. Ils rentrèrent haletants ; et tous les deux avec un rhume.

L'audition, la phonation, la vision furent expédiées lestement. Mais Bouvard s'étala sur la génération.

Les réserves de Pécuchet en cette matière l'avaient toujours surpris. Son ignorance lui parut si complète qu'il le pressa de s'expliquer — et Pécuchet en rougissant finit par faire un aveu.

Des farceurs, autrefois, l'avaient entraîné dans une mauvaise maison — d'où il s'était enfui, se gardant pour la femme qu'il aimerait plus tard ; — une circonstance heureuse n'était jamais venue ; si bien, que par fausse honte, gêne pécuniaire, crainte des maladies, entêtement, habitude, à cinquante deux ans et malgré le séjour de la capitale, il possédait encore sa virginité.

Bouvard eut peine à le croire — puis il rit énormément, mais s'arrêta, en apercevant des larmes dans les yeux de Pécuchet.

Car les passions ne lui avaient pas manqué, s'étant tour à tour épris d'une danseuse de corde, de la belle-soeur d'un architecte, d'une demoiselle de comptoir — enfin d'une petite blanchisseuse ; — et le mariage allait même se conclure, quand il avait découvert qu'elle était enceinte d'un autre.

Bouvard lui dit :

— Il y a moyen toujours de réparer le temps perdu ! Pas de tristesse, voyons ! je me charge si tu veux...

Pécuchet répliqua, en soupirant, qu'il ne fallait plus y songer. — Et ils continuèrent leur physiologie.

Est-il vrai que la surface de notre corps dégage perpétuellement une vapeur subtile ? La preuve, c'est que le poids d'un homme décroît à chaque minute. Si chaque jour s'opère l'addition de ce qui manque et la soustraction de ce qui excède, la santé se maintiendra en parfait équilibre. Sanctorius, l'inventeur de cette loi, employa un demi-siècle à peser quotidiennement sa nourriture avec toutes ses excrétiions, et se pesait lui-même, ne prenant de relâche que pour écrire ses calculs.

Ils essayèrent d'imiter Sanctorius. Mais comme leur balance ne pouvait les supporter tous les deux, ce fut Pécuchet qui commença.

Il retira ses habits, afin de ne pas gêner la perspiration — et il se tenait sur le plateau, complètement nu, laissant voir, malgré la pudeur, son torse très long pareil à un cylindre, avec des jambes courtes, les pieds plats et la peau brune. À ses côtés, sur une chaise, son ami lui faisait la lecture.

Des savants prétendent que la chaleur animale se développe par les contractions musculaires, et qu'il est possible en agitant le thorax et les membres pelviens de hausser la température d'un bain tiède.

Bouvard alla chercher leur baignoire — et quand tout fut prêt, il s'y plongea, muni d'un thermomètre.

Les ruines de la distillerie balayées vers le fond de l'appartement dessinaient dans l'ombre un vague monticule. On entendait par intervalles le grignotement des souris ; une vieille odeur de plantes aromatiques s'exhalait — et se trouvant là fort bien ils causaient avec sérénité.

Cependant Bouvard sentait un peu de fraîcheur.

— Agite tes membres ! dit Pécuchet.

Il les agita, sans rien changer au thermomètre ; — c'est froid, décidément.

— Je n'ai pas chaud, non plus reprit Pécuchet, saisi lui-même par un frisson mais agite tes membres pelviens ! agite-les !

Bouvard ouvrit les cuisses, se tordait les flancs, balançait son ventre, soufflait comme un cachalot ; — puis regardait le thermomètre, qui baissait toujours. — Je n'y comprends rien ! Je me remue, pourtant !

— Pas assez !

Et il reprenait sa gymnastique.

Elle avait duré trois heures, quand une fois encore il empoigna le tube.

— Comment ! douze degrés ! — Ah ! bonsoir ! Je me retire !

Un chien entra, moitié dogue moitié braque, le poil jaune, galeux, la langue pendante.

Que faire ? pas de sonnettes ! et leur domestique était sourde. Ils gelottaient mais n'osaient bouger, dans la peur d'être mordus.

Pécuchet crut habile de lancer des menaces, en roulant des yeux.

Alors le chien aboya ; — et il sautait autour de la balance, où Pécuchet se cramponnant aux cordes, et pliant les genoux, tâchait de s'élever le plus haut possible.

— Tu t'y prends mal dit Bouvard ; et il se mit à faire des risettes au chien en proférant des douceurs.

Le chien sans doute les comprit. — Il s'efforçait de le caresser, lui collait ses pattes sur les épaules, les éraflait avec ses ongles.

— Allons ! maintenant ! voilà qu'il a emporté ma culotte !

Il se coucha dessus, et demeura tranquille.

Enfin, avec les plus grandes précautions, ils se hasardèrent l'un à descendre du plateau, l'autre à sortir de la baignoire ; — et quand Pécuchet fut rhabillé, cette exclamation lui échappa :

— Toi, mon bonhomme, tu serviras à nos expériences !

Quelles expériences ?

On pouvait lui injecter du phosphore, puis l'enfermer dans une cave pour voir s'il rendrait du feu par les naseaux. Mais comment injecter ? et du reste, on ne leur vendrait pas de phosphore.

Ils songèrent à l'enfermer sous la machine pneumatique, à lui faire respirer des gaz, à lui donner pour breuvage des poisons. Tout cela peut être ne serait pas drôle ! Enfin ils choisirent l'aimantation de l'acier par le contact de la moelle épinière.

Bouvard, refoulant son émotion, tendait sur une assiette des aiguilles à Pécuchet, qui les plantait contre les vertèbres. Elles se cassaient, glissaient, tombaient par terre ; il en prenait d'autres, et les enfonçait vivement, au hasard. Le chien rompit ses attaches, passa comme un boulet de canon par les carreaux, traversa la cour, le vestibule et se présenta dans la cuisine.

Germaine poussa des cris en le voyant tout ensanglanté, avec des ficelles autour des pattes.

Ses maîtres qui le poursuivaient entrèrent au même moment. Il fit un bond et disparut.

La vieille servante les apostropha.

— C'est encore une de vos bêtises, j'en suis sûre ! — Et ma cuisine, elle est propre ! Ça le rendra peut-être enragé ! On en fourre en prison qui ne vous valent pas !

Ils regagnèrent le laboratoire, pour éprouver les aiguilles. Pas une n'attira la moindre limaille.

Puis, l'hypothèse de Germaine les inquiéta. Il pouvait avoir la rage, revenir à l'improviste, se précipiter sur eux.

Le lendemain, ils allèrent partout, aux informations — et pendant plusieurs années, ils se détournaient dans la campagne, sitôt qu'apparaissait un chien, ressemblant à celui-là.

Les autres expériences échouèrent. Contrairement aux auteurs, les pigeons qu'ils saignèrent l'estomac plein ou vide, moururent dans le même espace de temps. Des petits chats enfoncés sous l'eau périrent au bout de cinq minutes — et une oie, qu'ils avaient bourrée de garance, offrit des périostes d'une entière blancheur.

La nutrition les tourmentait.

Comment se fait-il que le même suc produise des os, du sang, de la lymphe et des matières excrémentielles ? Mais on ne peut suivre les métamorphoses d'un aliment. L'homme qui n'use que d'un seul est, chimiquement, pareil à celui qui en absorbe plusieurs. Vauquelin ayant calculé toute la chaux contenue dans l'avoine d'une poule, en retrouva davantage dans les coquilles de ses oeufs. Donc, il se fait une création de substance. De quelle manière ? on n'en sait rien.

On ne sait même pas quelle est la force du coeur. Borelli admet celle qu'il faut pour soulever un poids de cent quatre-vingt mille livres, et Keill l'évalue à huit onces, environ. D'où ils conclurent que la Physiologie est (suivant un vieux mot) le roman de la médecine. N'ayant pu la comprendre, ils n'y croyaient pas.

Un mois se passa dans le désœuvrement. Puis ils songèrent à leur jardin.

L'arbre mort étalé dans le milieu était gênant. Ils l'équarrirent. Cet exercice les fatigua. — Bouvard avait, très souvent, besoin de faire arranger ses outils chez le forgeron.

Un jour qu'il s'y rendait, il fut accosté par un homme portant sur le dos un sac de toile, et qui lui proposa des almanachs, des livres pieux, des médailles bénites, enfin le Manuel de la Santé, par François Raspail.

Cette brochure lui plut tellement qu'il écrivit à Barberou de lui envoyer le grand ouvrage. Barberou l'expédia, et indiquait dans sa lettre, une pharmacie pour les médicaments.

La clarté de la doctrine les séduisit. Toutes les affections proviennent des vers. Ils gâtent les dents, creusent les poumons, dilatent le foie, ravagent les intestins, et y causent des bruits. Ce qu'il y a de mieux pour s'en délivrer c'est le camphre. Bouvard et Pécuchet l'adoptèrent. Ils en prisaient, ils en croquaient et distribuaient des cigarettes, des flacons d'eau sédative, et des pilules d'aloès. Ils entreprirent même la cure d'un bossu.

C'était un enfant qu'ils avaient rencontré un jour de foire. Sa mère, une mendiante, l'amenait chez eux tous les matins. Ils frictionnaient sa bosse avec de la graisse camphrée, y mettaient pendant vingt minutes un cataplasme de moutarde, puis la recouvraient de diachylum, et pour être sûrs qu'il reviendrait, lui donnaient à déjeuner.

Ayant l'esprit tendu vers les helminthes, Pécuchet observa sur la joue de Mme Bordin une tache bizarre. Le Docteur, depuis longtemps la traitait par les amers ; ronde au début comme une pièce de vingt sols, cette tache avait grandi, et formait un cercle rose. Ils voulurent l'en guérir. Elle accepta ; mais exigeait que ce fût Bouvard qui lui fît les onctions. Elle se posait devant la fenêtre, dégrafait le haut de son corsage et restait la joue tendue, en le regardant avec un oeil, qui aurait été dangereux sans la présence de Pécuchet. Dans les doses permises et malgré l'effroi du mercure ils administrèrent du calomel. Un mois plus tard, Mme Bordin était sauvée.

Elle leur fit de la propagande ; — et le percepteur des contributions, le secrétaire de la mairie, le maire lui-même, tout le monde dans Chavignolles suçait des tuyaux de plume.

Cependant le bossu ne se redressait pas. Le percepteur lâcha la cigarette, elle redoublait ses étouffements. Foureau se plaignit des pilules d'aloès qui lui occasionnaient des hémorroïdes, Bouvard eut des maux d'estomac et Pécuchet d'atroces migraines. Ils perdirent confiance dans le Raspail, mais eurent soin de n'en rien dire, craignant de diminuer leur considération.

Et ils montrèrent beaucoup de zèle pour la vaccine, apprirent à saigner sur des feuilles de chou, firent même l'acquisition d'une paire de lancettes.

Ils accompagnaient le médecin chez les pauvres, puis consultaient leurs livres.

Les symptômes notés par les auteurs n'étaient pas ceux qu'ils venaient de voir. Quant aux noms des maladies, du latin, du grec, du français, une bigarrure de toutes les langues.

On les compte par milliers, et la classification linnéenne est bien commode, avec ses genres et ses espèces ; mais comment établir les espèces ? Alors, ils s'égarèrent dans la philosophie de la médecine.

Ils rêvaient sur l'archée de Van Helmont, le vitalisme, le Brownisme, l'organicisme, demandaient au Docteur d'où vient le germe de la scrofule, vers quel endroit se porte le miasme contagieux, et le moyen dans tous les cas morbides de distinguer la cause de ses effets.

— La cause et l'effet s'embrouillent, répondait Vaucorbeil.

Son manque de logique les dégoûta ; — et ils visitèrent les malades tout seuls, pénétrant dans les maisons, sous prétexte de philanthropie.

Au fond des chambres sur de sales matelas, reposaient des gens dont la figure pendait d'un côté, d'autres l'avaient bouffie et d'un rouge écarlate, ou couleur de citron, ou bien violette, avec les narines pincées, la bouche tremblante ; et des râles, des hoquets, des sueurs, des exhalaisons de cuir et de vieux fromage.

Ils lisaient les ordonnances de leurs médecins, et étaient fort surpris que les calmants soient parfois des excitants, les vomitifs des purgatifs, qu'un même remède convienne à des affections diverses, et qu'une maladie s'en aille sous des traitements opposés.

Néanmoins, ils donnaient des conseils, remontaient le moral, avaient l'audace d'ausculter.

Leur imagination travaillait. Ils écrivirent au Roi, pour qu'on établît dans le Calvados un institut de gardes-malades, dont ils seraient les professeurs.

Ils se transportèrent chez le pharmacien de Bayeux (celui de Falaise leur en voulait toujours à cause de son jujube) et ils l'engagèrent à fabriquer comme les Anciens des pila purgatoria, c'est-à-dire des boulettes de médicaments, qui à force d'être maniées, s'absorbent dans l'individu.

D'après ce raisonnement qu'en diminuant la chaleur on entrave les phlegmasies, ils suspendirent dans son fauteuil, aux poutrelles du plafond, une femme affectée de méningite, et ils la balançaient à tour de bras quand le mari survenant les flanqua dehors.

Enfin au grand scandale de M. le curé, ils avaient pris la mode nouvelle d'introduire des thermomètres dans les derrières.

Une fièvre typhoïde se répandit aux environs : Bouvard déclara qu'il ne s'en mêlerait pas. Mais la femme de Gouy leur fermier vint gémir chez eux. Son homme était malade depuis quinze jours ; et M. Vaucorbeil le négligeait.

Pécuchet se dévoua.

Taches lenticulaires sur la poitrine, douleurs aux articulations, ventre ballonné, langue rouge, c'étaient tous les signes de la dothiénentérie. Se rappelant le mot de Raspail qu'en ôtant la diète on supprime la fièvre, il ordonna des bouillons, un peu de viande. Tout à coup, le docteur parut.

Son malade était en train de manger, deux oreillers derrière le dos, entre la fermière et Pécuchet qui le renforçaient.

Il s'approcha du lit, et jeta l'assiette par la fenêtre, en s'écriant :

— C'est un véritable meurtre !

— Pourquoi ?

— Vous perforez l'intestin, puisque la fièvre typhoïde est une altération de sa membrane folliculaire.

— Pas toujours !

Et une dispute s'engagea sur la nature des fièvres. Pécuchet croyait à leur essence. Vaucorbeil les faisait dépendre des organes. — Aussi j'éloigne tout ce qui peut surexciter !

— Mais la diète affaiblit le principe vital !

— Qu'est-ce que vous me chantez avec votre principe vital !

Comment est-il ? qui l'a vu ?

Pécuchet s'embrouilla.

— D'ailleurs disait le médecin, Gouy ne veut pas de nourriture. Le malade fit un geste d'assentiment sous son bonnet de coton.

— N'importe ! il en a besoin !

— Jamais ! son poulx donne quatre-vingt-dix-huit pulsations.

— Qu'importe les pulsations ! Et Pécuchet nomma ses autorités.

— Laissons les systèmes ! dit le Docteur.

Pécuchet croisa les bras.

— Vous êtes un empirique, alors ?

— Nullement ! mais en observant.

— Et si on observe mal ?

Vaucorbeil prit cette parole pour une allusion à l'herpès de Mme Bordin, histoire clabaudée par la veuve, et dont le souvenir l'agaçait.

— D'abord, il faut avoir fait de la pratique.

— Ceux qui ont révolutionné la science, n'en faisaient pas ! Van Helmont, Boerhave, Broussais, lui-même.

Vaucorbeil, sans répondre, se pencha vers Gouy, et haussant la voix :

— Lequel de nous deux choisissez-vous pour médecin ?

Le malade, somnolent, aperçut des visages en colère, et se mit à pleurer.

Sa femme non plus ne savait que répondre ; car l'un était habile ; mais l'autre avait peut-être un secret ?

— Très bien ! dit Vaucorbeil. Puisque vous balancez entre un homme nanti d'un diplôme :... Pécuchet ricana. Pourquoi riez-vous ?

— C'est qu'un diplôme n'est pas toujours un argument !

Le Docteur était attaqué dans son gagne-pain, dans sa prérogative, dans son importance sociale. Sa colère éclata.

— Nous le verrons quand vous irez devant les tribunaux pour exercice illégal de la médecine ! Puis se tournant vers la fermière : Faites-le tuer par monsieur tout à votre aise, et que je sois pendu si je reviens jamais dans votre maison.

Et il s'enfonça sous la hêtrée, en gesticulant avec sa canne.

Bouvard, quand Pécuchet rentra, était lui-même dans une grande agitation.

Il venait de recevoir Foureau, exaspéré par ses hémorroïdes. Vainement avait-il soutenu qu'elles préservent de toutes les maladies, Foureau n'écoutant rien, l'avait menacé de dommages et intérêts. Il en perdait la tête.

Pécuchet lui conta l'autre histoire, qu'il jugeait plus sérieuse — et fut un peu choqué de son indifférence.

Gouy, le lendemain eut une douleur dans l'abdomen. Cela pouvait tenir à l'ingestion de la nourriture ? Peut-être que Vaucorbeil ne s'était pas trompé ? Un médecin après tout doit s'y connaître ! et des remords assaillirent Pécuchet. Il avait peur d'être homicide.

Par prudence, ils congédièrent le bossu. Mais à cause du déjeuner lui échappant, sa mère cria beaucoup. Ce n'était pas la peine de les avoir fait venir tous les jours de Barneval à Chavignolles !

Foureau se calma — et Gouy reprenait des forces. À présent, la guérison était certaine ; un tel succès enhardit Pécuchet.

— Si nous travaillions les accouchements, avec un de ces mannequins...

— Assez de mannequins !

— Ce sont des demi-corps en peau, inventés pour les élèves sages-femmes.

Il me semble que je retournerais le fœtus ?

Mais Bouvard était las de la médecine.

— Les ressorts de la vie nous sont cachés, les affections trop nombreuses, les remèdes problématiques — et on ne découvre dans les auteurs aucune définition raisonnable de la santé, de la maladie, de la diathèse, ni même du pus !

Cependant toutes ces lectures avaient ébranlé leur cervelle.

Bouvard, à l'occasion d'un rhume, se figura qu'il commençait une fluxion de poitrine. Des sangsues n'ayant pas affaibli le point de côté, il eut recours à un vésicatoire, dont l'action se porta sur les reins. Alors, il se crut attaqué de la pierre.

Pécuchet prit une courbature à l'élagage de la charmille, et vomit après son dîner, ce qui l'effraya beaucoup. Puis observant qu'il avait le teint un peu jaune, suspecta une maladie de foie, se demandait : Ai-je des douleurs ? et finit par en avoir.

S'attristant mutuellement, ils regardaient leur langue, se tâtaient le poulx, changeaient d'eau minérale, se purgeaient ; — et redoutaient le froid, la chaleur, le vent, la pluie, les mouches, principalement les courants d'air.

Pécuchet imagina que l'usage de la prise était funeste. D'ailleurs, un éternuement occasionne parfois la rupture d'un anévrisme — et il abandonna la tabatière. Par habitude, il y plongeait les doigts ; puis, tout à coup, se rappelait son imprudence.

Comme le café noir secoue les nerfs Bouvard voulut renoncer à la demi-tasse ; mais il dormait après ses repas, et avait peur en se réveillant ; car le sommeil prolongé est une menace d'apoplexie.

Leur idéal était Cornaro, ce gentilhomme vénitien, qui à force de régime atteignit une extrême vieillesse. Sans l'imiter absolument, on peut avoir les mêmes précautions, et Pécuchet tira de sa bibliothèque un Manuel d'hygiène par le docteur Morin.

Comment avaient-ils fait pour vivre jusque-là ? Les plats qu'ils aimaient s'y trouvent défendus. Germaine embarrassée ne savait plus que leur servir.

Toutes les viandes ont des inconvénients. Le boudin et la charcuterie, le hareng saur, le homard, et le gibier sont réfractaires. Plus un poisson est gros plus il contient de gélatine et par conséquent est lourd. Les légumes causent des aigreurs, le macaroni donne des rêves, les fromages considérés généralement, sont d'une digestion difficile. Un verre d'eau le matin est dangereux ; chaque boisson ou comestible étant suivi d'un avertissement pareil, ou bien de ces mots : mauvais ! — gardez-vous de l'abus ! — ne convient pas à tout le monde. — Pourquoi mauvais ? où est l'abus ? comment savoir si telle chose vous convient ?

Quel problème que celui du déjeuner ! Ils quittèrent le café au lait, sur sa détestable réputation ; et ensuite le chocolat, — car c'est un amas de substances indigestes ; restait donc le thé. Mais les personnes nerveuses doivent se l'interdire complètement. Cependant, Decker au XVIIe siècle en prescrivait vingt décalitres par jour, afin de nettoyer les marais du pancréas.

Ce renseignement ébranla Morin dans leur estime, d'autant plus qu'il condamne toutes les coiffures, chapeaux, bonnets et casquettes, exigence qui révolta Pécuchet. Alors ils achetèrent le traité de Becquerel où ils virent que le porc est en soi-même un bon aliment, le tabac d'une innocence parfaite, et le café indispensable aux militaires.

Jusqu'alors ils avaient cru à l'insalubrité des endroits humides. Pas du tout ! Casper les déclare moins mortels que les autres. On ne se baigne pas dans la mer sans avoir rafraîchi sa peau. Bégin veut qu'on s'y jette en pleine transpiration. Le vin pur après la soupe passe pour excellent à l'estomac. Lévy l'accuse d'altérer les dents. Enfin, le gilet de flanelle, cette sauvegarde, ce tuteur de la santé, ce palladium chéri de Bouvard et inhérent à Pécuchet, sans ambages ni crainte de l'opinion, des auteurs le déconseillent aux hommes pléthoriques et sanguins.

Qu'est-ce donc que l'hygiène ?

— Vérité en deçà des Pyrénées, erreur au delà affirme M. Lévy ; et Becquerel ajoute qu'elle n'est pas une science.

Alors ils se commandèrent pour leur dîner des huîtres, un canard, du porc au choux, de la crème, un Pont-l'Évêque, et une bouteille de Bourgogne. Ce fut un affranchissement, presque une revanche ; et ils se moquaient de Cornaro ! Fallait-il être imbécile pour se tyranniser comme lui ! Quelle bassesse que de penser toujours au prolongement de son existence ! La vie n'est bonne qu'à la condition d'en jouir. — Encore un morceau ? — Je veux bien. — Moi de même ! — À ta santé ! — À la tienne ! — Et fichons-nous du reste ! Ils s'exaltaient.

Bouvard annonça qu'il voulait trois tasses de café, bien qu'il ne fût pas un militaire. Pécuchet, la casquette sur les oreilles, prisait coup sur coup, éternuait sans peur, et sentant le besoin d'un peu de champagne, ils ordonnèrent à Germaine d'aller de suite au cabaret, leur en acheter une bouteille. Le village était trop loin. Elle refusa. Pécuchet fut indigné.

— Je vous somme, entendez-vous ! je vous somme d'y courir.

Elle obéit, mais en bougonnant, résolue à lâcher bientôt ses maîtres, tant ils étaient incompréhensibles et fantasques.

Puis, comme autrefois, ils allèrent prendre le gloria sur le vigneau.

La moisson venait de finir — et des meules au milieu des champs dressaient leurs masses noires sur la couleur de la nuit, bleuâtre et douce. Les fermes étaient tranquilles. On n'entendait même plus les grillons. Toute la campagne dormait. Ils digéraient en humant la brise qui rafraîchissait leurs pommettes.

Le ciel très haut, était couvert d'étoiles ; les unes brillant par groupes, d'autres à la file, ou bien seules à des intervalles éloignés. Une zone de poussière lumineuse, allant du septentrion au midi, se bifurquait au-dessus de leurs têtes. Il y avait entre ces clartés, de grands espaces vides ; — et le firmament semblait une mer d'azur, avec des archipels et des îlots.

— Quelle quantité ! s'écria Bouvard.

— Nous ne voyons pas tout ! reprit Pécuchet. Derrière la voie lactée, ce sont les nébuleuses ; au delà des nébuleuses des étoiles encore ! La plus voisine est séparée de nous par trois cents billions de myriamètres ! Il avait regardé souvent dans le télescope de la place Vendôme et se rappelait les chiffres. Le Soleil est un million de fois plus gros que la Terre, Sirius a douze fois la grandeur du soleil, des comètes mesurent trente-quatre millions de lieues !

— C'est à rendre fou dit Bouvard. Il déplora son ignorance et même regrettait de n'avoir pas été, dans sa jeunesse, à l'École Polytechnique.

Alors Pécuchet le tournant vers la Grande Ourse, lui montra l'étoile polaire, puis Cassiopée dont la constellation forme un Y, Véga de la Lyre toute scintillante, et au bas de l'horizon, le rouge Aldebaran.

Bouvard, la tête renversée, suivait péniblement les triangles, quadrilatères et pentagones qu'il faut imaginer pour se reconnaître dans le ciel.

Pécuchet continua :

— La vitesse de la lumière est de quatre-vingt mille lieues dans une seconde. Un rayon de la Voie lactée met six siècles à nous parvenir — si bien qu'une étoile, quand on l'observe, peut avoir disparu. Plusieurs sont intermittentes, d'autres ne reviennent jamais ; — et elles changent de position ; tout s'agite, tout passe.

— Cependant, le Soleil est immobile ?

— On le croyait autrefois. Mais les savants aujourd'hui, annoncent qu'il se précipite vers la constellation d'Hercule !

Cela dérangeait les idées de Bouvard — et après une minute de réflexion :

— La science est faite, suivant les données fournies par un coin de l'étendue. Peut-être ne convient-elle pas à tout le reste qu'on ignore, qui est beaucoup plus grand, et qu'on ne peut découvrir.

Ils parlaient ainsi, debout sur le vigneau, à la lueur des astres — et leurs discours étaient coupés par de longs silences.

Enfin ils se demandèrent s'il y avait des hommes dans les étoiles. Pourquoi pas ? Et comme la création est harmonique, les habitants de Sirius devaient être démesurés, ceux de Mars d'une taille moyenne, ceux de Vénus très petits. À moins que ce ne soit partout la même chose ? Il existe là-haut des commerçants, des gendarmes ; on y trafique, on s'y bat, on y détrône des rois !...

Quelques étoiles filantes glissèrent tout à coup, décrivant sur le ciel comme la parabole d'une monstrueuse fusée.

— Tiens ! dit Bouvard voilà des mondes qui disparaissent.

Pécuchet reprit :

— Si le nôtre, à son tour, faisait la cabriole, les citoyens des étoiles

ne seraient pas plus émus que nous ne le sommes maintenant ! De pareilles idées vous renfoncent l'orgueil.

— Quel est le but de tout cela ?

— Peut-être qu'il n'y a pas de but ?

— Cependant ! et Pécuchet répéta deux ou trois fois cependant sans trouver rien de plus à dire. — N'importe ! je voudrais bien savoir comment l'univers s'est fait !

— Cela doit être dans Buffon ! répondit Bouvard, dont les yeux se fermaient. Je n'en peux plus ! je vais me coucher !

Les Époques de la nature leur apprirent qu'une comète, en heurtant le soleil, en avait détaché une portion, qui devint la Terre. D'abord les pôles s'étaient refroidis. Toutes les eaux avaient enveloppé le globe. Elles s'étaient retirées dans les cavernes ; puis les continents se divisèrent, les animaux et l'homme parurent.

La majesté de la création leur causa un ébahissement, infini comme elle. Leur tête s'élargissait. Ils étaient fiers de réfléchir sur de si grands objets.

Les minéraux ne tardèrent pas à les fatiguer ; — et ils recoururent comme distraction, aux Harmonies de Bernardin de Saint-Pierre.

Harmonies végétales et terrestres, aériennes, aquatiques, humaines, fraternelles et même conjugales, tout y passa — sans omettre les invocations à Vénus, aux Zéphyrs et aux Amours ! Ils s'étonnaient que les poissons eussent des nageoires, les oiseaux des ailes, les semences une enveloppe — pleins de cette philosophie qui découvre dans la Nature des intentions vertueuses et la considère comme une espèce de saint Vincent de Paul, toujours occupé à répandre des bienfaits !

Ils admirèrent ensuite ses prodiges, les trombes, les volcans, les forêts vierges ; — et ils achetèrent l'ouvrage de M. Depping sur les Merveilles et beautés de la nature en France. Le Cantal en possède trois, l'Hérault cinq, la Bourgogne deux — pas davantage — tandis que le Dauphiné compte à lui seul jusqu'à quinze merveilles ! Mais bientôt, on n'en trouvera plus ! Les grottes à stalactites se bouchent, les montagnes ardentes s'éteignent, les glaciers naturels s'échauffent ; — et les vieux arbres dans lesquels on disait la messe tombent sous la cognée des niveleurs, ou sont en train de mourir.

Puis leur curiosité se tourna vers les bêtes.

Ils rouvrirent leur Buffon et s'extasièrent devant les goûts bizarres de certains animaux.

Mais tous les livres ne valant pas une observation personnelle, ils entraient dans les cours, et demandaient aux laboureurs s'ils avaient vu des taureaux se joindre à des juments, les cochons rechercher les vaches, et les mâles des perdrix commettre entre eux des turpitudes.

— Jamais de la vie ! On trouvait même ces questions un peu drôles pour des messieurs de leur âge.

Ils voulurent tenter des alliances anormales.

La moins difficile est celle du bouc et de la brebis. Leur fermier ne possédait pas de bouc. Une voisine prêta le sien ; et l'époque du rut étant venue, ils enfermèrent les deux bêtes dans le pressoir, en se cachant derrière les futailles, pour que l'événement pût s'accomplir en paix.

Chacune, d'abord, mangea son petit tas de foin. Puis, elles ruminèrent, la brebis se coucha ; — et elle bêlait sans discontinuer, pendant que le bouc, d'aplomb sur ses jambes torses, avec sa grande barbe et ses oreilles pendantes, fixait sur eux ses prunelles, qui luisaient dans l'ombre.

Enfin, le soir du troisième jour, ils jugèrent convenable de faciliter la nature. Mais le bouc se retournant contre Pécuchet, lui flanqua un coup de cornes au bas du ventre. La brebis, saisie de peur, se mit à tourner dans le pressoir comme dans un manège. Bouvard courut après, se jeta dessus pour la retenir, et tomba par terre avec des poignées de laine dans les deux mains.

Ils renouvelèrent leurs tentatives sur des poules et un canard, sur un dogue et une truie, avec l'espoir qu'il en sortirait des monstres et ne comprenant rien à la question de l'espèce.

Ce mot désigne un groupe d'individus dont les descendants se reproduisent. Mais des animaux classés comme d'espèces différentes peuvent se reproduire, et d'autres compris dans la même en ont perdu la faculté.

Ils se flattèrent d'obtenir là-dessus des idées nettes, en étudiant le développement des germes ; et Pécuchet écrivit à Dumouchel, pour avoir un microscope.

Tour à tour ils mirent sur la plaque de verre des cheveux, du tabac, des ongles, une patte de mouche. Mais ils avaient oublié la goutte d'eau, indispensable. C'était, d'autres fois, la petite lamelle ; — et ils se poussaient, dérangeaient l'instrument ; puis, n'apercevant que du brouillard accusaient l'opticien. Ils en arrivèrent à douter du microscope. Les découvertes qu'on lui attribue ne sont peut-être pas si positives.

Dumouchel, en leur adressant la facture, les pria de recueillir à son intention des ammonites et des oursins, curiosités dont il était toujours amateur, et fréquentes dans leur pays. Pour les exciter à la géologie, il leur envoyait les Lettres de Bertrand avec le Discours de Cuvier sur les révolutions du globe.

Après ces deux lectures, ils se figurèrent les choses suivantes.

D'abord une immense nappe d'eau, d'où émergeaient des promontoires, tachetés par des lichens ; et pas un être vivant, pas un cri ; c'était un monde silencieux, immobile et nu. — Puis de longues plantes se balançaient dans un brouillard qui ressemblait à la vapeur d'une étuve. Un soleil tout rouge surchauffait l'atmosphère humide. Alors des volcans éclatèrent, les roches ignées jaillissaient des montagnes ; et la pâte des porphyres et des basaltes qui coulait, se figea. — Troisième tableau : dans des mers peu profondes, des îles de madrépores ont surgi ; un bouquet de palmiers, de place en place, les domine. Il y a des coquillages pareils à des roues de chariot, des tortues qui ont trois mètres, des lézards de soixante pieds. Des amphibiens allongent entre les roseaux leur col d'autruche à mâchoire de crocodile. Des serpents ailés s'envolent. — Enfin, sur les grands continents, de grands mammifères parurent, les membres difformes comme des pièces de bois mal équarries, le cuir plus épais que des plaques de bronze, ou bien velus, lippus, avec des crinières, et des défenses contournées. Des troupeaux de mammoths broutaient les plaines où fut depuis l'Atlantique ; le paléothérium, moitié cheval moitié tapir, bouleversait de son groin les fourmilières de Montmartre, et le cervus giganteus tremblait sous les châtaigniers, à la voix de l'ours des cavernes, qui faisait japper dans sa tanière, le chien de Beaugency trois fois haut comme un loup.

Toutes ces époques avaient été séparées les unes des autres par des cataclysmes, dont le dernier est notre déluge. C'était comme une féerie en plusieurs actes, ayant l'homme pour apothéose.

Ils furent stupéfaits d'apprendre qu'il existait sur des pierres des empreintes de libellules, de pattes d'oiseaux, — et ayant feuilleté un des manuels Roret, ils cherchèrent des fossiles.

Un après-midi, comme ils retournaient des silex au milieu de la grande route, M. le curé passa, et les abordant d'une voix pateline :

— Ces messieurs s'occupent de géologie ? fort bien !

Car il estimait cette science. Elle confirme l'autorité des Écritures, en prouvant le Déluge.

Bouvard parla des coprolithes, lesquels sont des excréments de bêtes, pétrifiés.

L'abbé Jeufroy parut surpris du fait ; après tout, s'il avait lieu, c'était une raison de plus, d'admirer la Providence.

Pécuchet avoua que leurs enquêtes jusqu'alors n'avaient pas été fructueuses, — et cependant les environs de Falaise, comme tous les terrains jurassiques, devaient abonder en débris d'animaux.

— J'ai entendu dire répliqua l'abbé Jeufroy qu'autrefois on avait trouvé à Villers la mâchoire d'un éléphant. Du reste, un de ses amis, M.

Larsonneur, avocat, membre du barreau de Lisieux et archéologue, leur fournirait peut-être des renseignements ! Il avait fait une histoire de Port-en-Bessin où était notée la découverte d'un crocodile.

Bouvard et Pécuchet échangèrent un coup d'oeil ; le même espoir leur était venu ; — et malgré la chaleur, ils restèrent debout pendant longtemps, à interroger l'ecclésiastique qui s'abritait sous un parapluie de coton bleu. Il avait le bas du visage un peu lourd avec le nez pointu, souriait continuellement, ou penchait la tête en fermant les paupières.

La cloche de l'église tinta l'angélus.

— Bien le bonsoir, messieurs ! Vous permettez, n'est-ce pas ?

Recommandés par lui, ils attendirent durant trois semaines la réponse de Larsonneur. Enfin, elle arriva.

L'homme de Villers qui avait déterré la dent de mastodonte s'appelait Louis Bloche ; les détails manquaient. Quant à son histoire, elle occupait un des volumes de l'Académie Lexovienne, et il ne prêtait point son exemplaire, dans la peur de dépareiller la collection. Pour ce qui était de l'alligator, on l'avait découvert au mois de novembre 1825, sous la falaise des Hachettes, à Sainte-Honorine, près de Port-en-Bessin, arrondissement de Bayeux. Suivaient des compliments.

L'obscurité enveloppant le mastodonte irrita le désir de Pécuchet. Il aurait voulu se rendre tout de suite à Villers.

Bouvard objecta que pour s'épargner un déplacement peut-être inutile, et à coup sûr dispendieux, il convenait de prendre des informations — et ils écrivirent au Maire de l'endroit une lettre, où ils lui demandaient ce qu'était devenu un certain Louis Bloche. Dans l'hypothèse de sa mort, ses descendants ou collatéraux pouvaient-ils les instruire sur sa précieuse découverte ? Quand il la fit, à quelle place de la commune gisait ce document des âges primitifs ? Avait-on des chances d'en trouver d'analogues ? Quel était par jour le prix d'un homme et d'une charrette.

Et ils eurent beau s'adresser à l'Adjoint, puis au premier Conseiller Municipal, ils ne reçurent de Villers aucune nouvelle. Sans doute les habitants étaient jaloux de leurs fossiles ? À moins qu'ils ne les vendissent aux Anglais. Le voyage des Hachettes fut résolu.

Bouvard et Pécuchet prirent la diligence de Falaise pour Caen. Ensuite une carriole les transporta de Caen à Bayeux ; — et de Bayeux, ils allèrent à pied jusqu'à Port-en-Bessin.

On ne les avait pas trompés. La côte des Hachettes offrait des cailloux bizarres — et sur les indications de l'aubergiste, ils atteignirent la grève.

La marée étant basse, elle découvrait tous ses galets, avec une prairie de goémons jusqu'au bord des flots.

Des vallonnements herbeux découpaient la falaise, composée d'une terre molle et brune et qui se durcissant devenait dans ses strates inférieures, une muraille de pierre grise. Des filets d'eau en tombaient sans discontinuer, pendant que la mer au loin, grondait. Elle semblait parfois suspendre son battement ; — et on n'entendait plus que le petit bruit des sources.

Ils titubaient sur des herbes gluantes, ou bien ils avaient à sauter des trous. — Bouvard s'assit près du rivage, et contempla les vagues, ne pensant à rien, fasciné, inerte. Pécuchet le ramena vers la côte pour lui faire voir un ammonite, incrusté dans la roche, comme un diamant dans sa gangue. Leurs ongles s'y brisèrent, il aurait fallu des instruments, la nuit venait, d'ailleurs ! — Le ciel était empourpré à l'occident, et toute la place couverte d'une ombre. — Au milieu des varechs presque noirs, les flaques d'eau s'élargissaient. La mer montait vers eux ; il était temps de rentrer.

Le lendemain dès l'aube, avec une pioche et un pic, ils attaquèrent leur fossile dont l'enveloppe éclata. C'était un ammonite nodosus, rongé par les bouts mais pesant bien seize livres, et Pécuchet, dans l'enthousiasme, s'écria : — Nous ne pouvons faire moins que de l'offrir à Dumouchel !

Puis ils rencontrèrent des éponges, des térébratules, des orques, et pas de crocodile ! — à son défaut, ils espéraient une vertèbre d'hippopotame ou d'ichthyosaure, n'importe quel ossement contemporain du Déluge, quand ils distinguèrent à hauteur d'homme contre la falaise, des contours qui figuraient le galbe d'un poisson gigantesque.

Ils délibérèrent sur les moyens de l'obtenir.

Bouvard le dégagerait par le haut, tandis que Pécuchet en dessous, démolirait la roche pour le faire descendre, doucement, sans l'abîmer.

Comme ils reprenaient haleine, ils virent au-dessus de leur tête, dans la campagne un douanier en manteau, qui gesticulait d'un air de commandement.

— Eh bien ! quoi ? fiche-nous la paix ! et ils continuèrent leur besogne, Bouvard sur la pointe des orteils, tapant avec sa pioche, Pécuchet les reins pliés, creusant avec son pic.

Mais le douanier reparut, plus bas, dans un vallon, en multipliant les signaux : ils s'en moquaient bien ! Un corps ovale se bombait sous la terre amincie, et penchait, allait glisser.

Un autre individu, avec un sabre, se montra tout à coup.

— Vos passeports !

C'était le garde champêtre en tournée ; — et au même moment survint l'homme de la douane, accouru par une ravine.

— Empoignez-les, père Morin ! ou la falaise va s'écrouler !

— C'est dans un but scientifique répondit Pécuchet.

Alors une masse tomba, en les frôlant de si près tous les quatre, qu'un peu plus ils étaient morts.

Quand la poussière fut dissipée, ils reconnurent un mât de navire qui s'émietta sous la botte du douanier.

Bouvard dit en soupirant : — Nous ne faisons pas grand mal !

— On ne doit rien faire dans les limites du Génie ! reprit le garde champêtre. D'abord qui êtes-vous ? pour que je vous dresse procès !

Pécuchet se rebiffa, criant à l'injustice.

— Pas de raisons ! suivez-moi !

Dès qu'ils arrivèrent sur le port, une foule de gamins les escorta. Bouvard rouge comme un coquelicot, affectait un air digne. Pécuchet, très pâle, lançait des regards furieux ; — et ces deux étrangers, portant des cailloux dans leurs mouchoirs n'avaient pas une bonne figure. Provisoirement, on les colloqua dans l'auberge, dont le maître sur le seuil, barrait l'entrée. Puis le maçon réclama ses outils ; ils les payèrent ; encore des frais ! — et le garde champêtre ne revenait pas ! pourquoi ? Enfin un monsieur qui avait la croix d'honneur, les délivra ; et ils s'en allèrent, ayant donné leurs noms, prénoms et domicile, avec l'engagement d'être à l'avenir plus circonspects.

Outre un passeport, il leur manquait bien des choses ! et avant d'entreprendre des explorations nouvelles ils consultèrent le Guide du voyageur géologue par Boné.

Il faut avoir, premièrement, un bon havresac de soldat, puis une chaîne d'arpenteur, une lime, des pinces, une boussole, et trois marteaux, passés dans une ceinture qui se dissimule sous la redingote, et vous préserve ainsi de cette apparence originale, que l'on doit éviter en voyage. Comme bâton, Pécuchet adopta franchement le bâton de touriste, haut de six pieds, à longue pointe de fer. Bouvard préférait une canne-parapluie, ou parapluie-polybranches, dont le pommeau se retire, pouragrafer la soie contenue, à part, dans un petit sac. Ils n'oublèrent pas de forts souliers, avec des guêtres, chacun deux paires de bretelles, à cause de la transpiration et bien qu'on ne puisse se présenter partout en casquette ils reculèrent devant la dépense d'un de ces chapeaux qui se plient, et qui portent le nom du chapelier Gibus, leur inventeur. Le même ouvrage donne des préceptes de conduite : Savoir la langue du pays que l'on visite, ils la savaient. Garder une tenue modeste, c'était leur usage. Ne pas avoir d'argent sur soi, rien de plus simple. Enfin, pour s'épargner toutes sortes d'embarras, il est bon de prendre la qualité d'ingénieur !

— Eh bien ! nous la prendrons !

Ainsi préparés, ils commencèrent leurs courses, étaient absents quelquefois pendant huit jours, passaient leur vie au grand air.

Tantôt sur les bords de l'Orne, ils apercevaient dans une déchirure, des pans de rocs dressant leurs lames obliques entre des peupliers et des bruyères ; — ou bien ils s'attristaient de ne rencontrer le long du chemin que des couches d'argile. Devant un paysage, ils n'admiraient ni la série des plans, ni la profondeur des lointains ni les ondulations de la verdure ; mais ce qu'on ne voyait pas, le dessous, la terre ; — et toutes les collines étaient pour eux encore une preuve du Déluge.

À la manie du Déluge, succéda celle des blocs erratiques. Les grosses pierres seules dans les champs devaient provenir de glaciers disparus ; — et ils cherchaient des moraines et des faluns.

Plusieurs fois, on les prit pour des porte-balles, vu leur accoutrement — et quand ils avaient répondu qu'ils étaient des ingénieurs une crainte leur venait ; l'usurpation d'un titre pareil pouvait leur attirer des désagréments.

À la fin du jour, ils haletaient sous le poids de leurs échantillons, mais intrépides les rapportaient chez eux. Il y en avait le long des marches dans l'escalier, dans les chambres, dans la salle, dans la cuisine ; et Germaine se lamentait sur la quantité de poussière.

Ce n'était pas une mince besogne avant de coller les étiquettes, que de savoir les noms des roches ; la variété des couleurs et du grenu leur faisait confondre l'argile avec la marne, le granit et le gneiss, le quartz et le calcaire.

Et puis la nomenclature les irritait. Pourquoi dévonien, cambrien, jurassique, comme si les terres désignées par ces mots n'étaient pas ailleurs qu'en Devonshire, près de Cambridge, et dans le Jura ? Impossible de s'y reconnaître ! ce qui est système pour l'un est pour l'autre un étage, pour un troisième une simple assise. Les feuillets des couches, s'entremêlent, s'embrouillent ; mais Omalius d'Halloy vous prévient qu'il ne faut pas croire aux divisions géologiques.

Cette déclaration les soulagea — et quand ils eurent vu des calcaires à polypiers dans la plaine de Caen, des phillades à Balleroy, du kaolin à Saint-Blaise, de l'oolithe partout, et cherché de la houille à Cartigny, et du mercure à la Chapelle-en-Juger près Saint-Lô, ils décidèrent une excursion plus lointaine, un voyage au Havre pour étudier le quartz pyromaque et l'argile de Kimmeridge !

À peine descendus du paquebot, ils demandèrent le chemin qui conduit sous les phares. Des éboulements l'obstruaient ; — il était dangereux de s'y hasarder.

Un loueur de voitures les accosta, et leur offrit des promenades aux environs, Ingouville, Octeville, Fécamp, Lillebonne, Rome s'il le fallait.

Ses prix étaient déraisonnables ; mais le nom de Fécamp les avait frappés : en se détournant un peu sur la route, on pouvait voir Étretat — et ils prirent la gondole de Fécamp, pour se rendre au plus loin, d'abord.

Dans la gondole Bouvard et Pécuchet firent la conversation avec trois paysans, deux bonnes femmes, un séminariste, et n'hésitèrent pas à se qualifier d'ingénieurs.

On s'arrêta devant le bassin. Ils gagnèrent la falaise, et cinq minutes après, la frôlèrent, pour éviter une grande flaque d'eau avançant comme un golfe au milieu du rivage. Ensuite, ils virent une arcade qui s'ouvrait sur une grotte profonde. Elle était sonore, très claire, pareille à une église, avec des colonnes de haut en bas, et un tapis de varech tout le long de ses dalles.

Cet ouvrage de la nature les étonna ; et ils s'élevèrent à des considérations sur l'origine du monde.

Bouvard penchait vers le neptunisme. Pécuchet au contraire était plutonien. Le feu central avait brisé la croûte du globe, soulevé les terrains, fait des crevasses. C'est comme une mer intérieure ayant son flux et reflux, ses tempêtes. Une mince pellicule nous en sépare. On ne dormirait pas si l'on songeait à tout ce qu'il y a sous nos talons. — Cependant le feu central diminue, et le soleil s'affaiblit, si bien que la Terre un jour périra de refroidissement. Elle deviendra stérile ; tout le bois et toute la houille se seront convertis en acide carbonique — et aucun être ne pourra subsister.

— Nous n'y sommes pas encore dit Bouvard.

— Espérons-le ! reprit Pécuchet.

N'importe ! cette fin du monde, si lointaine qu'elle fût, les assombrit — et côte à côte, ils marchaient silencieusement sur les galets.

La falaise, perpendiculaire, toute blanche et rayée en noir, çà et là, par des lignes de silex, s'en allait vers l'horizon tel que la courbe d'un rempart ayant cinq lieues d'étendue. Un vent d'est, âpre et froid soufflait. Le ciel était gris, la mer verdâtre et comme enflée. Du sommet des roches, des oiseaux s'envolaient, tournoyaient, rentraient vite dans leurs trous. Quelquefois, une pierre se détachant, rebondissait de place en place, avant de descendre jusqu'à eux.

Pécuchet poursuivait à haute voix ses pensées : — À moins que la terre ne soit anéantie par un cataclysme ? On ignore la longueur de notre période. Le feu central n'a qu'à déborder.

— Pourtant, il diminue ?

— Cela n'empêche pas ses explosions d'avoir produit l'île Julia, le Monte-Nuovo, bien d'autres encore.

Bouvard se rappelait avoir lu ces détails dans Bertrand — Mais de pareils faits n'arrivent pas en Europe ?

— Mille excuses ! témoin celui de Lisbonne ! Quant à nos pays, les mines de houille et de pyrite martiale y sont nombreuses et peuvent très bien en se décomposant, former les bouches volcaniques. Les volcans, d'ailleurs, éclatent toujours près de la mer.

Bouvard promena sa vue sur les flots, et crut distinguer au loin, une fumée qui montait vers le ciel.

— Puisque l'île Julia reprit Pécuchet, a disparu, des terrains produits par la même cause, auront peut-être, le même sort ? Un îlot de l'Archipel est aussi important que la Normandie, et même que l'Europe.

Bouvard se figura l'Europe engloutie dans un abîme.

— Admets dit Pécuchet qu'un tremblement de terre ait lieu sous la Manche. Les eaux se ruent dans l'Atlantique. Les côtes de la France et de l'Angleterre en chancelant sur leur base, s'inclinent, se rejoignent, et v'lan ! tout l'entre-deux est écrasé.

Au lieu de répondre, Bouvard se mit à marcher tellement vite qu'il fut bientôt à cent pas de Pécuchet. Étant seul, l'idée d'un cataclysme le troubla. Il n'avait pas mangé depuis le matin. Ses tempes bourdonnaient. Tout à coup le sol, lui parut tressaillir, — et la falaise au-dessus de sa tête pencher par le sommet. À ce moment, une pluie de graviers, déroula d'en haut.

Pécuchet l'aperçut qui détalait avec violence, comprit sa terreur, cria, de loin : — Arrête ! arrête ! la période n'est pas accomplie.

Et pour le rattraper, il faisait des sauts énormes avec son bâton de touriste, tout en vociférant : La période n'est pas accomplie ! la période n'est pas accomplie !

Bouvard en démente, courait toujours. Le parapluie polybranches tomba, les pans de sa redingote s'envolaient, le havresac ballottait à son dos. C'était comme une tortue avec des ailes, qui aurait galopé parmi les roches ; une plus grosse le cacha.

Pécuchet y parvint hors d'haleine, ne vit personne ; puis retourna en arrière pour gagner les champs par une valleuse que Bouvard avait prise, sans doute.

Ce raidillon étroit était taillé à grandes marches dans la falaise, de la largeur de deux hommes, et luisant comme de l'albâtre poli. À cinquante pieds d'élévation, Pécuchet voulut descendre. La mer battait son plein. Il se remit à grimper.

Au second tournant, quand il aperçut le vide, la peur le glaça. À mesure qu'il approchait du troisième, ses jambes devenaient molles. Les couches de l'air vibraient autour de lui, une crampe le pinçait à l'épigastre ; il s'assit par terre les yeux fermés, n'ayant plus conscience que des battements de son cœur qui l'étouffaient. Puis, il jeta son bâton de touriste, et avec les genoux et les mains reprit son ascension. Mais les trois marteaux tenus à la ceinture lui entraient dans le ventre, les cailloux dont ses poches étaient bourrées tapaient ses flancs ; la visière de sa casquette l'aveuglait, le vent redoublait de force ; enfin il atteignit le plateau et y trouva Bouvard qui était monté plus loin, par une valleuse moins difficile.

Une charrette les recueillit. Ils oublièrent Étretat.

Le lendemain soir au Havre, en attendant le paquebot, ils virent au bas d'un journal, un feuilleton intitulé De l'enseignement de la géologie.

Cet article, plein de faits, exposait la question comme elle était comprise à l'époque.

Jamais il n'y eut un cataclysme complet du globe ; mais la même espèce n'a pas toujours la même durée, et s'éteint plus vite dans tel endroit que dans tel autre. Des terrains de même âge contiennent des fossiles différents comme des dépôts très éloignés en renferment de pareils. Les fougères d'autrefois sont identiques aux fougères d'à présent. Beaucoup de zoophytes contemporains se retrouvent dans les couches les plus anciennes. En résumé, les modifications actuelles expliquent les bouleversements antérieurs. Les mêmes causes agissent toujours, la Nature ne fait pas de sauts, et les périodes, affirme Brongniart, ne sont après tout que des abstractions.

Cuvier jusqu'à présent leur avait apparu dans l'éclat d'une auréole, au sommet d'une science indiscutable. Elle était sapée. La Création n'avait plus la même discipline ; et leur respect pour ce grand homme diminua.

Par des biographies et des extraits, ils apprirent quelque chose des doctrines de Lamarck et de Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire.

Tout cela contrariait les idées reçues, l'autorité de l'Église.

Bouvard en éprouva comme l'allègement d'un joug brisé.

— Je voudrais voir, maintenant, ce que le citoyen Jeufroy me répondrait sur le Déluge !

Ils le trouvèrent dans son petit jardin où il attendait les membres du Conseil de fabrique, qui devaient se réunir tout à l'heure, pour l'acquisition d'une chasuble.

— Ces messieurs souhaitent... ?

— Un éclaircissement, s'il vous plaît, et Bouvard commença.

Que signifiaient dans la Genèse, l'abîme qui se rompit et les cataractes du ciel ? Car un abîme ne se rompt pas, et le ciel n'a point de cataractes !

L'abbé ferma les paupières, puis répondit qu'il fallait distinguer toujours entre le sens et la lettre. Des choses qui d'abord nous choquent deviennent légitimes en les approfondissant.

— Très bien ! mais comment expliquer la pluie qui dépassait les plus hautes montagnes, lesquelles mesurent deux lieues ! y pensez-vous, deux lieues ! une épaisseur d'eau ayant deux lieues !

Et le maire, survenant, ajouta : — Saprelotte, quel bain !

— Convenez dit Bouvard que Moïse exagère diablement.

Le curé avait lu Bonald, et répliqua : — J'ignore ses motifs ; c'était, sans doute, pour imprimer un effroi salutaire aux peuples qu'il dirigeait !

— Enfin, cette masse d'eau, d'où venait-elle ?

— Que sais-je ? L'air s'était changé en pluie, comme il arrive tous les jours.

Par la porte du jardin, on vit entrer M. Girbal, directeur des Contributions, avec le capitaine Heurtaux, propriétaire ; et Beljambe l'aubergiste donnait le bras à Langlois l'épicier, qui marchait péniblement à cause de son catarrhe.

Pécuchet, sans souci d'eux, prit la parole.

— Pardon, monsieur Jeufroy. Le poids de l'atmosphère (la science nous le démontre) est égal à celui d'une masse d'eau qui ferait autour du globe une enveloppe de dix mètres. Par conséquent, si tout l'air condensé tombait dessus à l'état liquide, il augmenterait bien peu la masse des eaux existantes.

Et les fabriciens ouvraient de grands yeux, écoutaient.

Le curé s'impatia.

— Nierez-vous qu'on ait trouvé des coquilles sur les montagnes ? qui les y a mises, sinon le Déluge ? Elles n'ont pas coutume, je crois, de pousser toutes seules dans la terre comme des carottes ! Et ce mot ayant fait rire l'assemblée, il ajouta en pinçant les lèvres : À moins que ce ne soit encore une des découvertes de la science ?

Bouvard voulut répondre par le soulèvement des montagnes, la théorie d'Élie de Beaumont.

— Connais pas ! répondit l'Abbé.

Foureau s'empressa de dire : — Il est de Caen ! Je l'ai vu une fois à la Préfecture !

— Mais si votre Déluge repartit Bouvard avait charrié des coquilles, on les trouverait brisées à la surface, et non à des profondeurs de trois cents mètres quelquefois.

Le prêtre se rejeta sur la véracité des Écritures, la tradition du genre humain et les animaux découverts dans de la glace, en Sibérie.

Cela ne prouve pas que l'Homme ait vécu en même temps qu'eux ! La Terre, selon Pécuchet, était considérablement plus vieille. — Le Delta du Mississippi remonte à des dizaines de milliers d'années. L'époque actuelle en a cent mille, pour le moins. Les listes de Manéthon...

Le comte de Faverges s'avança.

Tous firent silence à son approche.

— Continuez, je vous prie ! Que disiez-vous ?

— Ces messieurs me querellaient répondit l'abbé.

— À propos de quoi ?

— Sur la sainte Écriture, monsieur le Comte !

Bouvard, de suite, allégua qu'ils avaient droit, comme géologues, à discuter religion.

— Prenez garde dit le comte. Vous savez le mot, cher monsieur, un peu de science en éloigne, beaucoup y ramène. Et d'un ton à la fois hautain et paternel : Croyez-moi ! vous y reviendrez ! vous y reviendrez !

Peut-être ! — mais que penser d'un livre, où l'on prétend que la lumière a été créée avant le soleil, comme si le soleil n'était pas la seule cause de la lumière !

— Vous oubliez celle qu'on appelle boréale dit l'ecclésiastique.

Bouvard, sans répondre à l'objection, nia fortement qu'elle ait pu être d'un côté et les ténèbres de l'autre, qu'il y ait eu un soir et un matin quand les astres n'existaient pas, et que les animaux aient apparu tout à coup, au lieu de se former par cristallisation.

Comme les allées étaient trop petites, en gesticulant, on marchait dans les plates-bandes. Langlois fut pris d'une quinte de toux. Le capitaine criait : Vous êtes des révolutionnaires ! Girbal : La paix ! la paix ! Le prêtre : Quel matérialisme ! Foureau : Occupons-nous plutôt de notre chasuble !

— Hou ! Laissez-moi parler ! Et Bouvard s'échauffant, alla jusqu'à dire que l'Homme descendait du Singe !

Tous les fabriciens se regardèrent, fort ébahis, et comme pour s'assurer qu'ils n'étaient pas des singes.

Bouvard reprit : — En comparant le fœtus d'une femme, d'une chienne, d'un oiseau...

— Assez !

— Moi, je vais plus loin ! s'écria Pécuchet. L'homme descend des poissons ! Des rires éclatèrent. Mais sans se troubler : le Telliamed ! un livre arabe !...

— Allons, messieurs, en séance !

Et on entra dans la sacristie.

Les deux compagnons n'avaient pas roulé l'abbé Jeufroy, comme ils l'auraient cru — aussi Pécuchet lui trouva-t-il le cachet du jésuitisme.

Sa lumière boréale les inquiétait cependant ; ils la cherchèrent dans le manuel de d'Orbigny.

C'est une hypothèse, pour expliquer comment les végétaux fossiles de la baie de Baffin ressemblent aux plantes équatoriales. On suppose, à la place du soleil, un grand foyer lumineux, maintenant disparu, et dont les aurores boréales ne sont peut-être que les vestiges.

Puis un doute leur vint sur la provenance de l'Homme ; — et embarrassés, ils songèrent à Vaucorbeil.

Ses menaces n'avaient pas eu de suites. Comme autrefois, il passait le matin devant leur grille, en raclant avec sa canne tous les barreaux l'un après l'autre.

Bouvard l'épia — et l'ayant arrêté, dit qu'il voulait lui soumettre un point curieux d'anthropologie.

— Croyez-vous que le genre humain descende des poissons ?

— Quelle bêtise !

— Plutôt des singes, n'est-ce pas ?

— Directement, c'est impossible !

À qui se fier ? Car enfin le Docteur n'était pas un catholique !

Ils continuèrent leurs études, mais sans passion, étant las de l'éocène et du miocène, du Mont-Jorullo, de l'île Julia, des mammouths de Sibérie et des fossiles invariablement comparés dans tous les auteurs à des médailles qui sont des témoignages authentiques, si bien qu'un jour, Bouvard jeta son havresac par terre, en déclarant qu'il n'irait pas plus loin.

La géologie est trop défectueuse ! À peine connaissons-nous quelques endroits de l'Europe. Quant au reste, avec le fond des Océans, on l'ignorera toujours.

Enfin, Pécuchet ayant prononcé le mot de règne minéral :

— Je n'y crois pas, au règne minéral ! puisque des matières organiques ont pris part à la formation du silex, de la craie, de l'or peut-être ! Le diamant n'a-t-il pas été du charbon : la houille un assemblage de végétaux : — en la chauffant à je ne sais plus combien de degrés, on obtient de la sciure de bois, tellement que tout passe, tout coule. La création est faite d'une matière ondoyante et fugace. Mieux vaudrait nous occuper d'autre chose !

Il se coucha sur le dos, et se mit à sommeiller, pendant que Pécuchet la tête basse et un genou dans les mains, se livrait à ses réflexions.

Une lisière de mousse bordait un chemin creux, ombragé par des frênes dont les cimes légères tremblaient. Des angéliques, des menthes, des lavandes exhalaient des senteurs chaudes, épicées ; l'atmosphère était lourde ; et Pécuchet, dans une sorte d'abrutissement, rêvait aux existences innombrables éparses autour de lui, aux insectes qui bourdonnaient, aux sources cachées sous le gazon, à la sève des plantes, aux oiseaux dans leurs nids, au vent, aux nuages, à toute la Nature, sans chercher à découvrir ses mystères, séduit par sa force, perdu dans sa grandeur.

— J'ai soif ! dit Bouvard, en se réveillant.

— Moi de même ! Je boirais volontiers quelque chose !

— C'est facile reprit un homme qui passait, en manches de chemise, avec une planche sur l'épaule.

Et ils reconnurent ce vagabond, à qui Bouvard autrefois avait donné un verre de vin. Il semblait de dix ans plus jeune, portait les cheveux en accroche-cœur, la moustache bien cirée, et dandinait sa taille d'une façon parisienne.

Après cent pas environ, il ouvrit la barrière d'une cour, jeta sa planche contre un mur, et les fit entrer dans une haute cuisine.

— Mélie ! es-tu là, Mélie ?

Une jeune fille parut ; sur son commandement, alla tirer de la boisson et revint près de la table, servir ces messieurs.

Ses bandeaux, de la couleur des blés, dépassaient un béguin de toile grise. Tous ses pauvres vêtements descendaient le long de son corps sans un pli ; — et le nez droit, les yeux bleus, elle avait quelque chose de délicat, de champêtre et d'ingénu.

— Elle est gentille, hein ? dit le menuisier, pendant qu'elle apportait des verres. Si on ne jurerait pas une demoiselle, costumée en paysanne ! et rude à l'ouvrage, pourtant ! — Pauvre petit cœur, va ! quand je serai riche, je t'épouserai !

— Vous dites toujours des bêtises, monsieur Gorju répondit-elle d'une voix douce, sur un accent traînard.

Un valet d'écurie vint prendre de l'avoine dans un vieux coffre, et laissa retomber le couvercle si brutalement qu'un éclat de bois en jaillit.

Gorju s'emporta contre la lourdeur de tous ces gars de la campagne puis, à genoux devant le meuble, il cherchait la place du morceau. Pécuchet en voulant l'aider, distingua sous la poussière, des figures de personnages.

C'était un bahut de la Renaissance, avec une torsade en bas, des pampres dans les coins, et les colonnettes divisaient sa devanture en cinq compartiments. On voyait au milieu, Vénus-Anadyomène debout sur une coquille, puis Hercule et Omphale, Samson et Dalila, Circé et ses pourceaux, les filles de Loth enivrant leur père ; tout cela délabré, rongé de mites, et même le panneau de droite manquait. Gorju prit une chandelle pour mieux faire voir à Pécuchet celui de gauche, qui présentait sous l'arbre du Paradis, Adam et Ève dans une posture fort indécente.

Bouvard également admira le bahut.

— Si vous y tenez, on vous le céderait à bon compte.

Ils hésitaient, vu les réparations.

Gorju pouvait les faire, étant de son métier ébéniste. — Allons ! Venez ! et il entraîna Pécuchet vers la mesure, où Mme Castillon, la maîtresse, étendait du linge.

Mélie quand elle eut lavé ses mains, prit sur le bord de la fenêtre, son métier à dentelles, s'assit en pleine lumière, et travailla.

Le linteau de la porte l'encadrait. Les fuseaux se débrouillaient sous ses doigts avec un claquement de castagnettes. Son profil restait penché.

Bouvard la questionna sur ses parents, son pays, les gages qu'on lui donnait.

Elle était de Ouistreham, n'avait plus de famille, gagnait une pistole par mois — enfin, elle lui plut tellement qu'il désira la prendre à son service pour aider la vieille Germaine.

Pécuchet reparut avec la fermière, et pendant qu'ils continuaient leur marchandage, Bouvard demanda tout bas à Gorju, si la petite bonne consentirait à devenir sa servante.

— Parbleu !

— Toutefois dit Bouvard, il faut que je consulte mon ami.

— Eh bien ! je ferai en sorte. Mais n'en parlez pas ! à cause de la bourgeoise.

Le marché venait de se conclure, moyennant trente-cinq francs. Pour le raccommodage on s'entendrait.

À peine dans la cour Bouvard dit son intention relativement à Mélie.

Pécuchet s'arrêta, afin de mieux réfléchir, ouvrit sa tabatière, huma une prise, et s'étant mouché :

— Au fait, c'est une idée ! mon Dieu, oui ! pourquoi pas ? D'ailleurs, tu es le maître !

Dix minutes après, Gorju se montra sur le haut-bord d'un fossé — et les interpellant :

- Quand faut-il que je vous apporte le meuble ?
- Demain !
- Et pour l'autre question, êtes-vous décidés ?
- Convenu ! répondit Pécuchet.

CHAPITRE IV

Six mois plus tard, ils étaient devenus des archéologues ; — et leur maison ressemblait à un musée.

Une vieille poutre de bois se dressait dans le vestibule. Les spécimens de géologie encombraient l'escalier ; — et une chaîne énorme s'étendait par terre tout le long du corridor.

Ils avaient décroché la porte entre les deux chambres où ils ne couchaient pas et condamné l'entrée extérieure de la seconde, pour ne faire de ces deux pièces qu'un même appartement.

Quand on avait franchi le seuil on se heurtait à une auge de pierre (un sarcophage gallo-romain) puis, les yeux étaient frappés par de la quincaillerie.

Contre le mur en face, une bassinoire dominait deux chenets et une plaque de foyer, qui représentait un moine caressant une bergère. Sur des planchettes tout autour, on voyait des flambeaux, des serrures, des boulons, des écrous. Le sol disparaissait sous des tessons de tuiles rouges. Une table au milieu exhibait les curiosités les plus rares : la carcasse d'un bonnet de Cauchoise, deux urnes d'argile, des médailles, une fiole de verre opalin. Un fauteuil en tapisserie avait sur son dossier un triangle de guipure. Un morceau de cotte de mailles ornait la cloison à droite ; et en dessous, des pointes maintenaient horizontalement une hallebarde, pièce unique.

La seconde chambre, où l'on descendait par deux marches, renfermait les anciens livres apportés de Paris, et ceux qu'en arrivant ils avaient découverts dans une armoire. Les vantaux en étaient retirés. Ils l'appelaient la bibliothèque.

L'arbre généalogique de la famille Croixmare occupait seul tout le revers de la porte. Sur le lambris en retour, la figure au pastel d'une dame en costume Louis XV faisait pendant au portrait du père Bouvard. Le chambranle de la glace avait pour décoration un sombrero de feutre noir, et une monstrueuse galoche, pleine de feuilles, les restes d'un nid.

Deux noix de coco (appartenant à Pécuchet depuis sa jeunesse) flanquaient sur la cheminée un tonneau de faïence, que chevauchait un paysan. Auprès, dans une corbeille de paille, il y avait un décime, rendu par un canard.

Devant la bibliothèque, se carrait une commode en coquillages, avec des ornements de peluche. Son couvercle supportait un chat tenant une souris dans sa gueule, — pétrification de Saint-Allyre, — une boîte à ouvrage en coquilles même ; et sur cette boîte, une carafe d'eau-de-vie contenait une poire de bon-chrétien.

Mais le plus beau, c'était dans l'embrasure de la fenêtre, une statue de saint Pierre ! Sa main droite couverte d'un gant serrait la clef du Paradis, de couleur vert pomme ; sa chasuble que des fleurs de lis agrémentaient était bleu ciel, et sa tiare très jaune pointue comme une pagode. Il avait les joues fardées, de gros yeux ronds, la bouche béante, le nez de travers et en trompette. Au-dessus pendait un baldaquin fait d'un vieux tapis où l'on distinguait deux amours dans un cercle de roses — et à ses pieds comme une colonne se levait un pot à beurre, portant ces mots en lettres blanches sur fond chocolat : Exécuté devant S.A.R. Monseigneur le duc d'Angoulême, à Noron, le 3 d'octobre 1817.

Pécuchet, de son lit, apercevait tout cela en enfilade — et parfois même il allait jusque dans la chambre de Bouvard, pour allonger la perspective.

Une place demeurait vide en face de la cotte de mailles, celle du bahut renaissance.

Il n'était pas achevé. Gorju y travaillait encore ; varloper les panneaux dans le fournil, et les ajustant, les démontant.

À onze heures, il déjeunait ; causait ensuite avec Mélie, et souvent ne reparissait plus de toute la journée.

Pour avoir des morceaux dans le genre du meuble Bouvard et Pécuchet s'étaient mis en campagne. Ce qu'ils rapportaient ne convenait pas. Mais ils avaient rencontré une foule de choses curieuses. Le goût des bibelots leur était venu, puis l'amour du moyen âge.

D'abord, ils visitèrent les cathédrales ; — et les hautes nefs se mirant dans l'eau des bénitiers, les verreries éblouissantes comme des tentures de pierreries, les tombeaux au fond des chapelles, le jour incertain des cryptes, tout, jusqu'à la fraîcheur des murailles leur causa un frémissement de plaisir, une émotion religieuse.

Bientôt, ils furent capables de distinguer les époques — et dédaigneux des sacristains, ils disaient : — Ah ! une abside romane ! Cela est du XII<sup>e</sup> siècle ! voilà que nous retombons dans le flamboyant !

Ils tâchaient de comprendre les symboles sculptés sur les chapiteaux, comme les deux griffons de Marigny becquetant un arbre en fleurs. Pécuchet vit une satire dans les chantres à mâchoire grotesque qui terminent les cintres de Feuguerolles ; — et pour l'exubérance de l'homme obscène couvrant un des meneaux d'Hérouville, cela prouvait, suivant Bouvard, que nos aïeux avaient chéri la gaudriole.

Ils arrivèrent à ne plus tolérer la moindre marque de décadence. Tout était de la décadence — et ils déploraient le vandalisme, tonnaient contre le badigeon.

Mais le style d'un monument ne s'accorde pas toujours avec la date qu'on lui suppose. Le plein cintre, au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle domine encore dans la Provence. L'ogive est peut-être fort ancienne ! et des auteurs contestent l'antériorité du roman sur le gothique — Ce défaut de certitude les contrariait.

Après les églises ils étudièrent les châteaux forts, ceux de Domfront et de Falaise. Ils admiraient sous la porte les rainures de la herse, et parvenus au sommet, ils voyaient d'abord toute la campagne, puis les toits de la ville, les rues s'entrecroisant, des charrettes sur la place, des femmes au lavoir. Le mur dévalait à pic jusqu'aux broussailles des douves — et ils pâlissaient en songeant que des hommes avaient monté là, suspendus à des échelles. Ils se seraient risqués dans les souterrains, mais Bouvard avait pour obstacle son ventre, et Pécuchet la crainte des vipères.

Ils voulurent connaître les vieux manoirs, Curcy, Bully, Fontenay-le-Marmion, Argouges. Parfois, à l'angle des bâtiments, derrière le fumier se dresse une tour carlovingienne. La cuisine garnie de bancs en pierre fait songer à des ripailles féodales. D'autres ont un aspect exclusivement farouche, avec leurs trois enceintes encore visibles, des meurtrières sous l'escalier, de longues tourelles à pans aigus. Puis, on arrive dans un appartement, où une fenêtre du temps des Valois ciselée comme un ivoire laisse entrer le soleil qui chauffe sur le parquet des grains de colza, répandus. Des abbayes servent de grange. Les inscriptions des pierres tombales sont effacées. Au milieu des champs, un pignon reste debout — et du haut en bas est revêtu d'un lierre que le vent fait trembler.

Quantité de choses excitaient leurs convoitises, un pot d'étain, une boucle de strass, des indiennes à grands ramages. Le manque d'argent les retenait.

Par un hasard providentiel, ils déterrèrent à Balleroy, chez un étameur, un vitrail gothique, — qui fut assez grand pour couvrir près du fauteuil la partie droite de la croisée jusqu'au deuxième carreau. Le clocher de Chavignolles se montrait dans le lointain, produisant un effet splendide.

Avec un bas d'armoire, Gorju fabriqua un prie-Dieu pour mettre sous le vitrail, car il flattait leur manie. Elle était si forte qu'ils regrettaient les monuments sur lesquels on ne sait rien du tout, — comme la maison de plaisance des évêques de Séez.

— Bayeux, dit M. de Caumont, devait avoir un théâtre. Ils en cherchèrent la place inutilement.

Le village de Montrecy contient un pré célèbre, par des médailles d'empereurs qu'on y a découvertes autrefois. Ils comptaient y faire une belle récolte. Le gardien leur en refusa l'entrée.

Ils ne furent pas plus heureux sur la communication qui existait entre une citerne de Falaise et le faubourg de Caen. Des canards qu'on y avait introduits reparurent à Vaucelles, en grognant : — Can can can d'où est venu le nom de la ville.

Aucune démarche ne leur coûtait, aucun sacrifice.

À l'auberge de Mesnil-Villement, en 1816, M. Galeron eut un déjeuner pour la somme de quatre sols. — Ils y firent le même repas, et constatèrent avec surprise que les choses ne se passaient plus comme ça !

Quel est le fondateur de l'abbaye de Sainte-Anne ? Existe-t-il une parenté entre Marin-Onfroy, qui importa au XII<sup>e</sup> siècle une nouvelle espèce de pommes, et Onfroy gouverneur d'Hastings, à l'époque de la conquête ? Comment se procurer L'Astucieuse Pythonisse, comédie en vers d'un certain Dutrésor, faite à Bayeux, et actuellement des plus rares ? Sous Louis XVI, Hérambert Dupaty, ou Dupastis Hérambert, composa un ouvrage, qui n'a jamais paru, plein d'anecdotes sur Argentan. — Il s'agirait de retrouver ces anecdotes. Que sont devenus les mémoires autographes de Mme Dubois de la Pierre, consultés pour l'histoire inédite de Laigle, par Louis Dasprès, desservant de Saint-Martin ? — Autant de problèmes, de points curieux à éclaircir.

Mais souvent un faible indice met sur la voie d'une découverte inappréciable.

Donc, ils revêtirent leurs blouses, afin de ne pas donner l'éveil ; — et sous l'apparence de colporteurs, ils se présentaient dans les maisons, demandant à acheter de vieux papiers. On leur en vendit des tas. C'étaient des cahiers d'école, des factures, d'anciens journaux, rien d'utile.

Enfin, Bouvard et Pécuchet s'adressèrent à Larsonneur.

Il était perdu dans le celticisme, et répondant sommairement à leurs questions en fit d'autres.

Avaient-ils observé autour d'eux des traces de la religion du chien comme on en voit à Montargis ; et des détails spéciaux, sur les feux de la Saint-Jean, les mariages, les dictons populaires, etc. ? Il les pria même de recueillir pour lui, quelques-unes de ces haches en silex, appelées alors des celtoe, et que les druides employaient dans leurs criminels holocaustes.

Par Gorju, ils s'en procurèrent une douzaine, lui expédièrent la moins grande — les autres enrichirent le muséum.

Ils s'y promenaient avec amour, le balayaient eux-mêmes, en avaient parlé à toutes leurs connaissances.

Un après-midi, Mme Bordin, et M. Marescot se présentèrent pour le voir.

Bouvard les reçut, et commença la démonstration par le vestibule.

La poutre n'était rien moins que l'ancien gibet de Falaise, d'après le menuisier qui l'avait vendue — lequel tenait ce renseignement de son grand-père.

La grosse chaîne dans le corridor provenait des oubliettes du donjon de Torteval. Elle ressemblait suivant le notaire, aux chaînes des bornes devant les cours d'honneur. Bouvard était convaincu qu'elle servait autrefois à lier les captifs. Et il ouvrit la porte de la première chambre.

— Pourquoi toutes ces tuiles ? s'écria Mme Bordin.

— Pour chauffer les étuves ! mais un peu d'ordre, s'il vous plaît ! Ceci est un tombeau découvert dans une auberge où on l'employait comme abreuvoir.

Ensuite, Bouvard prit les deux urnes pleines d'une terre, qui était de la cendre humaine, et il approcha de ses yeux la fiole, afin de montrer par quelle méthode les Romains y versaient des pleurs.

— Mais on ne voit chez vous que des choses lugubres !

Effectivement, c'était un peu sérieux pour une dame, et alors il tira d'un carton plusieurs monnaies de cuivre, avec un denier d'argent.

Mme Bordin demanda au notaire, quelle somme aujourd'hui cela pourrait valoir.

La cotte de mailles qu'il examinait, lui échappa des doigts ; des anneaux se rompirent. Bouvard dissimula son mécontentement.

Il eut même l'obligeance de décrocher la hallebarde — et se courbant, levant les bras, battant du talon, il faisait mine de faucher les jarrets d'un cheval, de pointer comme à la baïonnette, d'assommer un ennemi. La veuve, intérieurement, le trouva un rude gaillard.

Elle fut enthousiasmée par la commode en coquillages. Le chat de Saint-Allyre l'étonna beaucoup, la poire dans la carafe un peu moins.

Puis arrivant à la cheminée :

— Ah ! voilà un chapeau qui aurait besoin de raccommode.

Trois trous, des marques de balles, en perçaient les bords.

C'était celui d'un chef de voleurs sous le Directoire, David de La Bazoque, pris en trahison, et tué immédiatement.

— Tant mieux, on a bien fait ! dit Mme Bordin.

Marescot souriait devant les objets d'une façon dédaigneuse. Il ne comprenait pas cette galoche qui avait été l'enseigne d'un marchand de chaussures, ni pourquoi le tonneau de faïence, un vulgaire pichet de cidre ; — et le saint Pierre, franchement, était lamentable avec sa physionomie d'ivrogne.

Mme Bordin fit cette remarque : — Il a dû vous coûter bon, tout de même ?

— Oh pas trop ! pas trop !

Un couvreur d'ardoises l'avait donné pour quinze francs.

Ensuite, elle blâma, vu l'inconvenance, le décolletage de la dame en perruque poudrée.

— Où est le mal ? reprit Bouvard, quand on possède quelque chose de beau ? et il ajouta plus bas : Comme vous, je suis sûr ?

Le notaire leur tournait le dos, étudiant les branches de la famille Croixmare. Elle ne répondit rien, mais se mit à jouer avec sa longue chaîne de montre. Ses seins bombaient le taffetas noir de son corsage ; et les cils un peu rapprochés, elle baissait le menton, comme une tourterelle qui se rengorge. Puis d'un air ingénu :

— Comment s'appelait cette dame ?

— On l'ignore ! c'est une maîtresse du Régent, — vous savez — celui qui a fait tant de farces !

— Je crois bien ! les mémoires du temps !... et le notaire, sans finir sa phrase déplora cet exemple d'un prince, entraîné par ses passions.

— Mais vous êtes tous comme ça !

Les deux hommes se récrièrent ; et un dialogue s'en suivit sur les femmes, sur l'amour. Marescot affirma qu'il existe beaucoup d'unions heureuses. — Parfois même, sans qu'on s'en doute, on a près de soi, ce qu'il faudrait pour son bonheur. L'allusion était directe. Les joues de la veuve s'empourprèrent ; mais se remettant presque aussitôt :

— Nous n'avons plus l'âge des folies ! n'est-ce pas monsieur Bouvard ?

— Eh ! eh ! moi, je ne dis pas ça ! et il offrit son bras pour revenir dans l'autre chambre. Faites attention aux marches. Très bien ! Maintenant, observez le vitrail.

On y distinguait un manteau d'écarlate et les deux ailes d'un ange — tout le reste se perdant sous les plombs qui tenaient en équilibre les nombreuses cassures du verre. Le jour diminuait ; des ombres s'allongeaient ; Mme Bordin était devenue sérieuse.

Bouvard s'éloigna, et reparut, affublé d'une couverture de laine, puis s'agenouilla devant le prie-Dieu, les coudes en dehors, la face dans les mains, la lueur du soleil tombant sur sa calvitie ; — et il avait conscience de cet effet, car il dit : — Est-ce que je n'ai pas l'air d'un moine du moyen âge ? Ensuite, il leva le front obliquement, les yeux noyés, faisant prendre à sa figure une expression mystique.

On entendit dans le corridor la voix grave de Pécuchet :

— N'aie pas peur ! c'est moi !

Et il entra, la tête complètement recouverte d'un casque — un pot de fer à oreillons pointus.

Bouvard ne quitta pas le prie-Dieu. Les deux autres restaient debout.

Une minute se passa dans l'ébahissement.

Mme Bordin parut un peu froide à Pécuchet. Cependant, il voulut savoir si on lui avait tout montré.

— Il me semble ? et désignant la muraille : Ah ! pardon ! nous aurons ici un objet que l'on restaure en ce moment.

La veuve et Marescot se retirèrent.

Les deux amis avaient imaginé de feindre une concurrence. Ils allaient en courses l'un sans l'autre, le second faisant des offres supérieures à celles du premier. Pécuchet ainsi venait d'obtenir le casque.

Bouvard l'en félicita et reçut des éloges à propos de la couverture.

Mélie avec des cordons, l'arrangea en manière de froc. Ils la mettaient à tour de rôle, pour recevoir les visites.

Ils eurent celles de Girbal, de Foureau, du capitaine Heurtaux, puis de personnes inférieures, Langlois, Beljambe, leurs fermiers, jusqu'aux servantes des voisins ; — et chaque fois, ils recommençaient leurs explications, montraient la place où serait le bahut, affectaient de la modestie, réclamaient de l'indulgence pour l'encombrement.

Pécuchet, ces jours-là, portait le bonnet de zouave qu'il avait autrefois à Paris, l'estimant plus en rapport avec le milieu artistique. À un certain moment, il se coiffait du casque, et le penchait sur la nuque, afin de dégager son visage. Bouvard n'oubliait pas la manoeuvre de la hallebarde ; enfin, d'un coup d'oeil ils se demandaient si le visiteur méritait que l'on fît le moins du moyen âge.

Quelle émotion quand s'arrêta devant leur grille, la voiture de M. de Faverges ! Il n'avait qu'un mot à dire. Voici la chose.

Hurel, son homme d'affaires, lui avait appris que cherchant partout des documents ils avaient acheté de vieux papiers à la ferme de la Aubrye.

Rien de plus vrai.

N'y avaient-ils pas découvert, des lettres du baron de Gonneval, ancien aide de camp du duc d'Angoulême, et qui avait séjourné à la Aubrye ? On désirait cette correspondance, pour des intérêts de famille.

Elle n'était pas chez eux. Mais ils détenaient une chose qui l'intéressait s'il daignait les suivre, jusqu'à leur bibliothèque.

Jamais pareilles bottes vernies n'avaient craqué dans le corridor. Elles se heurtèrent contre le sarcophage. Il faillit même écraser plusieurs tuiles, tourna le fauteuil, descendit deux marches — et parvenus dans la seconde chambre, ils lui firent voir sous le baldaquin, devant le saint Pierre, le pot à beurre, exécuté à Noron.

Bouvard et Pécuchet avaient cru que la date, quelquefois, pouvait servir.

Le gentilhomme par politesse inspecta leur musée. — Il répétait : Charmant, très bien ! tout en se donnant sur la bouche de petits coups avec le pommeau de sa badine, — pour sa part, il les remerciait d'avoir sauvé ces débris du moyen âge, époque de foi religieuse et de dévouements chevaleresques. Il aimait le progrès, — et se fût livré, comme eux, à ces études intéressantes. — Mais la Politique, le conseil général, l'Agriculture, un véritable tourbillon l'en détournait !

— Après vous, toutefois, on n'aurait que des glanes ; car bientôt, vous aurez pris toutes les curiosités du département.

— Sans amour-propre, nous le pensons dit Pécuchet.

Et cependant, on pouvait en découvrir encore à Chavignolles, par exemple, il y avait contre le mur du cimetière dans la ruelle, un bénitier, enfoui sous les herbes, depuis un temps immémorial.

Ils furent heureux du renseignement, puis échangèrent un regard signifiant est-ce la peine ? mais déjà le Comte ouvrait la porte.

Mélie, qui se trouvait derrière, s'enfuit brusquement.

Comme il passait dans la cour, il remarqua Gorju, en train de fumer sa pipe, les bras croisés.

— Vous employez ce garçon ! Hum ! un jour d'émeute je ne m'y fierais pas.

Et M. de Faverges remonta dans son tilbury.

Pourquoi leur bonne semblait-elle en avoir peur ?

Ils la questionnèrent ; et elle conta qu'elle avait servi dans sa ferme. C'était cette petite fille qui versait à boire aux moissonneuses quand ils étaient venus. Deux ans plus tard, on l'avait prise comme aide, au château — et renvoyée par suite de faux rapports.

Pour Gorju, que lui reprocher ? Il était fort habile, et leur marquait infiniment de considération.

Le lendemain, dès l'aube, ils se rendirent au cimetière.

Bouvard, avec sa canne, tâta à la place indiquée. Un corps dur sonna. Ils arrachèrent quelques orties, et découvrirent une cuvette en grès, un font baptismal où des plantes poussaient.

On n'a pas coutume cependant d'enfouir les fonts baptismaux hors des églises.

Pécuchet en fit un dessin, Bouvard la description ; et ils envoyèrent le tout à Larsonneur.

Sa réponse fut immédiate.

— Victoire, mes chers confrères ! Incontestablement, c'est une cuve druidique !

Toutefois qu'ils y prissent garde ! La hache était douteuse. — Et autant pour lui que pour eux-mêmes il leur indiquait une série d'ouvrages à consulter.

Larsonneur confessait en post-scriptum, son envie de connaître cette cuve — ce qui aurait lieu, à quelque jour, quand il ferait le voyage de la Bretagne.

Alors Bouvard et Pécuchet se plongèrent dans l'archéologie celtique. D'après cette science, les anciens Gaulois, nos aïeux, adoraient Kirk et Kron, Taranis, Ésus, Nétalemnica, le Ciel et la Terre, le Vent, les Eaux, — et, par-dessus tout, le grand Teutatès, qui est le Saturne des Païens. — Car Saturne, quand il régnait en Phénicie épousa une nymphe nommée Anobret, dont il eut un enfant appelé Jeüd — et Anobret a les traits de Sara, Jeüd fut sacrifié (ou près de l'être) comme Isaac ; — donc, Saturne est Abraham, d'où il faut conclure que la religion des Gaulois avait les mêmes principes que celle des Juifs.

Leur société était fort bien organisée. La première classe de personnes comprenait le peuple, la noblesse et le roi, la deuxième les jurisconsultes, — et dans la troisième, la plus haute, se rangeaient, suivant Taillepieu, les diverses manières de philosophes c'est-à-dire les Druides ou Saronides, eux-mêmes divisés en Eubages, Bardes et Vates.

Les uns prophétisaient, les autres chantaient, d'autres enseignaient la Botanique, la Médecine, l'Histoire et la Littérature, bref tous les arts de leur époque. Pythagore et Platon furent leurs élèves. Ils apprirent la métaphysique aux Grecs, la sorcellerie aux Persans, l'aruspicine aux Étrusques — et aux Romains, l'étamage du cuivre et le commerce des jambons.

Mais de ce peuple, qui dominait l'ancien monde, il ne reste que des pierres, soit toutes seules, ou par groupes de trois, ou disposées en galeries, ou formant des enceintes.

Bouvard et Pécuchet, pleins d'ardeur, étudièrent successivement la Pierre-du-Post à Ussy, la Pierre-Couplée au Guest, la Pierre du Jarier, près de Laigie — d'autres encore !

Tous ces blocs, d'une égale insignifiance, les ennuyèrent promptement ; — et un jour qu'ils venaient de voir le menhir du Passais, ils allaient s'en retourner, quand leur guide les mena dans un bois de hêtres, encombré par des masses de granit pareilles à des piédestaux, ou à de monstrueuses tortues.

La plus considérable est creusée comme un bassin. Un des bords se relève — et du fond partent deux entailles qui descendent jusqu'à terre ; c'était pour l'écoulement du sang ; impossible d'en douter ! Le hasard ne fait pas de ces choses.

Les racines des arbres s'entremêlaient à ces rocs abrupts. Un peu de pluie tombait ; au loin, les flocons de brume montaient, comme de grands fantômes. Il était facile d'imaginer sous les feuillages, les prêtres en tiare d'or et en robe blanche, avec leurs victimes humaines les bras attachés dans le dos — et sur le bord de la cuve la druidesse, observant le ruisseau rouge, pendant qu'autour d'elle, la foule hurlait, au tapage des cymbales et des buccins faits d'une corne d'auroch.

Tout de suite, leur plan fut arrêté.

Et une nuit, par un clair de lune, ils prirent le chemin du cimetière, marchant comme des voleurs, dans l'ombre des maisons. Les persiennes étaient closes, et les masures tranquilles ; pas un chien n'aboya. Gorju les accompagnait, ils se mirent à l'ouvrage. On n'entendait que le bruit des cailloux heurtés par la bêche, qui creusait le gazon. Le voisinage des morts leur était désagréable ; l'horloge de l'église poussait un râle continu, et la rosace de son tympan avait l'air d'un oeil épiant les sacrilèges.

Enfin, ils emportèrent la cuve.

Le lendemain, ils revinrent au cimetière pour voir les traces de l'opération.

L'abbé, qui prenait le frais sur sa porte, les pria de lui faire l'honneur d'une visite ; et les ayant introduits dans sa petite salle, il les regarda singulièrement.

Au milieu du dresseoir, entre les assiettes, il y avait une soupière décorée de bouquets jaunes.

Pécuchet la vanta, ne sachant que dire.

— C'est un vieux Rouen reprit le curé, un meuble de famille. Les amateurs le considèrent, M. Marescot, surtout. Pour lui, grâce à Dieu il n'avait pas l'amour des curiosités ; — et comme ils semblaient ne pas comprendre, il déclara les avoir aperçus lui-même dérobant le font baptismal.

Les deux archéologues furent très penauds, balbutièrent. L'objet en question n'était plus d'usage.

N'importe ! ils devaient le rendre.

Sans doute ! Mais au moins qu'on leur permît de faire venir un peintre pour le dessiner.

— Soit, messieurs.

— Entre nous, n'est-ce pas ? dit Bouvard sous le sceau de la confession !

L'ecclésiastique, en souriant les rassura d'un geste.

Ce n'était pas lui, qu'ils craignaient, mais plutôt Larsonneur. Quand il passerait par Chavignolles, il aurait envie de la cuve — et ses bavardages iraient jusqu'aux oreilles du gouvernement. Par prudence, ils la cachèrent dans le fournil, puis dans la tonnelle, dans la cahute, dans une armoire. Gorju était las de la trimbaler.

La possession d'un tel morceau les attachait au celticisme de la Normandie.

Ses origines sont égyptiennes. Séez, dans le département de l'Orne s'écrit parfois Saïs comme la ville du Delta. Les Gaulois juraient par le taureau, importation du boeuf Apis. Le nom latin de Bellocastes qui était celui des gens de Bayeux vient de Beli Casa, demeure, sanctuaire de Bélus. Bélus et Osiris même divinité. Rien ne s'oppose dit Mangon de la Lande à ce qu'il y ait eu, près de Bayeux, des monuments druidiques.

— Ce pays, ajoute M. Roussel, ressemble au pays où les Égyptiens bâtirent le temple de Jupiter-Ammon. Donc, il y avait un temple et qui enfermaient des richesses. Tous les monuments celtiques en renferment.

En 1715, relate dom Martin, un sieur Héribel exhuma aux environs de Bayeux, plusieurs vases d'argile, pleins d'ossements — et conclut (d'après la tradition et des autorités évanouies) que cet endroit, une nécropole, était le mont Faunus, où l'on a enterré le Veau d'or.

Cependant le Veau d'or fut brûlé et avalé ! — à moins que la Bible ne se trompe ?

Premièrement, où est le mont Faunus ? Les auteurs ne l'indiquent pas. Les indigènes n'en savent rien. Il aurait fallu se livrer à des fouilles ; — et dans ce but, ils envoyèrent à M. le préfet, une pétition, qui n'eut pas de réponse.

Peut-être que le mont Faunus a disparu, et que ce n'était pas une colline mais un tumulus ? Que signifiaient les tumulus ?

Plusieurs contiennent des squelettes, ayant la position du fœtus dans le sein de sa mère. Cela veut dire que le tombeau était pour eux comme une seconde gestation les préparant à une autre vie. Donc, le tumulus symbolise l'organe femelle, comme la pierre levée est l'organe mâle.

En effet, où il y a des menhirs, un culte obscène a persisté. Témoin ce qui se faisait à Guérande, à Chichebouche, au Croisic, à Livarot. Anciennement, les bornes des routes et même les arbres avaient la signification de phallus — et pour Bouvard et Pécuchet tout devint phallus. Ils recueillirent des palonniers de voiture, des jambes de fauteuil, des verrous de cave, des pilons de pharmacien. Quand on venait les voir, ils demandaient : À qui trouvez-vous que cela ressemble ? puis, confiaient le mystère — et si l'on se récriait, ils levaient, de pitié, les épaules.

Un soir, qu'ils rêvaient aux dogmes des druides, l'abbé se présenta, discrètement.

Tout de suite, ils montrèrent le musée, en commençant par le vitrail, mais il leur tardait d'arriver à un compartiment nouveau, celui des Phallus. L'ecclésiastique les arrêta, jugeant l'exhibition indécente. Il venait réclamer son font baptismal.

Bouvard et Pécuchet implorèrent quinze jours encore, le temps d'en prendre un moulage.

— Le plus tôt sera le mieux dit l'abbé. Puis il causa de choses indifférentes.

Pécuchet qui s'était absenté une minute, lui glissa dans la main un napoléon.

Le prêtre fit un mouvement en arrière.

— Ah ! pour vos pauvres !

Et M. Jeufroy, en rougissant fourra la pièce d'or dans sa soutane.

Rendre la cuve, la cuve aux sacrifices ? Jamais de la vie ! Ils voulaient même apprendre l'hébreu, qui est la langue mère du celtique, à moins qu'elle n'en dérive ? — et ils allaient faire le voyage de la Bretagne, — en commençant par Rennes où ils avaient un rendez-vous avec Larsonneur, pour étudier cette urne mentionnée dans les mémoires de l'Académie celtique et qui paraît avoir contenu les cendres de la reine Artémise — quand le maire entra, le chapeau sur la tête, sans façon, en homme grossier qu'il était.

— Ce n'est pas tout ça, mes petits pères ! Il faut le rendre !

— Quoi donc ?

— Farceurs ! je sais bien que vous le cachez !

On les avait trahis.

Ils répliquèrent qu'ils le détenaient avec la permission de monsieur le curé.

— Nous allons voir.

Et Foureau s'éloigna.

Il revint, une heure après.

— Le curé dit que non ! Venez vous expliquer.

Ils s'obstinèrent.

D'abord on n'avait pas besoin de ce bénitier, — qui n'était pas un bénitier. Ils le prouveraient par une foule de raisons scientifiques. Puis, ils offrirent de reconnaître, dans leur testament, qu'il appartenait à la commune.

Ils proposèrent même de l'acheter.

— Et d'ailleurs, c'est mon bien ! répétait Pécuchet. Les vingt francs, acceptés par M. Jeufroy, étaient une preuve du contrat — et s'il fallait comparaître devant le juge de paix, tant pis, il ferait un faux serment !

Pendant ces débats, il avait revu la soupière, plusieurs fois ; et dans son âme s'était développé le désir, la soif, le prurit de cette faïence. Si on voulait la lui donner, il remettrait la cuve. Autrement, non.

Par fatigue ou peur du scandale, M. Jeufroy la céda.

Elle fut mise dans leur collection, près du bonnet de Cauchoise. La cuve décora le porche de l'église ; et ils se consolèrent de ne plus l'avoir par cette idée que les gens de Chavignolles en ignoraient la valeur.

Mais la soupière leur inspira le goût des faïences — nouveau sujet d'études et d'explorations dans la campagne.

C'était l'époque où les gens distingués recherchaient les vieux plats de Rouen. Le notaire en possédait quelques-uns, et tirait de là comme une réputation d'artiste, préjudiciable à son métier, mais qu'il rachetait par des côtés sérieux.

Quand il sut que Bouvard et Pécuchet avaient acquis la soupière, il vint leur proposer un échange.

Pécuchet s'y refusa.

— N'en parlons plus ! et Marescot examina leur céramique.

Toutes les pièces accrochées le long des murs étaient bleues sur un fond d'une blancheur malpropre ; — et quelques-unes étalaient leur corne d'abondance aux tons verts et rougeâtres, plats à barbe, assiettes et soucoupes, objets longtemps poursuivis et rapportés sur le coeur, dans le sinus de la redingote.

Marescot en fit l'éloge, parla des autres faïences, de l'hispano-arabe, de la hollandaise, de l'anglaise, de l'italienne ; — et les ayant éblouis par son érudition : — Si je revoyais votre soupière ?

Il la fit sonner d'un coup de doigt, puis contempla les deux S peints sous le couvercle.

— La marque de Rouen ! dit Pécuchet.

— Oh ! oh ! Rouen, à proprement parler, n'avait pas de marque. Quand on ignorait Moustiers toutes les faïences françaises étaient de Nevers. De même pour Rouen, aujourd'hui ! D'ailleurs on l'imite dans la perfection à Elbeuf !

— Pas possible !

— On imite bien les majoliques ! Votre pièce n'a aucune valeur — et j'allais faire, moi, une belle sottise !

Quand le notaire eut disparu, Pécuchet s'affaissa dans le fauteuil, prostré !

— Il ne fallait pas rendre la cuve dit Bouvard mais tu t'exaltes ! tu t'emportes toujours.

— Oui ! je m'emporte et Pécuchet empoignant la soupière, la jeta loin de lui, contre le sarcophage.

Bouvard plus calme, ramassa les morceaux, un à un ; — et, quelque temps après, eut cette idée :

— Marescot par jalousie, pourrait bien s'être moqué de nous ?

— Comment ?

— Rien ne m'assure que la soupière ne soit pas authentique ? tandis que les autres pièces, qu'il a fait semblant d'admirer, sont fausses peut-être ?

Et la fin du jour se passa dans les incertitudes, les regrets.

Ce n'était pas une raison pour abandonner le voyage de la Bretagne. Ils comptaient même emmener Gorju, qui les aiderait dans leurs fouilles.

Depuis quelque temps, il couchait à la maison, afin de terminer plus vite le raccommodage du meuble. La perspective d'un déplacement le contraria et comme ils parlaient des menhirs et des tumulus qu'ils comptaient voir :

— Je connais mieux leur dit-il ; en Algérie, dans le Sud, près des sources de Bou-Moursou, on en rencontre des quantités. Il fit même la description d'un tombeau, ouvert devant lui, par hasard ; — et qui contenait un squelette, accroupi comme un singe, les deux bras autour des jambes.

Larsonneur, qu'ils instruisirent du fait, n'en voulut rien croire.

Bouvard approfondit la matière, et le relança.

— Comment se fait-il que les monuments des Gaulois soient informes, tandis que ces mêmes Gaulois étaient civilisés au temps de Jules César ? Sans doute, ils proviennent d'un peuple plus ancien ?

— Une telle hypothèse, selon Larsonneur, manquait de patriotisme.

— N'importe ! rien ne dit que ces monuments soient l'oeuvre des Gaulois. — Montrez-nous un texte !

L'académicien se fâcha, ne répondit plus ; — et ils en furent bien aises, tant les Druides les ennuyaient.

S'ils ne savaient à quoi s'en tenir sur la céramique et sur le celticisme c'est qu'ils ignoraient l'histoire, particulièrement l'histoire de France.

L'ouvrage d'Anquetil se trouvait dans leur bibliothèque ; mais la suite des rois fainéants les amusa fort peu, la scélératesse des maires du Palais ne les indigna point ; — et ils lâchèrent Anquetil, rebutés par l'ineptie de ses réflexions.

Alors ils demandèrent à Dumouchel quelle est la meilleure histoire de France.

Dumouchel prit en leur nom, un abonnement à un cabinet de lecture et leur expédia les lettres d'Augustin Thierry, avec deux volumes de M. de Genoude.

D'après cet écrivain, la royauté, la religion, et les assemblées nationales, voilà les principes de la nation française, lesquels remontent aux Mérovingiens. Les Carlovingiens y ont dérogé. Les Capétiens, d'accord avec le peuple s'efforcèrent de les maintenir. Sous Louis XIII, le pouvoir absolu fut établi, pour vaincre le Protestantisme, dernier effort de la Féodalité — et 89 est un retour vers la constitution de nos aïeux.

Pécuchet admira ces idées.

Elles faisaient pitié à Bouvard, qui avait lu Augustin Thierry, d'abord.

— Qu'est-ce que tu me chantes, avec ta nation française ! puisqu'il n'existait pas de France, ni d'assemblées nationales ! et les Carlovingiens n'ont rien usurpé, du tout ! et les Rois n'ont pas affranchi les communes ! Lis, toi-même !

Pécuchet se soumit à l'évidence, et bientôt le dépassa en rigueur scientifique ! Il se serait cru déshonoré s'il avait dit : Charlemagne et non Karl le Grand, Clovis au lieu de Clodowig.

Néanmoins, il était séduit par Genoude, trouvant habile de faire se rejoindre les deux bouts de l'histoire de France, si bien que le milieu est du remplissage ; — et pour en avoir le coeur net, ils prirent la collection de Buchez et Roux.

Mais le pathos des préfaces, cet amalgame de socialisme et de catholicisme les écoœura ; les détails trop nombreux empêchaient de voir l'ensemble.

Ils recoururent à M. Thiers.

C'était pendant l'été de 1845, dans le jardin, sous la tonnelle. Pécuchet, un petit banc sous les pieds, lisait tout haut de sa voix caverneuse, sans fatigue, ne s'arrêtant que pour plonger les doigts dans sa tabatière. Bouvard l'écoutait la pipe à la bouche, les jambes ouvertes, le haut du pantalon déboutonné.

Des vieillards leur avaient parlé de 93 ; — et des souvenirs presque personnels animaient les plates descriptions de l'auteur. Dans ce temps-là, les grandes routes étaient couvertes de soldats qui chantaient la Marseillaise. Sur le seuil des portes, des femmes assises cousaient de la toile, pour faire des tentes. Quelquefois, arrivait un flot d'hommes en bonnet rouge, inclinant au bout d'une pique une tête décolorée, dont les cheveux pendaient. La haute tribune de la Convention dominait un nuage de poussière, où des visages furieux hurlaient des cris de mort.

Quand on passait au milieu du jour près du bassin des Tuileries, on entendait le heurt de la guillotine, pareil à des coups de mouton.

Et la brise remuait les pampres de la tonnelle, les orges mûres se balançaient par intervalles, un merle sifflait. En portant des regards autour d'eux, ils savouraient cette tranquillité.

Quel dommage que dès le commencement, on n'ait pu s'entendre — car si les royalistes avaient pensé comme les patriotes, si la Cour y avait mis plus de franchise, et ses adversaires moins de violence, bien des malheurs ne seraient pas arrivés.

À force de bavarder là-dessus, ils se passionnèrent. Bouvard, esprit libéral et cœur sensible, fut constitutionnel, girondin, thermidorien. Pécuchet, bilieux et de tendances autoritaires, se déclara sans-culotte et même robespierriste.

Il approuvait la condamnation du roi, les décrets les plus violents, le culte de l'Être Suprême. Bouvard préférait celui de la nature. Il aurait salué avec plaisir l'image d'une grosse femme, versant de ses mamelles à ses adorateurs, non pas de l'eau, mais du chambertin.

Pour avoir plus de faits à l'appui de leurs arguments, ils se procurèrent d'autres ouvrages, Montgaillard, Prudhomme, Gallois, Lacretelle, etc. ; et les contradictions de ces livres ne les embarrassaient nullement. Chacun y prenait ce qui pouvait défendre sa cause.

Ainsi Bouvard ne doutait pas que Danton eût accepté cent mille écus pour faire des motions qui perdraient la République ; — et selon Pécuchet Vergniaud aurait demandé six mille francs par mois.

— Jamais de la vie ! Explique-moi plutôt, pourquoi la soeur de Robespierre avait une pension de Louis XVIII ?

— Pas du tout ! c'était de Bonaparte ; et puisque tu le prends comme ça, quel est le personnage qui peu de temps avant la mort d'Égalité eut avec lui une conférence secrète ? Je veux qu'on réimprime dans les mémoires de la Campan les paragraphes supprimés ! Le décès du Dauphin me paraît louche. La poudrière de Grenelle en sautant tua deux mille personnes ! Cause inconnue, dit-on, quelle bêtise ! car Pécuchet n'était pas loin de la connaître, et rejetait tous les crimes sur les manoeuvres des aristocrates, l'or de l'étranger.

Dans l'esprit de Bouvard, montez-au-ciel-fils-de-saint-Louis, les vierges de Verdun et les culottes en peau humaine étaient indiscutables. Il acceptait les listes de Prudhomme, un million de victimes tout juste.

Mais la Loire rouge de sang depuis Saumur jusqu'à Nantes, dans une longueur de dix-huit lieues, le fit songer. Pécuchet également conçut des doutes, et ils prirent en méfiance les historiens.

La Révolution est pour les uns, un événement satanique. D'autres la proclament une exception sublime. Les vaincus de chaque côté, naturellement sont des martyrs.

Thierry démontre, à propos des Barbares, combien il est sot de rechercher si tel prince fut bon ou fut mauvais. Pourquoi ne pas suivre cette méthode dans l'examen des époques plus récentes ? Mais l'Histoire doit venger la morale ; on est reconnaissant à Tacite d'avoir déchiré Tibère. Après tout, que la Reine ait eu des amants, que Dumouriez dès Valmy se proposât de trahir, en prairial que ce soit la Montagne ou la Gironde qui ait commencé, et en thermidor les Jacobins ou la Plaine, qu'importe au développement de la Révolution, dont les origines sont profondes et les résultats incalculables ! Donc, elle devait s'accomplir, être ce qu'elle fut ; mais supposez la fuite du Roi sans entrave, Robespierre s'échappant ou Bonaparte assassiné — hasards qui dépendaient d'un aubergiste moins scrupuleux, d'une porte ouverte, d'une sentinelle endormie, et le train du monde changeait.

Ils n'avaient plus sur les hommes et les faits de cette époque, une seule idée d'aplomb.

Pour la juger impartialement, il faudrait avoir lu toutes les histoires, tous les mémoires, tous les journaux et toutes les pièces manuscrites, car de la moindre omission une erreur peut dépendre qui en amènera d'autres à l'infini. Ils y renoncèrent.

Mais le goût de l'Histoire leur était venu, le besoin de la vérité pour elle-même.

Peut-être, est-elle plus facile à découvrir dans les époques anciennes ? Les auteurs, étant loin des choses, doivent en parler sans passion. Et ils commencèrent le bon Rollin.

— Quel tas de balivernes ! s'écria Bouvard, dès le premier chapitre.

— Attends un peu dit Pécuchet, en fouillant dans le bas de leur bibliothèque, où s'entassaient les livres du dernier propriétaire, un vieux jurisconsulte, maniaque et bel esprit ; — et ayant déplacé beaucoup de romans et de pièces de théâtre, avec un Montesquieu et des traductions d'Horace, il atteignit ce qu'il cherchait : l'ouvrage de Beaufort sur l'Histoire romaine.

Tite-Live attribue la fondation de Rome à Romulus. Salluste en fait honneur aux Troyens d'Énée. Coriolan mourut en exil selon Fabius Pictor, par les stratagèmes d'Attius Tullus, si l'on en croit Denys ; Sénèque affirme qu'Horatius Coclès s'en retourna victorieux, Dion qu'il fut blessé à la jambe. Et La Mothe le Vayer émet des doutes pareils, relativement aux autres peuples.

On n'est pas d'accord sur l'antiquité des Chaldéens, le siècle d'Homère, l'existence de Zoroastre, les deux empires d'Assyrie. Quinte-Curce a fait des contes. Plutarque dément Hérodote. Nous aurions de César une autre idée, si le Vercingétorix avait écrit ses commentaires.

L'Histoire ancienne est obscure par le défaut de documents. Ils abondent dans la moderne ; — et Bouvard et Pécuchet revinrent à la France, entamèrent Sismondi.

La succession de tant d'hommes leur donnait envie de les connaître plus profondément, de s'y mêler. Ils voulaient parcourir les originaux, Grégoire de Tours, Monstrelet, Commines, tous ceux dont les noms étaient bizarres ou agréables.

Mais les événements s'embrouillèrent faute de savoir les dates.

Heureusement qu'ils possédaient la mnémotechnie de Dumouchel, un in-12 cartonné avec cette épigraphe : Instruire en amusant.

Elle combinait les trois systèmes d'Allévy, de Pâris, et de Feinaigle.

Allévy transforme les chiffres en figures, le nombre 1 s'exprimant par une tour, 2 par un oiseau, 3 par un chameau, ainsi du reste. Pâris frappe l'imagination au moyen de rébus ; un fauteuil garni de clous à vis donnera : Clou, vis = Clovis ; et comme le bruit de la friture fait ric, ric des merles dans une poêle rappelleront Chilpéric. Feinaigle divise l'univers en maisons, qui contiennent des chambres, ayant chacune quatre parois à neuf panneaux, chaque panneau portant un emblème. Donc, le premier roi de la première dynastie occupera dans la première chambre le premier panneau. Un phare sur un mont dira comment il s'appelait Phar à mon système Pâris — et d'après le conseil d'Allévy, en plaçant au-dessus un miroir qui signifie 4, un oiseau 2, et un cerceau 0, on obtiendra 420, date de l'avènement de ce prince.

Pour plus de clarté, ils prirent comme base mnémotechnique leur propre maison, leur domicile, attachant à chacune de ses parties un fait distinct ; — et la cour, le jardin, les environs, tout le pays, n'avait plus d'autre sens que de faciliter la mémoire. Les bornages dans la campagne limitaient certaines époques, les pommiers étaient des arbres généalogiques, les buissons des batailles, le monde devenait symbole. Ils cherchaient sur les murs, des quantités de choses absentes, finissaient par les voir, mais ne savaient plus les dates qu'elles représentaient.

D'ailleurs, les dates ne sont pas toujours authentiques. Ils apprirent dans un manuel pour les collèges, que la naissance de Jésus doit être reportée cinq ans plus tôt qu'on ne la met ordinairement, qu'il y avait chez les Grecs trois manières de compter les Olympiades, et huit chez les Latins de faire commencer l'année. — Autant d'occasions pour les méprises, outre celles qui résultent des zodiaques, des ères, et des calendriers différents.

Et de l'insouciance des dates, ils passèrent au dédain des faits.

Ce qu'il y a d'important, c'est la philosophie de l'Histoire !

Bouvard ne put achever le célèbre discours de Bossuet.

— L'aigle de Meaux est un farceur ! Il oublie la Chine, les Indes et l'Amérique ! mais a soin de nous apprendre que Théodose était la joie de l'univers, qu'Abraham traitait d'égal avec les rois et que la philosophie des Grecs descend des Hébreux. Sa préoccupation des Hébreux m'agace !

Pécuchet partagea cette opinion, et voulut lui faire lire Vico.

— Comment admettre objectait Bouvard, que des fables soient plus vraies que les vérités des historiens ?

Pécuchet tâcha d'expliquer les mythes, se perdait dans la Scienza Nuova.

— Nieras-tu le plan de la Providence ?

— Je ne le connais pas ! dit Bouvard.

Et ils décidèrent de s'en rapporter à Dumouchel.

Le Professeur avoua qu'il était maintenant dérouté en fait d'histoire.

— Elle change tous les jours. On conteste les rois de Rome et les voyages de Pythagore ! On attaque Bélisaire, Guillaume Tell, et jusqu'au Cid, devenu, grâce aux dernières découvertes, un simple bandit. C'est à souhaiter qu'on ne fasse plus de découvertes, et même l'Institut devrait établir une sorte de canon, prescrivant ce qu'il faut croire !

Il envoyait en post-scriptum des règles de critique, prises dans le cours de Daunou :

— Citer comme preuve le témoignage des foules, mauvaise preuve ; elles ne sont pas là pour répondre.

— Rejetez les choses impossibles. On fit voir à Pausanias la pierre avalée par Saturne.

— L'architecture peut mentir, exemple : l'Arc du Forum, où Titus est appelé le premier vainqueur de Jérusalem, conquise avant lui par Pompée.

— Les médailles trompent, quelquefois. Sous Charles IX, on battit des monnaies avec le coin de Henri II.

— Tenez en compte l'adresse des faussaires, l'intérêt des apologistes et des calomnieurs.

Peu d'historiens ont travaillé d'après ces règles — mais tous en vue d'une cause spéciale, d'une religion, d'une nation, d'un parti, d'un système, ou pour gourmander les rois, conseiller le peuple, offrir des exemples moraux.

Les autres, qui prétendent narrer seulement, ne valent pas mieux. Car on ne peut tout dire. Il faut un choix. Mais dans le choix des documents, un certain esprit dominera ; — et comme il varie, suivant les conditions de l'écrivain, jamais l'histoire ne sera fixée.

C'est triste, pensaient-ils.

Cependant on pourrait prendre un sujet, épuiser les sources, en faire bien l'analyse — puis le condenser dans une narration, qui serait comme un raccourci des choses, reflétant la vérité tout entière. Une telle oeuvre semblait exécutable à Pécuchet.

— Veux-tu que nous essayions de composer une histoire ?

— Je ne demande pas mieux ! Mais laquelle ?

— Effectivement, laquelle ?

Bouvard s'était assis. Pécuchet marchait de long en large dans le musée ; quand le pot à beurre frappa ses yeux, et s'arrêtant tout à coup :

— Si nous écrivions la vie du duc d'Angoulême ?

— Mais c'était un imbécile ! répliqua Bouvard.

— Qu'importe ! Les personnages du second plan ont parfois une influence énorme — et celui-là, peut-être, tenait le rouage des affaires.

Les livres leur donneraient des renseignements — et M. de Faverges en possédait sans doute, par lui-même, ou par de vieux gentilshommes de ses amis.

Ils méditèrent ce projet, le débattirent, et résolurent enfin, de passer quinze jours à la Bibliothèque municipale de Caen, pour y faire des recherches.

Le Bibliothécaire mit à leur disposition des histoires générales et des brochures, avec une lithographie coloriée, représentant, de trois quarts, Monseigneur le duc d'Angoulême.

Le drap bleu de son habit d'uniforme disparaissait sous les épaulettes, les crachats, et le grand cordon rouge de la Légion d'honneur. Un collet extrêmement haut enfermait son long cou. Sa tête piriforme était encadrée par les frisons de sa chevelure et de ses minces favoris ; — et de lourdes paupières, un nez très fort et de grosses lèvres donnaient à sa figure une expression de bonté insignifiante.

Quand ils eurent pris des notes, ils rédigèrent un programme.

Naissance et enfance, peu curieuses. Un de ses gouverneurs est l'abbé Guénée, l'ennemi de Voltaire. À Turin, on lui fait fondre un canon, et il étudie les campagnes de Charles VIII. Aussi, est-il nommé, malgré sa jeunesse, colonel d'un régiment de gardes-nobles.

97. Son mariage.

1814. Les Anglais s'emparent de Bordeaux. Il accourt derrière eux — et montre sa personne aux habitants. Description de la personne du Prince.

1815. Bonaparte le surprend. Tout de suite, il appelle le roi d'Espagne, et Toulon, sans Masséna, était livré à l'Angleterre.

Opérations dans le Midi. Il est battu, mais relâché sous la promesse de rendre les diamants de la couronne, emportés au grand galop par le Roi, son oncle.

Après les Cent-Jours, il revient avec ses parents, et vit tranquille.

Plusieurs années s'écoulent.

Guerre d'Espagne. — Dès qu'il a franchi les Pyrénées, la Victoire suit partout le petit-fils de Henri IV. Il enlève le Trocadéro, atteint les colonnes d'Hercule, écrase les factions, embrasse Ferdinand, et s'en retourne.

Arcs de triomphe, fleurs que présentent les jeunes filles, dîners dans les préfectures, Te Deum dans les cathédrales. Les Parisiens sont au comble de l'ivresse. La ville lui offre un banquet. On chante sur les théâtres des allusions au Héros.

L'enthousiasme diminue. Car en 1827 à Cherbourg un bal organisé par souscription rate.

Comme il est grand-amiral de France, il inspecte la flotte, qui va partir pour Alger.

Juillet 1830. Marmont lui apprend l'état des affaires. Alors il entre dans une telle fureur qu'il se blesse la main à l'épée du général.

Le roi lui confie le commandement de toutes les forces.

Il rencontre, au bois de Boulogne, des détachements de la ligne — et ne trouve pas un seul mot à leur dire.

De Saint-Cloud il vole au pont de Sèvres. Froideur des troupes. Ça ne l'ébranle pas. La famille royale quitte Trianon. Il s'assoit au pied d'un chêne, déploie une carte, médite, remonte à cheval, passe devant Saint-Cyr, et envoie aux élèves des paroles d'espérance.

À Rambouillet, les gardes du corps font leurs adieux.

Il s'embarque, et pendant toute la traversée est malade. Fin de sa carrière.

On doit y relever l'importance qu'eurent les ponts. D'abord il s'expose inutilement sur le pont de l'Inn, il enlève le Pont-Saint-Esprit et le pont de Lauriol ; à Lyon, les deux ponts lui sont funestes — et sa fortune expire devant le pont de Sèvres.

Tableau de ses vertus. Inutile de vanter son courage, auquel il joignait une grande politique. Car il offrit soixante francs à chaque soldat, pour abandonner l'Empereur — et en Espagne, il tâcha de corrompre à prix d'argent les Constitutionnels.

Sa réserve était si profonde qu'il consentit au mariage projeté entre son père et la reine d'Étrurie, à la formation d'un cabinet nouveau après les ordonnances, à l'abdication en faveur de Chambord, à tout ce que l'on voulait.

La fermeté pourtant ne lui manquait pas. À Angers, il cassa l'infanterie de la garde nationale, qui jalouse de la cavalerie, et au moyen d'une manoeuvre, était parvenue à lui faire escorte — tellement, que Son Altesse se trouva prise dans les fantassins à en avoir les genoux comprimés. Mais il blâma la cavalerie, cause du désordre, et pardonna à l'infanterie, véritable jugement de Salomon.

Sa piété se signala par de nombreuses dévotions, et sa clémence en obtenant la grâce du général Debelle, qui avait porté les armes contre lui.

Détails intimes — traits du Prince :

Au château de Beauregard, dans son enfance, il prit plaisir avec son frère à creuser une pièce d'eau que l'on voit encore. Une fois il visita la caserne des chasseurs, demanda un verre de vin, et le but à la santé du Roi.

Tout en se promenant, pour marquer le pas, il se répétait, à lui-même :

Une, deux ; une, deux ; une, deux !

On a conservé quelques-uns de ses mots :

À une députation de Bordelais : — Ce qui me console de n'être pas à Bordeaux c'est de me trouver au milieu de vous !

Aux protestants de Nîmes : — Je suis bon catholique ; mais je n'oublierai jamais que le plus illustre de mes ancêtres fut protestant.

Aux élèves de Saint-Cyr, quand tout est perdu : — Bien, mes amis ! Les nouvelles sont bonnes ! Ça va bien ! très bien.

Après l'abdication de Charles X : Puisqu'ils ne veulent pas de moi, qu'ils s'arrangent !

Et en 1814, à tout propos, dans le moindre village : — Plus de guerre, plus de conscription, plus de droits réunis.

Son style valait sa parole. Ses proclamations dépassent tout.

La première du comte d'Artois débutait ainsi : — Français, le frère de votre roi est arrivé.

Celle du prince : — J'arrive ! Je suis le fils de vos rois ! Vous êtes Français.

Ordre du jour, daté de Bayonne : — Soldats, j'arrive !

Une autre, en pleine défection : — Continuez à soutenir avec la vigueur qui convient au soldat français, la lutte que vous avez commencée. La France l'attend de vous !

Dernière à Rambouillet. — Le roi est entré en arrangement avec le gouvernement établi à Paris ; et tout porte à croire que cet arrangement est sur le point d'être conclu. Tout porte à croire était sublime.

— Une chose me chiffonne dit Bouvard c'est qu'on ne mentionne pas ses affaires de coeur ?

Et ils notèrent en marge : Chercher les amours du Prince !

Au moment de partir, le bibliothécaire se ravisant, leur fit voir un autre portrait du duc d'Angoulême.

Sur celui-là, il était en colonel de cuirassiers, de profil, l'oeil encore plus petit, la bouche ouverte, avec des cheveux plats, voltigeant.

Comment concilier les deux portraits ? Avait-il les cheveux plats, ou bien crépus, à moins qu'il ne poussât la coquetterie jusqu'à se faire friser ?

Question grave, suivant Pécuchet ; car la chevelure donne le tempérament, le tempérament l'individu.

Bouvard pensait qu'on ne sait rien d'un homme tant qu'on ignore ses passions ; — et pour éclaircir ces deux points ils se présentèrent au château de Faverges. Le comte n'y était pas, cela retardait leur ouvrage. Ils rentrèrent chez eux, vexés.

La porte de la maison était grande ouverte. Personne dans la cuisine.

Ils montèrent l'escalier ; et que virent-ils au milieu de la chambre de Bouvard ? Mme Bordin qui regardait de droite et de gauche.

— Excusez-moi dit-elle en s'efforçant de rire. Depuis une heure je cherche votre cuisinière, dont j'aurais besoin, pour mes confitures.

Ils la trouvèrent dans le bûcher sur une chaise, et dormant profondément. On la secoua. Elle ouvrit les yeux.

— Qu'est-ce encore ? Vous êtes toujours à me diguer avec vos questions !

Il était clair qu'en leur absence, Mme Bordin lui en faisait.

Germaine sortit de sa torpeur, et déclara une indigestion.

— Je reste pour vous soigner dit la veuve.

Alors ils aperçurent dans la cour, un grand bonnet, dont les barbes s'agitaient. C'était Mme Castillon la fermière. Elle cria : Gorju ! Gorju !

Et du grenier, la voix de leur petite bonne répondit hautement :

— Il n'est pas là !

Elle descendit au bout de cinq minutes, les pommettes rouges, en émoi. — Bouvard et Pécuchet lui reprochèrent sa lenteur. Elle déboucla leurs guêtres sans murmurer.

Ensuite, ils allèrent voir le bahut.

Ses morceaux épars jonchaient le fournil ; les sculptures étaient endommagées, les battants rompus.

À ce spectacle, devant cette déception nouvelle, Bouvard retint ses pleurs et Pécuchet en avait un tremblement.

Gorju se montrant presque aussitôt, exposa le fait : il venait de mettre le bahut dehors pour le vernir quand une vache errante l'avait jeté par terre.

— À qui la vache ? dit Pécuchet.

— Je ne sais pas.

— Eh ! vous aviez laissé la porte ouverte comme tout à l'heure ! C'est de votre faute !

Ils y renonçaient du reste : depuis trop longtemps, il les lanternait — et ne voulaient plus de sa personne ni de son travail.

Ces messieurs avaient tort. Le dommage n'était pas si grand. Avant trois semaines tout serait fini ; — et Gorju les accompagna jusque dans la cuisine où Germaine en se traînant, arrivait, pour faire le dîner.

Ils remarquèrent sur la table, une bouteille de calvados, aux trois quarts vidée.

— Sans doute par vous ? dit Pécuchet à Gorju.

— Moi ? jamais.

Bouvard objecta : — Vous étiez le seul homme dans la maison.

— Eh bien, et les femmes ? reprit l'ouvrier, avec un clin d'oeil oblique.

Germaine le surprit : — Dites plutôt que c'est moi !

— Certainement c'est vous !

— Et c'est moi, peut-être qui ai démoli l'armoire !

Gorju fit une pirouette. — Vous ne voyez donc pas qu'elle est saoule !

Alors, ils se chamaillèrent violemment, lui pâle, gouailleur, elle empourprée, et arrachant ses touffes de cheveux gris sous son bonnet de coton. Mme Bordin parlait pour Germaine, Mélie pour Gorju.

La vieille éclata.

— Si ce n'est pas une abomination ! que vous passiez des journées ensemble dans le bosquet, sans compter la nuit ! espèce de Parisien, mangeur de bourgeoises ! qui vient chez nos maîtres, pour leur faire accroire des farces.

Les prunelles de Bouvard s'écarquillèrent. — Quelles farces ?

— Je dis qu'on se fiche de vous !

— On ne se fiche pas de moi ! s'écria Pécuchet, et indigné de son insolence, exaspéré par les déboires, il la chassa ; qu'elle eût à déguerpir. Bouvard ne s'opposa point à cette décision — et ils se retirèrent, laissant Germaine pousser des sanglots sur son malheur, tandis que Mme Bordin tâchait de la consoler.

Le soir, quand ils furent calmes, ils reprirent ces événements, se demandèrent qui avait bu le calvados, comment le meuble s'était brisé, que réclamait Mme Castillon en appelant Gorju, — et s'il avait déshonoré Mélie ?

— Nous ne savons pas dit Bouvard, ce qui se passe dans notre ménage, et nous prétendons découvrir quels étaient les cheveux et les amours du duc d'Angoulême !

Pécuchet ajouta : — Combien de questions autrement considérables, et encore plus difficiles !

D'où ils conclurent que les faits extérieurs ne sont pas tout. Il faut les compléter par la psychologie. Sans l'imagination, l'Histoire est défectueuse. — Faisons venir quelques romans historiques !

CHAPITRE V

Ils lurent d'abord Walter Scott.

Ce fut comme la surprise d'un monde nouveau.

Les hommes du passé qui n'étaient pour eux que des fantômes ou des noms devinrent des êtres vivants, rois, princes, sorciers, valets, gardes-chasse, moines, bohémiens, marchands et soldats, qui délibèrent, combattent, voyagent, trafiquent, mangent et boivent, chantent et prient, dans la salle d'armes des châteaux, sur le banc noir des auberges, par les rues tortueuses des villes, sous l'auvent des échoppes, dans le cloître des monastères. Des paysages artistement composés, entourent les scènes comme un décor de théâtre. On suit des yeux un cavalier qui galope le long des grèves. On aspire au milieu des genêts la fraîcheur du vent, la lune éclaire des lacs où glisse un bateau, le soleil fait reluire les cuirasses, la pluie tombe sur les huttes de feuillage. Sans connaître les modèles, ils trouvaient ces peintures ressemblantes, et l'illusion était complète. L'hiver s'y passa.

Leur déjeuner fini, ils s'installaient dans la petite salle, aux deux bouts de la cheminée ; — et en face l'un de l'autre, avec un livre à la main, ils lisaient silencieusement. Quand le jour baissait, ils allaient se promener sur la grande route, dînaient en hâte, et continuaient leur lecture dans la nuit. Pour se garantir de la lampe Bouvard avait des conserves bleues, Pécuchet portait la visière de sa casquette inclinée sur le front.

Germaine n'était pas partie, et Gorju, de temps à autre, venait fouir au jardin, car ils avaient cédé par indifférence, oubli des choses matérielles.

Après Walter Scott, Alexandre Dumas les divertit à la manière d'une lanterne magique. Ses personnages, alertes comme des singes, forts comme des boeufs, gais comme des pinsons, entrent et partent brusquement, sautent des toits sur le pavé, reçoivent d'affreuses blessures dont ils guérissent, sont crus morts et reparaissent. Il y a des trappes sous les planchers, des antidotes, des déguisements — et tout se mêle, court et se débrouille, sans une minute pour la réflexion. L'amour conserve de la décence, le fanatisme est gai, les massacres font sourire.

Rendus difficiles par ces deux maîtres, ils ne purent tolérer le fatras de Bélisaire, la niaiserie de Numa Pompilius, Marchangy ni d'Arlincourt.

La couleur de Frédéric Soulié, comme celle du bibliophile Jacob leur parut insuffisante — et M. Villemain les scandalisa en montrant page 85 de son Lascaris, un Espagnol qui fume une pipe une longue pipe arabe au milieu du XVe siècle.

Pécuchet consultait la biographie universelle — et il entreprit de réviser Dumas au point de vue de la science.

L'auteur, dans Les Deux Diane se trompe de dates. Le mariage du Dauphin François eut lieu le 14 octobre 1548, et non le 20 mars 1549. Comment sait-il (voir Le Page du Duc de Savoie) que Catherine de Médicis, après la mort de son époux voulait recommencer la guerre ? Il est peu probable qu'on ait couronné le duc d'Anjou, la nuit, dans une église, épisode qui agrémente La Dame de Montsoreau. La Reine Margot, principalement, fourmille d'erreurs. Le duc de Nevers n'était pas absent. Il opina au conseil avant la Saint-Barthélémy. Et Henri de Navarre ne suivit pas la procession quatre jours après. Et Henri III ne revint pas de Pologne aussi vite. D'ailleurs, combien de rengaines, le miracle de l'aubépine, le balcon de Charles IX, les gants empoisonnés de Jeanne d'Albret. Pécuchet n'eut plus confiance en Dumas.

Il perdit même tout respect pour Walter Scott, à cause des bévues de son Quentin Durward. Le meurtre de l'évêque de Liège est avancé de quinze ans. La femme de Robert de Lamarck était Jeanne d'Arschel et non Hameline de Croy. Loin d'être tué par un soldat, il fut mis à mort par Maximilien, et la figure du Téméraire, quand on trouva son cadavre, n'exprimait aucune menace, puisque les loups l'avaient à demi dévorée.

Bouvard n'en continua pas moins Walter Scott, mais finit par s'ennuyer de la répétition des mêmes effets. L'héroïne, ordinairement, vit à la campagne avec son père, et l'amoureux, un enfant volé, est rétabli dans ses droits et triomphe de ses rivaux. Il y a toujours un mendiant philosophe, un châtelain bourru, des jeunes filles pures, des valets facétieux et d'interminables dialogues, une pruderie bête, manque complet de profondeur.

En haine du bric-à-brac, Bouvard prit George Sand.

Il s'enthousiasma pour les belles adultères et les nobles amants, aurait voulu être Jacques, Simon, Bénédic, Lélío, et habiter Venise ! Il poussait des soupirs, ne savait pas ce qu'il avait, se trouvait lui-même changé.

Pécuchet, travaillant la littérature historique, étudiait les pièces de théâtre. Il avala deux Pharamond, trois Clovis, quatre Charlemagne, plusieurs Philippe-Auguste, une foule de Jeanne d'Arc, et bien des marquises de Pompadour, et des conspirations de Cellamare !

Presque toutes lui parurent encore plus bêtes que les romans. Car il existe pour le théâtre une histoire convenue, que rien ne peut détruire. Louis XI ne manquera pas de s'agenouiller devant les figurines de son chapeau ; Henri IV sera constamment jovial ; Marie Stuart pleureuse, Richelieu cruel — enfin, tous les caractères se montrent d'un seul bloc, par amour des idées simples et respect de l'ignorance — si bien que le dramaturge, loin d'élever abaisse, au lieu d'instruire abrutit.

Comme Bouvard lui avait vanté George Sand, Pécuchet se mit à lire Consuelo, Horace, Mauprat, fut séduit par la défense des opprimés, le côté social, et républicain, les thèses.

Suivant Bouvard, elles gâtaient la fiction et il demanda au cabinet de lecture des romans d'amour.

À haute voix et l'un après l'autre, ils parcoururent La Nouvelle Héloïse, Delphine, Adolphe, Ourika. Mais les bâillements de celui qui écoutait gagnaient son compagnon, dont les mains bientôt laissaient tomber le livre par terre. Ils reprochaient à tous ceux-là de ne rien dire sur le milieu, l'époque, le costume des personnages. Le coeur seul est traité ; toujours du sentiment ! comme si le monde ne contenait pas autre chose !

Ensuite, ils tâtèrent des romans humoristiques ; tels que Le Voyage autour de ma chambre, par Xavier de Maistre, Sous les Tilleuls, d'Alphonse Karr. Dans ce genre de livres, on doit interrompre la narration pour parler de son chien, de ses pantoufles, ou de sa maîtresse. Un tel sans-gêne, d'abord les charma, puis leur parut stupide ; — car l'auteur efface son oeuvre en y étalant sa personne.

Par besoin de dramatique, ils se plongèrent dans les romans d'aventures, l'intrigue les intéressait d'autant plus qu'elle était enchevêtrée, extraordinaire et impossible. Ils s'évertuaient à prévoir les dénouements, devinrent là dessus très forts, et se lassèrent d'une amusette, indigne d'esprits sérieux.

L'oeuvre de Balzac les émerveilla, tout à la fois comme une Babylone, et comme des grains de poussière sous le microscope. Dans les choses les plus banales, des aspects nouveaux surgirent. Ils n'avaient pas soupçonné la vie moderne aussi profonde.

— Quel observateur ! s'écriait Bouvard.

— Moi je le trouve chimérique finit par dire Pécuchet. Il croit aux sciences occultes, à la monarchie, à la noblesse, est ébloui par les coquins, vous remue les millions comme des centimes, et ses bourgeois ne sont pas des bourgeois, mais des colosses. Pourquoi gonfler ce qui est plat, et décrire tant de sottises ? Il a fait un roman sur la chimie, un autre sur la Banque, un autre sur les machines à imprimer. Comme un certain Ricard avait fait le cocher de fiacre, le porteur d'eau, le marchand de coco. Nous en aurons sur tous les métiers et sur toutes les provinces, puis sur toutes les villes et les étages de chaque maison et chaque individu, ce qui ne sera plus de la littérature, mais de la statistique ou de l'ethnographie.

Peu importait à Bouvard le procédé. Il voulait s'instruire, descendre plus avant dans la connaissance des moeurs. Il relut Paul de Kock, feuilleta de vieux ermites de la Chaussée d'Antin.

— Comment perdre son temps à des inepties pareilles ? disait Pécuchet.

— Mais par la suite, ce sera fort curieux, comme documents.

— Va te promener avec tes documents ! Je demande quelque chose qui m'exalte, qui m'enlève aux misères de ce monde !

Et Pécuchet, porté à l'idéal tourna Bouvard, insensiblement vers la Tragédie.

Le lointain où elle se passe, les intérêts qu'on y débat et la condition de ses personnages leur imposaient comme un sentiment de grandeur.

Un jour, Bouvard prit Athalie, et débita le songe tellement bien, que Pécuchet voulut à son tour l'essayer. — Dès la première phrase, sa voix se perdit dans une espèce de bourdonnement. Elle était monotone, et bien que forte, indistincte.

Bouvard, plein d'expérience lui conseilla, pour l'assouplir, de la déployer depuis le ton le plus bas jusqu'au plus haut, et de la replier, — émettant deux gammes, l'une montante, l'autre descendante ; — et lui-même se livrait à cet exercice, le matin dans son lit, couché sur le dos, selon le précepte des Grecs. Pécuchet, pendant ce temps-là, travaillait de la même façon ; leur porte était close — et ils braillaient séparément.

Ce qui leur plaisait de la Tragédie, c'était l'emphase, les discours sur la Politique, les maximes de perversité.

Ils apprirent par coeur les dialogues les plus fameux de Racine et de Voltaire et ils les déclamaient dans le corridor. Bouvard, comme au Théâtre-Français, marchait la main sur l'épaule de Pécuchet en s'arrêtant par intervalles, et roulait ses yeux, ouvrait les bras, accusait les destins. Il avait de beaux cris de douleur dans le Philoctète de La Harpe, un joli hoquet dans Gabrielle de Vergy — et quand il faisait Denys tyran de Syracuse une manière de considérer son fils en l'appelant Monstre, digne de moi ! qui était vraiment terrible. Pécuchet en oubliait son rôle. Les moyens lui manquaient, non la bonne volonté.

Une fois dans la Cléopâtre de Marmontel, il imagina de reproduire le sifflement de l'aspic, tel qu'avait dû le faire l'automate inventé exprès par Vaucanson. Cet effet manqué les fit rire jusqu'au soir. La Tragédie tomba dans leur estime.

Bouvard en fut las le premier, et y mettant de la franchise démontra combien elle est artificielle et podagre : la niaiserie de ses moyens, l'absurdité des confidents.

Ils abordèrent la Comédie — qui est l'école des nuances. Il faut disloquer la phrase, souligner les mots, peser les syllabes. Pécuchet n'en put venir à bout — et échoua complètement dans Célimène.

Du reste, il trouvait les amoureux bien froids, les raisonneurs assommants, les valets intolérables, Clitandre et Sganarelle aussi faux qu'Égisthe et qu'Agamemnon.

Restait la Comédie sérieuse, ou tragédie bourgeoise, celle où l'on voit des pères de famille désolés, des domestiques sauvant leurs maîtres, des richards offrant leur fortune, des couturières innocentes et d'infâmes suborneurs, genre qui se prolonge de Diderot jusqu'à Pixérécourt. Toutes ces pièces prêchant la vertu les choquèrent comme triviales.

Le drame de 1830 les enchantait par son mouvement, sa couleur, sa jeunesse. Ils ne faisaient guère de différence entre Victor Hugo, Dumas, ou Bouchardy ; — et la diction ne devait plus être pompeuse ou fine, — mais lyrique, désordonnée.

Un jour que Bouvard tâchait de faire comprendre à Pécuchet le jeu de Frédéric Lemaître, Mme Bordin se montra tout à coup avec son châle vert, et un volume de Pigault-Lebrun qu'elle rapportait, ces messieurs ayant l'obligeance de lui prêter des romans, quelquefois.

— Mais continuez ! car elle était là depuis une minute, et avait plaisir à les entendre.

Ils s'excusèrent. Elle insistait.

— Mon Dieu ! dit Bouvard rien ne nous empêche !...

Pécuchet allégua, par fausse honte, qu'ils ne pouvaient jouer à l'improviste, sans costume.

— Effectivement ! nous aurions besoin de nous déguiser. Et Bouvard chercha un objet quelconque, ne trouva que le bonnet grec, et le prit.

Comme le corridor manquait de largeur, ils descendirent dans le salon.

Des araignées couraient le long des murs — et les spécimens géologiques encombrant le sol avaient blanchi de leur poussière le velours des fauteuils. On étala sur le moins malpropre un torchon pour que Mme Bordin pût s'asseoir.

Il fallait lui servir quelque chose de bien. Bouvard était partisan de La Tour de Nesle. Mais Pécuchet avait peur des rôles qui demandent trop d'action.

— Elle aimera mieux du classique ! Phèdre par exemple ?

— Soit.

Bouvard conta le sujet. — C'est une reine, dont le mari, a, d'une autre femme, un fils. Elle est devenue folle du jeune homme — y sommes-nous ? En route !

— Oui, Prince, je languis, je brûle pour Thésée, — Je l'aime !

Et parlant au profil de Pécuchet, il admirait son port, son visage, cette tête charmante, se désolait de ne l'avoir pas rencontré sur la flotte des Grecs, aurait voulu se perdre avec lui dans le labyrinthe.

La mèche du bonnet rouge s'inclinait amoureusement ; — et sa voix tremblante, et sa figure bonne conjuraient le cruel de prendre en pitié sa flamme. Pécuchet, en se détournant, haletait pour marquer de l'émotion.

Mme Bordin immobile écarquillait les yeux, comme devant les faiseurs de tours. Mélie écoutait derrière la porte. Gorju, en manches de chemise, les regardait par la fenêtre.

Bouvard entama la seconde tirade. Son jeu exprimait le délire des sens, le remords, le désespoir, et il se rua sur le glaive idéal de Pécuchet avec tant de violence que trébuchant dans les cailloux, il faillit tomber par terre.

— Ne faites pas attention ! Puis, Thésée arrive, et elle s'empoisonne !

— Pauvre femme ! dit Mme Bordin.

Ensuite ils la prièrent de leur désigner un morceau.

Le choix l'embarrassait. Elle n'avait vu que trois pièces : Robert le Diable dans la capitale, le Jeune Mari à Rouen — et une autre à Falaise qui était bien amusante et qu'on appelait La Brouette du Vinaigrier.

Enfin Bouvard lui proposa la grande scène de Tartuffe, au troisième acte.

Pécuchet crut une explication nécessaire :

Il faut savoir que Tartuffe...

Mme Bordin l'interrompit. On sait ce que c'est qu'un Tartuffe !

Bouvard eût désiré, pour un certain passage, une robe.

— Je ne vois que la robe de moine dit Pécuchet.

— N'importe ! mets-la !

Il reparut avec elle, et un Molière.

Le commencement fut médiocre. Mais Tartuffe venant à caresser les genoux d'Elmire, Pécuchet prit un ton de gendarme.

— Que fait là votre main ?

Bouvard bien vite répliqua d'une voix sucrée :

— Je tâte votre habit, l'étoffe en est moelleuse. Et il dardait ses prunelles, tendait la bouche, reniflait, avait un air extrêmement lubrique, finit même par s'adresser à Mme Bordin.

Les regards de cet homme la gênaient — et quand il s'arrêta, humble et palpitant, elle cherchait presque une réponse.

Pécuchet eut recours au livre : — La déclaration est tout à fait galante.

— Ah ! oui, s'écria-t-elle, c'est un fier enjôleur.

— N'est-ce pas ? reprit fièrement Bouvard. Mais en voilà une autre, d'un chic plus moderne, et ayant défait sa redingote, il s'accroupit sur un moellon et déclama la tête renversée.

Des flammes de tes yeux inonde ma paupière. Chante-moi quelque chant, comme parfois, le soir, Tu m'en chantaïs, avec des pleurs dans ton oeil noir.

— Ça me ressemble pensa-t-elle.

Soyons heureux ! buvons ! car la coupe est remplie, Car cette heure est à nous, et le reste est folie.

— Comme vous êtes drôle !

Et elle riait d'un petit rire, qui lui remontait la gorge et découvrait ses dents.

N'est-ce pas qu'il est doux D'aimer, et de savoir qu'on vous aime à genoux ?

Il s'agenouilla.

— Finissez donc !

Oh ! laisse-moi dormir et rêver sur ton sein, Doña Sol ! ma beauté ! mon amour !

— Ici on entend les cloches, un montagnard les dérange.

— Heureusement ! car sans cela... ! Et Mme Bordin sourit, au lieu de terminer sa phrase. Le jour baissait. Elle se leva.

Il avait plu tout à l'heure — et le chemin par la hêtrée n'étant pas facile, mieux valait s'en retourner par les champs. Bouvard l'accompagna dans le jardin, pour lui ouvrir la porte.

D'abord, ils marchèrent le long des quenouilles, sans parler. Il était encore ému de sa déclamation ; — et elle éprouvait au fond de l'âme comme une surprise, un charme qui venait de la Littérature. L'Art, en de certaines occasions, ébranle les esprits médiocres ; — et des mondes peuvent être révélés par ses interprètes les plus lourds.

Le soleil avait reparu, faisait luire les feuilles, jetait des taches lumineuses dans les fourrés, çà et là. Trois moineaux avec de petits cris sautillaient sur le tronc d'un vieux tilleul abattu. Une épine en fleurs étalait sa gerbe rose, des lilas alourdis se penchaient.

— Ah ! cela fait bien ! dit Bouvard, en humant l'air à pleins poumons.

— Aussi, vous vous donnez un mal !

— Ce n'est pas que j'aie du talent, mais pour du feu, j'en possède.

— On voit reprit-elle — et mettant un espace entre les mots que vous avez... aimé... autrefois.

— Autrefois, seulement — vous croyez !

Elle s'arrêta.

— Je n'en sais rien.

— Que veut-elle dire ? Et Bouvard sentait battre son cœur.

Une flaque au milieu du sable obligeant à un détour, les fit monter sous la charmille.

Alors ils causèrent de la représentation.

— Comment s'appelle votre dernier morceau ?

— C'est tiré de Hernani, un drame.

— Ah ! puis lentement, et se parlant à elle-même ce doit être bien agréable, un monsieur qui vous dit des choses pareilles, — pour tout de bon.

— Je suis à vos ordres répondit Bouvard.

— Vous ?

— Oui ! moi !

— Quelle plaisanterie !

— Pas le moins du monde !

Et ayant jeté un regard autour d'eux, il la prit à la ceinture, par derrière, et la baisa sur la nuque, fortement.

Elle devint très pâle comme si elle allait s'évanouir — et s'appuya d'une main contre un arbre ; puis, ouvrit les paupières, et secoua la tête.

— C'est passé.

Il la regardait, avec ébahissement.

La grille ouverte, elle monta sur le seuil de la petite porte. Une rigole coulait de l'autre côté. Elle ramassa tous les plis de sa jupe, et se tenait au bord, indécise.

— Voulez-vous mon aide ?

— Inutile !

— Pourquoi ?

— Ah ! vous êtes trop dangereux !

Et, dans le saut qu'elle fit, son bas blanc parut.

Bouvard se blâma d'avoir raté l'occasion. Bah ! elle se retrouverait ; — et puis les femmes ne sont pas toutes les mêmes. Il faut brusquer les unes, l'audace vous perd avec les autres. En somme, il était content de lui ; — et s'il ne confia pas son espoir à Pécuchet, ce fut dans la peur des observations, et nullement par délicatesse.

À partir de ce jour-là, ils déclamèrent souvent devant Mélie et Gorju tout en regrettant de n'avoir pas un théâtre de société.

La petite bonne s'amusait sans y rien comprendre, ébahie du langage, fascinée par le ronron des vers. Gorju applaudissait les tirades philosophiques des tragédies et tout ce qui était pour le peuple dans les mélodrames ; — si bien que charmés de son goût ils pensèrent à lui donner des leçons, pour en faire plus tard un acteur. Cette perspective éblouissait l'ouvrier.

Le bruit de leurs travaux s'était répandu. Vaucorbeil leur en parla d'une façon narquoise. Généralement on les méprisait.

Ils s'en estimaient davantage. Ils se sacrèrent artistes. Pécuchet porta des moustaches, et Bouvard ne trouva rien de mieux, avec sa mine ronde et sa calvitie, que de se faire une tête à la Béranger !

Enfin, ils résolurent de composer une pièce.

Le difficile c'était le sujet.

Ils le cherchaient en déjeunant, et buvaient du café, liqueur indispensable au cerveau, puis deux ou trois petits verres. Ensuite, ils allaient dormir sur leur lit ; après quoi, ils descendaient dans le verger, s'y promenaient, enfin sortaient pour trouver dehors l'inspiration, cheminaient côte à côte, et rentraient exténués.

Ou bien, ils s'enfermaient à double tour, Bouvard nettoyait la table, mettait du papier devant lui, trempait sa plume et restait les yeux au plafond, pendant que Pécuchet dans le fauteuil, méditait les jambes droites et la tête basse.

Parfois, ils sentaient un frisson et comme le vent d'une idée ; au moment de la saisir, elle avait disparu.

Mais il existe des méthodes pour découvrir des sujets. On prend un titre, au hasard, et un fait en découle ; on développe un proverbe, on combine des aventures en une seule. Pas un de ces moyens n'aboutit. Ils feuilletèrent vainement des recueils d'anecdotes, plusieurs volumes des causes célèbres, un tas d'histoires.

Et ils rêvaient d'être joués à l'Odéon, pensaient aux spectacles, regrettaient Paris.

— J'étais fait pour être auteur, et ne pas m'enterrer à la campagne ! disait Bouvard.

— Moi de même, répondait Pécuchet.

Une illumination lui vint : s'ils avaient tant de mal, c'est qu'ils ne savaient pas les règles.

Ils les étudièrent, dans La Pratique du Théâtre par d'Aubignac, et dans quelques ouvrages moins démodés.

On y débat des questions importantes : Si la comédie peut s'écrire en vers, — si la tragédie n'excède point les bornes en tirant sa fable de l'histoire moderne, — si les héros doivent être vertueux, — quel genre de scélérats elle comporte, — jusqu'à quel point les horreurs y sont permises ? Que les détails concourent à un seul but, que l'intérêt grandisse, que la fin réponde au commencement, sans doute !

« Inventez des ressorts qui puissent m'attacher », dit Boileau.

Par quel moyen inventer des ressorts ?

« Que dans tous vos discours la passion émue Aille chercher le coeur, l'échauffe et le remue. »

Comment chauffer le coeur ?

Donc les règles ne suffisent pas. Il faut, de plus, le génie.

Et le génie ne suffit pas. Corneille, suivant l'Académie française, n'entend rien au théâtre. Geoffroy dénigra Voltaire. Racine fut bafoué par Subligny. La Harpe rugissait au nom de Shakespeare.

La vieille critique les dégoûtant, ils voulurent connaître la nouvelle, et firent venir les comptes rendus de pièces, dans les journaux.

Quel aplomb ! Quel entêtement ! Quelle improbité ! Des outrages à des chefs-d'oeuvre, des révérences faites à des platitudes — et les âneries de ceux qui passent pour savants et la bêtise des autres que l'on proclame spirituels !

C'est peut-être au Public qu'il faut s'en rapporter ?

Mais des oeuvres applaudies parfois leur déplaisaient, et dans les sifflées quelque chose leur agréait.

Ainsi, l'opinion des gens de goût est trompeuse et le jugement de la foule inconcevable.

Bouvard posa le dilemme à Barberou. Pécuchet, de son côté, écrivit à Dumouchel.

L'ancien commis-voyageur s'étonna du ramollissement causé par la province, son vieux Bouvard tournait à la bedolle, bref n'y était plus du tout.

Le théâtre est un objet de consommation comme un autre. Cela rentre dans l'article-Paris. On va au spectacle pour se divertir. Ce qui est bien, c'est ce qui amuse.

— Mais imbécile s'écria Pécuchet ce qui t'amuse n'est pas ce qui m'amuse — et les autres et toi-même s'en fatigueront plus tard. Si les pièces sont absolument écrites pour être jouées, comment se fait-il que les meilleures soient toujours lues ? Et il attendit la réponse de Dumouchel.

Suivant le professeur, le sort immédiat d'une pièce ne prouvait rien. Le Misanthrope et Athalie tombèrent. Zaïre n'est plus comprise. Qui parle aujourd'hui de Ducange et de Picard ? — Et il rappelait tous les grands succès contemporains, depuis Fanchon la Vielleuse jusqu'à Gaspardo le Pêcheur, déplorait la décadence de notre scène. Elle a pour cause le mépris de la Littérature — ou plutôt du style.

Alors, ils se demandèrent en quoi consiste précisément le style ? — et grâce à des auteurs indiqués par Dumouchel, ils apprirent le secret de tous ses genres.

Comment on obtient le majestueux, le tempéré, le naïf, les tournures qui sont nobles, les mots qui sont bas. Chiens se relève par dévorants. Vomir ne s'emploie qu'au figuré. Fièvre s'applique aux passions. Vaillance est beau en vers.

— Si nous faisons des vers ? dit Pécuchet.

— Plus tard ! Occupons-nous de la prose, d'abord.

On recommande formellement de choisir un classique pour se mouler sur lui mais tous ont leurs dangers — et non seulement ils ont péché par le style — mais encore par la langue.

Une telle assertion déconcerta Bouvard et Pécuchet et ils se mirent à étudier la grammaire.

Avons-nous dans notre idiome des articles définis et indéfinis comme en latin ? Les uns pensent que oui, les autres que non. Ils n'osèrent se décider.

Le sujet s'accorde toujours avec le verbe, sauf les occasions où le sujet ne s'accorde pas.

Nulle distinction autrefois entre l'adjectif verbal et le participe présent, mais l'Académie en pose une peu commode à saisir.

Ils furent bien aises d'apprendre que leur, pronom, s'emploie pour les personnes mais aussi pour les choses, tandis que où et en s'emploient pour les choses et quelquefois pour les personnes.

Doit-on dire cette femme a l'air bon ou l'air bonne ? — une bûche de bois sec ou de bois sèche — ne pas laisser de ou que de — une troupe de voleurs survint, ou survinrent ?

Autres difficultés : Autour et à l'entour dont Racine et Boileau ne voyaient pas la différence — imposer ou en imposer synonymes chez Massillon et chez Voltaire ; croasser et coasser confondus par La Fontaine, qui pourtant savait reconnaître un corbeau d'une grenouille.

Les grammairiens, il est vrai, sont en désaccord ; ceux-ci voyant une beauté, où ceux-là découvrent une faute. Ils admettent des principes dont ils repoussent les conséquences, proclament les conséquences dont ils refusent les principes, s'appuient sur la tradition, rejettent les maîtres, et ont des raffinements bizarres. Ménage au lieu de lentilles et cassonade préconise nentilles et castonade. Bouhours jérarchie et non pas hiérarchie, et M. Chapsal les oeils de la soupe.

Pécuchet surtout fut ébahi par Génin. Comment ? des z'annetons vaudrait mieux que des hannetons, des z'aricots que des haricots — et sous Louis XIV, on prononçait Roume et M. de Loune pour Rome et M. de Lionne !

Litré leur porta le coup de grâce en affirmant que jamais il n'y eut d'orthographe positive, et qu'il ne saurait y en avoir.

Ils en conclurent que la syntaxe est une fantaisie et la grammaire une illusion.

En ce temps-là, d'ailleurs, une rhétorique nouvelle annonçait qu'il faut écrire comme on parle et que tout sera bien pourvu qu'on ait senti, observé.

Comme ils avaient senti et croyaient avoir observé, ils se jugèrent capables d'écrire. Une pièce est gênante par l'étroitesse du cadre ; mais le roman a plus de libertés. Pour en faire un, ils cherchèrent dans leurs souvenirs.

Pécuchet se rappela un de ses chefs de bureau, un très vilain monsieur, et il ambitionnait de s'en venger par un livre.

Bouvard avait connu à l'estaminet, un vieux maître d'écriture ivrogne et misérable. Rien ne serait drôle comme ce personnage.

Au bout de la semaine, ils imaginèrent de fondre ces deux sujets, en un seul — en demeuraient là, passèrent aux suivants : — une femme qui cause le malheur d'une famille — une femme, son mari et son amant — une femme qui serait vertueuse par défaut de conformation, un ambitieux, un mauvais prêtre.

Ils tâchaient de relier à ces conceptions incertaines des choses fournies par leur mémoire, retranchaient, ajoutaient. Pécuchet était pour le sentiment et l'idée, Bouvard pour l'image et la couleur — et ils commençaient à ne plus s'entendre, chacun s'étonnant que l'autre fût si borné.

La science qu'on nomme esthétique, trancherait peut-être leurs différends. Un ami de Dumouchel, professeur de philosophie, leur envoya une liste d'ouvrages sur la matière. Ils travaillaient à part, et se communiquaient leurs réflexions.

D'abord qu'est-ce que le Beau ?

Pour Schelling c'est l'infini s'exprimant par le fini, pour Reid une qualité occulte, pour Jouffroy un trait indécomposable, pour De Maistre ce qui plaît à la vertu ; pour le P. André, ce qui convient à la Raison.

Et il existe plusieurs sortes de Beau : un beau dans les sciences, la géométrie est belle, un beau dans les moeurs, on ne peut nier que la mort de Socrate ne soit belle. Un beau dans le règne animal. La Beauté du chien consiste dans son odorat. Un cochon ne saurait être beau, vu ses habitudes immondes ; un serpent non plus, car il éveille en nous des idées de bassesse. Les fleurs, les papillons, les oiseaux peuvent être beaux. Enfin la condition première du Beau, c'est l'unité dans la variété, voilà le principe.

— Cependant, dit Bouvard, deux yeux louches sont plus variés que deux yeux droits et produisent moins bon effet, — ordinairement.

Ils abordèrent la question du sublime.

Certains objets, sont d'eux-mêmes sublimes, le fracas d'un torrent, des ténèbres profondes, un arbre battu par la tempête. Un caractère est beau quand il triomphe, et sublime quand il lutte.

— Je comprends dit Bouvard le Beau est le Beau, et le Sublime le très Beau.

Comment les distinguer ?

— Au moyen du tact, répondit Pécuchet.

— Et le tact, d'où vient-il ?

— Du goût !

— Qu'est-ce que le goût ?

On le définit un discernement spécial, un jugement rapide, l'avantage de distinguer certains rapports.

— Enfin le goût c'est le goût, — et tout cela ne dit pas la manière d'en avoir.

Il faut observer les bienséances ; mais les bienséances varient ; — et si parfaite que soit une oeuvre, elle ne sera pas toujours irréprochable. — Il y a, pourtant, un Beau indestructible, et dont nous ignorons les lois, car sa genèse est mystérieuse.

Puisqu'une idée ne peut se traduire par toutes les formes, nous devons reconnaître des limites entre les Arts, et dans chacun des Arts plusieurs genres. Mais des combinaisons surgissent où le style de l'un entrera dans l'autre sous peine de dévier du but, de ne pas être vrai.

L'application trop exacte du Vrai nuit à la Beauté, et la préoccupation de la Beauté empêche le Vrai. Cependant, sans idéal pas de Vrai ; — c'est pourquoi les types sont d'une réalité plus continue que les portraits. L'Art, d'ailleurs, ne traite que la vraisemblance — mais la vraisemblance dépend de qui l'observe, est une chose relative, passagère.

Ils se perdaient ainsi dans les raisonnements. Bouvard, de moins en moins, croyait à l'esthétique.

— Si elle n'est pas une blague, sa rigueur se démontrera par des exemples. Or, écoute. Et il lut une note, qui lui avait demandé bien des recherches.

Bouhours accuse Tacite de n'avoir pas la simplicité que réclame l'Histoire. M. Droz, un professeur, blâme Shakespeare pour son mélange du sérieux et du bouffon, Nisard, autre professeur, trouve qu'André Chénier est comme poète au-dessous du XVIIe siècle, Blair, Anglais, déplore dans Virgile le tableau des harpies. Marmontel gémit sur les licences d'Homère. Lamotte n'admet point l'immoralité de ses héros, Vida s'indigne de ses comparaisons. Enfin, tous les faiseurs de rhétoriques, de poétiques et d'esthétiques me paraissent des imbéciles !

— Tu exagères ! dit Pécuchet.

Des doutes l'agitaient — car si les esprits médiocres (comme observe Longin) sont incapables de fautes, les fautes appartiennent aux maîtres, et on devra les admirer ? C'est trop fort ! Cependant les maîtres sont les maîtres ! Il aurait voulu faire s'accorder les doctrines avec les oeuvres, les critiques et les poètes, saisir l'essence du Beau ; — et ces questions le travaillèrent tellement que sa bile en fut remuée. Il y gagna une jaunisse.

Elle était à son plus haut période, quand Marianne la cuisinière de Mme

Bordin vint demander à Bouvard un rendez-vous pour sa maîtresse.

La veuve n'avait pas reparu depuis la séance dramatique. Était-ce une avance ? Mais pourquoi l'intermédiaire de Marianne ? — Et pendant toute la nuit, l'imagination de Bouvard s'égara.

Le lendemain, vers deux heures, il se promenait dans le corridor et regardait de temps à autre par la fenêtre ; un coup de sonnette retentit. C'était le notaire.

Il traversa la cour, monta l'escalier, se mit dans le fauteuil — et les premières politesses échangées, dit que las d'attendre Mme Bordin, il avait pris les devants. Elle désirait lui acheter les Écalles.

Bouvard sentit comme un refroidissement et passa dans la chambre de

Pécuchet.

Pécuchet ne sut que répondre. Il était soucieux ; — M. Vaucorbeil devant venir tout à l'heure.

Enfin, elle arriva. Son retard s'expliquait par l'importance de sa toilette : un cachemire, un chapeau, des gants glacés, la tenue qui sied aux occasions sérieuses.

Après beaucoup d'ambages, elle demanda si mille écus ne seraient pas suffisants ?

— Un acre ! Mille écus ? jamais !

Elle cligna ses paupières : — Ah ! pour moi !

Et tous les trois restaient silencieux. M. de Faverges entra.

Il tenait sous le bras, comme un avoué, une serviette de maroquin — et en la posant sur la table :

— Ce sont des brochures ! Elles ont trait à la Réforme — question brûlante ; — mais voici une chose qui vous appartient sans doute ? Et il tendit à Bouvard le second volume des Mémoires du Diable.

Mélie, tout à l'heure, le lisait dans la cuisine ; et comme on doit surveiller les moeurs de ces gens-là, il avait cru bien faire en confisquant le livre.

Bouvard l'avait prêté à sa servante. On causa des romans.

Mme Bordin les aimait, quand ils n'étaient pas lugubres.

— Les écrivains dit M. de Faverges nous peignent la vie sous des couleurs flatteuses !

— Il faut peindre ! objecta Bouvard.

— Alors, on n'a plus qu'à suivre l'exemple !...

— Il ne s'agit pas d'exemple !

— Au moins, conviendrez-vous qu'ils peuvent tomber entre les mains d'une jeune fille. Moi, j'en ai une.

— Charmante ! dit le notaire, en prenant la figure qu'il avait les jours de contrat de mariage.

— Eh bien, à cause d'elle, ou plutôt des personnes qui l'entourent, je les prohibe dans ma maison, car le Peuple, cher monsieur !...

— Qu'a-t-il fait, le Peuple ? dit Vaucorbeil, paraissant tout à coup sur le seuil.

Pécuchet, qui avait reconnu sa voix, vint se mêler à la compagnie.

— Je soutiens reprit le comte qu'il faut écarter de lui certaines lectures.

Vaucorbeil répliqua : — Vous n'êtes donc pas pour l'instruction ?

— Si fait ! Permettez ?

— Quand tous les jours dit Marescot on attaque le gouvernement !

— Où est le mal ?

Et le gentilhomme et le médecin se mirent à dénigrer Louis-Philippe, rappelant l'affaire Pritchard, les lois de septembre contre la liberté de la presse.

— Et celle du théâtre ! ajouta Pécuchet.

Marescot n'y tenait plus. — Il va trop loin, votre théâtre !

— Pour cela, je vous l'accorde ! dit le comte ; des pièces qui exaltent le suicide !

— Le suicide est beau ! — témoin Caton, objecta Pécuchet.

Sans répondre à l'argument, M. de Faverges stigmatisa ces oeuvres, où l'on bafoue les choses les plus saintes, la famille, la propriété, le mariage !

— Eh bien, et Molière ? dit Bouvard.

Marescot, homme de goût, riposta que Molière ne passerait plus — et d'ailleurs était un peu surfait.

— Enfin dit le comte Victor Hugo a été sans pitié — oui sans pitié, pour Marie-Antoinette, en traînant sur la claie, le type de la Reine dans le personnage de Marie Tudor !

— Comment ! s'écria Bouvard moi — auteur — je n'ai pas le droit...

— Non, monsieur, vous n'avez pas le droit de nous montrer le crime sans mettre à côté un correctif, sans nous offrir une leçon.

Vaucorbeil trouvait aussi que l'Art devait avoir un but : viser à l'amélioration des masses ! Chantez-nous la science, nos découvertes, le patriotisme et il admirait Casimir Delavigne.

Mme Bordin vanta le marquis de Foudras.

Le notaire reprit : — Mais la langue, y pensez-vous ?

— La langue ? comment ?

— On vous parle du style ! cria Pécuchet. Trouvez-vous ses ouvrages bien écrits ?

— Sans doute, fort intéressants !

Il leva les épaules — et elle rougit sous l'impertinence.

Plusieurs fois, Mme Bordin avait tâché de revenir à son affaire. Il était trop tard pour la conclure. Elle sortit au bras de Marescot.

Le comte distribua ses pamphlets, en recommandant de les propager.

Vaucorbeil allait partir, quand Pécuchet l'arrêta.

— Vous m'oubliez, Docteur !

Sa mine jaune était lamentable, avec ses moustaches, et ses cheveux noirs qui pendaient sous un foulard mal attaché.

— Purgez-vous dit le médecin ; et lui donnant deux petites claques comme à un enfant : Trop de nerfs, trop artiste !

Cette familiarité lui fit plaisir. Elle le rassurait ; — et dès qu'ils furent seuls :

— Tu crois que ce n'est pas sérieux ?

— Non ! bien sûr !

Ils résumèrent ce qu'ils venaient d'entendre. La moralité de l'Art se renferme pour chacun dans le côté qui flatte ses intérêts. On n'aime pas la Littérature.

Ensuite ils feuilletèrent les imprimés du Comte. Tous réclamaient le suffrage universel.

— Il me semble dit Pécuchet que nous aurons bientôt du grabuge ? Car il voyait tout en noir, peut-être à cause de sa jaunisse.

CHAPITRE VI

Dans la matinée du 25 février 1848, on apprit à Chavignolles, par un individu venant de Falaise, que Paris était couvert de barricades — et le lendemain, la proclamation de la République fut affichée sur la mairie.

Ce grand événement stupéfia les bourgeois.

Mais quand on sut que la Cour de cassation, la Cour d'appel, la Cour des Comptes, le Tribunal de commerce, la Chambre des notaires, l'Ordre des avocats, le Conseil d'État, l'Université, les généraux et M. de la Rochejacquelein lui-même donnaient leur adhésion au Gouvernement Provisoire, les poitrines se desserrèrent ; — et comme à Paris on plantait des arbres de la liberté, le Conseil municipal décida qu'il en fallait à Chavignolles.

Bouvard en offrit un, réjouï dans son patriotisme par le triomphe du Peuple — quant à Pécuchet, la chute de la Royauté confirmait trop ses prévisions pour qu'il ne fût pas content.

Gorju, leur obéissant avec zèle, déplanta un des peupliers qui bordaient la prairie au-dessous de la Butte, et le transporta jusqu'au Pas de la Vaque, à l'entrée du bourg, endroit désigné.

Avant l'heure de la cérémonie, tous les trois attendaient le cortège.

Un tambour retentit, une croix d'argent se montra ; ensuite, parurent deux flambeaux que tenaient des chantres, et M. le curé avec l'étole, le surplis, la chape et la barrette. Quatre enfants de chœur l'escortaient, un cinquième portait le seau pour l'eau bénite, et le sacristain le suivait.

Il monta sur le rebord de la fosse où se dressait le peuplier, garni de bandelettes tricolores. On voyait en face le maire et ses deux adjoints Beljambe et Marescot, puis les notables, M. de Faverges, Vaucorbeil, Coulon le juge de paix, bonhomme à figure somnolente ; Heurtaux s'était coiffé d'un bonnet de police — et Alexandre Petit le nouvel instituteur, avait mis sa redingote, une pauvre redingote verte, celle des dimanches. Les pompiers, que commandait Girbal sabre au poing, formaient un seul rang ; de l'autre côté brillaient les plaques blanches de quelques vieux shakos du temps de La Fayette — cinq ou six, pas plus, la garde nationale étant tombée en désuétude à Chavignolles. Des paysans et leurs femmes, des ouvriers des fabriques voisines, des gamins, se tassaient par derrière ; — et Placquevent, le garde champêtre, haut de cinq pieds huit pouces, les contenait du regard, en se promenant les bras croisés.

L'allocution du curé fut comme celle des autres prêtres dans la même circonstance. Après avoir tonné contre les Rois, il glorifia la République. Ne dit-on pas la République des Lettres, la République chrétienne ? Quoi de plus innocent que l'une, de plus beau que l'autre ? Jésus-Christ formula notre sublime devise ; l'arbre du peuple c'était l'arbre de la Croix. Pour que la Religion donne ses fruits, elle a besoin de la charité — et au nom de la charité, l'ecclésiastique conjura ses frères de ne commettre aucun désordre, de rentrer chez eux, paisiblement.

Puis, il aspergea l'arbuste, en implorant la bénédiction de Dieu. Qu'il se développe et qu'il nous rappelle l'affranchissement de toute servitude, et cette fraternité plus bienfaisante que l'ombrage de ses rameaux ! — Amen !

Des voix répétèrent Amen — et après un battement de tambour, le clergé, poussant un Te Deum, reprit le chemin de l'église.

Son intervention avait produit un excellent effet. Les simples y voyaient une promesse de bonheur, les patriotes une déférence, un hommage rendu à leurs principes.

Bouvard et Pécuchet trouvaient qu'on aurait dû les remercier pour leur cadeau, y faire une allusion, tout au moins ; — et ils s'en ouvrirent à Faverges et au docteur.

Qu'importaient de pareilles misères ! Vaucorbeil était charmé de la Révolution, le Comte aussi. Il exécrait les d'Orléans. On ne les reverrait plus ; bon voyage ! Tout pour le peuple, désormais ! — et suivi de Hurel, son factotum, il alla rejoindre M. le curé.

Foureau marchait la tête basse, entre le notaire et l'aubergiste, vexé par la cérémonie, ayant peur d'une émeute ; — et instinctivement il se retournait vers le garde champêtre, qui déplorait avec le Capitaine, l'insuffisance de Girbal, et la mauvaise tenue de ses hommes.

Des ouvriers passèrent sur la route, en chantant la Marseillaise. Gorju, au milieu d'eux, brandissait une canne ; Petit les escortait, l'oeil animé.

— Je n'aime pas cela ! dit Marescot, on vocifère, on s'exalte !

— Eh bon Dieu ! reprit Coulon, il faut que jeunesse s'amuse !

Foureau soupira. Drôle d'amusement ! et puis la guillotine, au bout ! Il avait des visions d'échafaud, s'attendait à des horreurs.

Chavignolles reçut le contrecoup des agitations de Paris. Les bourgeois s'abonnèrent à des journaux. Le matin, on s'encombra au bureau de la poste, et la directrice ne s'en fût pas tirée sans le Capitaine, qui l'aidait, quelquefois. Ensuite, on restait sur la Place, à causer.

La première discussion violente eut pour objet la Pologne.

Heurtaux et Bouvard demandaient qu'on la délivrât.

M. de Faverges pensait autrement.

— De quel droit irions-nous là-bas ? C'était déchaîner l'Europe contre nous. Pas d'imprudence ! Et tout le monde l'approuvant, les deux Polonais se turent.

Une autre fois, Vaucorbeil défendit les circulaires de Ledru-Rollin.

Foureau riposta par les 45 centimes.

Mais le gouvernement, dit Pécuchet, avait supprimé l'esclavage.

— Qu'est-ce que ça me fait, l'esclavage !

— Eh bien, et l'abolition de la peine de mort, en matière politique ?

— Parbleu ! reprit Foureau ; on voudrait tout abolir. Cependant qui sait ?

Les locataires déjà, se montrent d'une exigence !

— Tant mieux ! les propriétaires selon Pécuchet étaient favorisés. Celui qui possède un immeuble...

Foureau et Marescot l'interrompirent, criant qu'il était un communiste.

— Moi ? communiste !

Et tous parlaient à la fois, quand Pécuchet proposa de fonder un club !

Foureau eut la hardiesse de répondre que jamais on n'en verrait à Chavignolles.

Ensuite, Gorju réclama des fusils pour la garde nationale — l'opinion l'ayant désigné comme instructeur.

Les seuls fusils qu'il y eût étaient ceux des pompiers. Girbal y tenait.

Foureau ne se souciait pas d'en délivrer.

Gorju le regarda. — On trouve, pourtant, que je sais m'en servir car il joignait à toutes ses industries celle du braconnage — et souvent M. le maire et l'aubergiste lui achetaient un lièvre ou un lapin.

— Ma foi ! prenez-les ! dit Foureau.

Le soir même, on commença les exercices.

C'était sur la pelouse, devant l'église. Gorju en bourgeron bleu, une cravate autour des reins, exécutait les mouvements d'une façon automatique. Sa voix, quand il commandait, était brutale. — Rentrez les ventres ! Et tout de suite, Bouvard s'empêchant de respirer, creusait son abdomen, tendait la croupe. — On ne vous dit pas de faire un arc, nom de Dieu ! Pécuchet confondait les files et les rangs, demi-tour à droite, demi-tour à gauche ; mais le plus lamentable était l'instituteur : débile et de taille exiguë, avec un collier de barbe blonde, il chancelait sous le poids de son fusil, dont la baïonnette incommodait ses voisins.

On portait des pantalons de toutes les couleurs, des baudriers crasseux, de vieux habits d'uniforme trop courts, laissant voir la chemise sur les flancs ; — et chacun prétendait n'avoir pas le moyen de faire autrement. Une souscription fut ouverte pour habiller les plus pauvres. Foureau lésina, tandis que des femmes se signalèrent. Mme Bordin offrit cinq francs, malgré sa haine de la République. M. de Faverges équipa douze hommes ; et ne manquait pas à la manoeuvre. Puis il s'installait chez l'épicier et payait des petits verres au premier venu.

Les puissants alors flagornaient la basse classe. Tout passait après les ouvriers. On briguait l'avantage de leur appartenir. Ils devenaient des nobles.

Ceux du canton, pour la plupart, étaient tisserands. D'autres travaillaient dans les manufactures d'indiennes, ou à une fabrique de papiers, nouvellement établie.

Gorju les fascinait par son bagout, leur apprenait la savate, menait boire les intimes chez Mme Castillon.

Mais les paysans étaient plus nombreux ; et les jours de marché, M. de Faverges se promenant sur la Place, s'informait de leurs besoins, tâchait de les convertir à ses idées. Ils écoutaient sans répondre, comme le père Gouy, prêt à accepter tout gouvernement, pourvu qu'on diminuât les impôts.

À force de bavarder, Gorju se fit un nom. Peut-être qu'on le porterait à l'Assemblée.

M. de Faverges y pensait comme lui, — tout en cherchant à ne pas se compromettre. Les conservateurs balançaient entre Foureau et Marescot. Mais le notaire tenant à son étude, Foureau fut choisi — un rustre, un crétin. Le docteur s'en indigna.

Fruit sec des concours, il regrettait Paris — et c'était la conscience de sa vie manquée qui lui donnait un air morose. Une carrière plus vaste allait se développer — quelle revanche ! Il rédigea une profession de foi et vint la lire à messieurs Bouvard et Pécuchet.

Ils l'en félicitèrent ; leurs doctrines étaient les mêmes.

Cependant, ils écrivaient mieux, connaissaient l'histoire, pouvaient aussi bien que lui figurer à la Chambre. Pourquoi pas ? Mais lequel devait se présenter ? Et une lutte de délicatesse s'engagea. Pécuchet préférait à lui-même, son ami. Non ! non, ça te revient ! tu as plus de prestance ! — Peut-être répondait Bouvard mais toi plus de toupet ! Et sans résoudre la difficulté, ils dressèrent des plans de conduite.

Ce vertige de la députation en avait gagné d'autres. Le Capitaine y rêvait sous son bonnet de police, tout en fumant sa bouffarde ; et l'instituteur aussi, dans son école, et le curé aussi entre deux prières — tellement que parfois il se surprenait les yeux au ciel, en train de dire : Faites, ô mon Dieu ! que je sois député !

Le Docteur, ayant reçu des encouragements, se rendit chez Heurtaux, et lui exposa les chances qu'il avait.

Le capitaine n'y mit pas de façons. Vaucorbeil était connu sans doute ; mais peu chéri de ses confrères, et spécialement des pharmaciens. Tous clabauderaient contre lui ; le peuple ne voulait pas d'un Monsieur ; ses meilleurs malades le quitteraient ; — et ayant pesé ces arguments, le médecin regretta sa faiblesse.

Dès qu'il fut parti, Heurtaux alla voir Placquevent. Entre vieux militaires on s'oblige ! Mais le garde champêtre, tout dévoué à Foureau, refusa net de le servir.

Le curé démontra à M. de Faverges que l'heure n'était pas venue. Il fallait donner à la République le temps de s'user.

Bouvard et Pécuchet représentèrent à Gorju qu'il ne serait jamais assez fort pour vaincre la coalition des paysans et des bourgeois, l'emplirent d'incertitudes, lui ôtèrent toute confiance.

Petit, par orgueil, avait laissé voir son désir. Beljambe le prévint que s'il échouait, sa destitution était certaine.

Enfin, Monseigneur ordonna au curé de se tenir tranquille.

Donc, il ne restait que Foureau.

Bouvard et Pécuchet le combattirent, rappelant sa mauvaise volonté pour les fusils, son opposition au club, ses idées rétrogrades, son avarice ; — et même persuadèrent à Gouy qu'il voulait rétablir l'ancien régime.

Si vague que fût cette chose-là pour le paysan, il l'exécrait d'une haine accumulée dans l'âme de ses aïeux, pendant dix siècles — et il tourna contre Foureau tous ses parents et ceux de sa femme, beaux-frères, cousins, arrière-neveux, une horde.

Gorju, Vaucorbeil et Petit continuaient la démolition de M. le maire ; et le terrain ainsi déblayé, Bouvard et Pécuchet, sans que personne s'en doutât, pouvaient réussir.

Ils tirèrent au sort pour savoir qui se présenterait. Le sort ne trancha rien — et ils allèrent consulter là-dessus, le docteur.

Il leur apprit une nouvelle. Flacardoux, rédacteur du Calvados, avait déclaré sa candidature. La déception des deux amis fut grande ; chacun, outre la sienne, ressentait celle de l'autre. Mais la Politique les échauffait. Le jour des élections, ils surveillèrent les urnes. Flacardoux l'emporta.

M. le comte s'était rejeté sur la garde nationale, sans obtenir l'épaulette de commandant. Les Chavignollais imaginèrent de nommer Beljambe.

Cette faveur du public, bizarre et imprévue, consterna Heurtaux. Il avait négligé ses devoirs, se bornant à inspecter parfois les manoeuvres, et émettre des observations. N'importe ! Il trouvait monstrueux qu'on préférât un aubergiste à un ancien Capitaine de l'Empire — et il dit, après l'envahissement de la Chambre au 15 mai : Si les grades militaires se donnent comme ça dans la capitale, je ne m'étonne plus de ce qui arrive !

La Réaction commençait.

On croyait aux purées d'ananas de Louis Blanc, au lit d'or de Flocon, aux orgies royales de Ledru-Rollin — et comme la province prétend connaître tout ce qui se passe à Paris, les bourgeois de Chavignolles ne doutaient pas de ces inventions, et admettaient les rumeurs les plus absurdes.

M. de Faverges, un soir, vint trouver le curé pour lui apprendre l'arrivée en Normandie du Comte de Chambord.

Joinville, d'après Foureau, se disposait avec ses marins, à vous réduire les socialistes. Heurtaux affirmait que prochainement Louis Bonaparte serait consul.

Les fabriques chômaient. Des pauvres, par bandes nombreuses, erraient dans la campagne.

Un dimanche (c'était dans les premiers jours de juin) un gendarme, tout à coup, partit vers Falaise. Les ouvriers d'Acqueville, Liffard, Pierre-Pont et Saint-Rémy marchaient sur Chavignolles.

Les auvents se fermèrent, le Conseil municipal s'assembla ; — et résolut, pour prévenir des malheurs, qu'on ne ferait aucune résistance. La gendarmerie fut même consignée, avec l'injonction de ne pas se montrer.

Bientôt on entendit comme un grondement d'orage. Puis le chant des Girondins ébranla les carreaux ; — et des hommes, bras dessus bras dessous, débouchèrent par la route de Caen, poudreux, en sueur, dépenaillés. Ils emplissaient la Place. Un grand brouhaha s'élevait.

Gorju et deux compagnons entrèrent dans la salle. L'un était maigre et à figure chafouine avec un gilet de tricot, dont les rosettes pendaient. L'autre noir de charbon — un mécanicien sans doute — avait les cheveux en brosse, de gros sourcils, et des savates de lisière. Gorju, comme un hussard, portait sa veste sur l'épaule.

Tous les trois restaient debout — et les Conseillers, siégeant autour de la table couverte d'un tapis bleu, les regardaient, blêmes d'angoisse.

— Citoyens ! dit Gorju il nous faut de l'ouvrage !

Le maire tremblait ; la voix lui manqua.

Marescot répondit à sa place, que le Conseil aviserait immédiatement ; — et les compagnons étant sortis, on discuta plusieurs idées.

La première fut de tirer du caillou.

Pour utiliser les cailloux, Girbal proposa un chemin d'Angleville à Tournebu.

Celui de Bayeux rendait absolument le même service.

On pouvait curer la mare ? ce n'était pas un travail suffisant ! ou bien creuser une seconde mare ! mais à quelle place ?

Langlois était d'avis de faire un remblai le long des Mortins, en cas d'inondation — mieux valait, selon Beljambe, défricher les bruyères. Impossible de rien conclure ! — Pour calmer la foule, Coulon descendit sur le péristyle, et annonça qu'ils préparaient des ateliers de charité.

— La charité ? Merci ! s'écria Gorju. À bas les aristos ! Nous voulons le droit au travail !

C'était la question de l'époque. Il s'en faisait un moyen de gloire. On applaudit.

En se retournant, il coudoya Bouvard, que Pécuchet avait entraîné jusque-là — et ils engagèrent une conversation. Rien ne pressait ; la mairie était cernée. Le Conseil n'échapperait pas.

— Où trouver de l'argent ? disait Bouvard.

— Chez les riches ! D'ailleurs, le gouvernement ordonnera des travaux.

— Et si on n'a pas besoin de travaux ?

— On en fera, par avance !

— Mais les salaires baisseront ! riposta Pécuchet. Quand l'ouvrage vient à manquer, c'est qu'il y a trop de produits ! — et vous réclamez pour qu'on les augmente !

Gorju se mordait la moustache. — Cependant... avec l'organisation du travail...

— Alors le gouvernement sera le maître ?

Quelques-uns, autour d'eux, murmurèrent : — Non ! non ! plus de maîtres !

Gorju s'irrita. — N'importe ! on doit fournir aux travailleurs un capital — ou bien instituer le crédit !

— De quelle manière ?

— Ah ! je ne sais pas ! mais on doit instituer le crédit !

— En voilà assez dit le mécanicien ; ils nous embêtent, ces farceurs-là !

Et il gravit le perron, déclarant qu'il enfoncerait la porte.

Placquevent l'y reçut, le jarret droit fléchi, les poings serrés.

— Avance un peu !

Le mécanicien recula.

Une nuée de la foule parvint dans la salle ; tous se levèrent, ayant envie de s'enfuir. Le secours de Falaise n'arrivait pas ! On déplorait l'absence de M. le Comte. Marescot tortillait une plume. Le père Coulon gémissait. Heurtaux s'emporta pour qu'on fît donner les gendarmes.

— Commandez-les ! dit Foureau.

— Je n'ai pas d'ordre.

Le bruit redoublait, cependant. La Place était couverte de monde ; — et tous observaient le premier étage de la mairie, quand à la croisée du milieu, sous l'horloge, on vit paraître Pécuchet.

Il avait pris adroitement l'escalier de service ; — et voulant faire comme

Lamartine, il se mit à haranguer le peuple :

— Citoyens !

Mais sa casquette, son nez, sa redingote, tout son individu manquait de prestige.

L'homme au tricot l'interpella :

— Est-ce que vous êtes ouvrier ?

— Non.

— Patron, alors ?

— Pas davantage !

— Eh bien, retirez-vous !

— Pourquoi ? reprit fièrement Pécuchet.

Et aussitôt, il disparut dans l'embrasure, empoigné par le mécanicien.

Gorju vint à son aide. — Laisse-le ! c'est un brave ! Ils se colletaient.

La porte s'ouvrit, et Marescot sur le seuil, proclama la décision municipale. Hurel l'avait suggérée.

Le chemin de Tournebu aurait un embranchement sur Angleville, et qui mènerait au château de Faverges.

C'était un sacrifice que s'imposait la commune dans l'intérêt des travailleurs. Ils se dispersèrent.

En rentrant chez eux, Bouvard et Pécuchet eurent les oreilles frappées par des voix de femmes. Les servantes et Mme Bordin poussaient des exclamations, la veuve criait plus fort, — et à leur aspect :

— Ah ! c'est bien heureux ! depuis trois heures que je vous attends ! mon pauvre jardin ! plus une seule tulipe ! des cochonneries partout, sur le gazon ! Pas moyen de le faire démarrer.

— Qui cela ?

— Le père Gouy !

Il était venu avec une charrette de fumier — et l'avait jetée tout à vrac au milieu de l'herbe. Il laboure maintenant ! Dépêchez-vous pour qu'il finisse !

— Je vous accompagne ! dit Bouvard.

Au bas des marches, en dehors, un cheval dans les brancards d'un tombereau mordait une touffe de lauriers-roses. Les roues, en frôlant les plates-bandes, avaient pilé les buis, cassé un rhododendron, abattu les dahlias — et des mottes de fumier noir, comme des taupinières, bosselaient le gazon. Gouy le bêchait avec ardeur.

Un jour, Mme Bordin avait dit négligemment qu'elle voulait le retourner. Il s'était mis à la besogne, et malgré sa défense continuait. C'est de cette manière qu'il entendait le droit au travail, le discours de Gorju lui ayant tourné la cervelle.

Il ne partit que sur les menaces violentes de Bouvard.

Mme Bordin, comme dédommagement, ne paya pas sa main-d'oeuvre et garda le fumier. Elle était judicieuse, l'épouse du médecin — et même celle du notaire, bien que d'un rang supérieur, la considéraient.

Les ateliers de charité durèrent une semaine. Aucun trouble n'advint.

Gorju avait quitté le pays.

Cependant la garde nationale était toujours sur pied ; le dimanche une revue, promenades militaires, quelquefois — et chaque nuit des rondes. Elles inquiétaient le village.

On tirait les sonnettes des maisons, par facétie ; on pénétrait dans les chambres où des époux ronflaient sur le même traversin ; alors on disait des gaudrioles ; et le mari se levant allait vous chercher des petits verres. Puis on revenait au corps de garde, jouer un cent de dominos ; on y buvait du cidre, on y mangeait du fromage, et le factionnaire qui s'ennuyait à la porte l'entrebâillait à chaque minute. L'indiscipline régnait, grâce à la mollesse de Beljambe.

Quand éclatèrent les journées de Juin, tout le monde fut d'accord pour voler au secours de Paris, mais Foureau ne pouvait quitter la mairie, Marescot son étude, le Docteur sa clientèle, Girbal ses pompiers.

M. de

Faverges était à Cherbourg. Beljambe s'alita. Le capitaine grommelait :

On n'a pas voulu de moi, tant pis ! et Bouvard eut la sagesse de retenir

Pécuchet.

Les rondes dans la campagne furent étendues plus loin.

Des paniques survenaient, causées par l'ombre d'une meule, ou les formes des branches ; une fois, tous les gardes nationaux s'enfuirent. Sous le clair de la lune, ils avaient aperçu dans un pommier, un homme avec un fusil — et qui les tenait en joue.

Une autre fois, par une nuit obscure, la patrouille faisant halte sous la hêtrée entendit quelqu'un devant elle.

— Qui vive ?

Pas de réponse !

On laissa l'individu continuer sa route, en le suivant à distance, car il pouvait avoir un pistolet ou un casse-tête — mais quand on fut dans le village, à portée des secours, les douze hommes du peloton, tous à la fois se précipitèrent sur lui, en criant : Vos papiers ! Ils le houspillaient, l'accablaient d'injures. Ceux du corps de garde étaient sortis. On l'y traîna ; — et à la lueur de la chandelle brûlant sur le poêle, on reconnut enfin Gorju.

Un méchant paletot de lasting craquait à ses épaules. Ses orteils se montraient par les trous de ses bottes. Des éraflures et des contusions faisaient saigner son visage. Il était amaigri prodigieusement, et roulait des yeux, comme un loup.

Foureau, accouru bien vite, lui demanda comment il se trouvait sous la hêtrée, ce qu'il revenait faire à Chavignolles, l'emploi de son temps, depuis six semaines.

Ça ne les regardait pas. Il était libre.

Placquevent le fouilla pour découvrir des cartouches. On allait provisoirement le coffrer.

Bouvard s'interposa.

— Inutile ! reprit le maire on connaît vos opinions.

— Cependant ?...

— Ah ! prenez garde, je vous en avertis ! Prenez garde.

Bouvard n'insista plus.

Gorju alors, se tourna vers Pécuchet : — Et vous, patron, vous ne dites rien ?

Pécuchet baissa la tête, comme s'il eût douté de son innocence.

Le pauvre diable eut un sourire d'amertume. — Je vous ai défendu, pourtant !

Au petit jour, deux gendarmes l'emmenèrent à Falaise.

Il ne fut pas traduit devant un conseil de guerre, mais condamné par la correctionnelle à trois mois de prison, pour délit de paroles tendant au bouleversement de la société.

De Falaise, il écrivit à ses anciens maîtres de lui envoyer prochainement un certificat de bonne vie et moeurs — et leur signature devant être légalisée par le maire ou par l'adjoint, ils préférèrent demander ce petit service à Marescot.

On les introduisit dans une salle à manger, que décoraient des plats de vieille faïence. Une horloge de Boulle occupait le panneau le plus étroit. Sur la table d'acajou, sans nappe, il y avait deux serviettes, une théière, des bols. Mme Marescot traversa l'appartement dans un peignoir de cachemire bleu. C'était une Parisienne qui s'ennuyait à la campagne. Puis le notaire entra, une toque à la main, un journal de l'autre ; — et tout de suite, d'un air aimable, il apposa son cachet — bien que leur protégé fût un homme dangereux.

— Vraiment dit Bouvard, pour quelques paroles !...

— Quand la parole amène des crimes, cher monsieur, permettez !

— Cependant reprit Pécuchet, quelle démarcation établir entre les phrases innocentes et les coupables ? Telle chose défendue maintenant sera par la suite applaudie. Et il blâma la manière féroce dont on traitait les insurgés.

Marescot alléguait naturellement la défense de la Société, le Salut Public, loi suprême.

— Pardon ! dit Pécuchet, le droit d'un seul est aussi respectable que celui de tous — et vous n'avez rien à lui objecter que la force — s'il retourne contre vous l'axiome.

Marescot, au lieu de répondre, leva les sourcils dédaigneusement. Pourvu qu'il continuât à faire des actes, et à vivre au milieu de ses assiettes, dans son petit intérieur confortable, toutes les injustices pouvaient se présenter sans l'émouvoir. Les affaires le réclamaient. Il s'excusa.

Sa doctrine du salut public les avait indignés. Les conservateurs parlaient maintenant comme Robespierre.

Autre sujet d'étonnement : Cavaignac baissait. La garde mobile devint suspecte. Ledru-Rollin s'était perdu, même dans l'esprit de Vaucorbeil. Les débats sur la Constitution n'intéressèrent personne ; — et au 10 décembre, tous les Chavignollais votèrent pour Bonaparte.

Les six millions de voix refroidirent Pécuchet à l'encontre du peuple ; — et Bouvard et lui étudièrent la question du suffrage universel.

Appartenant à tout le monde, il ne peut avoir d'intelligence. Un ambitieux le mènera toujours, les autres obéiront comme un troupeau, les électeurs n'étant pas même contraints de savoir lire ; — c'est pourquoi, suivant Pécuchet, il y avait eu tant de fraudes dans l'élection présidentielle.

— Aucune, reprit Bouvard, je crois plutôt à la sottise du peuple. Pense à tous ceux qui achètent la Revalessière, la pommade Dupuytren, l'eau des châtelaines, etc. ! Ces nigards forment la masse électorale, et nous subissons leur volonté. Pourquoi ne peut-on se faire avec des lapins trois mille livres de rentes ? C'est qu'une agglomération trop nombreuse est une cause de mort. — De même, par le fait seul de la foule, les germes de bêtise qu'elle contient se développent et il en résulte des effets incalculables.

— Ton scepticisme m'épouvante ! dit Pécuchet.

Plus tard, au printemps, ils rencontrèrent M. de Faverges, qui leur apprit l'expédition de Rome. On n'attaquerait pas les Italiens. Mais il nous fallait des garanties. Autrement, notre influence était ruinée. Rien de plus légitime que cette intervention.

Bouvard écarquilla les yeux. — À propos de la Pologne, vous souteniez le contraire ?

— Ce n'est plus la même chose ! Maintenant, il s'agissait du Pape.

Et M. de Faverges en disant : Nous voulons, nous ferons, nous comptons bien représenter un groupe.

Bouvard et Pécuchet furent dégoûtés du petit nombre comme du grand. La plèbe en somme, valait l'aristocratie.

Le droit d'intervention leur semblait louche. Ils en cherchèrent les principes dans Calvo, Martens, Vattel ; — et Bouvard conclut :

— On intervient pour remettre un prince sur le trône, pour affranchir un peuple — ou par précaution, en vue d'un danger. Dans les deux cas, c'est un attentat au droit d'autrui, un abus de la force, une violence hypocrite !

— Cependant, dit Pécuchet, les peuples comme les hommes sont solidaires.

— Peut-être ! Et Bouvard se mit à rêver.

Bientôt commença l'expédition de Rome à l'intérieur.

En haine des idées subversives, l'élite des bourgeois parisiens, saccagea deux imprimeries. Le grand parti de l'ordre se formait.

Il avait pour chefs dans l'arrondissement, M. le comte, Foureau, Marescot et le curé. Tous les jours, vers quatre heures, ils se promenaient d'un bout à l'autre de la Place, et causaient des événements. L'affaire principale était la distribution des brochures. Les titres ne manquaient pas de saveur : *_Dieu le voudra — les Partageux — Sortons du gâchis — Où allons-nous ? _*Ce qu'il y avait de plus beau, c'était les dialogues en style villageois, avec des jurons et des fautes de français, pour élever le moral des paysans. Par une loi nouvelle, le colportage se trouvait aux mains des préfets — et on venait de fourrer Proudhon à Sainte-Pélagie — immense victoire.

Les arbres de la liberté furent abattus généralement. Chavignolles obéit à la consigne. Bouvard vit de ses yeux les morceaux de son peuplier sur une brouette. Ils servirent à chauffer les gendarmes ; — et on offrit la souche à M. le Curé — qui l'avait béni, pourtant ! quelle dérision !

L'instituteur ne cacha pas sa manière de penser. Bouvard et Pécuchet l'en félicitèrent un jour qu'ils passaient devant sa porte.

Le lendemain, il se présenta chez eux. À la fin de la semaine, ils lui rendirent sa visite.

Le jour tombait ; les gamins venaient de partir, et le maître d'école en bouts de manche, balayait la cour. Sa femme coiffée d'un madras allaitait un enfant. Une petite fille se cacha derrière sa jupe ; un mioche hideux jouait par terre, à ses pieds ; l'eau du savonnage qu'elle faisait dans la cuisine coulait au bas de la maison.

— Vous voyez dit l'instituteur comme le gouvernement nous traite ! Et tout de suite, il s'en prit à l'infâme capital. Il fallait le démocratiser, affranchir la matière !

— Je ne demande pas mieux ! dit Pécuchet.

Au moins, on aurait dû reconnaître le droit à l'assistance.

— Encore un droit ! dit Bouvard.

N'importe ! le Provisoire avait été mollasse, en n'ordonnant pas la Fraternité.

— Tâchez donc de l'établir !

Comme il ne faisait plus clair, Petit commanda brutalement à sa femme de monter un flambeau dans son cabinet.

Des épingles fixaient aux murs de plâtre les portraits lithographiés des orateurs de la gauche. Un casier avec des livres dominait un bureau de sapin. On avait pour s'asseoir une chaise, un tabouret et une vieille caisse à savon ; il affectait d'en rire. Mais la misère plaquait ses joues, et ses tempes étroites dénotaient un entêtement de bœuf, un intraitable orgueil. Jamais il ne calerait.

— Voilà d'ailleurs ce qui me soutient !

C'était un amas de journaux, sur une planche — et il exposa en paroles fiévreuses les articles de sa foi : désarmement des troupes, abolition de la magistrature, égalité des salaires, niveau — moyens par lesquels on obtiendrait l'âge d'or, sous la forme de la République — avec un dictateur à la tête, un gaillard pour vous mener ça, rondement !

Puis, il atteignit une bouteille d'anisette, et trois verres, afin de porter un toast au Héros, à l'immortelle victime, au grand Maximilien !

Sur le seuil, la robe noire du curé parut.

Ayant salué vivement la compagnie, il aborda l'instituteur, et lui dit presque à voix basse :

— Notre affaire de Saint-Joseph, où en est-elle ?

— Ils n'ont rien donné ! reprit le maître d'école.

— C'est de votre faute !

— J'ai fait ce que j'ai pu !

— Ah ! — vraiment ?

Bouvard et Pécuchet se levèrent par discrétion. Petit les fit se rasseoir ; et s'adressant au curé : — Est-ce tout ?

L'abbé Jeufroy hésita ; — puis, avec un sourire qui tempérerait sa réprimande :

— On trouve que vous négligez un peu l'histoire sainte.

— Oh ! l'histoire sainte ! reprit Bouvard.

— Que lui reprochez-vous, monsieur ?

— Moi ? rien ! Seulement il y a peut-être des choses plus utiles que l'anecdote de Jonas et les rois d'Israël !

— Libre à vous ! répliqua sèchement le prêtre — et sans souci des étrangers, ou à cause d'eux : L'heure du catéchisme est trop courte !

Petit leva les épaules.

— Faites attention. Vous perdrez vos pensionnaires !

Les dix francs par mois de ces élèves étaient le meilleur de sa place.

Mais la soutane l'exaspérait. — Tant pis, vengez-vous !

— Un homme de mon caractère ne se venge pas ! dit le prêtre, sans s'émouvoir. Seulement, — Je vous rappelle que la loi du 15 mars nous attribue la surveillance de l'instruction primaire.

— Eh ! je le sais bien ! s'écria l'instituteur. Elle appartient même aux colonels de gendarmerie ! Pourquoi pas au garde-champêtre ! ce serait complet !

Et il s'affaissa sur l'escabeau, mordant son poing, retenant sa colère, suffoqué par le sentiment de son impuissance.

L'ecclésiastique le toucha légèrement sur l'épaule.

— Je n'ai pas voulu vous affliger, mon ami ! Calmez-vous ! Un peu de raison ! Voilà Pâques bientôt ; j'espère que vous donnerez l'exemple, — en communiant avec les autres.

— Ah c'est trop fort ! moi ! moi ! me soumettre à de pareilles bêtises !

Devant ce blasphème le curé pâlit. Ses prunelles fulguraient. Sa mâchoire tremblait. — Taisez-vous, malheureux ! taisez-vous !

Et c'est sa femme qui soigne les linges de l'église !

— Eh bien ? quoi ? Qu'a-t-elle fait ?

— Elle manque toujours la messe ! — Comme vous, d'ailleurs !

— Eh ! on ne renvoie pas un maître d'école, pour ça !

— On peut le déplacer !

Le prêtre ne parla plus. Il était au fond de la pièce, dans l'ombre.

Petit, la tête sur la poitrine, songeait.

Ils arriveraient à l'autre bout de la France, leur dernier sou mangé par le voyage ; — et il retrouverait là-bas sous des noms différents, le même curé, le même recteur, le même préfet ! — tous, jusqu'au ministre, étaient comme les anneaux de sa chaîne accablante ! Il avait reçu déjà un avertissement, d'autres viendraient. Ensuite ? — et dans une sorte d'hallucination, il se vit marchant sur une grande route, un sac au dos, ceux qu'il aimait près de lui, la main tendue vers une chaise de poste !

À ce moment-là, sa femme dans la cuisine fut prise d'une quinte de toux, le nouveau-né se mit à vagir ; et le marmot pleurait.

— Pauvres enfants ! dit le prêtre d'une voix douce.

Le père alors éclata en sanglots. — Oui ! oui ! tout ce qu'on voudra !

— J'y compte reprit le curé ; — et ayant fait la révérence : — Messieurs, bien le bonsoir !

Le maître d'école restait la figure dans les mains. — Il repoussa Bouvard.

— Non ! laissez-moi ! j'ai envie de crever ! je suis un misérable !

Les deux amis regagnèrent leur domicile, en se félicitant de leur indépendance. Le pouvoir du clergé les effrayait.

On l'appliquait maintenant à raffermir l'ordre social. La République allait bientôt disparaître.

Trois millions d'électeurs se trouvèrent exclus du suffrage universel. Le cautionnement des journaux fut élevé, la censure rétablie. On en voulait aux romans-feuilletons ; la philosophie classique était réputée dangereuse ; les bourgeois prêchaient le dogme des intérêts matériels — et le Peuple semblait content.

Celui des campagnes revenait à ses anciens maîtres.

M. de Faverges, qui avait des propriétés dans l'Eure, fut porté à la Législative, et sa réélection au Conseil général du Calvados était d'avance certaine.

Il jugea bon d'offrir un déjeuner aux notables du pays.

Le vestibule où trois domestiques les attendaient pour prendre leurs paletots, le billard et les deux salons en enfilade, les plantes dans les vases de la Chine, les bronzes sur les cheminées, les baguettes d'or aux lambris, les rideaux épais, les larges fauteuils, ce luxe immédiatement les flatta comme une politesse qu'on leur faisait ; — et en entrant dans la salle à manger, au spectacle de la table couverte de viandes sur les plats d'argent, avec la rangée des verres devant chaque assiette, les hors d'oeuvre çà et là, et un saumon au milieu, tous les visages s'épanouirent.

Ils étaient dix-sept, y compris deux forts cultivateurs, le sous-préfet de Bayeux, et un individu de Cherbourg. M. de Faverges pria ses hôtes d'excuser la comtesse, empêchée par une migraine ; — et après des compliments sur les poires et les raisins qui emplissaient quatre corbeilles aux angles, il fut question de la grande nouvelle : le projet d'une descente en Angleterre par Changarnier.

Heurtaux la désirait comme soldat, le curé en haine des protestants, Foureau dans l'intérêt du commerce.

— Vous exprimez dit Pécuchet des sentiments du moyen âge !

— Le moyen âge avait du bon ! reprit Marescot. Ainsi, nos cathédrales !...

— Cependant, monsieur, les abus !...

— N'importe, la Révolution ne serait pas arrivée !...

— Ah ! la Révolution, voilà le malheur ! dit l'ecclésiastique, en soupirant.

— Mais tout le monde y a contribué ! et — (excusez-moi, monsieur le comte), les nobles eux-mêmes par leur alliance avec les philosophes !

— Que voulez-vous ! Louis XVIII a légalisé la spoliation ! Depuis ce temps-là, le régime parlementaire vous sape les bases !...

Un roastbeef parut — et durant quelques minutes on n'entendit que le bruit des fourchettes et des mâchoires, avec le pas des servants sur le parquet et ces deux mots répétés : Madère ! Sauterne !

La conversation fut reprise par le monsieur de Cherbourg. Comment s'arrêter sur le penchant de l'abîme ?

— Chez les Athéniens dit Marescot chez les Athéniens, avec lesquels nous avons des rapports, Solon mata les démocrates, en élevant le cens électoral.

— Mieux vaudrait dit Hurel supprimer la Chambre ; tout le désordre vient de Paris.

— Décentralisons ! dit le notaire.

— Largement ! reprit le Comte.

D'après Foureau, la commune devait être maîtresse absolue, jusqu'à interdire ses routes aux voyageurs, si elle le jugeait convenable.

Et pendant que les plats se succédaient, poule au jus, écrevisses, champignons, légumes en salade, rôtis d'alouettes, bien des sujets furent traités : le meilleur système d'impôts, les avantages de la grande culture, l'abolition de la peine de mort — le sous-préfet n'oublia pas de citer ce mot charmant d'un homme d'esprit : — Que MM. les assassins commencent !

Bouvard était surpris par le contraste des choses qui l'entouraient avec celles que l'on disait — car il semble toujours que les paroles doivent correspondre aux milieux, et que les hauts plafonds soient faits pour les grandes pensées. Néanmoins, il était rouge au dessert, et entrevoyait les compotiers dans un brouillard.

On avait pris des vins de Bordeaux, de Bourgogne et de Malaga... M. de Faverges qui connaissait son monde fit déboucher du champagne. Les convives, en trinquant burent au succès de l'élection — et il était plus de trois heures, quand ils passèrent dans le fumoir, pour prendre le café.

Une caricature du Charivari traînait sur une console, entre des numéros de l'Univers ; cela représentait un citoyen, dont les basques de la redingote laissaient voir une queue, se terminant par un oeil. Marescot en donna l'explication. On rit beaucoup.

Ils absorbaient des liqueurs — et la cendre des cigares tombait dans les capitons des meubles. L'abbé voulant convaincre Girbal attaqua Voltaire.

Coulon s'endormit. M. de Faverges déclara son dévouement pour Chambord. — Les abeilles prouvent la monarchie.

— Mais les fourmilières la République ! Du reste, le médecin n'y tenait plus.

— Vous avez raison ! dit le sous-préfet. La forme du gouvernement importe peu !

— Avec la liberté ! objecta Pécuchet.

— Un honnête homme n'en a pas besoin répliqua Foureau. Je ne fais pas de discours, moi ! Je ne suis pas journaliste ! et je vous soutiens que la France veut être gouvernée par un bras de fer !

Tous réclamaient un Sauveur.

Et en sortant, Bouvard et Pécuchet entendirent M. de Faverges qui disait à l'abbé Jeufroy :

— Il faut rétablir l'obéissance. L'autorité se meurt, si on la discute ! Le droit divin, il n'y a que ça !

— Parfaitement, monsieur le comte !

Les pâles rayons d'un soleil d'octobre s'allongeaient derrière les bois ; un vent humide soufflait ; — et en marchant sur les feuilles mortes, ils respiraient comme délivrés.

Tout ce qu'ils n'avaient pu dire s'échappa en exclamations :

— Quels idiots ! quelle bassesse ! Comment imaginer tant d'entêtement ?

D'abord, que signifie le droit divin ?

L'ami de Dumouchel, ce professeur qui les avait éclairés sur l'esthétique, répondit à leur question dans une lettre savante.

La théorie du droit divin a été formulée sous Charles II par l'Anglais Filmer.

La voici :

Le Créateur donna au premier homme la souveraineté du monde. Elle fut transmise à ses descendants ; et la puissance du Roi émane de Dieu. Il est son image, écrit Bossuet. L'empire paternel accoutume à la domination d'un seul. On a fait les rois d'après le modèle des pères.

Locke réfuta cette doctrine. Le pouvoir paternel se distingue du monarchique, tout sujet ayant le même droit sur ses enfants que le monarque sur les siens. La royauté n'existe que par le choix populaire — et même l'élection était rappelée dans la cérémonie du sacre, où deux évêques, en montrant le Roi, demandaient aux nobles et aux manants, s'ils l'acceptaient pour tel.

Donc le Pouvoir vient du Peuple. Il a le droit de faire tout ce qu'il veut, dit Helvétius, de changer sa constitution, dit Vattel, de se révolter contre l'injustice, prétendent Glafey, Hotman, Mably, etc. ! — et saint Thomas d'Aquin l'autorise à se délivrer d'un tyran. Il est même, dit Jurieu, dispensé d'avoir raison.

Étonnés de l'axiome, ils prirent le Contrat social de Rousseau.

Pécuchet alla jusqu'au bout — puis fermant les yeux, et se renversant la tête, il en fit l'analyse.

— On suppose une convention, par laquelle l'individu aliéna sa liberté. Le Peuple, en même temps, s'engageait à le défendre contre les inégalités de la Nature et le rendait propriétaire des choses qu'il détient.

— Où est la preuve du contrat ?

— Nulle part ! et la communauté n'offre pas de garantie. Les citoyens s'occuperont exclusivement de politique. Mais comme il faut des métiers, Rousseau conseille l'esclavage. Les sciences ont perdu le genre humain. Le théâtre est corrompateur, l'argent funeste ; et l'État doit imposer une religion, sous peine de mort.

Comment, se dirent-ils, voilà le dieu de 93, le pontife de la démocratie !

Tous les réformateurs l'ont copié ; — et ils se procurèrent l'Examen du socialisme, par Morant.

Le chapitre premier expose la doctrine saint-simonienne.

Au sommet le Père, à la fois pape et empereur. Abolition des héritages, tous les biens meubles et immeubles composant un fonds social, qui sera exploité hiérarchiquement. Les industriels gouverneront la fortune publique. Mais rien à craindre ! on aura pour chef celui qui aime le plus.

Il manque une chose, la Femme. De l'arrivée de la Femme dépend le salut du monde.

— Je ne comprends pas.

— Ni moi !

Et ils abordèrent le Fouriérisme.

Tous les malheurs viennent de la contrainte. Que l'Attraction soit libre, et l'Harmonie s'établira.

Notre âme enferme douze passions principales, cinq égoïstes, quatre animiques, trois distributives. Elles tendent, les premières à l'individu, les suivantes aux groupes, les dernières aux groupes de groupes, ou séries, dont l'ensemble est la Phalange, société de dix-huit cents personnes, habitant un palais. Chaque matin, des voitures emmènent les travailleurs dans la campagne, et les ramènent le soir. On porte des étendards, on donne des fêtes, on mange des gâteaux. Toute femme, si elle y tient, possède trois hommes, le mari, l'amant et le géniteur. Pour les célibataires, le Bayadérisme est institué.

— Ça me va ! dit Bouvard ; et il se perdit dans les rêves du monde harmonien.

Par la restauration des climatures la terre deviendra plus belle, par le croisement des races la vie humaine plus longue. On dirigera les nuages comme on fait maintenant de la foudre, il pleuvra la nuit sur les villes pour les nettoyer. Des navires traverseront les mers polaires dégelées sous les aurores boréales — car tout se produit par la conjonction des deux fluides mâle et femelle, jaillissant des pôles — et les aurores boréales sont un symptôme du rut de la planète, une émission prolifique.

— Cela me passe dit Pécuchet.

Après Saint-Simon et Fourier, le problème se réduit à des questions de salaire.

Louis Blanc, dans l'intérêt des ouvriers veut qu'on abolisse le commerce extérieur, La Farelle qu'on impose les machines, un autre qu'on dégrève les boissons, ou qu'on refasse les jurandes, ou qu'on distribue des soupes. Proudhon imagine un tarif uniforme, et réclame pour l'État le monopole du sucre.

— Tes socialistes disait Bouvard, demandent toujours la tyrannie.

— Mais non !

— Si fait !

— Tu es absurde !

— Toi, tu me révoltes !

Ils firent venir les ouvrages dont ils ne connaissaient que les résumés.

Bouvard nota plusieurs endroits, et les montrant :

— Lis, toi-même ! Ils nous proposent comme exemple, les Esséniens, les Frères Moraves, les Jésuites du Paraguay, et jusqu'au régime des prisons.

Chez les Icariens, le déjeuner se fait en vingt minutes, les femmes accouchent à l'hôpital. Quant aux livres, défense d'en imprimer sans l'autorisation de la République.

— Mais Cabet est un idiot.

— Maintenant voilà du Saint-Simon : les publicistes soumettront leurs travaux à un comité d'industriels.

Et du Pierre Leroux : la loi forcera les citoyens à entendre un orateur.

Et de l'Auguste Comte : les prêtres éduqueront la jeunesse, dirigeront toutes les oeuvres de l'esprit, et engageront le Pouvoir à régler la procréation.

Ces documents affligèrent Pécuchet. Le soir, au dîner, il répliqua.

— Qu'il y ait chez les utopistes, des choses ridicules, j'en conviens. Cependant, ils méritent notre amour. La hideur du monde les désolait, et pour le rendre plus beau, ils ont tout souffert. Rappelle-toi Morus décapité, Campanella mis sept fois à la torture, Buonarroti avec une chaîne autour du cou, Saint-Simon crevant de misère, bien d'autres. Ils auraient pu vivre tranquilles ! mais non ! ils ont marché dans leur voie, la tête au ciel, comme des héros.

— Crois-tu que le monde reprit Bouvard, changera grâce aux théories d'un monsieur ?

— Qu'importe ! dit Pécuchet, il est temps de ne plus croupir dans l'égoïsme ! Cherchons le meilleur système !

— Alors, tu comptes le trouver ?

— Certainement !

— Toi ?

Et dans le rire dont Bouvard fut pris, ses épaules et son ventre sautaient d'accord. Plus rouge que les confitures, avec sa serviette sous l'aisselle, il répétait : Ah ! ah ! ah ! d'une façon irritante.

Pécuchet sortit de l'appartement, en faisant claquer la porte.

Germaine le héla par toute la maison ; — et on le découvrit au fond de sa chambre dans une bergère, sans feu ni chandelle et la casquette sur les sourcils. Il n'était pas malade ; mais se livrait à ses réflexions.

La brouille étant passée, ils reconnurent qu'une base manquait à leurs études : l'économie politique.

Ils s'enquirent de l'offre et de la demande, du capital et du loyer, de l'importation, de la prohibition.

Une nuit, Pécuchet fut réveillé par le craquement d'une botte dans le corridor. La veille comme d'habitude, il avait tiré lui-même tous les verrous — et il appela Bouvard qui dormait profondément.

Ils restèrent immobiles sous leurs couvertures. Le bruit ne recommença pas.

Les servantes interrogées n'avaient rien entendu.

Mais en se promenant dans leur jardin, ils remarquèrent au milieu d'une plate-bande, près de la claire-voie l'empreinte d'une semelle — et deux bâtons du treillage étaient rompus. — On l'avait escaladé, évidemment.

Il fallait prévenir le garde champêtre.

Comme il n'était pas à la mairie, Pécuchet se rendit chez l'épicier.

Que vit-il dans l'arrière-boutique, à côté de Placquevent, parmi les buveurs ? Gorju ! — Gorju nippé comme un bourgeois, — et régaland la compagnie.

Cette rencontre était insignifiante. Bientôt, ils arrivèrent à la question du Progrès.

Bouvard n'en doutait pas dans le domaine scientifique. Mais en littérature, il est moins clair — et si le bien-être augmente, la splendeur de la vie a disparu.

Pécuchet, pour le convaincre, prit un morceau de papier.

— Je trace obliquement une ligne ondulée. Ceux qui pourraient la parcourir, toutes les fois qu'elle s'abaisse, ne verraient plus l'horizon. Elle se relève pourtant, et malgré ses détours, ils atteindront le sommet. Telle est l'image du Progrès.

Mme Bordin entra.

C'était le 3 décembre 1851. Elle apportait le journal.

Ils lurent bien vite et côte à côte, l'Appel au peuple, la dissolution de la Chambre, l'emprisonnement des députés.

Pécuchet devint blême. Bouvard considérait la veuve.

— Comment ? vous ne dites rien !

— Que voulez-vous que j'y fasse ? Ils oubliaient de lui offrir un siège. Moi qui suis venue, croyant vous faire plaisir. Ah ! vous n'êtes guère aimables aujourd'hui et elle sortit, choquée de leur impolitesse.

La surprise les avait rendus muets. Puis, ils allèrent dans le village, épandre leur indignation.

Marescot, qui les reçut au milieu des contrats, pensait différemment. Le bavardage de la Chambre était fini, grâce au ciel. On aurait désormais une politique d'affaires.

Beljambe ignorait les événements, et s'en moquait d'ailleurs.

Sous les Halles, ils arrêterent Vaucorbeil.

Le médecin était revenu de tout ça. — Vous avez bien tort de vous tourmenter.

Foureau passa près d'eux, en disant d'un air narquois : — Enfoncés les démocrates ! — Et le capitaine au bras de Girbal, cria de loin : Vive l'Empereur !

Mais Petit devait les comprendre — et Bouvard ayant frappé au carreau, le maître d'école quitta sa classe.

Il trouvait extrêmement drôle que Thiers fût en prison. Cela vengeait le Peuple. — Ah ! ah ! messieurs les Députés, à votre tour !

La fusillade sur les boulevards eut l'approbation de Chavignolles. Pas de grâce aux vaincus, pas de pitié pour les victimes ! Dès qu'on se révolte on est un scélérat.

— Remercions la Providence ! disait le curé — et après elle Louis Bonaparte. Il s'entoure des hommes les plus distingués ! Le comte de Faverger deviendra sénateur.

Le lendemain, ils eurent la visite de Placquevent.

Ces messieurs avaient beaucoup parlé. Il les engageait à se taire.

— Veux-tu savoir mon opinion ? dit Pécuchet.

Puisque les bourgeois sont féroces, les ouvriers jaloux, les prêtres serviles — et que le Peuple enfin, accepte tous les tyrans, pourvu qu'on lui laisse le museau dans sa gamelle, Napoléon a bien fait ! — qu'il le bâillonne, le foule et l'extermine ! ce ne sera jamais trop, pour sa haine du droit, sa lâcheté, son ineptie, son aveuglement !

Bouvard songeait : — Hein, le Progrès, quelle blague ! Il ajouta : — Et la Politique, une belle saleté !

— Ce n'est pas une science reprit Pécuchet. L'art militaire vaut mieux, on prévoit ce qui arrive. Nous devrions nous y mettre ?

— Ah ! merci ! répliqua Bouvard. Tout me dégoûte. Vendons plutôt notre baraque — et allons au tonnerre de Dieu, chez les sauvages !

— Comme tu voudras !

Mélie dans la cour, tirait de l'eau.

La pompe en bois avait un long levier. Pour le faire descendre, elle courbait les reins — et on voyait alors ses bas bleus jusqu'à la hauteur de son mollet. Puis, d'un geste rapide, elle levait son bras droit, tandis qu'elle tournait un peu la tête — et Pécuchet en la regardant, sentait quelque chose de tout nouveau, un charme, un plaisir infini.

CHAPITRE VII

Des jours tristes commencèrent.

Ils n'étudiaient plus dans la peur de déceptions ; les habitants de Chavignolles s'écartaient d'eux ; les journaux tolérés n'apprenaient rien — et leur solitude était profonde, leur désœuvrement complet.

Quelquefois, ils ouvraient un livre, et le refermaient ; à quoi bon ? En d'autres jours, ils avaient l'idée de nettoyer le jardin, au bout d'un quart d'heure une fatigue les prenait ; ou de voir leur ferme, ils en revenaient écoeurés ; ou de s'occuper de leur ménage, Germaine poussait des lamentations ; ils y renoncèrent.

Bouvard voulut dresser le catalogue du musée, et déclara ces bibelots stupides. Pécuchet emprunta la canardière de Langlois pour tirer des alouettes ; l'arme éclatant du premier coup faillit le tuer.

Donc ils vivaient dans cet ennui de la campagne, si lourd quand le ciel blanc écrase de sa monotonie un cœur sans espoir. On écoute le pas d'un homme en sabots qui longe le mur, ou les gouttes de la pluie tomber du toit par terre. De temps à autre, une feuille morte vient frôler la vitre, puis tourne, s'en va. Des glas indistincts sont apportés par le vent. Au fond de l'étable, une vache mugit.

Ils bâillaient l'un devant l'autre, consultaient le calendrier, regardaient la pendule, attendaient les repas ; — et l'horizon était toujours le même ! des champs en face, à droite l'église, à gauche un rideau de peupliers ; leurs cimes se balançaient dans la brume, perpétuellement, d'un air lamentable !

Des habitudes qu'ils avaient tolérées les faisaient souffrir. Pécuchet devenait incommode avec sa manie de poser sur la nappe son mouchoir. Bouvard ne quittait plus la pipe, et causait en se dandinant. Des contestations s'élevaient, à propos des plats ou de la qualité du beurre. Dans leur tête-à-tête ils pensaient à des choses différentes.

Un événement avait bouleversé Pécuchet.

Deux jours après l'émeute de Chavignolles, comme il promenait son déboire politique, il arriva dans un chemin, couvert par des ormes touffus ; et il entendit derrière son dos une voix crier : — Arrête !

C'était Mme Castillon. Elle courait de l'autre côté, sans l'apercevoir. Un homme, qui marchait devant elle, se retourna. C'était Gorju ; — et ils s'abordèrent à une toise de Pécuchet, la rangée des arbres les séparant de lui.

— Est-ce vrai ? dit-elle tu vas te battre ?

Pécuchet se coula dans le fossé, pour entendre :

— Eh bien ! oui, répliqua Gorju je vais me battre ! Qu'est-ce que ça te fait ?

— Il le demande ! s'écria-t-elle, en se tordant les bras. Mais si tu es tué, mon amour ? Oh reste ! — Et ses yeux bleus, plus encore que ses paroles, le suppliaient.

— Laisse-moi tranquille ! je dois partir !

Elle eut un ricanement de colère. — L'autre l'a permis, hein ?

— N'en parle pas ! Il leva son poing fermé.

— Non ! mon ami, non ! je me tais, je ne dis rien. Et de grosses larmes descendaient le long de ses joues dans les ruches de sa collerette.

Il était midi. Le soleil brillait sur la campagne, couverte de blés jaunes. Tout au loin, la bâche d'une voiture glissait lentement. Une torpeur s'étalait dans l'air — pas un cri d'oiseau, pas un bourdonnement d'insecte. Gorju s'était coupé une badine, et en raclait l'écorce. Mme Castillon ne relevait pas la tête.

Elle songeait, la pauvre femme, à la vanité de ses sacrifices, les dettes qu'elle avait soldées, ses engagements d'avenir, sa réputation perdue. Au lieu de se plaindre elle lui rappela les premiers temps de leur amour, quand elle allait, toutes les nuits, le rejoindre dans la grange ; — si bien qu'une fois son mari croyant à un voleur, avait lâché par la fenêtre un coup de pistolet. La balle était encore dans le mur. — Du moment que je t'ai connu, tu m'as semblé beau comme un prince. J'aime tes yeux, ta voix, ta démarche, ton odeur ! Elle ajouta plus bas : — Je suis en folie de ta personne !

Il souriait, flatté dans son orgueil.

Elle le prit à deux mains par les flancs, — et la tête renversée, comme en adoration.

— Mon cher coeur ! mon cher amour ! mon âme ! ma vie ! voyons ! parle ! que veux-tu ? — est-ce de l'argent ? on en trouvera. J'ai eu tort ! je t'ennuyais ! pardon ! et commande-toi des habits chez le tailleur, bois du champagne, fais la noce ! je te permets tout, — tout ! — Elle murmura dans un effort suprême : jusqu'à elle !... pourvu que tu reviennes à moi !

Il se pencha sur sa bouche, un bras autour de ses reins, pour l'empêcher de tomber ; — et elle balbutiait : — Cher coeur ! cher amour ! comme tu es beau ! mon Dieu, que tu es beau !

Pécuchet immobile, et la terre du fossé à la hauteur de son menton, les regardait, en haletant.

— Pas de faiblesse ! dit Gorju. Je n'aurais qu'à manquer la diligence ! on prépare un fameux coup de chien ; j'en suis ! — Donne-moi dix sous, pour que je paye un gloria au conducteur.

Elle tira cinq francs de sa bourse. — Tu me les rendras bientôt. Aie un peu de patience ! Depuis le temps qu'il est paralysé ! songe donc ! — Et si tu voulais nous irions à la chapelle de la Croix-Janval — et là, mon amour, je jurerais devant la sainte Vierge, de t'épouser, dès qu'il sera mort !

— Eh ! il ne meurt jamais, ton mari !

Gorju avait tourné les talons. Elle le rattrapa ; — et se cramponnant à ses épaules :

— Laisse-moi partir avec toi ! je serai ta domestique ! Tu as besoin de quelqu'un. Mais ne t'en va pas ! ne me quitte pas ! La mort plutôt ! Tue-moi !

Elle se traînait à ses genoux, tâchant de saisir ses mains pour les baiser ; son bonnet tomba, son peigne ensuite, et ses cheveux courts s'éparpillèrent. Ils étaient blancs sous les oreilles — et comme elle le regardait de bas en haut, toute sanglotante, avec ses paupières rouges et ses lèvres tuméfiées, une exaspération le prit, il la repoussa.

— Arrière la vieille ! Bonsoir !

Quand elle se fut relevée, elle arracha la croix d'or, qui pendait à son cou — et la jetant vers lui :

— Tiens ! canaille !

Gorju s'éloignait, — en tapant avec sa badine les feuilles des arbres.

Mme Castillon ne pleurait pas. La mâchoire ouverte et les prunelles éteintes elle resta sans faire un mouvement, — pétrifiée dans son désespoir, — n'étant plus un être, — mais une chose en ruines.

Ce qu'il venait de surprendre fut pour Pécuchet comme la découverte d'un monde — tout un monde ! — qui avait des lueurs éblouissantes, des floraisons désordonnées, des océans, des tempêtes, des trésors — et des abîmes d'une profondeur infinie ; — un effroi s'en dégageait ; qu'importe ! il rêva l'amour, ambitionnait de le sentir comme elle, de l'inspirer comme lui.

Pourtant, il exérait Gorju — et, au corps de garde, avait eu peine à ne pas le trahir.

L'amant de Mme Castillon l'humiliait par sa taille mince, ses accroche-cœurs égaux, sa barbe floconneuse, un air de conquérant ; — tandis que sa chevelure — à lui — se collait sur son crâne comme une perruque mouillée, son torse dans sa houppelande ressemblait à un traversin, deux canines manquaient, et sa physionomie était sévère. Il trouvait le ciel injuste, se sentait comme déshérité, et son ami ne l'aimait plus. Bouvard l'abandonnait tous les soirs.

Après la mort de sa femme, rien ne l'eût empêché d'en prendre une autre — et qui maintenant le dorloterait, soignerait sa maison. Il était trop vieux pour y songer !

Mais Bouvard se considéra dans la glace. Ses pommettes gardaient leurs couleurs, ses cheveux frisaient comme autrefois ; pas une dent n'avait bougé ; — et à l'idée qu'il pouvait plaire, il eut un retour de jeunesse ; Mme Bordin surgit dans sa mémoire. — Elle lui avait fait des avances, la première fois lors de l'incendie des meules, la seconde à leur dîner, puis dans le muséum, pendant la déclamation, et dernièrement, elle était venue sans rancune, trois dimanches de suite. Il alla donc chez elle, et y retourna, se promettant de la séduire.

Depuis le jour où Pécuchet avait observé la petite bonne tirant de l'eau il lui parlait plus souvent ; — et soit qu'elle balayât le corridor, ou qu'elle étendit du linge, ou qu'elle tournât les casseroles, il ne pouvait se rassasier du bonheur de la voir, — surpris lui-même de ses émotions, comme dans l'adolescence. Il en avait les fièvres et les langueurs, — et était persécuté par le souvenir de Mme Castillon, étreignant Gorju.

Il questionna Bouvard sur la manière dont les libertins s'y prennent pour avoir des femmes.

— On leur fait des cadeaux ! on les régale au restaurant.

— Très bien ! Mais ensuite ?

— Il y en a qui feignent de s'évanouir, pour qu'on les porte sur un canapé, d'autres laissent tomber par terre leur mouchoir. Les meilleures vous donnent un rendez-vous, franchement. Et Bouvard se répandit en descriptions, qui incendièrent l'imagination de Pécuchet, comme des gravures obscènes. La première règle, c'est de ne pas croire à ce qu'elles disent. J'en ai connu, qui sous l'apparence de Saintes, étaient de véritables Messalines ! Avant tout, il faut être hardi !

Mais la hardiesse ne se commande pas. Pécuchet, quotidiennement ajournait sa décision, était d'ailleurs intimidé par la présence de Germaine.

Espérant qu'elle demanderait son compte, il en exigea un surcroît de besogne, notait les fois qu'elle était grise, remarquait tout haut, sa malpropreté, sa paresse, et fit si bien qu'on la renvoya.

Alors Pécuchet fut libre !

Avec quelle impatience, il attendait la sortie de Bouvard ! Quel battement de coeur, dès que la porte était refermée !

Mélie travaillait sur un guéridon, près de la fenêtre, à la clarté d'une chandelle. De temps à autre, elle cassait son fil avec ses dents, puis clignait les yeux, pour l'ajuster dans la fente de l'aiguille.

D'abord, il voulut savoir quels hommes lui plaisaient. Étaient-ce, par exemple, ceux du genre de Bouvard ? Pas du tout ; elle préférait les maigres. Il osa lui demander si elle avait eu des amoureux ? — Jamais !

Puis, se rapprochant, il contemplait son nez fin, sa bouche étroite, le tour de sa figure. Il lui adressa des compliments et l'exhortait à la sagesse.

En se penchant sur elle, il apercevait dans son corsage des formes blanches d'où émanait une tiède senteur, qui lui chauffait la joue. Un soir, il toucha des lèvres les cheveux follets de sa nuque, et il en ressentit un ébranlement jusqu'à la moelle des os. Une autre fois, il la baisa sous le menton, en se retenant de ne pas mordre sa chair, tant elle était savoureuse. Elle lui rendit son baiser. L'appartement tourna. Il n'y voyait plus.

Il lui fit cadeau d'une paire de bottines, et la régalaient souvent d'un verre d'anisette.

Pour lui éviter du mal, il se levait de bonne heure, cassait le bois, allumait le feu, poussait l'attention jusqu'à nettoyer les chaussures de Bouvard.

Mélie ne s'évanouit pas, ne laissa pas tomber son mouchoir et Pécuchet ne savait à quoi se résoudre, son désir augmentant par la peur de le satisfaire.

Bouvard faisait assidûment la cour à Mme Bordin.

Elle le recevait, un peu sanglée dans sa robe de soie gorge-pigeon qui craquait comme le harnais d'un cheval, tout en maniant par contenance sa longue chaîne d'or.

Leurs dialogues roulaient sur les gens de Chavignolles, ou défunt son mari, autrefois huissier à Livarot.

Puis, elle s'informa du passé de Bouvard, curieuse de connaître ses farces de jeune homme, sa fortune incidemment, par quels intérêts il était lié à Pécuchet ?

Il admirait la tenue de sa maison, et quand il dînait chez elle, la netteté du service, l'excellence de la table. Une suite de plats, d'une saveur profonde, que coupait à intervalles égaux un vieux pommard, les menait jusqu'au dessert où ils étaient fort longtemps à prendre le café ; — et Mme Bordin, en dilatant les narines, trempait dans la soucoupe sa lèvre charnue, ombrée légèrement d'un duvet noir.

Un jour, elle apparut décolletée. Ses épaules fascinèrent Bouvard. Comme il était sur une petite chaise devant elle, il se mit à lui passer les deux mains le long des bras. La veuve se fâcha. Il ne recommença plus mais il se figurait des rondeurs d'une amplitude et d'une consistance merveilleuses.

Un soir, que la cuisine de Mélie l'avait dégoûté, il eut une joie en entrant dans le salon de Mme Bordin. C'est là qu'il aurait fallu vivre !

Le globe de la lampe, couvert d'un papier rose, épandait une lumière tranquille. Elle était assise auprès du feu ; et son pied passait le bord de sa robe. Dès les premiers mots, l'entretien tomba.

Cependant, elle le regardait, les cils à demi fermés, d'une manière langoureuse, avec obstination.

Bouvard n'y tint plus ! — et s'agenouillant sur le parquet, il bredouilla : — Je vous aime ! Marions-nous !

Mme Bordin respira fortement ; puis, d'un air ingénu, dit qu'il plaisantait, sans doute, on allait se moquer, ce n'était pas raisonnable. Cette déclaration l'étourdissait.

Bouvard objecta qu'ils n'avaient besoin du consentement de personne. Qui vous arrête ? est-ce le trousseau ? Notre linge a une marque pareille, un B ! nous unissons nos majuscules.

L'argument lui plut. Mais une affaire majeure l'empêchait de se décider avant la fin du mois. Et Bouvard gémit.

Elle eut la délicatesse de le reconduire, — escortée de Marianne, qui portait un falot.

Les deux amis s'étaient caché leur passion.

Pécuchet comptait voiler toujours son intrigue avec la bonne. Si Bouvard s'y opposait il l'emmènerait vers d'autres lieux, fût-ce en Algérie, où l'existence n'est pas chère ! Mais rarement il formait de ces hypothèses, plein de son amour, sans penser aux conséquences.

Bouvard projetait de faire du muséum la chambre conjugale, à moins que

Pécuchet ne s'y refusât ; alors il habiterait le domicile de son épouse.

Un après-midi de la semaine suivante, — c'était chez elle dans son jardin ; les bourgeons commençaient à s'ouvrir ; et il y avait, entre les nuées, de grands espaces bleus, — elle se baissa pour cueillir des violettes, et dit, en les présentant :

— Saluez Mme Bouvard !

— Comment ! Est-ce vrai ?

— Parfaitement vrai.

Il voulut la saisir dans ses bras, elle le repoussa. Quel homme ! — puis devenue sérieuse, l'avertit que bientôt, elle lui demanderait une faveur.

— Je vous l'accorde !

Ils fixèrent la signature de leur contrat à jeudi prochain.

Personne jusqu'au dernier moment n'en devait rien savoir.

— Convenu !

Et il sortit les yeux au ciel, léger comme un chevreuil.

Pécuchet le matin du même jour s'était promis de mourir, s'il n'obtenait pas les faveurs de sa bonne — et il l'avait accompagnée dans la cave, espérant que les ténèbres lui donneraient de l'audace.

Plusieurs fois, elle avait voulu s'en aller ; mais il la retenait pour compter les bouteilles, choisir des lattes, ou voir le fond des tonneaux ; cela durait depuis longtemps.

Elle se trouvait en face de lui, sous la lumière du soupirail, droite, les paupières basses, le coin de la bouche un peu relevé.

— M'aimes-tu ? dit brusquement Pécuchet.

— Oui ! je vous aime.

— Eh bien, alors, prouve-le-moi !

Et l'enveloppant du bras gauche, il commença, de l'autre main, à dégrafer son corset.

— Vous allez me faire du mal ?

— Non ! mon petit ange ! N'aie pas peur !

— Si M. Bouvard...

— Je ne lui dirai rien ! Sois tranquille !

Un tas de fagots se trouvait derrière. Elle s'y laissa tomber, les seins hors de la chemise, la tête renversée ; — puis se cacha la figure sous un bras — et un autre eût compris qu'elle ne manquait pas d'expérience.

Bouvard, bientôt, arriva pour dîner.

Le repas se fit en silence, chacun ayant peur de se trahir. Mélie les servait impassible, comme d'habitude. Pécuchet tournait les yeux, pour éviter les siens, tandis que Bouvard considérant les murs, songeait à des améliorations.

Huit jours après, le jeudi, il rentra furieux.

— La sacrée garce !

— Qui donc ?

— Mme Bordin.

Et il conta qu'il avait poussé la démence jusqu'à vouloir en faire sa femme. Mais tout était fini, depuis un quart d'heure, chez Marescot.

Elle avait prétendu recevoir en dot les Écalles, dont il ne pouvait disposer — l'ayant comme la ferme, soldée en partie avec l'argent d'un autre.

— Effectivement ! dit Pécuchet.

— Et moi ! qui ai eu la bêtise de lui promettre une faveur, à son choix ! C'était celle-là ! j'y ai mis de l'entêtement ; si elle m'aimait, elle m'eût cédé ! La veuve, au contraire s'était emportée en injures, avait dénigré son physique, sa bedaine. Ma bedaine ! je te demande un peu.

Pécuchet cependant était sorti plusieurs fois, marchait les jambes écartées.

— Tu souffres ? dit Bouvard.

— Oh ! — oui ! je souffre !

Et ayant fermé la porte, Pécuchet après beaucoup d'hésitations, confessa qu'il venait de se découvrir une maladie secrète.

— Toi ?

— Moi-même !

— Ah ! mon pauvre garçon ! qui te l'a donnée ?

Il devint encore plus rouge, et dit d'une voix encore plus basse :

— Ce ne peut être que Mélie !

Bouvard en demeura stupéfait.

La première chose était de renvoyer la jeune personne.

Elle protesta d'un air candide.

Le cas de Pécuchet était grave, pourtant ; mais honteux de sa turpitude, il n'osait voir le médecin.

Bouvard imagina de recourir à Barberou.

Ils lui adressèrent le détail de la maladie, pour le montrer à un docteur qui la soignerait par correspondance. Barberou y mit du zèle, persuadé qu'elle concernait Bouvard, et l'appela vieux roquentin, tout en le félicitant.

— À mon âge ! disait Pécuchet n'est-ce pas lugubre ! Mais pourquoi m'a-t-elle fait ça !

— Tu lui plaisais.

— Elle aurait dû me prévenir.

— Est-ce que la passion raisonne ! Et Bouvard se plaignait de Mme Bordin.

Souvent, il l'avait surprise arrêtée devant les Écalles, dans la compagnie de Marescot, en conférence avec Germaine, — tant de manoeuvres pour un peu de terre !

— Elle est avare ! Voilà l'explication !

Ils ruminaient ainsi leur mécompte, dans la petite salle, au coin du feu, Pécuchet, tout en avalant ses remèdes, Bouvard en fumant des pipes — et ils dissertaient sur les femmes.

— Étrange besoin, est-ce un besoin ? — Elles poussent au crime, à l'héroïsme, et à l'abrutissement ! L'enfer sous un jupon, le paradis dans un baiser — ramage de tourterelle, ondulations de serpent, griffe de chat ; — perfidie de la mer, variété de la lune — ils dirent tous les lieux communs qu'elles ont fait répandre.

C'était le désir d'en avoir qui avait suspendu leur amitié. Un remords les prit. — Plus de femmes, n'est-ce pas ? Vivons sans elles ! — Et ils s'embrassèrent avec attendrissement.

Il fallait réagir ! — et Bouvard, après la guérison de Pécuchet, estima que l'hydrothérapie leur serait avantageuse.

Germaine, revenue dès le départ de l'autre, charriait tous les matins, la baignoire dans le corridor.

Les deux bonshommes, nus comme des sauvages, se lançaient de grands seaux d'eau ; — puis ils couraient pour rejoindre leurs chambres. — On les vit par la claire-voie ; — et des personnes furent scandalisées.

CHAPITRE VIII

Satisfaits de leur régime, ils voulurent s'améliorer le tempérament par de la gymnastique.

Et ayant pris le manuel d'Amoros, ils en parcoururent l'atlas.

Tous ces jeunes garçons, accroupis, renversés, debout, pliant les jambes, écartant les bras, montrant le poing, soulevant des fardeaux, chevauchant des poutres, grimpant à des échelles, cabriolant sur des trapèzes, un tel déploiement de force et d'agilité excita leur envie.

Cependant, ils étaient contristés par les splendeurs du gymnase, décrites dans la préface. Car jamais ils ne pourraient se procurer un vestibule pour les équipages, un hippodrome pour les courses, un bassin pour la natation, ni une montagne de gloire, colline artificielle, ayant trente-deux mètres de hauteur.

Un cheval de voltige en bois avec le rembourrage eût été dispendieux, ils y renoncèrent ; le tilleul abattu dans le jardin leur servit de mât horizontal ; et quand ils furent habiles à le parcourir d'un bout à l'autre, pour en avoir un vertical, ils replantèrent une poutrelle des contre-espaliers. Pécuchet gravit jusqu'en haut. Bouvard glissait, retombait toujours, finalement, y renonça.

Les bâtons orthosomatiques lui plurent davantage, c'est-à-dire deux manches à balai reliés par deux cordes dont la première se passe sous les aisselles, la seconde sur les poignets — et pendant des heures il gardait cet appareil, le menton levé, la poitrine en avant, les coudes le long du corps.

À défaut d'haltères, le charron leur tourna quatre morceaux de frêne qui ressemblaient à des pains de sucre, se terminant en goulot de bouteille. On doit porter ces massues à droite, à gauche, par devant, par derrière ; mais trop lourdes, elles échappaient de leurs doigts, au risque de leur broyer les jambes. N'importe, ils s'acharnèrent aux mils persanes et même craignant qu'elles n'éclatassent, tous les soirs, ils les frottaient avec de la cire et un morceau de drap.

Ensuite, ils recherchèrent des fossés. Quand ils en avaient trouvé un à leur convenance, ils appuyaient au milieu une longue perche, s'élançaient du pied gauche, atteignaient l'autre bord, puis recommençaient. La campagne étant plate, on les apercevait au loin ; — et les villageois se demandaient quelles étaient ces deux choses extraordinaires, bondissant à l'horizon.

L'automne venu, ils se mirent à la gymnastique de chambre ; elle les ennuya. Que n'avaient-ils le trémoissoir ou fauteuil de poste imaginé sous Louis XIV par l'abbé de Saint-Pierre ! Comment était-ce construit ? où se renseigner ? Dumouchel ne daigna pas même leur répondre !

Alors, ils établirent dans le fournil une bascule brachiale. Sur deux poulies vissées au plafond passait une corde, tenant une traverse à chaque bout. Sitôt qu'ils l'avaient prise, l'un poussait la terre de ses orteils, l'autre baissait les bras jusqu'au niveau du sol ; le premier, par sa pesanteur, attirait le second, qui lâchant un peu la cordelette, montait à son tour ; en moins de cinq minutes leurs membres dégouttelaient de sueur.

Pour suivre les prescriptions du manuel, ils tâchèrent de devenir ambidextres, jusqu'à se priver de la main droite, temporairement. Ils firent plus : Amoros indique les pièces de vers qu'il faut chanter dans les manoeuvres — et Bouvard et Pécuchet, en marchant, répétaient l'hymne n° 9 :

Un roi, un roi juste est un bien sur la terre.

Quand ils se battaient les pectoraux : Amis, la couronne et la gloire, etc. Au pas de course :

À nous l'animal timide !

Atteignons le cerf rapide !

Oui ! nous vaincrons !

Courons ! courons ! courons !

Et plus haletants que des chiens, ils s'animaient au bruit de leurs voix.

Un côté de la gymnastique les exaltait : son emploi comme moyen de sauvetage.

Mais il aurait fallu des enfants, pour apprendre à les porter dans des sacs ; — et ils prièrent le maître d'école de leur en fournir quelques-uns. Petit objecta que les familles se fâcheraient. Ils se rabattirent sur les secours aux blessés. L'un feignait d'être évanoui ; et l'autre le charriait dans une brouette, avec toutes sortes de précautions.

Quant aux escalades militaires, l'auteur préconise l'échelle de Bois-Rosé, ainsi nommée du capitaine qui surprit Fécamp autrefois, en montant par la falaise.

D'après la gravure du livre, ils garnirent de bâtonnets un câble, et l'attachèrent sous le hangar.

Dès qu'on a enfourché le premier bâton, et saisi le troisième, on jette ses jambes en dehors, pour que le deuxième qui était tout à l'heure contre la poitrine se trouve juste sous les cuisses. On se redresse, on empoigne le quatrième et l'on continue. — Malgré de prodigieux déhanchements, il leur fut impossible d'atteindre le deuxième échelon.

Peut-être a-t-on moins de mal en s'accrochant aux pierres avec les mains, comme firent les soldats de Bonaparte à l'attaque du Fort-Chambray ? — et pour vous rendre capable d'une telle action, Amoros possède une tour dans son établissement.

Le mur en ruines pouvait la remplacer. Ils en tentèrent l'assaut.

Mais Bouvard, ayant retiré trop vite son pied d'un trou, eut peur et fut pris d'étourdissement.

Pécuchet en accusa leur méthode : ils avaient négligé ce qui concerne les phalanges — si bien qu'ils devaient se remettre aux principes.

Ses exhortations furent vaines ; — et dans sa présomption, il aborda les échasses.

La nature semblait l'y avoir destiné ; car il employa tout de suite le grand modèle, ayant des palettes à quatre pieds du sol ; — et tranquille là-dessus, il arpentait le jardin, pareil à une gigantesque cigogne qui se fût promenée.

Bouvard à la fenêtre le vit tituber — puis s'abattre d'un bloc sur les haricots, dont les rames en se fracassant amortirent sa chute. On le ramassa couvert de terreau, les narines saignantes, livide — et il croyait s'être donné un effort.

Décidément la gymnastique ne convenait point à des hommes de leur âge ; ils l'abandonnèrent, n'osaient plus se mouvoir par crainte des accidents, et restaient tout le long du jour assis dans le muséum, à rêver d'autres occupations.

Ce changement d'habitudes influa sur la santé de Bouvard. Il devint très lourd, soufflait après ses repas comme un cachalot, voulut se faire maigrir, mangea moins, et s'affaiblit.

Pécuchet également, se sentait miné, avait des démangeaisons à la peau et des plaques dans la gorge. Ça ne va pas, disaient-ils, ça ne va pas.

Bouvard imagina d'aller choisir à l'auberge quelques bouteilles de vin d'Espagne, afin de se remonter la machine.

Comme il en sortait, le clerc de Marescot et trois hommes apportaient à Beljambe une grande table de noyer ; Monsieur l'en remerciait beaucoup.

Elle s'était parfaitement conduite.

Bouvard connut ainsi la mode nouvelle des tables tournantes. Il en plaisanta le clerc.

Cependant par toute l'Europe, en Amérique, en Australie et dans les Indes, des millions de mortels passaient leur vie à faire tourner des tables ; — et on découvrait la manière de rendre les serins prophètes, de donner des concerts sans instruments, de correspondre aux moyens des escargots. La Presse offrant avec sérieux ces bourdes au public, le renforçait dans sa crédulité.

Les Esprits-frappeurs avaient débarqué au château de Faverges, de là s'étaient répandus dans le village — et le notaire principalement, les questionnait.

Choqué du scepticisme de Bouvard, il convia les deux amis à une soirée de tables tournantes.

Était-ce un piège ? Mme Bordin se trouverait là. Pécuchet, seul, s'y rendit.

Il y avait, comme assistants, le maire, le percepteur, le capitaine, d'autres bourgeois et leurs épouses, Mme Vaucorbeil, Mme Bordin effectivement, de plus, une ancienne sous-maîtresse de Mme Marescot, Mlle Laverrière, personne un peu louche avec des cheveux gris tombant en spirales sur les épaules, à la façon de 1830. Dans un fauteuil se tenait un cousin de Paris, costumé d'un habit bleu et l'air impertinent.

Les deux lampes de bronze, l'étagère de curiosités, des romances à vignette sur le piano, et des aquarelles minuscules dans des cadres exorbitants faisaient toujours l'étonnement de Chavignolles. Mais ce soir-là les yeux se portaient vers la table d'acajou. On l'éprouverait tout à l'heure, et elle avait l'importance des choses qui contiennent un mystère.

Douze invités prirent place autour d'elle, les mains étendues, les petits doigts se touchant. On n'entendait que le battement de la pendule. Les visages dénotaient une attention profonde.

Au bout de dix minutes, plusieurs se plaignirent de fourmillements dans les bras. Pécuchet était incommodé.

— Vous poussez ! dit le capitaine à Foureau.

— Pas du tout !

— Si fait !

— Ah ! monsieur !

Le notaire les calma.

À force de tendre l'oreille, on crut distinguer des craquements de bois. — Illusion ! — Rien ne bougeait.

L'autre jour, quand les familles Aubert et Lormeau étaient venues de

Lisieux et qu'on avait emprunté exprès la table de Beljambe, tout avait si bien marché ! Mais celle-là aujourd'hui montrait un entêtement !...

Pourquoi ?

Le tapis sans doute la contrariait ; — et on passa dans la salle à manger.

Le meuble choisi fut un large guéridon, où s'installèrent Pécuchet, Girbal, Mme Marescot et son cousin M. Alfred.

Le guéridon, qui avait des roulettes, glissa vers la droite ; les opérateurs sans déranger leurs doigts suivirent son mouvement, et de lui-même il fit encore deux tours. On fut stupéfait.

Alors M. Alfred articula d'une voix haute :

— Esprit, comment trouves-tu ma cousine ?

Le guéridon en oscillant avec lenteur frappa neuf coups. D'après une pancarte, où le nombre des coups se traduisait par des lettres, cela signifiait — charmante. Des bravos éclatèrent.

Puis Marescot, taquinant Mme Bordin, somma l'esprit de déclarer l'âge exact qu'elle avait.

Le pied du guéridon retomba cinq fois.

— Comment ? cinq ans ! s'écria Girbal.

— Les dizaines ne comptent pas reprit Foureau.

La veuve sourit, intérieurement vexée.

Les réponses aux autres questions manquèrent, tant l'alphabet était compliqué. Mieux valait la Planchette, moyen expéditif et dont Mlle Laverrière s'était servie pour noter sur un album les communications directes de Louis XII, Clémence Isaure, Franklin, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, etc. Ces mécaniques se vendaient rue d'Aumale ; M. Alfred en promit une, puis s'adressant à la sous-maîtresse :

— Mais pour le quart d'heure, un peu de piano, n'est-ce pas ? une mazurka !

Deux accords plaqués vibrèrent. Il prit sa cousine à la taille, disparut avec elle, revint. On était rafraîchi par le vent de la robe qui frôlait les portes en passant. Elle se renversait la tête, il arrondissait son bras. On admirait la grâce de l'une, l'air fringant de l'autre ; et sans attendre les petits fours, Pécuchet se retira, ébahi de la soirée.

Il eut beau répéter : — Mais j'ai vu ! Bouvard niait les faits et néanmoins consentit à expérimenter, lui-même.

Pendant quinze jours, ils passèrent leurs après-midi en face l'un de l'autre les mains sur une table, puis sur un chapeau, sur une corbeille, sur des assiettes. Tous ces objets demeurèrent immobiles.

Le phénomène des tables tournantes n'en est pas moins certain. Le vulgaire l'attribue à des Esprits, Faraday au prolongement de l'action nerveuse, Chevreul à l'inconscience des efforts, ou peut-être, comme admet Séguin, se dégage-t-il de l'assemblage des personnes une impulsion, un courant magnétique ?

Cette hypothèse fit rêver Pécuchet. Il prit dans sa bibliothèque le Guide du magnétiseur par Montacabère, le relut attentivement, et initia

Bouvard à la théorie.

Tous les corps animés reçoivent et communiquent l'influence des astres, propriété analogue à la vertu de l'aimant. En dirigeant cette force on peut guérir les malades, voilà le principe. La science, depuis Mesmer, s'est développée ; — mais il importe toujours de verser le fluide et de faire des passes qui, premièrement, doivent endormir.

— Eh bien, endors-moi dit Bouvard.

— Impossible répliqua Pécuchet pour subir l'action magnétique et pour la transmettre la foi est indispensable. Puis considérant Bouvard :

— Ah ! quel dommage !

— Comment ?

— Oui, si tu voulais, avec un peu de pratique, il n'y aurait pas de magnétiseur comme toi !

Car il possédait tout ce qu'il faut : l'abord prévenant, une constitution robuste — et un moral solide.

Cette faculté qu'on venait de lui découvrir flatta Bouvard. Il se plongea sournoisement dans Montacabère.

Puis comme Germaine avait des bourdonnements d'oreilles, qui l'assourdisaient, il dit un soir d'un ton négligé : Si on essayait du magnétisme ? Elle ne s'y refusa pas. Il s'assit devant elle, lui prit les deux pouces dans ses mains, — et la regarda fixement, comme s'il n'eût fait autre chose de toute sa vie.

La bonne femme, une chaufferette sous les talons, commença par fléchir le cou ; ses yeux se fermèrent, et tout doucement, elle se mit à ronfler.

Au bout d'une heure qu'ils la contemplaient Pécuchet dit à voix basse :

Que sentez-vous ?

Elle se réveilla.

Plus tard sans doute la lucidité viendrait.

Ce succès les enhardit ; — et reprenant avec aplomb l'exercice de la médecine ils soignèrent Chamberlan, le bedeau, pour ses douleurs intercostales, Migraine, le maçon, affecté d'une névrose de l'estomac, la mère Varin, dont l'encéphaloïde sous la clavicule exigeait pour se nourrir des emplâtres de viande, un goutteux, le père Lemoine, qui se traînait au bord des cabarets, un phtisique, un hémiplégique, bien d'autres. Ils traitèrent aussi des coryzas et des engelures.

Après l'exploration de la maladie, ils s'interrogeaient du regard pour savoir quelles passes employer, si elles devaient être à grands ou à petits courants, ascendantes ou descendantes, longitudinales, transversales, biditiges, triditiges ou même quinditiges. Quand l'un en avait trop, l'autre le remplaçait. Puis revenus chez eux, ils notaient les observations, sur le journal du traitement.

Leurs manières onctueuses captèrent le monde. Cependant on préférerait

Bouvard ; et sa réputation parvint jusqu'à Falaise quand il eut guéri la Barbée, la fille du père Barbey, un ancien capitaine au long cours.

Elle sentait comme un clou à l'occiput, parlait d'une voix rauque, restait souvent plusieurs jours sans manger, puis dévorait du plâtre ou du charbon. Ses crises nerveuses débutant par des sanglots se terminaient dans un flux de larmes ; et on avait pratiqué tous les remèdes, depuis les tisanes jusqu'aux moxas — si bien que par lassitude, elle accepta les offres de Bouvard.

Quand il eut congédié la servante et poussé les verrous, il se mit à frictionner son abdomen en appuyant sur la place des ovaires — un bien-être se manifesta par des soupirs et des bâillements. Il lui posa un doigt entre les sourcils au haut du nez — tout à coup elle devint inerte. Si on levait ses bras, ils retombaient ; sa tête garda les attitudes qu'il voulut — et les paupières à demi closes, en vibrant d'un mouvement spasmodique, laissaient apercevoir les globes des yeux, qui roulaient avec lenteur ; ils se fixèrent dans les angles, convulsés.

Bouvard lui demanda si elle souffrait ; elle répondit que non ; ce qu'elle éprouvait maintenant ? elle distinguait l'intérieur de son corps.

— Qu'y voyez-vous ?

— Un ver !

— Que faut-il pour le tuer ?

Son front se plissa : — Je cherche, — je ne peux pas ; je ne peux pas.

À la deuxième séance, elle se prescrivit un bouillon d'orties, à la troisième de l'herbe au chat. Les crises s'atténuèrent, disparurent. C'était vraiment comme un miracle.

L'addigitation nasale ne réussit point avec les autres ; et pour amener le somnambulisme ils projetèrent de construire un baquet mesmérien. — Déjà même Pécuchet avait recueilli de la limaille et nettoyé une vingtaine de bouteilles, quand un scrupule l'arrêta. Parmi les malades, il viendrait des personnes du sexe. — Et que ferons-nous s'il leur prend des accès d'érotisme furieux ?

Cela n'eût pas arrêté Bouvard ; mais à cause des potins et du chantage peut-être, mieux valait s'abstenir. Ils se contentèrent d'un harmonica et le portaient avec eux dans les maisons, ce qui réjouissait les enfants.

Un jour, que Migraine était plus mal, ils y recoururent. Les sons cristallins l'exaspérèrent ; mais Deleuze ordonne de ne pas s'effrayer des plaintes, la musique continua. Assez ! assez ! criait-il. — Un peu de patience répétait Bouvard. Pécuchet tapotait plus vite sur les lames de verre, et l'instrument vibrait, et le pauvre homme hurlait, quand le médecin parut attiré par le vacarme.

— Comment ! encore vous ! s'écria-t-il, furieux de les retrouver toujours chez ses clients. Ils expliquèrent leur moyen magnétique. Alors il tonna contre le magnétisme, un tas de jongleries, et dont les effets proviennent de l'imagination.

Cependant on magnétise des animaux. Montcabère l'affirme et M. Lafontaine est parvenu à magnétiser une lionne. Ils n'avaient pas de lionne. Le hasard leur offrit une autre bête.

Car le lendemain à six heures un valet de charrue vint leur dire qu'on les réclamait à la ferme, pour une vache désespérée.

Ils y coururent.

Les pommiers étaient en fleurs, et l'herbe dans la cour fumait sous le soleil levant. Au bord de la mare, à demi couverte d'un drap, une vache beuglait, grelottante des seaux d'eau qu'on lui jetait sur le corps ; — et démesurément gonflée, elle ressemblait à un hippopotame.

Sans doute, elle avait pris du venin en pâture dans les trèfles. Le père et la mère Gouy se désolaient — car le vétérinaire ne pouvait venir, et un charron qui savait des mots contre l'enflure ne voulait pas se déranger, mais ces messieurs dont la bibliothèque était célèbre devaient connaître un secret.

Ayant retroussé leurs manches, ils se placèrent, l'un devant les cornes, l'autre à la croupe — et avec de grands efforts intérieurs et une gesticulation frénétique ils écartaient les doigts, pour épandre sur l'animal des ruisseaux de fluide tandis que le fermier, son épouse, leur garçon et des voisins les regardaient presque effrayés.

Les gargouillements que l'on entendait dans le ventre de la vache provoquèrent des borborygmes au fond de leurs entrailles. Elle émit un vent. Pécuchet dit alors :

— C'est une porte ouverte à l'espérance ! un débouché, peut-être ?

Le débouché s'opéra ; l'espérance jaillit dans un paquet de matières jaunes éclatant avec la force d'un obus. Les coeurs se desserrèrent, la vache dégonfla. Une heure après, il n'y paraissait plus.

Ce n'était pas l'effet de l'imagination, certainement. Donc, le fluide contient une vertu particulière. Elle se laisse enfermer dans des objets, où on ira la prendre sans qu'elle se trouve affaiblie. Un tel moyen épargne les déplacements. Ils l'adoptèrent ; — et ils envoyaient à leurs pratiques, des jetons magnétisés, des mouchoirs magnétisés, de l'eau magnétisée, du pain magnétisé.

Puis continuant leurs études, ils abandonnèrent les passes pour le système de Puységur, qui remplace le magnétiseur par un vieil arbre, au tronc duquel une corde s'enroule.

Un poirier dans leur mesure semblait fait tout exprès. Ils le préparèrent en l'embrassant fortement à plusieurs reprises. Un banc fut établi en dessous. Leurs habitués s'y rangeaient ; et ils obtinrent des résultats si merveilleux que pour enfoncer Vaucorbeil ils le convièrent à une séance, avec les notables du pays.

Pas un n'y manqua.

Germaine les reçut dans la petite salle, en priant de faire excuse, ses maîtres allaient venir.

De temps à autre, on entendait un coup de sonnette. C'était les malades qu'elle introduisait ailleurs. Les invités se montraient du coude les fenêtres poussiéreuses, les taches sur les lambris, la peinture s'éraillant ; — et le jardin était lamentable ! Du bois mort partout ! — Deux bâtons, devant la brèche du mur, barraient le verger.

Pécuchet se présenta. — À vos ordres, messieurs ! et l'on vit au fond sous le poirier d'Édouin, plusieurs personnes assises.

Chamberlan, sans barbe, comme un prêtre, et en soutanelle de lasting avec une calotte de cuir, s'abandonnait à des frissons occasionnés par sa douleur intercostale ; Migraine, souffrant toujours de l'estomac, grimaçait près de lui. La mère Varin, pour cacher sa tumeur portait un châle à plusieurs tours. Le père Lemoine, pieds nus dans des savates, avait ses béquilles sous les jarrets — et la Barbée en costume des dimanches était pâle, extraordinairement.

De l'autre côté de l'arbre, on trouva d'autres personnes : une femme à figure d'albinos épongeait les glandes suppurantes de son cou. Le visage d'une petite fille disparaissait à moitié sous des lunettes bleues. Un vieillard dont une contracture déformait l'échine heurtait de ses mouvements involontaires Marcel, une espèce d'idiot, couvert d'une blouse en loques et d'un pantalon rapiécé. Son bec-de-lièvre mal recousu laissait voir ses incisives — et des linges embobelinaient sa joue, tuméfiée par une énorme fluxion.

Tous tenaient à la main une ficelle descendant de l'arbre ; — et des oiseaux chantaient, l'odeur du gazon attiédi se roulait dans l'air. Le soleil passait entre les branches. On marchait sur de la mousse.

Cependant les sujets, au lieu de dormir, écarquillaient leurs paupières.

— Jusqu'à présent, ce n'est pas drôle dit Foureau. — Commencez, je m'éloigne une minute. Et il revint, en fumant dans un Abd-el-kader, reste dernier de la porte aux pipes.

Pécuchet se rappela un excellent moyen de magnétisation. Il mit dans sa bouche tous les nez des malades et aspira leur haleine pour tirer à lui l'électricité — et en même temps, Bouvard étreignait l'arbre, dans le but d'accroître le fluide.

Le maçon interrompit ses hoquets, le bedeau fut moins agité, l'homme à la contracture ne bougea plus. — On pouvait maintenant s'approcher d'eux, leur faire subir toutes les épreuves.

Le médecin, avec sa lancette, piqua sous l'oreille Chamberlan, qui tressaillit un peu. La sensibilité chez les autres fut évidente. Le goutteux poussa un cri. Quant à la Barbée, elle souriait comme dans un rêve, et un filet de sang lui coulait sous la mâchoire. Foureau, pour l'éprouver lui-même, voulut saisir la lancette, et le Docteur l'ayant refusée, il pinça la malade fortement. Le Capitaine lui chatouilla les narines avec une plume, le Percepteur allait lui enfoncer une épingle sous la peau.

— Laissez-la donc dit Vaucorbeil rien d'étonnant, après tout ! une hystérique ! le diable y perdrait son latin !

— Celle-là dit Pécuchet, en désignant Victoire la femme scrofuleuse est un médecin ! elle reconnaît les affections et indique les remèdes.

Langlois brûlait de la consulter sur son catarrhe ; il n'osa ; — mais Coulon, plus brave, demanda quelque chose pour ses rhumatismes.

Pécuchet lui mit la main droite dans la main gauche de Victoire — et les cils toujours clos, les pommettes un peu rouges, les lèvres frémissantes, la somnambule, après avoir divagué, ordonna du Valum Becum.

Elle avait servi à Bayeux chez un apothicaire. Vaucorbeil en inféra qu'elle voulait dire de _l'album graecum _mot entrevu, peut-être, dans la pharmacie.

Puis il aborda le père Lemoine qui selon Bouvard percevait à travers les corps opaques.

C'était un ancien maître d'école tombé dans la crapule. Des cheveux blancs s'éparpillaient autour de sa figure ; — et adossé contre l'arbre, les paumes ouvertes, il dormait, en plein soleil, d'une façon majestueuse.

Le médecin attacha sur ses paupières une double cravate ; — et Bouvard lui présentant un journal dit impérieusement : — Lisez.

Il baissa le front, remua les muscles de sa face ; puis se renversa la tête, et finit par épeler : Cons-ti-tu-tionnel.

Mais avec de l'adresse on fait glisser tous les bandeaux !

Ces dénégations du médecin révoltaient Pécuchet. Il s'aventura jusqu'à prétendre que la Barbée pourrait décrire ce qui se passait actuellement dans sa propre maison.

— Soit répondit le docteur ; et ayant tiré sa montre : À quoi ma femme s'occupe-t-elle ?

La Barbée hésita longtemps — puis, d'un air maussade : — Hein ? quoi ? Ah ! j'y suis. Elle coud des rubans à un chapeau de paille.

Vaucorbeil arracha une feuille de son calepin, et écrivit un billet, que le clerc de Marescot s'empessa de porter.

La séance était finie. Les malades s'en allèrent.

Bouvard et Pécuchet en somme, n'avaient pas réussi. Cela tenait-il à la température, ou à l'odeur du tabac, ou au parapluie de l'abbé Jeufroy, qui avait une garniture de cuivre — métal contraire à l'émission fluide ?

Vaucorbeil haussa les épaules.

Cependant, il ne pouvait contester la bonne foi de MM. Deleuze, Bertrand, Morin, Jules Cloquet. Or, ces maîtres affirment que des somnambules ont prédit des événements, subi, sans douleur, des opérations cruelles.

L'abbé rapporta des histoires plus étonnantes. Un missionnaire a vu des brahmanes parcourir une voûte la tête en bas, le Grand-Lama au Thibet se fend les boyaux, pour rendre des oracles.

— Plaisantez-vous ? dit le médecin.

— Nullement.

— Allons donc ! Quelle farce !

Et la question se détournant chacun produisit des anecdotes.

— Moi dit l'épicier j'ai eu un chien qui était toujours malade quand le mois commençait par un vendredi.

— Nous étions quatorze enfants reprit le juge de paix. Je suis né un 14, mon mariage eut lieu un 14 — et le jour de ma fête tombe un 14 ! Expliquez-moi ça.

Beljambe avait rêvé, bien des fois, le nombre de voyageurs qu'il aurait le lendemain à son auberge. Et Petit conta le souper de Cazotte.

Le curé, alors, fit cette réflexion : — Pourquoi ne pas voir là dedans, tout simplement...

— Les démons, n'est-ce pas ? dit Vaucorbeil.

L'abbé, au lieu de répondre, eut un signe de tête.

Marescot parla de la Pythie de Delphes. — Sans aucun doute, des miasmes...

— Ah ! les miasmes, maintenant !

— Moi, j'admets un fluide reprit Bouvard.

— Nervoso-sidéral ajouta Pécuchet.

— Mais prouvez-le ! montrez-le ! votre fluide ! D'ailleurs les fluides sont démodés ; écoutez-moi.

Vaucorbeil alla plus loin, se mettre à l'ombre. Les bourgeois le suivirent. Si vous dites à un enfant : Je suis un loup, je vais te manger, il se figure que vous êtes un loup et il a peur ; c'est donc un rêve commandé par des paroles. De même le somnambule accepte les fantaisies que l'on voudra. Il se souvient et n'imagine pas, n'a que les sensations quand il croit penser. De cette manière des crimes sont suggérés et des gens vertueux, pourront se voir bêtes féroces, et devenir anthropophages.

On regarda Bouvard et Pécuchet. Leur science avait des périls pour la société.

Le clerc de Marescot reparut dans le jardin, en brandissant une lettre de Mme Vaucorbeil.

Le Docteur la décacheta, — pâlit — et enfin lut ces mots :

— Je couds des rubans à un chapeau de paille !

La stupéfaction empêcha de rire.

— Une coïncidence, parbleu ! Ça ne prouve rien. Et comme les deux magnétiseurs avaient un air de triomphe, il se retourna sous la porte pour leur dire :

— Ne continuez plus ! ce sont des amusements dangereux !

Le curé, en emmenant son bedeau, le tança vertement.

— Êtes-vous fou ? sans ma permission ! des manoeuvres défendues par l'Église !

Tout le monde venait de partir ; Bouvard et Pécuchet causaient sur le vigneau avec l'instituteur quand Marcel débusqua du verger, la mentonnière défaite, et il bredouillait :

— Guéri ! guéri ! Bons messieurs !

— Bien ! assez ! laisse-nous tranquilles !

— Ah bons messieurs ! je vous aime ! serviteur !

Petit, homme de progrès, avait trouvé l'explication du médecin terre à terre, bourgeoise. La Science est un monopole aux mains des Riches. Elle exclut le Peuple. À la vieille analyse du moyen âge, il est temps que succède une synthèse large et primesautière ! La Vérité doit s'obtenir par le Coeur — et se déclarant spiritiste, il indiqua plusieurs ouvrages, défectueux sans doute, mais qui étaient le signe d'une aurore.

Ils se les firent envoyer.

Le spiritisme pose en dogme l'amélioration fatale de notre espèce. La terre un jour deviendra le ciel ; et c'est pourquoi cette doctrine charmait l'instituteur. Sans être catholique, elle se réclame de saint Augustin et de saint Louis. Allan-Kardec publie même des fragments dictés par eux et qui sont au niveau des opinions contemporaines. Elle est pratique, bienfaisante, et nous révèle, comme le télescope, les mondes supérieurs.

Les Esprits, après la mort et dans l'Extase, y sont transportés. Mais quelquefois ils descendent sur notre globe, où ils font craquer les meubles, se mêlent à nos divertissements, goûtent les beautés de la Nature et les plaisirs des Arts.

Cependant, plusieurs d'entre nous possèdent une trompe aromale, c'est-à-dire derrière le crâne un long tuyau qui monte depuis les cheveux jusqu'aux planètes et nous permet de converser avec les esprits de Saturne ; — les choses intangibles n'en sont pas moins réelles, et de la terre aux astres, des astres à la terre, c'est un va-et-vient, une transmission, un échange continu.

Alors le coeur de Pécuchet se gonfla d'aspirations désordonnées — et quand la nuit était venue, Bouvard le surprenait à sa fenêtre contemplant ces espaces lumineux, qui sont peuplés d'esprits.

Swedenborg y a fait de grands voyages. Car en moins d'un an il a exploré

Vénus, Mars, Saturne et vingt-trois fois Jupiter. De plus, il a vu à Londres Jésus-Christ, il a vu saint Paul, il a vu saint Jean, il a vu Moïse, et en 1736, il a même vu le Jugement dernier.

Aussi nous donne-t-il des descriptions du ciel.

On y trouve des fleurs, des palais, des marchés et des églises absolument comme chez nous.

Les anges, hommes autrefois, couchent leurs pensées sur des feuillets, devisent des choses du ménage, ou bien de matières spirituelles ; et les emplois ecclésiastiques appartiennent à ceux, qui dans leur vie terrestre, ont cultivé l'Écriture sainte.

Quant à l'enfer, il est plein d'une odeur nauséabonde, avec des cahutes, des tas d'immondices, des personnes mal habillées.

Et Pécuchet s'abîmait l'intellect pour comprendre ce qu'il y a de beau dans ces révélations. Elles parurent à Bouvard le délire d'un imbécile.

Tout cela dépasse les bornes de la Nature ! Qui les connaît, cependant ?

Et ils se livrèrent aux réflexions suivantes.

Des bateleurs peuvent illusionner une foule ; un homme ayant des passions violentes en remuera d'autres ; mais comment la seule volonté agirait-elle sur de la matière inerte ? Un Bavarois, dit-on, mûrit les raisins ; M. Gervais a ranimé un héliotrope ; un plus fort à Toulouse écarte les nuages.

Faut-il admettre une substance intermédiaire entre le monde et nous ? L'od, un nouvel impondérable, une sorte d'électricité, n'est pas autre chose, peut-être ? Ses émissions expliquent la lueur que les magnétisés croient voir, les feux errants des cimetières, la forme des fantômes.

Ces images ne seraient donc pas une illusion, et les dons extraordinaires des Possédés pareils à ceux des somnambules, auraient une cause physique ?

Quelle qu'en soit l'origine, il y a une essence, un agent secret et universel. Si nous pouvions le tenir, on n'aurait pas besoin de la force de la durée. Ce qui demande des siècles se développerait en une minute ; tout miracle serait praticable et l'univers à notre disposition.

La magie provenait de cette convoitise éternelle de l'esprit humain. On a, sans doute, exagéré sa valeur ; mais elle n'est pas un mensonge. Des Orientaux qui la connaissent exécutent des prodiges ; tous les voyageurs le déclarent ; et au Palais-Royal M. Dupotet trouble avec son doigt, l'aiguille aimantée.

Comment devenir magicien ? Cette idée leur parut folle d'abord, mais elle revint, les tourmenta, et ils y cédèrent, tout en affectant d'en rire.

Un régime préparatoire est indispensable.

Afin de mieux s'exalter, ils vivaient la nuit, jeûnaient, et voulant faire de Germaine un médium plus délicat rationnèrent sa nourriture. Elle se dédommageait sur la boisson, et but tant d'eau-de-vie, qu'elle acheva de s'alcooliser. Leurs promenades dans le corridor la réveillaient. Elle confondait le bruit de leurs pas avec ses bourdonnements d'oreilles et les voix imaginaires qu'elle entendait sortir des murs. Un jour qu'elle avait mis le matin un carrelot dans la cave, elle eut peur en le voyant tout couvert de feu, se trouva désormais plus mal ; et finit par croire qu'ils lui avaient jeté un sort.

Espérant gagner des visions, ils se comprimèrent la nuque, réciproquement, ils se firent des sachets de belladone, enfin ils adoptèrent la boîte magique ; une petite boîte, d'où s'élève un champignon hérissé de clous et que l'on garde sur le coeur par le moyen d'un ruban attaché à la poitrine. Tout rata. Mais ils pouvaient employer le cercle de Dupotet.

Pécuchet avec du charbon barbouilla sur le sol une rondelle noire, afin d'y enclorre les esprits animaux que devaient aider les esprits ambiants — et heureux de dominer Bouvard, il lui dit d'un air pontifical : Je te défie de le franchir !

Bouvard considéra cette place ronde. Bientôt son coeur battit, ses yeux se troublaient. Ah ! finissons ! Et il sauta par-dessus pour fuir un malaise inexprimable.

Pécuchet, dont l'exaltation allait croissant, voulut faire apparaître un mort.

Sous le Directoire, un homme rue de l'Échiquier montrait les victimes de la Terreur. Les exemples de Revenants sont innombrables. Que ce soit une apparence, qu'importe ! il s'agit de la produire.

Plus le défunt nous touche de près, mieux il accourt à notre appel ;

mais il n'avait aucune relique de sa famille, ni bague ni miniature, pas un cheveu, tandis que Bouvard était dans les conditions à évoquer son père — et comme il témoignait de la répugnance Pécuchet lui demanda : — Que crains-tu ?

— Moi ? Oh ! rien du tout ! Fais ce que tu voudras !

Ils soudoyèrent Chamberlan qui leur fournit en cachette une vieille tête de mort. Un couturier leur tailla deux houpelandes noires, avec un capuchon comme à la robe de moine. La voiture de Falaise leur apporta un long rouleau dans une enveloppe. Puis ils se mirent à l'oeuvre, l'un curieux de l'exécuter, l'autre ayant peur d'y croire.

Le muséum était tendu comme un catafalque. Trois flambeaux brûlaient au bord de la table poussée contre le mur sous le portrait du père Bouvard, que dominait la tête de mort. Ils avaient même fourré une chandelle dans l'intérieur du crâne ; — et des rayons se projetaient par les deux orbites.

Au milieu, sur une chaufferette, de l'encens fumait. Bouvard se tenait derrière — et Pécuchet, lui tournant le dos, jetait dans l'âtre des poignées de soufre.

Avant d'appeler un mort, il faut le consentement des démons. Or, ce jour-là étant un vendredi — jour qui appartient à Béchet, on devait s'occuper de Béchet premièrement. Bouvard ayant salué de droite et de gauche, fléchi le menton, et levé les bras, commença.

— Par Éthaniel, Amazin, Ischyros il avait oublié le reste. — Pécuchet bien vite souffla les mots, notés sur un carton.

— Ischyros, Athanatos, Adonai, Sadaï, Éloy, Messias la kyrielle était longue je te conjure, je t'obsèque, je t'ordonne, ô Béchet puis baissant la voix : Où es-tu Béchet ? Béchet ! Béchet ! Béchet !

Bouvard s'affaissa dans le fauteuil ; et il était bien aise de ne pas voir Béchet — un instinct lui reprochant sa tentative comme un sacrilège. Où était l'âme de son père ? Pouvait-elle l'entendre ? Si tout à coup, elle allait venir ?

Les rideaux se remuaient avec lenteur sous le vent qui entraît par un carreau fêlé ; — et les cierges balançaient des ombres sur le crâne de mort et sur la figure peinte. Une couleur terreuse les brunissait également. De la moisissure dévorait les pommettes, les yeux n'avaient plus de lumière. Mais une flamme brillait au-dessus, dans les trous de la tête vide. Elle semblait quelquefois prendre la place de l'autre, poser sur le collet de la redingote, avoir ses favoris ; — et la toile, à demi déclouée, oscillait, palpait.

Peu à peu, ils sentirent comme l'effleurement d'une haleine, l'approche d'un être impalpable. Des gouttes de sueur mouillaient le front de Pécuchet — et voilà que Bouvard se mit à claquer des dents, une crampe lui serrait l'épigastre, le plancher comme une onde fuyait sous ses talons, le soufre qui brûlait dans la cheminée se rabattit à grosses volutes, des chauves-souris en même temps tournoyaient, un cri s'éleva ; — qui était-ce ?

Et ils avaient sous leurs capuchons, des figures tellement décomposées, que leur effroi en redoublait — n'osant faire un geste, ni même parler — quand derrière la porte ils entendirent des gémissements, comme ceux d'une âme en peine.

Enfin, ils se hasardèrent.

C'était leur vieille bonne — qui les espionnant par une fente de la cloison, avait cru voir le Diable ; — et à genoux dans le corridor, elle multipliait les signes de croix.

Tout raisonnement fut inutile. Elle les quitta le soir même — ne voulant plus servir des gens pareils.

Germaine bavarda. Chamberlan perdit sa place ; — et il se forma contre eux une sourde coalition, entretenue par l'abbé Jeufroy, Mme Bordin, et Foureau.

Leur manière de vivre — qui n'était pas celle des autres — déplaisait. Ils devinrent suspects ; et même inspiraient une vague terreur.

Ce qui les ruina surtout dans l'opinion, ce fut le choix de leur domestique. À défaut d'un autre, ils avaient pris Marcel.

Son bec-de-lièvre, sa hideur et son baragouin écartaient de sa personne. Enfant abandonné, il avait grandi au hasard dans les champs et conservait de sa longue misère une faim irrassiable. Les bêtes mortes de maladie, du lard en pourriture, un chien écrasé, tout lui convenait, pourvu que le morceau fût gros ; — et il était doux comme un mouton ; mais entièrement stupide.

La reconnaissance l'avait poussé à s'offrir comme serviteur chez Messieurs Bouvard et Pécuchet ; — et puis, les croyant sorciers, il espérait des gains extraordinaires.

Dès les premiers jours, il leur confia un secret. Sur la bruyère de Poligny, autrefois, un homme avait trouvé un lingot d'or. L'anecdote est rapportée dans les historiens de Falaise ; ils ignoraient la suite : douze frères avant de partir pour un voyage avaient caché douze lingots pareils, tout le long de la route, depuis Chavignolles jusqu'à Bretteville ; — et Marcel supplia ses maîtres de commencer les recherches. Ces lingots, se dirent-ils, avaient peut-être été enfouis au moment de l'émigration.

C'était le cas d'employer la baguette divinatoire. Les vertus en sont douteuses. Ils étudièrent la question, cependant ; — et apprirent qu'un certain Pierre Garnier donne pour les défendre des raisons scientifiques : les sources et les métaux projetteraient des corpuscules en affinité avec le bois.

Cela n'est guère probable. Qui sait, pourtant ? Essayons !

Ils se taillèrent une fourchette de coudrier — et un matin partirent à la découverte du trésor.

— Il faudra le rendre dit Bouvard.

— Ah ! non ! par exemple !

Après trois heures de marche, une réflexion les arrêta : La route de Chavignolles à Bretteville ! — était-ce l'ancienne, ou la nouvelle ? Ce devait être l'ancienne ?

Ils rebroussèrent chemin — et parcoururent les alentours, au hasard, le tracé de la vieille route n'étant pas facile à reconnaître.

Marcel courait de droite et de gauche, comme un épagneul en chasse ; toutes les cinq minutes, Bouvard était contraint de le rappeler ; Pécuchet avançait pas à pas, tenant la baguette par les deux branches, la pointe en haut. Souvent il lui semblait qu'une force, et comme un crampon, la tirait vers le sol ; — et Marcel bien vite faisait une entaille aux arbres voisins pour retrouver la place plus tard.

Pécuchet cependant se ralentissait. Sa bouche s'ouvrit, ses prunelles se convulsèrent. Bouvard l'interpella, le secoua par les épaules ; il ne remua pas, et demeurait inerte, absolument comme la Barbée.

Puis il conta qu'il avait senti autour du coeur une sorte de déchirement, état bizarre, provenant de la baguette, sans doute ; — et il ne voulait plus y toucher.

Le lendemain, ils revinrent devant les marques faites aux arbres. Marcel avec une bêche creusait des trous ; jamais la fouille n'amenait rien ; — et ils étaient chaque fois extrêmement penauds. Pécuchet s'assit au bord d'un fossé ; et comme il rêvait la tête levée, s'efforçant d'entendre la voix des Esprits par sa trompe aromale, se demandant même s'il en avait une, il fixa ses regards sur la visière de sa casquette ; l'extase de la veille le reprit. Elle dura longtemps, devenait effrayante.

Au-dessus des avoines, dans un sentier, un chapeau de feutre parut ; c'était M. Vaucorbeil trotinant sur sa jument. Bouvard et Marcel le hélèrent.

La crise allait finir quand arriva le médecin. Pour mieux examiner Pécuchet, il lui souleva sa casquette — et apercevant un front couvert de plaques cuivrées :

— Ah ! ah ! fructus belli ! — ce sont des syphilides, mon bonhomme ! soignez-vous ! diable ! ne badinons pas avec l'amour.

Pécuchet, honteux, remit sa casquette, une sorte de béret, bouffant sur une visière en forme de demi-lune, et dont il avait pris le modèle dans l'atlas d'Amoros.

Les paroles du Docteur le stupéfiaient. Il y songeait, les yeux en l'air — et tout à coup fut ressaisi.

Vaucorbeil l'observait, puis d'une chiquenaude, il fit tomber sa casquette.

Pécuchet recouvra ses facultés.

— Je m'en doutais dit le médecin la visière vernie vous hypnotise comme un miroir ; et ce phénomène n'est pas rare chez les personnes qui considèrent un corps brillant avec trop d'attention.

Il indiqua comment pratiquer l'expérience sur des poules, enfourcha son bidet, et disparut lentement.

Une demi-lieue plus loin, ils remarquèrent un objet pyramidal, dressé à l'horizon, dans une cour de ferme — on aurait dit une grappe de raisin noir monstrueuse, piquée de points rouges çà et là. C'était suivant l'usage normand, un long mâât garni de traverses où juchaient des dindes se rengorgeant au soleil.

— Entrons et Pécuchet aborda le fermier qui consentit à leur demande.

Avec du blanc d'Espagne, ils tracèrent une ligne au milieu du pressoir, lièrent les pattes d'un dindon, puis l'étendirent à plat ventre, le bec posé sur la raie. La bête ferma les yeux, et bientôt sembla morte. Il en fut de même des autres. Bouvard les repassait vivement à Pécuchet, qui les rangeait de côté dès qu'elles étaient engourdies. Les gens de la ferme témoignèrent des inquiétudes. La maîtresse cria ; une petite fille pleurait.

Bouvard détacha toutes les volailles. Elles se ranimaient, progressivement ; mais on ne savait pas les conséquences. À une objection un peu rêche de Pécuchet le fermier empoigna sa fourche.

— Filez, nom de Dieu ! ou je vous crève la paillasse !

Ils détalèrent.

N'importe ! le problème était résolu ; l'extase dépend d'une cause matérielle.

Qu'est donc la matière ? Qu'est-ce que l'Esprit ? D'où vient l'influence de l'une sur l'autre, et réciproquement ?

Pour s'en rendre compte, ils firent des recherches dans Voltaire, dans Bossuet, dans Fénelon — et même ils reprirent un abonnement à un cabinet de lecture.

Les maîtres anciens étaient inaccessibles par la longueur des oeuvres ou la difficulté de l'idiome ; mais Jouffroy et Damiron les initièrent à la philosophie moderne ; — et ils avaient des auteurs touchant celle du siècle passé.

Bouvard tirait ses arguments de La Mettrie, de Locke, d'Helvétius ; Pécuchet de M. Cousin, Thomas Reid et Gérando. Le premier s'attachait à l'expérience, l'idéal était tout pour le second. Il y avait de l'Aristote dans celui-ci, du Platon dans celui-là — et ils discutaient.

— L'âme est immatérielle disait l'un.

— Nullement ! disait l'autre ; la folie, le chloroforme, une saignée la bouleversent et puisqu'elle ne pense pas toujours, elle n'est point une substance ne faisant que penser.

— Cependant objecta Pécuchet j'ai, en moi-même, quelque chose de supérieur à mon corps, et qui parfois le contredit.

— Un être dans l'être ? l'homo duplex ! allons donc ! Des tendances différentes révèlent des motifs opposés. Voilà tout.

— Mais ce quelque chose, cette âme, demeure identique sous les changements du dehors. Donc, elle est simple, indivisible et partant spirituelle !

— Si l'âme était simple répliqua Bouvard, le nouveau-né se rappellerait, imaginerait comme l'adulte ! La Pensée, au contraire, suit le développement du cerveau. Quant à être indivisible, le parfum d'une rose, ou l'appétit d'un loup, pas plus qu'une volition ou une affirmation ne se coupent en deux.

— Ça n'y fait rien ! dit Pécuchet ; l'âme est exempte des qualités de la matière !

— Admets-tu la pesanteur ? reprit Bouvard. Or si la matière peut tomber, elle peut de même penser. Ayant eu un commencement, notre âme doit finir, et dépendante des organes, disparaître avec eux.

— Moi, je la prétends immortelle ! Dieu ne peut vouloir...

— Mais si Dieu n'existe pas ?

— Comment ? Et Pécuchet débita les trois preuves cartésiennes ; primo, Dieu est compris dans l'idée que nous en avons ; secundo, l'existence lui est possible ; tertio, être fini, comment aurais-je une idée de l'infini ? — et puisque nous avons cette idée, elle nous vient de Dieu, donc Dieu existe !

Il passa au témoignage de la conscience, à la tradition des peuples, au besoin d'un créateur. Quand je vois une horloge...

— Oui ! oui ! connu ! mais où est le père de l'horloger ?

— Il faut une cause, pourtant !

Bouvard doutait des causes. — De ce qu'un phénomène succède à un phénomène on conclut qu'il en dérive. Prouvez-le !

— Mais le spectacle de l'univers dénote une intention, un plan !

— Pourquoi ? Le mal est organisé aussi parfaitement que le Bien. Le ver qui pousse dans la tête du mouton et le fait mourir équivaut comme anatomie au mouton lui-même. Les monstruosité surpassent les fonctions normales. Le corps humain pouvait être mieux bâti. Les trois quarts du globe sont stériles. La Lune, ce lampadaire, ne se montre pas toujours ! Crois-tu l'Océan destiné aux navires, et le bois des arbres au chauffage de nos maisons ?

Pécuchet répondit :

— Cependant, l'estomac est fait pour digérer, la jambe pour marcher, l'oeil pour voir, bien qu'on ait des dyspepsies, des fractures et des cataractes. Pas d'arrangement sans but ! Les effets surviennent actuellement, ou plus tard. Tout dépend de lois. Donc, il y a des causes finales.

Bouvard imagina que Spinoza peut-être, lui fournirait des arguments, et il écrivit à Dumouchel, pour avoir la traduction de Saisset.

Dumouchel lui envoya un exemplaire, appartenant à son ami le professeur

Varlot, exilé au Deux décembre.

L'Éthique les effraya avec ses axiomes, ses corollaires. Ils lurent seulement les endroits marqués d'un coup de crayon, et comprirent ceci :

La substance est ce qui est de soi, par soi, sans cause, sans origine.
Cette substance est Dieu.

Il est seul l'Étendue — et l'Étendue n'a pas de bornes. Avec quoi la borner ?

Mais bien qu'elle soit infinie, elle n'est pas l'infini absolu ; car elle ne contient qu'un genre de perfection ; et l'Absolu les contient tous.

Souvent ils s'arrêtaient, pour mieux réfléchir. Pécuchet absorbait des prises de tabac et Bouvard était rouge d'attention.

— Est-ce que cela t'amuse ?

— Oui ! sans doute ! va toujours !

Dieu se développe en une infinité d'attributs, qui expriment chacun à sa manière, l'infinité de son être. Nous n'en connaissons que deux : l'Étendue et la Pensée.

De la Pensée et de l'Étendue, découlent des modes innombrables, lesquels en contiennent d'autres.

Celui qui embrasserait, à la fois, toute l'Étendue et toute la Pensée n'y verrait aucune contingence, rien d'accidentel — mais une suite géométrique de termes, liés entre eux par des lois nécessaires.

— Ah ! ce serait beau ! dit Pécuchet.

Donc, il n'y a pas de liberté chez l'homme, ni chez Dieu.

— Tu l'entends ! s'écria Bouvard.

Si Dieu avait une volonté, un but, s'il agissait pour une cause, c'est qu'il aurait un besoin, c'est qu'il manquerait d'une perfection. Il ne serait pas Dieu.

Ainsi notre monde n'est qu'un point dans l'ensemble des choses — et l'univers impénétrable à notre connaissance, une portion d'une infinité d'univers émettant près du nôtre des modifications infinies. L'Étendue enveloppe notre univers, mais est enveloppée par Dieu, qui contient dans sa pensée tous les univers possibles, et sa pensée elle-même est enveloppée dans sa substance.

Il leur semblait être en ballon, la nuit, par un froid glacial, emportés d'une course sans fin, vers un abîme sans fond, — et sans rien autour d'eux que l'insaisissable, l'immobile, l'Éternel. C'était trop fort. Ils y renoncèrent.

Et désirant quelque chose de moins rude, ils achetèrent le Cours de philosophie, à l'usage des classes, par monsieur Guesnier.

L'auteur se demande quelle sera la bonne méthode, l'ontologique ou la psychologique ?

La première convenait à l'enfance des sociétés, quand l'homme portait son attention vers le monde extérieur. Mais à présent qu'il la replie sur lui-même nous croyons la seconde plus scientifique et Bouvard et Pécuchet se décidèrent pour elle.

Le but de la psychologie est d'étudier les faits qui se passent au sein du moi ; on les découvre en observant.

— Observons ! Et pendant quinze jours, après le déjeuner habituellement, ils cherchaient dans leur conscience, au hasard — espérant y faire de grandes découvertes, et n'en firent aucune — ce qui les étonna beaucoup.

Un phénomène occupe le moi, à savoir l'idée. De quelle nature est-elle ? On a supposé que les objets se mirent dans le cerveau ; et le cerveau envoie ces images à notre esprit, qui nous en donne la connaissance.

Mais si l'idée est spirituelle, comment représenter la matière ? De là scepticisme quant aux perceptions externes. Si elle est matérielle, les objets spirituels ne seraient pas représentés ? De là scepticisme en fait de notions internes. D'ailleurs qu'on y prenne garde ! cette hypothèse nous mènerait à l'athéisme ! car une image étant une chose finie, il lui est impossible de représenter l'infini.

— Cependant objecta Bouvard quand je songe à une forêt, à une personne, à un chien, je vois cette forêt, cette personne, ce chien. Donc les idées les représentent.

Et ils abordèrent l'origine des idées.

D'après Locke, il y en a deux, la sensation, la réflexion — Condillac réduit tout à la sensation.

Mais alors, la réflexion manquera de base. Elle a besoin d'un sujet, d'un être sentant ; et elle est impuissante à nous fournir les grandes vérités fondamentales : Dieu, le mérite et le démérite, le juste, le beau, etc., notions qu'on nomme innées, c'est-à-dire antérieures à l'Expérience et universelles.

— Si elles étaient universelles, nous les aurions dès notre naissance.

— On veut dire, par ce mot, des dispositions à les avoir, et Descartes...

— Ton Descartes patauge ! car il soutient que le foetus les possède et il avoue dans un autre endroit que c'est d'une façon implicite.

Pécuchet fut étonné.

— Où cela se trouve-t-il ?

— Dans Gérando ! Et Bouvard lui donna une claque sur le ventre.

— Finis donc ! dit Pécuchet. Puis venant à Condillac : Nos pensées ne sont pas des métamorphoses de la sensation ! Elle les occasionne, les met en jeu. Pour les mettre en jeu, il faut un moteur. Car la matière de soi-même ne peut produire le mouvement ; — et j'ai trouvé cela dans ton Voltaire ! ajouta Pécuchet, en lui faisant une salutation profonde.

Ils rabâchaient ainsi les mêmes arguments, — chacun méprisant l'opinion de l'autre, sans le convaincre de la sienne.

Mais la Philosophie les grandissait dans leur estime. Ils se rappelaient avec pitié leurs préoccupations d'Agriculture, de Littérature, de Politique.

À présent le muséum les dégoûtait. Ils n'auraient pas mieux demandé que d'en vendre les bibelots ; — et ils passèrent au chapitre deuxième : des facultés de l'âme.

On en compte trois, pas davantage ! Celle de sentir, celle de connaître, celle de vouloir.

Dans la faculté de sentir distinguons la sensibilité physique de la sensibilité morale.

Les sensations physiques se classent naturellement en cinq espèces, étant amenées par les organes des sens.

Les faits de la sensibilité morale, au contraire, ne doivent rien au corps. — Qu'y a-t-il de commun entre le plaisir d'Archimède trouvant les lois de la pesanteur et la volupté immonde d'Apicius dévorant une hure de sanglier !

Cette sensibilité morale a quatre genres ; — et son deuxième genre désirs moraux se divise en cinq espèces, et les phénomènes du quatrième genre affections se subdivisent en deux autres espèces, parmi lesquelles l'amour de soi penchant légitime, sans doute, mais qui devenu exagéré prend le nom d'égoïsme.

Dans la faculté de connaître, se trouve l'aperception rationnelle, où l'on trouve deux mouvements principaux et quatre degrés.

L'Abstraction peut offrir des écueils aux intelligences bizarres.

La mémoire fait correspondre avec le passé comme la prévoyance avec l'avenir.

L'imagination est plutôt une faculté particulière, sui generis.

Tant d'embarras pour démontrer des platitudes, le ton pédantesque de l'auteur, la monotonie des tournures Nous sommes prêts à le reconnaître — Loin de nous la pensée — Interrogeons notre conscience l'éloge sempiternel de Dugalt-Stewart, enfin tout ce verbiage, les écoœura tellement, que sautant par dessus la faculté de vouloir, ils entrèrent dans la Logique.

Elle leur apprit ce qu'est l'Analyse, la Synthèse, l'Induction, la Déduction et les causes principales de nos erreurs.

Presque toutes viennent du mauvais emploi des mots.

— Le soleil se couche, le temps se rembrunit, l'hiver approche locutions vicieuses et qui feraient croire à des entités personnelles quand il ne s'agit que d'événements bien simples ! — Je me souviens de tel objet, de tel axiome, de telle vérité illusion ! ce sont les idées, et pas du tout les choses, qui restent dans le moi, et la rigueur du langage exige Je me souviens de tel acte de mon esprit par lequel j'ai perçu cet objet, par lequel j'ai déduit cet axiome, par lequel j'ai admis cette vérité.

Comme le terme qui désigne un accident ne l'embrasse pas dans tous ses modes, ils tâchèrent de n'employer que des mots abstraits — si bien qu'au lieu de dire : Faisons un tour, — il est temps de dîner, — j'ai la colique ils émettaient ces phrases : Une promenade serait salubre, — voici l'heure d'absorber des aliments, — j'éprouve un besoin d'exonération.

Une fois maîtres de l'instrument logique, ils passèrent en revue les différents critères, d'abord celui du sens commun.

Si l'individu ne peut rien savoir, pourquoi tous les individus en sauraient-ils davantage ? Une erreur, fût-elle vieille de cent mille ans, par cela même qu'elle est vieille ne constitue pas la vérité. La Foule invariablement suit la routine ; c'est, au contraire, le petit nombre qui mène le Progrès.

Vaut-il mieux se fier au témoignage des sens ? Ils trompent parfois, et ne renseignent jamais que sur l'apparence. Le fond leur échappe.

La Raison offre plus de garanties, étant immuable et impersonnelle — mais pour se manifester, il lui faut s'incarner. Alors, la Raison devient ma raison. Une règle importe peu, si elle est fausse. Rien ne prouve que celle-là soit juste.

On recommande de la contrôler avec les sens ; mais ils peuvent épaissir leurs ténèbres. D'une sensation confuse, une loi défectueuse sera induite, et qui plus tard empêchera la vue nette des choses.

Reste la morale. C'est faire descendre Dieu au niveau de l'utile, comme si nos besoins étaient la mesure de l'Absolu !

Quant à l'Évidence, niée par l'un, affirmée par l'autre, elle est à elle-même son critérium. M. Cousin l'a démontré.

— Je ne vois plus que la Révélation dit Bouvard. Mais pour y croire il faut admettre deux connaissances préalables, celle du corps qui a senti, celle de l'intelligence qui a perçu, admettre le Sens et la Raison, témoignages humains, et par conséquent suspects.

Pécuchet réfléchit, se croisa les bras. — Mais nous allons tomber dans l'abîme effrayant du scepticisme.

Il n'effrayait, selon Bouvard, que les pauvres cervelles.

— Merci du compliment ! répliqua Pécuchet. Cependant il y a des faits indiscutables. On peut atteindre la vérité dans une certaine limite.

— Laquelle ? Deux et deux font-ils quatre toujours ? Le contenu est-il, en quelque sorte, moindre que le contenant ? Que veut dire un à-peu-près du vrai, une fraction de Dieu, la partie d'une chose indivisible ?

— Ah ! tu n'es qu'un sophiste ! Et Pécuchet, vexé, bouda pendant trois jours.

Ils les employèrent à parcourir les tables de plusieurs volumes. Bouvard souriait de temps à autre — et renouant la conversation :

— C'est qu'il est difficile de ne pas douter ! Ainsi, pour Dieu, les preuves de Descartes, de Kant et de Leibniz ne sont pas les mêmes, et mutuellement se ruinent. La création du monde par les atomes, ou par un esprit, demeure inconcevable.

Je me sens à la fois matière et pensée tout en ignorant ce qu'est l'une et l'autre. L'impénétrabilité, la solidité, la pesanteur me paraissent des mystères aussi bien que mon âme — à plus forte raison l'union de l'âme et du corps.

Pour en rendre compte, Leibniz a imaginé son harmonie, Malebranche la prémotion, Cudworth un médiateur, et Bonnet y voit un miracle perpétuel qui est une bêtise, un miracle perpétuel ne serait plus un miracle.

— Effectivement ! dit Pécuchet.

Et tous deux s'avouèrent qu'ils étaient las des philosophes. Tant de systèmes vous embrouille. La métaphysique ne sert à rien. On peut vivre sans elle.

D'ailleurs leur gêne pécuniaire augmentait. Ils devaient trois barriques de vin à Beljambe, douze kilogrammes de sucre à Langlois, cent vingt francs au tailleur, soixante au cordonnier. La dépense allait toujours ; et maître Gouy ne payait pas.

Ils se rendirent chez Marescot, pour qu'il leur trouvât de l'argent, soit par la vente des Écalles, ou par une hypothèque sur leur ferme, ou en aliénant leur maison, qui serait payée en rentes viagères et dont ils garderaient l'usufruit — moyen impraticable, dit Marescot, mais une affaire meilleure se combinait et ils seraient prévenus.

Ensuite, ils pensèrent à leur pauvre jardin. Bouvard entreprit l'émondage de la charmille. Pécuchet la taille de l'espalier — Marcel devait fouir les plates-bandes.

Au bout d'un quart d'heure, ils s'arrêtaient, l'un fermait sa serpette, l'autre déposait ses ciseaux, et ils commençaient doucement à se promener, — Bouvard à l'ombre des tilleuls, sans gilet, la poitrine en avant, les bras nus, Pécuchet tout le long du mur, la tête basse, les mains dans le dos, la visière de sa casquette tournée sur le cou par précaution ; et ils marchaient ainsi parallèlement, sans même voir Marcel, qui se reposant au bord de la cahute mangeait une chiffre de pain.

Dans cette méditation, des pensées avaient surgi ; ils s'abordaient, craignant de les perdre ; et la métaphysique revenait.

Elle revenait à propos de la pluie ou du soleil, d'un gravier dans leur soulier, d'une fleur sur le gazon, à propos de tout.

En regardant brûler la chandelle, ils se demandaient si la lumière est dans l'objet ou dans notre oeil. Puisque des étoiles peuvent avoir disparu quand leur éclat nous arrive, nous admirons, peut-être, des choses qui n'existent pas.

Ayant retrouvé au fond d'un gilet une cigarette Raspail, ils l'émiettèrent sur de l'eau et le camphre tourna.

Voilà donc le mouvement dans la matière ! un degré supérieur du mouvement amènerait la vie.

Mais si la matière en mouvement suffisait à créer les êtres, ils ne seraient pas si variés. Car il n'existait à l'origine, ni terres, ni eaux, ni hommes, ni plantes. Qu'est donc cette matière primordiale, qu'on n'a jamais vue, qui n'est rien des choses du monde, et qui les a toutes produites ?

Quelquefois ils avaient besoin d'un livre. Dumouchel, fatigué de les servir, ne leur répondait plus, et ils s'acharnaient à la question, principalement Pécuchet.

Son besoin de vérité devenait une soif ardente.

Ému des discours de Bouvard, il lâchait le spiritualisme, le reprenait bientôt pour le quitter, et s'écriait la tête dans les mains : Oh ! le doute ! le doute ! j'aimerais mieux le néant !

Bouvard apercevait l'insuffisance du matérialisme, et tâchait de s'y retenir, déclarant, du reste, qu'il en perdait la boule.

Ils commençaient des raisonnements sur une base solide. Elle croulait ; — et tout à coup plus d'idée, — comme une mouche s'envole, dès qu'on veut la saisir.

Pendant les soirs d'hiver, ils causaient dans le muséum, au coin du feu, en regardant les charbons. Le vent qui sifflait dans le corridor faisait trembler les carreaux, les masses noires des arbres se balançaient, et la tristesse de la nuit augmentait le sérieux de leurs pensées.

Bouvard, de temps à autre, allait jusqu'au bout de l'appartement, puis revenait. Les flambeaux et les bassines contre les murs posaient sur le sol des ombres obliques ; et le saint Pierre, vu de profil, étalait au plafond, la silhouette de son nez, pareille à un monstrueux cor de chasse.

On avait peine à circuler entre les objets, et souvent Bouvard, n'y prenant garde, se cognait à la statue. Avec ses gros yeux, sa lippe tombante et son air d'ivrogne, elle gênait aussi Pécuchet. Depuis longtemps, ils voulaient s'en défaire ; mais par négligence, remettaient cela, de jour en jour.

Un soir au milieu d'une dispute sur la monade, Bouvard se frappa l'orteil au pouce de saint Pierre — et tournant contre lui son irritation :

— Il m'embête, ce coco-là, flanquons-le dehors !

C'était difficile par l'escalier. Ils ouvrirent la fenêtre, et l'inclinèrent sur le bord doucement. Pécuchet à genoux tâcha de soulever ses talons, pendant que Bouvard pesait sur ses épaules. Le bonhomme de pierre ne branlait pas ; ils durent recourir à la hallebarde, comme levier — et arrivèrent enfin à l'étendre tout droit. Alors, ayant basculé, il piqua dans le vide, la tiare en avant — un bruit mat retentit ; — et le lendemain, ils le trouvèrent cassé en douze morceaux, dans l'ancien trou aux composts.

Une heure après, le notaire entra, leur apportant une bonne nouvelle. Une personne de la localité avancerait mille écus, moyennant une hypothèque sur leur ferme ; et comme ils se réjouissaient : Pardon ! elle y met une clause ! c'est que vous lui vendrez les Écalles pour quinze cents francs. Le prêt sera soldé aujourd'hui même. L'argent est chez moi dans mon étude.

Ils avaient envie de céder l'un et l'autre. Bouvard finit par répondre :
— Mon Dieu... soit !

— Convenu ! dit Marescot ; et il leur apprit le nom de la personne, qui était Mme Bordin.

— Je m'en doutais ! s'écria Pécuchet.

Bouvard, humilié, se tut.

Elle ou un autre, qu'importait ! le principal étant de sortir d'embarras.

L'argent touché (celui des Écalles le serait plus tard) ils payèrent immédiatement toutes les notes, et regagnèrent leur domicile, quand au détour des Halles, le père Gouy les arrêta.

Il allait chez eux, pour leur faire part d'un malheur. Le vent, la nuit dernière, avait jeté bas vingt pommiers dans les cours, abattu la bouillerie, enlevé le toit de la grange. Ils passèrent le reste de l'après-midi à constater les dégâts, et le lendemain, avec le charpentier, le maçon, et le couvreur. Les réparations monteraient à dix-huit cents francs, pour le moins.

Puis le soir, Gouy se présenta. Marianne, elle-même, lui avait conté tout à l'heure la vente des Écalles. Une pièce d'un rendement magnifique, à sa convenance, qui n'avait presque pas besoin de culture, le meilleur morceau de toute la ferme ! — et il demandait une diminution.

Ces messieurs la refusèrent. On soumit le cas au juge de paix, et il conclut pour le fermier. La perte des Écalles, l'acre estimé deux mille francs, lui faisait un tort annuel de soixante-dix francs ; — et devant les tribunaux il gagnerait certainement.

Leur fortune se trouvait diminuée. Que faire ? Comment vivre bientôt ?

Ils se mirent tous les deux à table, pleins de découragement. Marcel n'entendait rien à la cuisine ; son dîner cette fois dépassa les autres. La soupe ressemblait à de l'eau de vaisselle, le lapin sentait mauvais, les haricots étaient incuits, les assiettes crasseuses, et au dessert, Bouvard éclata, menaçant de lui casser tout sur la tête.

— Soyons philosophes dit Pécuchet ; un peu moins d'argent, les intrigues d'une femme, la maladresse d'un domestique, qu'est-ce que tout cela ? Tu es trop plongé dans la matière !

— Mais quand elle me gêne, dit Bouvard.

— Moi, je ne l'admets pas ! repartit Pécuchet.

Il avait lu dernièrement une analyse de Berkeley, et ajouta : Je nie l'étendue, le temps, l'espace, voire la substance ! car la vraie substance c'est l'esprit percevant les qualités.

— Parfait dit Bouvard mais le monde supprimé, les preuves manqueront pour l'existence de Dieu.

Pécuchet se récria, et longuement, bien qu'il eût un rhume de cerveau, causé par l'iodure de potassium ; — et une fièvre permanente contribuait à son exaltation. Bouvard, s'en inquiétant, fit venir le médecin.

Vaucorbeil ordonna du sirop d'orange avec l'iodure, et pour plus tard des bains de cinabre.

— À quoi bon ? reprit Pécuchet. Un jour ou l'autre, la forme s'en ira. L'essence ne périt pas !

— Sans doute dit le médecin la matière est indestructible ! Cependant...

— Mais non ! mais non ! L'indestructible, c'est l'être. Ce corps qui est là devant moi, le vôtre, docteur, m'empêche de connaître votre personne, n'est pour ainsi dire qu'un vêtement, ou plutôt un masque.

Vaucorbeil le crut fou. — Bonsoir ! Soignez votre masque !

Pécuchet n'enraya pas. Il se procura une introduction à la philosophie hégélienne, et voulut l'expliquer à Bouvard.

— Tout ce qui est rationnel est réel. Il n'y a même de réel que l'idée. Les lois de l'Esprit sont les lois de l'univers ; la raison de l'homme est identique à celle de Dieu.

Bouvard feignait de comprendre.

— Donc, l'Absolu c'est à la fois le sujet et l'objet, l'unité où viennent se rejoindre toutes les différences. Ainsi les contradictoires sont résolus. L'ombre permet la lumière, le froid mêlé au chaud produit la température, l'organisme ne se maintient que par la destruction de l'organisme ; partout un principe qui divise, un principe qui enchaîne.

Ils étaient sur le vigneau ; et le curé passa le long de la claire-voie, son bréviaire à la main.

Pécuchet le pria d'entrer, pour finir devant lui l'exposition d'Hegel et voir un peu ce qu'il en dirait.

L'homme à la soutane s'assit près d'eux ; — et Pécuchet aborda le christianisme.

— Aucune religion n'a établi aussi bien cette vérité : La Nature n'est qu'un moment de l'idée !

— Un moment de l'idée ? murmura le prêtre, stupéfait.

— Mais oui ! Dieu, en prenant une enveloppe visible, a montré son union consubstantielle avec elle.

— Avec la Nature ? oh ! oh !

— Par son décès, il a rendu témoignage à l'essence de la mort ; donc, la mort était en lui, faisait, fait partie de Dieu.

L'ecclésiastique se renfrogna. Pas de blasphèmes ! c'était pour le salut du genre humain qu'il a enduré les souffrances...

— Erreur ! On considère la mort dans l'individu, où elle est un mal sans doute, mais relativement aux choses, c'est différent. Ne séparez pas l'esprit de la matière !

— Cependant, monsieur, avant la création...

— Il n'y a pas eu de création. Elle a toujours existé. Autrement ce serait un être nouveau s'ajoutant à la pensée divine ; ce qui est absurde.

Le prêtre se leva ; des affaires l'appelaient ailleurs.

Je me flatte de l'avoir crossé ! dit Pécuchet. Encore un mot !

Puisque l'existence du monde n'est qu'un passage continu de la vie à la mort, et de la mort à la vie, loin que tout soit, rien n'est. Mais tout devient ; comprends-tu ?

— Oui ! je comprends, ou plutôt non ! L'idéalisme à la fin exaspérait Bouvard. Je n'en veux plus ! le fameux cogito m'embête. On prend les idées des choses pour les choses elles-mêmes. On explique ce qu'on entend fort peu, au moyen de mots qu'on n'entend pas du tout ! Substance, étendue, force, matière et âme, autant d'abstractions, d'imaginations. Quant à Dieu, impossible de savoir comment il est, ni même s'il est ! Autrefois, il causait le vent, la foudre, les révolutions. À présent, il diminue. D'ailleurs, je n'en vois pas l'utilité.

— Et la morale, dans tout cela ?

— Ah ! tant pis !

Elle manque de base, effectivement se dit Pécuchet.

Et il demeura silencieux, acculé dans une impasse, conséquence des prémisses qu'il avait lui-même posées. Ce fut une surprise, un écrasement.

Bouvard ne croyait même plus à la matière.

La certitude que rien n'existe (si déplorable qu'elle soit) n'en est pas moins une certitude. Peu de gens sont capables de l'avoir. Cette transcendance leur inspira de l'orgueil ; et ils auraient voulu l'étaler. Une occasion s'offrit.

Un matin, en allant acheter du tabac, ils virent un attroupement devant la porte de Langlois. On entourait la gondole de Falaise, et il était question de Touache, un galérien qui vagabondait dans le pays. Le conducteur l'avait rencontré à la Croix-Verte entre deux gendarmes et les Chavignollais exhalèrent un soupir de délivrance.

Girbal et le capitaine restèrent sur la Place ; puis, arriva le juge de paix curieux d'avoir des renseignements, et M. Marescot en toque de velours et pantoufles de basane.

Langlois les invita à honorer sa boutique de leur présence. Ils seraient là plus à leur aise ; et malgré les chalands, et le bruit de la sonnette, ces messieurs continuèrent à discuter les forfaits de Touache.

— Mon Dieu dit Bouvard il avait de mauvais instincts, voilà tout !

— On en triomphe par la vertu répliqua le notaire.

— Mais si on n'a pas de vertu ? Et Bouvard nia positivement le libre arbitre.

— Cependant dit le capitaine je peux faire ce que je veux ! je suis libre, par exemple... de remuer la jambe.

— Non ! monsieur, car vous avez un motif pour la remuer !

Le capitaine chercha une réponse, n'en trouva pas — mais Girbal décocha ce trait :

— Un républicain qui parle contre la liberté ! c'est drôle !

— Histoire de rire ! dit Langlois.

Bouvard l'interpella :

— D'où vient que vous ne donnez pas votre fortune aux pauvres ?

L'épicier, d'un regard inquiet, parcourut toute sa boutique.

— Tiens ! pas si bête ! je la garde pour moi !

— Si vous étiez saint Vincent de Paul, vous agiriez différemment, puisque vous auriez son caractère. Vous obéissez au vôtre. Donc vous n'êtes pas libre !

— C'est une chicane répondit en chœur l'assemblée.

Bouvard ne broncha pas ; — et désignant la balance sur le comptoir :

— Elle se tiendra inerte, tant qu'un des plateaux sera vide. De même, la volonté ; — et l'oscillation de la balance entre deux poids qui semblent égaux, figure le travail de notre esprit, quand il délibère sur les motifs, jusqu'au moment où le plus fort l'emporte, le détermine.

— Tout cela dit Girbal ne fait rien pour Touache, et ne l'empêche pas d'être un gaillard joliment vicieux.

Pécuchet prit la parole :

— Les vices sont des propriétés de la Nature, comme les inondations, les tempêtes.

Le notaire l'arrêta ; et se haussant à chaque mot sur la pointe des orteils :

— Je trouve votre système d'une immoralité complète. Il donne carrière à tous les débordements, excuse les crimes, innocente les coupables.

— Parfaitement dit Bouvard. Le malheureux qui suit ses appétits est dans son droit, comme l'honnête homme qui écoute la Raison.

— Ne défendez pas les monstres !

— Pourquoi monstres ? Quand il naît un aveugle, un idiot, un homicide, cela nous paraît du désordre, comme si l'ordre nous était connu, comme si la nature agissait pour une fin !

— Alors vous contestez la Providence ?

— Oui ! je la conteste !

— Voyez plutôt l'Histoire ! s'écria Pécuchet rappelez-vous les assassinats de rois, les massacres de peuples, les dissensions dans les familles, le chagrin des particuliers.

— Et en même temps ajouta Bouvard, car ils s'excitaient l'un l'autre cette Providence soigne les petits oiseaux, et fait repousser les pattes des écrevisses. Ah ! si vous entendez par Providence, une loi qui règle tout, je veux bien, et encore !

— Cependant, monsieur dit le notaire il y a des principes !

— Qu'est-ce que vous me chantez ! Une science, d'après Condillac, est d'autant meilleure qu'elle n'en a pas besoin ! Ils ne font que résumer des connaissances acquises, et nous reportent vers ces notions, qui précisément sont discutables.

— Avez-vous comme nous poursuivait Pécuchet, scruté, fouillé les arcanes de la métaphysique ?

— Il est vrai, messieurs, il est vrai !

Et la société se dispersa.

Mais Coulon les tirant à l'écart, leur dit d'un ton paternel, qu'il n'était pas dévot certainement et même il détestait les jésuites. Cependant il n'allait pas si loin qu'eux ! Oh non ! bien sûr ; — et au coin de la place, ils passèrent devant le capitaine, qui rallumait sa pipe en grommelant : Je fais pourtant ce que je veux, nom de Dieu !

Bouvard et Pécuchet proférèrent en d'autres occasions leurs abominables paradoxes. Ils mettaient en doute, la probité des hommes, la chasteté des femmes, l'intelligence du gouvernement, le bon sens du peuple, enfin savaient les bases.

Foureau s'en émut, et les menaça de la prison, s'ils continuaient de tels discours.

L'évidence de leur supériorité blessait. Comme ils soutenaient des thèses immorales, ils devaient être immoraux ; des calomnies furent inventées.

Alors une faculté pitoyable se développa dans leur esprit, celle de voir la bêtise et de ne plus la tolérer.

Des choses insignifiantes les attristaient : les réclames des journaux, le profil d'un bourgeois, une sottise réfléchie entendue par hasard.

En songeant à ce qu'on disait dans leur village, et qu'il y avait jusqu'aux antipodes d'autres Coulon, d'autres Marescot, d'autres Foureau, ils sentaient peser sur eux comme la lourdeur de toute la terre.

Ils ne sortaient plus, ne recevaient personne.

Un après-midi, un dialogue s'éleva dans la cour, entre Marcel et un monsieur ayant un chapeau à larges bords avec des conserves noires. C'était l'académicien Larsonneur. Il ne fut pas sans observer un rideau entrouvert, des portes qu'on fermait. Sa démarche était une tentative de raccommodement et il s'en alla furieux, chargeant le domestique de dire à ses maîtres qu'il les regardait comme des goujats.

Bouvard et Pécuchet ne s'en soucièrent. Le monde diminuait d'importance — ils l'apercevaient comme dans un nuage, descendu de leur cerveau sur leurs prunelles.

N'est-ce pas, d'ailleurs, une illusion, un mauvais rêve ? Peut-être, qu'en somme, les prospérités et les malheurs s'équilibrent ? Mais le bien de l'espèce ne console pas l'individu.

— Et que m'importent les autres ! disait Pécuchet.

Son désespoir affligeait Bouvard. C'était lui qui l'avait poussé jusque-là ; et le délabrement de leur domicile avivait leur chagrin par des irritations quotidiennes.

Pour se remonter, ils se faisaient des raisonnements, se prescrivaient des travaux, et retombaient vite dans une paresse plus forte, dans un découragement profond.

À la fin des repas, ils restaient les coudes sur la table, à gémir d'un air lugubre — Marcel en écarquillait les yeux, puis retournait dans sa cuisine où il s'empiffrait solitairement.

Au milieu de l'été, ils reçurent un billet de faire-part annonçant le mariage de Dumouchel avec Mme veuve Olympe-Zulma Poulet.

Que Dieu le bénisse ! et ils se rappelèrent le temps où ils étaient heureux. Pourquoi ne suivaient-ils plus les moissonneurs ? Où étaient les jours qu'ils entraient dans les fermes cherchant partout des antiquités ? Rien maintenant n'occasionnerait ces heures si douces qu'emplissaient la distillerie ou la Littérature. Un abîme les en séparait. Quelque chose d'irrévocable était venu.

Ils voulurent faire comme autrefois une promenade dans les champs, allèrent très loin, se perdirent. — De petits nuages moutonnaient dans le ciel, le vent balançait les clochettes des avoines, le long d'un pré un ruisseau murmurait, quand tout à coup une odeur infecte les arrêta ; et ils virent sur des cailloux, entre des joncs, la charogne d'un chien.

Les quatre membres étaient desséchés. Le rictus de la gueule découvrait sous des babines bleuâtres des crocs d'ivoire ; à la place du ventre, c'était un amas de couleur terreuse, et qui semblait palpiter tant grouillait dessus la vermine. Elle s'agitait, frappée par le soleil, sous le bourdonnement des mouches, dans cette intolérable odeur, une odeur féroce et comme dévorante.

Cependant Bouvard plissait le front ; et des larmes mouillèrent ses yeux. — Pécuchet dit stoïquement : Nous serons un jour comme ça !

L'idée de la mort les avait saisis. Ils en causèrent, en revenant.

Après tout, elle n'existe pas. On s'en va dans la rosée, dans la brise, dans les étoiles. On devient quelque chose de la sève des arbres, de l'éclat des pierres fines, du plumage des oiseaux. On redonne à la Nature ce qu'elle vous a prêté et le Néant qui est devant nous n'a rien de plus affreux que le néant qui se trouve derrière.

Ils tâchaient de l'imaginer sous la forme d'une nuit intense, d'un trou sans fond, d'un évanouissement continu. N'importe quoi valait mieux que cette existence monotone, absurde, et sans espoir.

Ils récapitulèrent leurs besoins inassouvis. Bouvard avait toujours désiré des chevaux, des équipages, les grands crus de Bourgogne, et de belles femmes complaisantes dans une habitation splendide.

L'ambition de Pécuchet était le savoir philosophique. Or, le plus vaste des problèmes, celui qui contient les autres, peut se résoudre en une minute. Quand donc arriverait-elle ?

— Autant tout de suite, en finir.

— Comme tu voudras dit Bouvard.

Et ils examinèrent la question du suicide.

Où est le mal de rejeter un fardeau qui vous écrase ? et de commettre une action ne nuisant à personne ? Si elle offensait Dieu, aurions-nous ce pouvoir ? Ce n'est pas une lâcheté, bien qu'on dise ; — et l'insolence est belle, de bafouer même à son détriment, ce que les hommes estiment le plus.

Ils délibérèrent sur le genre de mort.

Le poison fait souffrir. Pour s'égorger, il faut trop de courage. Avec l'asphyxie, on se rate souvent.

Enfin, Pécuchet monta dans le grenier deux câbles de la gymnastique. Puis, les ayant liés à la même traverse du toit, laissa pendre un noeud coulant et avança dessous deux chaises, pour atteindre aux cordes.

Ce moyen fut résolu.

Ils se demandaient quelle impression cela causerait dans l'arrondissement, où iraient ensuite leur bibliothèque, leurs paperasses, leurs collections. La pensée de la mort les faisait s'attendrir sur eux-mêmes. Cependant, ils ne lâchaient point leur projet, et à force d'en parler, s'y accoutumèrent.

Le soir du 25 décembre, entre dix et onze heures, ils réfléchissaient dans le muséum, habillés différemment. Bouvard portait une blouse sur son gilet de tricot — et Pécuchet, depuis trois mois, ne quittait plus la robe de moine, par économie.

Comme ils avaient grand faim (car Marcel sorti dès l'aube n'avait pas reparu) Bouvard crut hygiénique de boire un carafon d'eau-de-vie et Pécuchet de prendre du thé.

En soulevant la bouilloire, il répandit de l'eau sur le parquet.

— Maladroit ! s'écria Bouvard.

Puis trouvant l'infusion médiocre, il voulut la renforcer par deux cuillerées de plus.

— Ce sera exécration dit Pécuchet.

— Pas du tout !

Et chacun tirant à soi la boîte, le plateau tomba ; une des tasses fut brisée, la dernière du beau service en porcelaine.

Bouvard pâlit. — Continue ! saccage ! ne te gêne pas !

— Grand malheur, vraiment !

— Oui ! un malheur ! Je la tenais de mon père !

— Naturel ajouta Pécuchet, en ricanant.

— Ah ! tu m'insultes !

— Non, mais je te fatigue ! avoue-le !

Et Pécuchet fut pris de colère, ou plutôt de démence. Bouvard aussi. Ils criaient à la fois tous les deux, l'un irrité par la faim, l'autre par l'alcool. La gorge de Pécuchet n'émettait plus qu'un râle.

— C'est infernal, une vie pareille ; j'aime mieux la mort. Adieu.

Il prit le flambeau, tourna les talons, claqua la porte.

Bouvard, au milieu des ténèbres, eut peine à l'ouvrir, courut derrière lui, arriva dans le grenier.

La chandelle était par terre — et Pécuchet debout sur une des chaises avec le câble dans sa main.

L'esprit d'imitation emporta Bouvard : — Attends-moi ! Et il montait sur l'autre chaise quand s'arrêtant tout à coup :

— Mais... nous n'avons pas fait notre testament ?

— Tiens ! c'est juste !

Des sanglots gonflaient leur poitrine. Ils se mirent à la lucarne pour respirer.

L'air était froid ; et des astres nombreux brillaient dans le ciel, noir comme de l'encre. La blancheur de la neige, qui couvrait la terre, se perdait dans les brumes de l'horizon.

Ils aperçurent de petites lumières à ras du sol ; et grandissant, se rapprochant, toutes allaient du côté de l'église.

Une curiosité les y poussa.

C'était la messe de minuit. Ces lumières provenaient des lanternes des bergers. Quelques-uns, sous le porche, secouaient leurs manteaux.

Le serpent ronflait, l'encens fumait. Des verres, suspendus, dans la longueur de la nef, dessinaient trois couronnes de feux multicolores — et au bout de la perspective des deux côtés du tabernacle, les cierges géants dressaient des flammes rouges. Par dessus les têtes de la foule et les capelines des femmes, au delà des chantres, on distinguait le prêtre dans sa chasuble d'or ; à sa voix aiguë répondaient les voix fortes des hommes emplissant le jubé, et la voûte de bois tremblait, sur ses arceaux de pierre. Des images représentant le chemin de la croix décoraient les murs. Au milieu du choeur, devant l'autel, un agneau était couché, les pattes sous le ventre, les oreilles toutes droites.

La tiède température, leur procura un singulier bien-être ; et leurs pensées, orageuses tout à l'heure, se faisaient douces, comme des vagues qui s'apaisent.

Ils écoutèrent l'Évangile et le Credo, observaient les mouvements du prêtre. Cependant les vieux, les jeunes, les pauvresses en guenille, les fermières en haut bonnet, les robustes gars à blonds favoris, tous priaient, absorbés dans la même joie profonde ; — et voyaient sur la paille d'une étable, rayonner comme un soleil, le corps de l'enfant-Dieu. Cette foi des autres touchait Bouvard en dépit de sa raison, et Pécuchet malgré la dureté de son coeur.

Il y eut un silence ; tous les dos se courbèrent — et au tintement d'une clochette, le petit agneau bêla.

L'hostie fut montrée par le prêtre, au bout de ses deux bras, le plus haut possible. Alors éclata un chant d'allégresse, qui conviait le monde aux pieds du Roi des Anges. Bouvard et Pécuchet involontairement s'y mêlèrent ; et ils sentaient comme une aurore se lever dans leur âme.

CHAPITRE IX

Marcel reparut le lendemain à trois heures, la face verte, les yeux rouges, une bigne au front, le pantalon déchiré, empestant l'eau-de-vie, immonde.

Il avait été, selon sa coutume annuelle, à six lieues de là, près d'Iqueville faire le réveillon chez un ami ; — et bégayant plus que jamais, pleurant, voulant se battre, il implorait sa grâce comme s'il eût commis un crime. Ses maîtres l'octroyèrent. Un calme singulier les portait à l'indulgence.

La neige avait fondu tout à coup — et ils se promenaient dans leur jardin, humant l'air tiède, heureux de vivre.

Était-ce le hasard seulement, qui les avait détournés de la mort ? Bouvard se sentait attendri. Pécuchet se rappela sa première communion ; et pleins de reconnaissance pour la Force, la Cause dont ils dépendaient, l'idée leur vint de faire des lectures pieuses.

L'Évangile dilata leur âme, les éblouit comme un soleil. Ils apercevaient Jésus, debout sur la montagne, un bras levé, la foule en dessous l'écoutant — ou bien au bord du Lac, parmi les Apôtres qui tirent des filets — puis sur l'ânesse, dans la clameur des alléluias, la chevelure éventée par les palmes frémissantes — enfin au haut de la croix, inclinant sa tête, d'où tombe éternellement une rosée sur le monde. Ce qui les gagna, ce qui les délectait, c'est la tendresse pour les humbles, la défense des pauvres, l'exaltation des opprimés. — Et dans ce livre où le ciel se déploie, rien de théologique ; au milieu de tant de préceptes, pas un dogme ; nulle exigence que la pureté du cœur.

Quant aux miracles, leur raison n'en fut pas surprise ; dès l'enfance, ils les connaissaient. La hauteur de saint Jean ravit Pécuchet — et le disposa à mieux comprendre l'Imitation.

Ici plus de paraboles, de fleurs, d'oiseaux — mais des plaintes, un resserrement de l'âme sur elle-même. Bouvard s'attrista en feuilletant ces pages, qui semblent écrites par un temps de brume, au fond d'un cloître, entre un clocher et un tombeau. Notre vie mortelle y apparaît si lamentable qu'il faut, l'oubliant, se retourner vers Dieu ; — et les deux bonshommes, après toutes leurs déceptions, éprouvaient le besoin d'être simples, d'aimer quelque chose, de se reposer l'esprit.

Ils abordèrent l'Ecclésiaste, Isaïe, Jérémie.

Mais la Bible les effrayait avec ses prophètes à voix de lion, le fracas du tonnerre dans les nues, tous les sanglots de la Géhenne, et son Dieu dispersant les empires, comme le vent fait des nuages.

Ils lisaient cela le dimanche, à l'heure des vêpres, pendant que la cloche tintait.

Un jour, ils se rendirent à la messe, puis y retournèrent. C'était une distraction au bout de la semaine. Le comte et la comtesse de Faverges les saluèrent de loin, ce qui fut remarqué. Le juge de paix leur dit, en clignant de l'oeil : — Parfait ! je vous approuve. Toutes les bourgeoises, maintenant leur envoyaient le pain bénit.

L'abbé Jeufroy leur fit une visite ; ils la rendirent, on se fréquenta ; et le prêtre ne parlait pas de religion.

Ils furent étonnés de cette réserve ; si bien que Pécuchet, d'un air indifférent lui demanda comment s'y prendre pour obtenir la Foi.

— Pratiquez, d'abord.

Ils se mirent à pratiquer, l'un avec espoir, l'autre par défi, Bouvard étant convaincu qu'il ne serait jamais un dévot. Un mois durant, il suivit régulièrement tous les offices, mais, à l'encontre de Pécuchet, ne voulut pas s'astreindre au maigre.

Était-ce une mesure d'hygiène ? on sait ce que vaut l'Hygiène ! une affaire de convenance ? à bas les convenances ! une marque de soumission envers l'Église ? il s'en fichait également ! bref, déclarait cette règle absurde, pharisaïque, et contraire à l'esprit de l'Évangile.

Le vendredi saint des autres années, ils mangeaient ce que Germaine leur servait.

Mais Bouvard cette fois, s'était commandé un beefsteak. Il s'assit, coupa la viande ; — et Marcel le regardait scandalisé, tandis que Pécuchet dépiautait gravement sa tranche de morue.

Bouvard restait la fourchette d'une main, le couteau de l'autre. Enfin se décidant, il monta une bouchée à ses lèvres. Tout à coup ses mains tremblèrent, sa grosse mine pâlit, sa tête se renversait.

— Tu te trouves mal ?

— Non !... Mais... et il fit un aveu. Par suite de son éducation (c'était plus fort que lui) il ne pouvait manger du gras ce jour-là, dans la crainte de mourir.

Pécuchet, sans abuser de sa victoire, en profita pour vivre à sa guise.

Un soir, il rentra la figure empreinte d'une joie sérieuse, et lâchant le mot, dit qu'il venait de se confesser.

Alors ils discutèrent l'importance de la confession.

Bouvard admettait celle des premiers chrétiens qui se faisait en public : la moderne est trop facile. Cependant il ne niait pas que cette enquête sur nous-mêmes ne fût un élément de progrès, un levain de moralité.

Pécuchet, désireux de la perfection, chercha ses vices. Les bouffées d'orgueil depuis longtemps étaient parties. Son goût du travail l'exemptait de la paresse. Quant à la gourmandise, personne de plus sobre. Quelquefois des colères l'emportaient. Il se jura de n'en plus avoir.

Ensuite, il faudrait acquérir les vertus, premièrement l'Humilité ; — c'est-à-dire se croire incapable de tout mérite, indigne de la moindre récompense, immoler son esprit, et se mettre tellement bas que l'on vous foule aux pieds comme la boue des chemins. Il était loin encore de ces dispositions.

Une autre vertu lui manquait : la chasteté — car intérieurement, il regrettait Mélie, et le pastel de la dame en robe Louis XV, le gênait avec son décolletage.

Il l'enferma dans une armoire, redoubla de pudeur jusque à craindre de porter ses regards sur lui-même, et couchait avec un caleçon.

Tant de soins autour de la Luxure la développèrent. Le matin principalement il avait à subir de grands combats — comme en eurent saint Paul, saint Benoît et saint Jérôme, dans un âge fort avancé. De suite, ils recouraient à des pénitences furieuses. La douleur est une expiation, un remède et un moyen, un hommage à Jésus-Christ. Tout amour veut des sacrifices — et quel plus pénible que celui de notre corps !

Afin de se mortifier, Pécuchet supprima le petit verre après les repas, se réduisit à quatre prises dans la journée, par les froids extrêmes ne mettait plus de casquette.

Un jour, Bouvard qui rattachait la vigne, posa une échelle contre le mur de la terrasse près de la maison — et sans le vouloir, se trouva plonger dans la chambre de Pécuchet.

Son ami, nu jusqu'au ventre, avec le martinet aux habits, se frappait les épaules doucement, puis s'animant, retira sa culotte, cingla ses fesses, et tomba sur une chaise, hors d'haleine.

Bouvard fut troublé comme à la découverte d'un mystère, qu'on ne doit pas surprendre.

Depuis quelque temps, il remarquait plus de netteté sur les carreaux, moins de trous aux serviettes, une nourriture meilleure — changements qui étaient dus à l'intervention de Reine, la servante de M. le curé.

Mêlant les choses de l'église à celles de sa cuisine, forte comme un valet de charrie et dévouée bien qu'irrespectueuse, elle s'introduisait dans les ménages, donnait des conseils, y devenait maîtresse. Pécuchet se fiait absolument à son expérience.

Une fois, elle lui amena un individu replet, ayant de petits yeux à la chinoise, un nez en bec de vautour. C'était M. Goutman, négociant en articles de piété ; — il en déballa quelques-uns, enfermés dans des boîtes, sous le hangar : croix, médailles et chapelets de toutes les dimensions, candélabres pour oratoires, autels portatifs, bouquets de clinquant — et des sacrés-cœurs en carton bleu, des saint Joseph à barbe rouge, des calvaires de porcelaine. Pécuchet les convoita. Le prix seul l'arrêtait.

Goutman ne demandait pas d'argent. Il préférait les échanges, et monté dans le muséum, il offrit, contre les vieux fers et tous les plombs, un stock de ses marchandises.

Elles parurent hideuses à Bouvard. Mais l'oeil de Pécuchet, les instances de Reine et le bagout du brocanteur finirent par le convaincre. Quand il le vit si coulant Goutman voulut, en outre, la hallebarde ; Bouvard, las d'en avoir démontré la manoeuvre, l'abandonna. L'estimation totale étant faite, ces messieurs devaient encore cent francs. On s'arrangea, moyennant quatre billets à trois mois d'échéance — et ils s'applaudirent du bon marché.

Leurs acquisitions furent distribuées dans tous les appartements. Une crèche remplie de foin et une cathédrale de liège décorèrent le muséum. Il y eut sur la cheminée de Pécuchet, un saint Jean-Baptiste en cire, le long du corridor les portraits des gloires épiscopales, et au bas de l'escalier, sous une lampe à chaînes, une sainte Vierge en manteau d'azur et couronnée d'étoiles — Marcel nettoyait ces splendeurs, n'imaginant au paradis rien de plus beau.

Quel dommage que le saint Pierre fût brisé, et comme il aurait fait bien dans le vestibule ! Pécuchet s'arrêtait parfois devant l'ancienne fosse aux composts, où l'on reconnaissait la tiare, une sandale, un bout d'oreille, lâchait des soupirs, puis continuait à jardiner ; — car maintenant, il joignait les travaux manuels aux exercices religieux — et bêchait la terre, vêtu de la robe de moine, en se comparant à saint Bruno. Ce déguisement pouvait être un sacrilège ; il y renonça.

Mais il prenait le genre ecclésiastique, sans doute par la fréquentation du curé. Il en avait le sourire, la voix, et d'un air frileux glissait comme lui dans ses manches ses deux mains jusqu'aux poignets. Un jour vint où le chant du coq l'importuna ; les roses l'ennuyaient ; il ne sortait plus, ou jetait sur la campagne des regards farouches.

Bouvard se laissa conduire au mois de Marie. Les enfants qui chantaient des hymnes, les gerbes de lilas, les festons de verdure, lui avaient donné comme le sentiment d'une jeunesse impérissable. Dieu se manifestait à son cœur par la forme des nids, la clarté des sources, la bienfaisance du soleil ; — et la dévotion de son ami lui semblait extravagante, fastidieuse.

— Pourquoi gémis-tu pendant le repas ?

— Nous devons manger en gémissant répondit Pécuchet ; car l'Homme par cette voie, a perdu son innocence phrase qu'il avait lue dans le Manuel du séminariste, deux volumes in-12 empruntés à M. Jeufroy. Et il buvait de l'eau de la Salette, se livrait portes closes à des oraisons jaculatoires, espérait entrer dans la confrérie de Saint-François.

Pour obtenir le don de persévérance, il résolut de faire un pèlerinage à la sainte Vierge.

Le choix des localités l'embarrassa. Serait-ce à Notre-Dame de Fourvières, de Chartres, d'Embrun, de Marseille ou d'Auray ? Celle de la Délivrande, plus proche, convenait aussi bien. — Tu m'accompagneras !

— J'aurais l'air d'un cornichon dit Bouvard.

Après tout, il pouvait en revenir croyant, ne refusait pas de l'être, et céda par complaisance.

Les pèlerinages doivent s'accomplir à pied. Mais quarante-trois kilomètres seraient durs ; — et les gondoles n'étant pas congruentes à la méditation ils louèrent un vieux cabriolet, qui après douze heures de route les déposa devant l'auberge.

Ils eurent une pièce à deux lits, avec deux commodes, supportant deux pots à l'eau dans des petites cuvettes ovales, et l'hôtelier leur apprit que c'était la chambre des capucins. Sous la Terreur on y avait caché la dame de la Délivrande avec tant de précaution que les bons Pères y disaient la messe clandestinement.

Cela fit plaisir à Pécuchet, et il lut tout haut une notice sur la chapelle, prise en bas dans la cuisine.

Elle a été fondée au commencement du IIe siècle par saint Régnobert premier évêque de Lisieux, ou par saint Ragnebert qui vivait au VIIe, ou par Robert le Magnifique au milieu du XIe.

Les Danois, les Normands et surtout les Protestants l'ont incendiée et ravagée à différentes époques.

Vers 1112, la statue primitive fut découverte par un mouton, qui en frappant du pied dans un herbage, indiqua l'endroit où elle était — sur cette place le comte Baudouin érigea un sanctuaire.

Ses miracles sont innombrables : — un marchand de Bayeux captif chez les Sarrasins l'invoque, ses fers tombent et il s'échappe. — Un avaré découvre dans son grenier un troupeau de rats, l'appelle à son secours et les rats s'éloignent. — Le contact d'une médaille ayant effleuré son effigie fit se repentir au lit de mort un vieux matérialiste de Versailles. — Elle rendit la parole au sieur Adeline qui l'avait perdue pour avoir blasphémé ; et par sa protection, M. et Mme de Becqueville eurent assez de force pour vivre chastement en état de mariage.

On cite parmi ceux qu'elle a guéris d'affections irrémédiables Mlle de

Palfresne, Anne Lorieux, Marie Duchemin, François Dufai, et Mme de

Jumillac, née d'Osseville.

Des personnages considérables l'ont visitée : Louis XI, Louis XIII, deux filles de Gaston d'Orléans, le cardinal Wiseman, Samirrhî, patriarche d'Antioche, Mgr Véroles, vicaire apostolique de la Mandchourie ; — et l'archevêque de Quélien vint lui rendre grâce pour la conversion du prince de Talleyrand.

— Elle pourra dit Pécuchet te convertir aussi !

Bouvard déjà couché, eut une sorte de grognement, et s'endormit tout à fait.

Le lendemain à six heures, ils entraient dans la chapelle.

On en construisait une autre ; — des toiles et des planches embarrassaient la nef et le monument, de style rococo, déplut à Bouvard, surtout l'autel de marbre rouge, avec ses pilastres corinthiens.

La statue miraculeuse dans une niche à gauche du choeur est enveloppée d'une robe à paillettes. Le bedeau survint, ayant pour chacun d'eux un cierge. Il le planta sur une manière de herse dominant la balustrade, demanda trois francs, fit une révérence, et disparut.

Ensuite ils regardèrent les ex-voto.

Des inscriptions sur plaques témoignent de la reconnaissance des fidèles. On admire deux épées en sautoir offertes par un ancien élève de l'École polytechnique, des bouquets de mariée, des médailles militaires, des coeurs d'argent, et dans l'angle au niveau du sol, une forêt de béquilles.

De la sacristie déboucha un prêtre portant le saint-ciboire.

Quand il fut resté quelques minutes au bas de l'autel, il monta les trois marches, dit l'Oremus, l'Introït et le Kyrie, que l'enfant de choeur à genoux récita tout d'une haleine.

Les assistants étaient rares, douze ou quinze vieilles femmes. On entendait le froissement de leurs chapelets, et le bruit d'un marteau cognant des pierres. Pécuchet incliné sur son prie-Dieu répondait aux Amen. Pendant l'élévation il supplia Notre-Dame de lui envoyer une foi constante et indestructible.

Bouvard dans un fauteuil, à ses côtés, lui prit son Eucologe, et s'arrêta aux litanies de la Vierge.

— Très pure, très chaste, vénérable, aimable — puissante, clément — tour d'ivoire, maison d'or, porte du matin ces mots d'adoration, ces hyperboles l'emportèrent vers celle qui est célébrée par tant d'hommages.

Il la rêva comme on la figure dans les tableaux d'église, sur un amoncellement de nuages, des chérubins à ses pieds, l'Enfant-Dieu à sa poitrine — mère des tendresses que réclament toutes les afflictions de la terre, — idéal de la Femme transportée dans le ciel ; car sorti de ses entrailles l'Homme exalte son amour et n'aspire qu'à reposer sur son coeur.

La messe étant finie, ils longèrent les boutiques qui s'adossent contre le mur du côté de la Place. On y voit des images, des bénitiers, des urnes à filets d'or, des Jésus-Christ en noix de coco, des chapelets d'ivoire ; — et le soleil, frappant les verres des cadres, éblouissait les yeux, faisait ressortir la brutalité des peintures, la hideur des dessins. Bouvard, qui chez lui trouvait ces choses abominables, fut indulgent pour elles. Il acheta une petite Vierge en pâte bleue. Pécuchet comme souvenir se contenta d'un rosaire.

Les marchands criaient : — Allons ! allons ! pour cinq francs, pour trois francs, pour soixante centimes, pour deux sols ! ne refusez pas Notre-Dame !

Les deux pèlerins flânaient sans rien choisir. Des remarques désobligeantes s'élevèrent.

— Qu'est-ce qu'ils veulent ces oiseaux-là ?

— Ils sont peut-être des Turcs !

— Des protestants, plutôt !

Une grande fille tira Pécuchet par la redingote ; un vieux en lunettes lui posa la main sur l'épaule ; tous braillaient à la fois ; puis quittant leurs baraques, ils vinrent les entourer, redoublaient de sollicitations et d'injures.

Bouvard n'y tint plus. — Laissez-nous tranquilles, nom de Dieu ! La tourbe s'écarta.

Mais une grosse femme les suivit quelque temps sur la Place, et cria qu'ils s'en repentiraient.

En rentrant à l'auberge, ils trouvèrent dans le café Goutman. Son négoce l'appelait en ces parages — et il causait avec un individu examinant des bordereaux, sur la table, devant eux.

Cet individu avait une casquette de cuir, un pantalon très large, le teint rouge et la taille fine, malgré ses cheveux blancs, l'air à la fois d'un officier en retraite, et d'un vieux cabotin.

De temps à autre, il lâchait un juron puis, sur un mot de Goutman dit plus bas, se calmait de suite, et passait à un autre papier.

Bouvard qui l'observait, au bout d'un quart d'heure s'approcha de lui.

— Barberou, je crois ?

— Bouvard ! s'écria l'homme à la casquette, et ils s'embrassèrent.

Barberou depuis vingt ans avait enduré toutes sortes de fortunes. Gérant d'un journal, commis d'assurances, directeur d'un parc aux huîtres ; je vous conterai cela ; enfin revenu à son premier métier, il voyageait pour une maison de Bordeaux, et Goutman qui faisait le diocèse lui plaçait des vins chez les ecclésiastiques — mais permettez ; dans une minute, je suis à vous !

Il avait repris ses comptes, quand bondissant sur la banquette :

— Comment, deux mille ?

— Sans doute !

— Ah ! elle est forte, celle-là !

— Vous dites ?

— Je dis que j'ai vu Hérambert moi-même, répliqua Barberou furieux. La facture porte quatre mille ; pas de blagues !

Le brocanteur ne perdit point contenance.

— Eh bien ; elle vous libère ! après ?

Barberou se leva, et à sa figure blême d'abord, puis violette, Bouvard et Pécuchet croyaient qu'il allait étrangler Goutman.

Il se rassit, croisa les bras. Vous êtes une rude canaille, convenez-en !

— Pas d'injures, monsieur Barberou ; il y a des témoins ; prenez garde !

— Je vous flanquerai un procès !

— Ta ! ta ! ta !

Puis ayant bouclé son portefeuille, Goutman souleva le bord de son chapeau :

— À l'avantage ! et il sortit.

Barberou exposa les faits : pour une créance de mille francs doublée par suite de manoeuvres usuraires, il avait livré à Goutman trois mille francs de vins ; ce qui payerait sa dette avec mille francs de bénéfice ; mais au contraire, il en devait trois mille. Ses patrons le renverraient, on le poursuivrait ! — Crapule ! brigand ! sale juif ! — et ça dîne dans les presbytères ! D'ailleurs, tout ce qui touche à la calotte !... Il déblatéra contre les prêtres, et tapait sur la table avec tant de violence que la statuette faillit tomber.

— Doucement ! dit Bouvard.

— Tiens ! Qu'est-ce que ça ? et Barberou ayant défait l'enveloppe de la petite vierge : un bibelot du pèlerinage ! À vous ?

Bouvard, au lieu de répondre, sourit d'une manière ambiguë.

— C'est à moi ! dit Pécuchet.

— Vous m'affligez reprit Barberou ; mais je vous éduquerai là-dessus, — n'ayez pas peur ! Et comme on doit être philosophe, et que la tristesse ne sert à rien, il leur offrit à déjeuner.

Tous les trois s'attablèrent.

Barberou fut aimable, rappela le vieux temps, prit la taille de la bonne, voulut toiser le ventre de Bouvard. Il irait chez eux bientôt, et leur apporterait un livre farce.

L'idée de sa visite les réjouissait médiocrement. Ils en causèrent dans la voiture, pendant une heure, au trot du cheval. Ensuite Pécuchet ferma les paupières. Bouvard se taisait aussi. Intérieurement, il penchait vers la Religion.

M. Marescot s'était présenté la veille pour leur faire une communication importante. — Marcel n'en savait pas davantage.

Le notaire ne put les recevoir que trois jours après ; — et de suite exposa la chose. Pour une rente de sept mille cinq cents francs, Mme Bordin proposait à M. Bouvard de lui acheter leur ferme.

Elle la reluquait depuis sa jeunesse, en connaissait les tenants et aboutissants, défauts et avantages — et ce désir était comme un cancer qui la minait. Car la bonne dame en vraie Normande, chérissait par-dessus tout le bien moins pour la sécurité du capital que pour le bonheur de fouler un sol vous appartenant. Dans l'espoir de celui-là, elle avait pratiqué des enquêtes, une surveillance journalière, de longues économies, et elle attendait avec impatience, la réponse de Bouvard.

Il fut embarrassé, ne voulant pas que Pécuchet un jour se trouvât sans fortune ; mais il fallait saisir l'occasion, — qui était l'effet du pèlerinage. — La Providence pour la seconde fois se manifestait en leur faveur.

Ils offrirent les conditions suivantes : la rente non pas de sept mille cinq cents francs mais de six mille serait dévolue au dernier survivant. Marescot fit valoir que l'un était faible de santé. Le tempérament de l'autre le disposait à l'apoplexie, et Mme Bordin signa le contrat, emportée par la passion.

Bouvard en resta mélancolique. Quelqu'un désirait sa mort ; et cette réflexion lui inspira des pensées graves, des idées de Dieu, et d'éternité.

Trois jours après M. Jeufroy les invita au repas de cérémonie qu'il donnait une fois par an à des collègues.

Le dîner commença vers deux heures de l'après-midi, pour finir à onze du soir. On y but du poiré, on y débita des calembours. L'abbé Pruneau composa séance tenante un acrostiche, M. Bougon fit des tours de cartes, et Cerpet, jeune vicaire, chanta une petite romance qui frisait la galanterie. Un pareil milieu divertit Bouvard. Il fut moins sombre le lendemain.

Le curé vint le voir fréquemment. Il présentait la Religion sous des couleurs gracieuses. Que risque-t-on, du reste ? — et Bouvard consentit bientôt à s'approcher de la sainte table. Pécuchet, en même temps que lui, participerait au sacrement.

Le grand jour arriva.

L'église, à cause des premières communions était pleine de monde. Les bourgeois et les bourgeoises encombraient leurs bancs, et le menu peuple se tenait debout par derrière, ou dans le jubé, au-dessus de la porte.

Ce qui allait se passer tout à l'heure était inexplicable, songeait Bouvard ; mais la Raison ne suffit pas à comprendre certaines choses. De très grands hommes ont admis celle-là. Autant faire comme eux. Et dans une sorte d'engourdissement, il contemplait l'autel, l'encensoir, les flambeaux, la tête un peu vide car il n'avait rien mangé — et éprouvait une singulière faiblesse.

Pécuchet en méditant la Passion de Jésus-Christ s'excitait à des élans d'amour. Il aurait voulu lui offrir son âme, celle des autres — et les ravissements, les transports, les illuminations des saints, tous les êtres, l'univers entier. Bien qu'il priât avec ferveur, les différentes parties de la messe lui semblèrent un peu longues.

Enfin, les petits garçons s'agenouillèrent sur la première marche de l'autel, formant avec leurs habits, une bande noire, que surmontaient inégalement des chevelures blondes ou brunes. Les petites filles les remplacèrent, ayant sous leurs couronnes, des voiles qui tombaient ; de loin, on aurait dit un alignement de nuées blanches au fond du chœur.

Puis ce fut le tour des grandes personnes.

La première du côté de l'Évangile était Pécuchet ; mais trop ému, sans doute, il oscillait la tête de droite et de gauche. Le curé eut peine à lui mettre l'hostie dans la bouche, et il la reçut en tournant les prunelles.

Bouvard, au contraire, ouvrit si largement les mâchoires que sa langue lui pendait sur la lèvre comme un drapeau. En se relevant, il coudoya Mme Bordin. Leurs yeux se rencontrèrent. Elle souriait ; sans savoir pourquoi, il rougit.

Après Mme Bordin communiquèrent ensemble Mlle de Faverges, la Comtesse, leur dame de compagnie, — et un monsieur que l'on ne connaissait pas à Chavignolles.

Les deux derniers furent Placquevent, et Petit l'instituteur ; — quand tout à coup on vit paraître Gorju.

Il n'avait plus de barbiche ; — et il regagna sa place, les bras en croix sur la poitrine, d'une manière fort édifiante.

Le curé harangua les petits garçons. Qu'ils aient soin plus tard de ne point faire comme Judas qui trahit son Dieu, et de conserver toujours leur robe d'innocence. Pécuchet regretta la sienne. Mais on remuait des chaises ; les mères avaient hâte d'embrasser leurs enfants.

Les paroissiens à la sortie, échangèrent des félicitations. Quelques-uns pleuraient. Mme de Faverges en attendant sa voiture se tourna vers Bouvard et Pécuchet, et présenta son futur gendre : — M. le baron de Mahurot, ingénieur. Le comte se plaignait de ne pas les voir. Il serait revenu la semaine prochaine. Notez-le ! je vous prie. La calèche était arrivée ; les dames du château partirent. Et la foule se dispersa.

Ils trouvèrent dans leur cour un paquet au milieu de l'herbe. Le facteur, comme la maison était close, l'avait jeté par-dessus le mur. C'était l'ouvrage que Barberou avait promis, — Examen du Christianisme par Louis Hervieu, ancien élève de l'École normale. Pécuchet le repoussa. Bouvard ne désirait pas le connaître.

On lui avait répété que le sacrement le transformerait : durant plusieurs jours, il guetta des floraisons dans sa conscience. Il était toujours le même ; et un étonnement douloureux le saisit.

Comment ! la chair de Dieu se mêle à notre chair — et elle n'y cause rien ! La pensée qui gouverne les mondes n'éclaire pas notre esprit. Le suprême pouvoir nous abandonne à l'impuissance.

M. Jeufroy, en le rassurant, lui ordonna le Catéchisme de l'abbé Gaume.

Au contraire, la dévotion de Pécuchet s'était développée. Il aurait voulu communier sous les deux espèces, chantait des psaumes, en se promenant dans le corridor, arrêta les Chavignollais pour discuter, et les convertir. Vaucorbeil lui rit au nez, Girbal haussa les épaules, et le capitaine l'appela Tartuffe. On trouvait maintenant qu'ils allaient trop loin.

Une excellente habitude c'est d'envisager les choses comme autant de symboles. Si le tonnerre gronde, figurez-vous le jugement dernier ; devant un ciel sans nuages, pensez au séjour des bienheureux ; dites-vous dans vos promenades que chaque pas vous rapproche de la mort. Pécuchet observa cette méthode. Quand il prenait ses habits il songeait à l'enveloppe charnelle dont la seconde personne de la Trinité s'est revêtue. Le tic-tac de l'horloge lui rappelait les battements de son cœur, une piqure d'épingle les clous de la croix. Mais il eut beau se tenir à genoux pendant des heures, et multiplier les jeûnes, et se pressurer l'imagination, le détachement de soi-même ne se faisait pas ; impossible d'atteindre à la contemplation parfaite !

Il recourut à des auteurs mystiques : sainte Thérèse, Jean de la Croix, Louis de Grenade, Simpoli, — et de plus modernes, Monseigneur Chaillot. Au lieu des sublinités qu'il attendait, il ne rencontra que des platitudes, un style très lâche, de froides images, et force comparaisons tirées de la boutique des lapidaires.

Il apprit cependant qu'il y a une purgation active et une purgation passive, une vision interne et une vision externe, quatre espèces d'oraisons, neuf excellences dans l'amour, six degrés dans l'humilité, et que la blessure de l'âme ne diffère pas beaucoup du vol spirituel.

Des points l'embarrassaient.

— Puisque la chair est maudite, comment se fait-il que l'on doive remercier Dieu pour le bienfait de l'existence ? Quelle mesure garder entre la crainte indispensable au salut, et l'espérance qui ne l'est pas moins ? Où est le signe de la grâce ? etc. !

Les réponses de M. Jeufroy étaient simples : — Ne vous tourmentez pas ! À vouloir tout approfondir, on court sur une pente dangereuse.

Le Catéchisme de Persévérance par Gaume avait tellement dégoûté Bouvard qu'il prit le volume de Louis Hervieu — c'était un sommaire de l'exégèse moderne défendu par le gouvernement. Barberou, comme républicain l'avait acheté.

Il éveilla des doutes dans l'esprit de Bouvard — et d'abord sur le péché originel. — Si Dieu a créé l'Homme peccable, il ne devait pas le punir ; et le mal est antérieur à la chute, puisqu'il y avait déjà, des volcans, des bêtes féroces ! Enfin ce dogme bouleverse mes notions de justice !

— Que voulez-vous disait le curé c'est une de ces vérités dont tout le monde est d'accord sans qu'on puisse en fournir de preuves ; — et nous-mêmes nous faisons rejaillir sur les enfants les crimes de leurs pères. Ainsi les mœurs et les lois justifient ce décret de la Providence, que l'on retrouve dans la Nature.

Bouvard hocha la tête. Il doutait aussi de l'enfer.

— Car tout châtement doit viser à l'amélioration du coupable — ce qui devient impossible avec une peine éternelle ! — et combien l'endurent ! Songez donc : tous les Anciens, les juifs, les musulmans, les idolâtres, les hérétiques et les enfants morts sans baptême, ces enfants créés par Dieu ! et dans quel but ? pour les punir d'une faute, qu'ils n'ont pas commise !

— Telle est l'opinion de saint Augustin ajouta le curé et saint Fulgence enveloppe dans la damnation jusqu'aux foetus. L'Église, il est vrai, n'a rien décidé à cet égard. Une remarque pourtant : ce n'est pas Dieu, mais le pécheur qui se damne lui-même ; et l'offense étant infinie, puisque Dieu est infini, la punition doit être infinie. Est-ce tout, monsieur ?

— Expliquez-moi la Trinité dit Bouvard.

— Avec plaisir ! — Prenons une comparaison : les trois côtés du triangle, ou plutôt notre âme, qui contient : être, connaître et vouloir ; ce qu'on appelle faculté chez l'Homme est personne en Dieu. Voilà le mystère.

— Mais les trois côtés du triangle ne sont pas chacun le triangle. Ces trois facultés de l'âme ne font pas trois âmes. Et vos personnes de la Trinité sont trois Dieux.

— Blasphème !

— Alors il n'y a qu'une personne, un Dieu, une substance affectée de trois manières !

— Adorons sans comprendre dit le curé.

— Soit ! dit Bouvard.

Il avait peur de passer pour un impie, d'être mal vu au château.

Maintenant ils y venaient trois fois la semaine — vers cinq heures — en hiver — et la tasse de thé les réchauffait. M. le comte par ses allures rappelait le chic de l'ancienne cour, la Comtesse placide et grasse, montrait sur toutes choses un grand discernement. Mlle Yolande leur fille, était le type de la jeune personne, l'Ange des keepsakes — et Mme de Noares leur dame de compagnie ressemblait à Pécuchet, ayant son nez pointu.

La première fois qu'ils entrèrent dans le salon, elle défendait quelqu'un.

— Je vous assure qu'il est changé ! Son cadeau le prouve.

Ce quelqu'un était Gorju. Il venait d'offrir aux futurs époux un prie-Dieu gothique. On l'apporta. Les armes des deux maisons s'y étalaient en reliefs de couleur. M. de Mahurot en parut content ; et Mme de Noares lui dit :

— Vous vous souviendrez de mon protégé !

Ensuite, elle amena deux enfants, un gamin d'une douzaine d'années et sa soeur, qui en avait dix peut-être. Par les trous de leurs guenilles, on voyait leurs membres rouges de froid. L'un était chaussé de vieilles pantoufles, l'autre n'avait plus qu'un sabot. Leurs fronts disparaissaient sous leurs chevelures et ils regardaient autour d'eux avec des prunelles ardentes comme de jeunes loups effarés.

Mme de Noares conta qu'elle les avait rencontrés le matin sur la grande route. Placquevent ne pouvait fournir aucun détail.

On leur demanda leur nom. Victor — Victorine. — Où était leur père ? — En prison. — Et avant, que faisait-il ? — Rien. — Leur pays. — Saint-Pierre. — Mais quel Saint-Pierre ? Les deux petits pour toute réponse disaient en reniflant : — Sais pas, sais pas. Leur mère était morte et ils mendiaient.

Mme de Noares exposa combien il serait dangereux de les abandonner ; elle attendrit la Comtesse, piqua d'honneur le Comte, fut soutenue par Mademoiselle, s'obstina, réussit. La femme du garde-chasse en prendrait soin. On leur trouverait de l'ouvrage plus tard ; — et comme ils ne savaient ni lire ni écrire, Mme de Noares leur donnerait elle-même des leçons afin de les préparer au catéchisme.

Quand M. Jeufroy venait au château, on allait quérir les deux mioches, il les interrogeait puis faisait une conférence, où il mettait de la prétention, à cause de l'auditoire.

Une fois, qu'il avait discoursu sur les Patriarches, Bouvard en s'en retournant avec lui et Pécuchet, les dénigra fortement.

Jacob s'est distingué par des filouteries, David par les meurtres, Salomon par ses débauches.

L'abbé lui répondit qu'il fallait voir plus loin. Le sacrifice d'Abraham est la figure de la Passion. Jacob une autre figure du Messie, comme Joseph, comme le serpent d'airain, comme Moïse.

— Croyez-vous dit Bouvard, qu'il ait composé le Pentateuque ?

— Oui ! sans doute !

— Cependant on y raconte sa mort ! même observation pour Josué — et quant aux Juges, l'auteur nous prévient qu'à l'époque dont il fait l'histoire, Israël n'avait pas encore de Rois. L'ouvrage fut donc écrit sous les Rois. Les Prophètes aussi m'étonnent.

— Il va nier les Prophètes, maintenant !

— Pas du tout ! mais leur esprit échauffé percevait Jéhovah sous des formes diverses, celle d'un feu, d'une broussaille, d'un vieillard, d'une colombe ; et ils n'étaient pas certains de la Révélation puisqu'ils demandent toujours un signe.

— Ah ! — et vous avez découvert ces belles choses ?...

— Dans Spinoza ! À ce mot, le curé bondit. — L'avez-vous lu ?

— Dieu m'en garde !

— Pourtant, monsieur, la Science !...

— Monsieur, on n'est pas savant, si l'on n'est chrétien.

La Science lui inspirait des sarcasmes. — Fera-t-elle pousser un épi de grain, votre Science ! Que savons-nous ? disait-il.

Mais il savait que le monde a été créé pour nous ; il savait que les Archanges sont au-dessus des Anges ; — il savait que le corps humain ressuscitera tel qu'il était vers la trentaine.

Son aplomb sacerdotal agaçait Bouvard, qui par méfiance de Louis Hervieu écrivit à Varlot. Et Pécuchet mieux informé, demanda à M. Jeufroy des explications sur l'Écriture.

Les six jours de la Genèse veulent dire six grandes époques. Le rapt des vases précieux fait par les juifs aux Égyptiens doit s'entendre des richesses intellectuelles, les Arts, dont ils avaient dérobé le secret. Isaïe ne se dépouilla pas complètement — Nudus en latin signifiant nu jusqu'aux hanches ; ainsi Virgile conseille de se mettre nu, pour labourer, et cet écrivain n'eût pas donné un précepte contraire à la pudeur ! Ézéchiél dévorant un livre n'a rien d'extraordinaire ; ne dit-on pas dévorer une brochure, un journal ?

Mais si l'on voit partout des métaphores que deviendront les faits ? L'abbé, soutenait cependant qu'ils étaient réels.

Cette manière de les entendre parut déloyale à Pécuchet. Il poussa plus loin ses recherches et apporta une note sur les contradictions de la Bible.

L'Exode nous apprend que pendant quarante ans on fit des sacrifices dans le désert ; on n'en fit aucun suivant Amos et Jérémie. Les Paralipomènes et Esdras ne sont point d'accord sur le dénombrement du Peuple. Dans le Deutéronome, Moïse voit le Seigneur face à face ; d'après l'Exode, jamais il ne put le voir. Où est, alors, l'inspiration ?

— Motif de plus pour l'admettre répliquait en souriant M. Jeufroy. Les imposteurs ont besoin de connivence, les sincères n'y prennent garde. Dans l'embarras recourons à l'Église. Elle est toujours infaillible.

De qui relève l'infailibilité ?

Les conciles de Bâle et de Constance l'attribuent aux conciles. Mais souvent les conciles diffèrent, témoin ce qui se passa pour Athanase et pour Arius. Ceux de Florence et de Latran la décernent au pape. Mais Adrien VI déclare que le Pape, comme un autre, peut se tromper.

Chicanes ! Tout cela ne fait rien à la permanence du dogme.

L'ouvrage de Louis Hervieu en signale les variations : le baptême autrefois était réservé pour les adultes. L'extrême-onction ne fut un sacrement qu'au IX<sup>e</sup> siècle ; la Présence réelle a été décrétée au VIII<sup>e</sup>, le Purgatoire, reconnu au XV<sup>e</sup>, l'Immaculée Conception est d'hier.

Et Pécuchet en arriva à ne plus savoir que penser de Jésus. Trois évangiles en font un homme. Dans un passage de saint Jean il paraît s'égaliser à Dieu ; dans un autre du même se reconnaître son inférieur.

L'abbé ripostait par la lettre du roi Abgar, les Actes de Pilate et le témoignage des Sibylles dont le fond est véritable. Il retrouvait la Vierge dans les Gaules, l'annonce d'un Rédempteur en Chine, la Trinité partout, la Croix sur le bonnet du grand lama, en Égypte au poing des dieux ; — et même il fit voir une gravure, représentant un nilomètre, lequel était un phallus suivant Pécuchet.

M. Jeufroy consultait secrètement son ami Pruneau, qui lui cherchait des preuves dans les auteurs. Une lutte d'érudition s'engagea ; et fouetté par l'amour-propre Pécuchet devint transcendant, mythologue.

Il comparait la Vierge à Isis, l'eucharistie au Homa des Perses, Bacchus à Moïse, l'arche de Noé au vaisseau de Xithuros, ces ressemblances pour lui démontraient l'identité des religions.

Mais il ne peut y avoir plusieurs religions, puisqu'il n'y a qu'un Dieu — et quand il était à bout d'arguments, l'homme à la soutane s'écriait : — C'est un mystère !

Que signifie ce mot ? Défaut de savoir ; très bien. Mais s'il désigne une chose dont le seul énoncé implique contradiction, c'est une sottise ; — et Pécuchet ne quittait plus M. Jeufroy. Il le surprenait dans son jardin, l'attendait au confessionnal, le relançait dans la sacristie.

Le prêtre imaginait des ruses pour le fuir.

Un jour, qu'il était parti à Sassetot administrer quelqu'un, Pécuchet se porta au-devant de lui sur la route, manière de rendre la conversation inévitable.

C'était le soir, vers la fin d'août. Le ciel écarlate se rembrunit, et un gros nuage s'y forma, régulier dans le bas, avec des volutes au sommet.

Pécuchet d'abord, parla de choses indifférentes, puis ayant glissé le mot martyr :

— Combien pensez-vous qu'il y en ait eu ?

— Une vingtaine de millions, pour le moins.

— Leur nombre n'est pas si grand, dit Origène.

— Origène, vous savez, est suspect !

Un large coup de vent passa, inclinant l'herbe des fossés, et les deux rangs d'ormes jusqu'au bout de l'horizon.

Pécuchet reprit : — On classe dans les martyrs, beaucoup d'évêques gaulois, tués en résistant aux Barbares, ce qui n'est plus la question.

— Allez-vous défendre les Empereurs !

Suivant Pécuchet, on les avait calomniés. — L'histoire de la Légion thébaine est une fable. Je conteste également Symphorose et ses sept fils, Félicité et ses sept filles, et les sept vierges d'Ancyre, condamnées au viol, bien que septuagénaires, et les onze mille vierges de sainte Ursule, dont une compagne s'appelait Undecemilla, un nom pris pour un chiffre, — encore plus les dix martyrs d'Alexandrie !

— Cependant !... Cependant, ils se trouvent dans des auteurs dignes de créance.

Des gouttes d'eau tombèrent. Le curé déploya son parapluie ; — et Pécuchet, quand il fut dessous, osa prétendre que les catholiques avaient fait plus de martyrs chez les juifs, les musulmans, les protestants, et les libres penseurs que tous les Romains autrefois.

L'ecclésiastique se récria :

— Mais on compte dix persécutions depuis Néron jusqu'au César Galère !

— Eh bien, et les massacres des Albigeois ! et la Saint-Barthélemy ! et la Révocation de l'édit de Nantes !

— Excès déplorables sans doute mais vous n'allez pas comparer ces gens-là à saint Étienne, saint Laurent, Cyprien, Polycarpe, une foule de missionnaires.

— Pardon ! je vous rappellerai Hypatie, Jérôme de Prague, Jean Huss, Bruno, Vanini, Anne Du Bourg !

La pluie augmentait, et ses rayons dardaient si fort, qu'ils rebondissaient du sol, comme de petites fusées blanches. Pécuchet et M. Jeufroy marchaient avec lenteur serrés l'un contre l'autre, et le curé disait :

— Après des supplices abominables, on les jetait dans des chaudières !

— L'Inquisition employait de même la torture, et elle vous brûlait très bien.

— On exposait les dames illustres dans les lupanars !

— Croyez-vous que les dragons de Louis XIV fussent décents ?

— Et notez que les chrétiens n'avaient rien fait contre l'État !

— Les Huguenots pas davantage !

Le vent chassait, balayait la pluie dans l'air. Elle claquait sur les feuilles, ruisselait au bord du chemin, et le ciel couleur de boue se confondait avec les champs dénudés, la moisson étant finie. Pas un toit. Au loin seulement, la cabane d'un berger.

Le maigre paletot de Pécuchet n'avait plus un fil de sec. L'eau coulait le long de son échine, entraînait dans ses bottes, dans ses oreilles, dans ses yeux, malgré la visière de la casquette Amoros. Le curé, en portant d'un bras la queue de sa soutane, se découvrait les jambes, et les pointes de son tricorné crachaient l'eau sur ses épaules comme des gargouilles de cathédrale.

Il fallut s'arrêter, et tournant leur dos à la tempête, ils restèrent face à face, ventre contre ventre, en tenant à quatre mains le parapluie qui oscillait.

M. Jeufroy n'avait pas interrompu la défense des catholiques.

— Ont-ils crucifié vos protestants, comme le fut saint Siméon, ou fait dévorer un homme par deux tigres comme il advint à saint Ignace ?

— Mais comptez-vous pour quelque chose, tant de femmes séparées de leurs maris, d'enfants arrachés à leurs mères ! Et les exils des pauvres, à travers la neige, au milieu des précipices ! On les entassait dans les prisons ; à peine morts on les traînait sur la claie.

L'abbé ricana : — Vous me permettrez de n'en rien croire ! Et nos martyrs à nous sont moins douteux. Sainte Blandine a été livrée dans un filet à une vache furieuse. Sainte Julie périt assommée de coups. Saint Taraque, saint Probus et saint Andronic, on leur a brisé les dents avec un marteau, déchiré les côtes avec des peignes de fer, traversé les mains avec des clous rougis, enlevé la peau du crâne !

— Vous exagérez dit Pécuchet. La mort des martyrs était dans ce temps-là une amplification de rhétorique !

— Comment de la rhétorique ?

— Mais oui ! tandis que moi, monsieur, je vous raconte de l'histoire. Les catholiques en Irlande éventrèrent des femmes enceintes pour prendre leurs enfants !

— Jamais.

— Et les donner aux pourceaux !

— Allons donc !

— En Belgique, ils les enterraient toutes vives.

— Quelle plaisanterie.

— On a leurs noms !

— Et quand même objecta le Prêtre, en secouant de colère son parapluie on ne peut les appeler des martyrs. Il n'y en a pas en dehors de l'Eglise.

— Un mot. Si la valeur du martyr dépend de la doctrine, comment servirait-il à en démontrer l'excellence ?

La pluie se calmait ; jusqu'au village ils ne parlèrent plus.

Mais, sur le seuil du presbytère, l'Abbé dit :

— Je vous plains ! véritablement, je vous plains !

Pécuchet conta de suite à Bouvard son altercation. Elle lui avait causé une malveillance antireligieuse ; — et une heure après, assis devant un feu de broussailles, il lisait le Curé Meslier. Ces négations lourdes le choquèrent ; puis se reprochant d'avoir méconnu, peut-être, des héros, il feuilleta dans la Biographie, l'histoire des martyrs les plus illustres.

Quelles clameurs du Peuple, quand ils entraient dans l'arène ! — et si les lions et les jaguars étaient trop doux, du geste et de la voix ils les excitaient à s'avancer. On les voyait tout couverts de sang, sourire debout le regard au ciel ; — sainte Perpétue renoua ses cheveux pour ne point paraître affligée. — Pécuchet se mit à réfléchir — La fenêtre était ouverte, la nuit tranquille, beaucoup d'étoiles brillaient — Il devait se passer dans leur âme des choses dont nous n'avons plus l'idée, une joie, un spasme divin ? — Et Pécuchet à force d'y rêver dit qu'il comprenait cela, aurait fait comme eux.

— Toi ?

— Certainement.

— Pas de blagues ! Crois-tu oui, ou non ?

— Je ne sais.

Il alluma une chandelle — puis ses yeux tombant sur le crucifix dans l'alcôve : — Combien de misérables ont recouru à celui-là ! et après un silence : On l'a dénaturé ! c'est la faute de Rome : la politique du Vatican !

Mais Bouvard admirait l'Église pour sa magnificence, et aurait souhaité au moyen âge être un cardinal. — J'aurais eu bonne mine sous la pourpre, conviens-en !

La casquette de Pécuchet posée devant les charbons n'était pas sèche encore. Tout en l'étirant, il sentit quelque chose dans la doublure, et une médaille de saint Joseph tomba. Ils furent troublés, le fait leur paraissant inexplicable.

Mme de Noares voulut savoir de Pécuchet s'il n'avait pas éprouvé comme un changement, un bonheur, et se trahit par ses questions. Une fois, pendant qu'il jouait au billard, elle lui avait cousu la médaille dans sa casquette.

Évidemment, elle l'aimait ; ils auraient pu se marier : elle était veuve ; et il ne soupçonna pas cet amour, qui peut-être eût fait le bonheur de sa vie.

Bien qu'il se montrât plus religieux que M. Bouvard, elle l'avait dédié à saint Joseph, dont le secours est excellent pour les conversions.

Personne, comme elle, ne connaissait tous les chapelets et les indulgences qu'ils procurent, l'effet des reliques, les privilèges des eaux saintes. Sa montre était retenue par une chaînette qui avait touché aux liens de saint Pierre. Parmi ses breloques luisait une perle d'or, à l'imitation de celle qui contient dans l'église d'Allouagne une larme de Notre-Seigneur. Un anneau à son petit doigt enfermait des cheveux du curé d'Ars ; — et comme elle cueillait des simples pour les malades, sa chambre ressemblait à une sacristie et à une officine d'apothicaire.

Son temps se passait à écrire des lettres, à visiter les pauvres, à dissoudre des concubinages, à répandre des photographies du Sacré-Coeur. Un monsieur devait lui envoyer de la Pâte des martyrs : mélange de cire pascalle et de poussière humaine prise aux catacombes, et qui s'emploie dans les cas désespérés en mouches ou en pilules. Elle en promit à Pécuchet.

Il parut choqué d'un tel matérialisme.

Le soir, un valet du château lui apporta une hottée d'opuscules, relatant des paroles pieuses du grand Napoléon, des bons mots de curé dans les auberges, des morts effrayantes advenues à des impies. Mme de Noares savait tout cela par cœur, avec une infinité de miracles.

Elle en contait de stupides — des miracles sans but, comme si Dieu les eût faits pour ébahir le monde. Sa grand'mère, à elle-même, avait serré dans une armoire des pruneaux couverts d'un linge, et quand on ouvrit l'armoire un an plus tard, on en vit treize sur la nappe, formant la croix. — Expliquez-moi cela. C'était son mot après ses histoires, qu'elle soutenait avec un entêtement de bourrique, bonne femme d'ailleurs, et d'humeur enjouée.

Une fois pourtant, elle sortit de son caractère. Bouvard lui contestait le miracle de Pezilla : un compotier où l'on avait caché des hosties pendant la Révolution se dora de lui-même — tout seul.

Peut-être y avait-il, au fond, un peu de couleur jaune provenant de l'humidité ?

— Mais non ! je vous répète que non ! La dorure a pour cause le contact de l'Eucharistie et elle donna en preuve l'attestation des évêques. C'est, disent-ils, comme un bouclier, un... un palladium sur le diocèse de Perpignan. Demandez plutôt à M. Jeufroy !

Bouvard n'y tint plus ; et ayant repassé son Louis Hervieu, emmena Pécuchet.

L'ecclésiastique finissait de dîner. Reine offrit des sièges, et sur un geste, alla prendre deux petits verres qu'elle emplit de Rosolio.

Après quoi, Bouvard exposa ce qui l'amenait.

L'abbé ne répondit pas franchement. Tout est possible à Dieu — et les miracles sont une preuve de la Religion.

— Cependant, il y a des lois.

— Cela n'y fait rien. Il les dérange pour instruire, corriger.

— Que savez-vous s'il les dérange ? répliqua Bouvard. Tant que la Nature suit sa routine, on n'y pense pas ; mais dans un phénomène extraordinaire, nous voyons la main de Dieu.

— Elle peut y être dit l'ecclésiastique et quand un événement se trouve certifié par des témoins...

— Les témoins gobent tout, car il y a de faux miracles !

Le prêtre devint rouge. — Sans doute... quelquefois.

— Comment les distinguer des vrais ? Et si les vrais donnés en preuves ont eux-mêmes besoin de preuves, pourquoi en faire ?

Reine intervint, et prêchant comme son maître, dit qu'il fallait obéir.

— La vie est un passage, mais la mort est éternelle !

— Bref ajouta Bouvard, en lampant le Rosolio, les miracles d'autrefois ne sont pas mieux démontrés que les miracles d'aujourd'hui ; des raisons analogues défendent ceux des chrétiens et des païens.

Le curé jeta sa fourchette sur la table. — Ceux-là étaient faux, encore un coup ! — Pas de miracles en dehors de l'Église !

— Tiens se dit Pécuchet même argument que pour les martyrs : la doctrine s'appuie sur les faits et les faits sur la doctrine.

M. Jeufroy, ayant bu un verre d'eau, reprit :

— Tout en les niant, vous y croyez. Le monde, que convertissent douze pêcheurs, voilà, il me semble, un beau miracle ?

— Pas du tout ! Pécuchet en rendait compte d'une autre manière. Le monothéisme vient des Hébreux, la Trinité des Indiens. Le Logos est à Platon, la Vierge-mère à l'Asie.

N'importe ! M. Jeufroy tenait au surnaturel, ne voulait que le christianisme pût avoir humainement la moindre raison d'être, bien qu'il en vît chez tous les peuples, des prodromes ou des déformations. L'impiété railleuse du XVIIIe siècle, il l'eût tolérée ; mais la critique moderne avec sa politesse, l'exaspérait.

— J'aime mieux l'athée qui blasphème que le sceptique qui ergote !

Puis il les regarda d'un air de bravade, comme pour les congédier.

Pécuchet s'en retourna mélancolique. Il avait espéré l'accord de la Foi et de la Raison.

Bouvard lui fit lire ce passage de Louis Hervieu :

Pour connaître l'abîme qui les sépare, opposez leurs axiomes :

La Raison vous dit : Le tout enferme la partie ; et la Foi vous répond par la substantiation. Jésus communiant avec ses apôtres, avait son corps dans sa main, et sa tête dans sa bouche.

La Raison vous dit : On n'est pas responsable du crime des autres — et la

Foi vous répond par le Péch<sup>é</sup> originel.

La Raison vous dit : Trois c'est trois — et la Foi déclare que : Trois c'est un.

Et ils ne fréquentèrent plus l'abbé.

C'était l'époque de la guerre d'Italie. Les honnêtes gens tremblaient pour le Pape. On tonnait contre Emmanuel. Mme de Noares allait jusqu'à lui souhaiter la mort.

Bouvard et Pécuchet ne protestaient que timidement. Quand la porte du salon tournait devant eux et qu'ils se miraient en passant dans les hautes glaces, tandis que par les fenêtres on apercevait les allées, où tranchait sur la verdure le gilet rouge d'un domestique, ils éprouvaient un plaisir ; et le luxe du milieu les faisait indulgents aux paroles qui s'y débitaient.

Le comte leur prêta tous les ouvrages de M. de Maistre. Il en développait les principes, devant un cercle d'intimes : Hurel, le curé, le juge de paix, le notaire et le baron son futur gendre, qui venait de temps à autre pour vingt-quatre heures au château.

— Ce qu'il y a d'abominable disait le comte c'est l'esprit de 89 ! D'abord on conteste Dieu, ensuite, on discute le gouvernement, puis arrive la liberté ; liberté d'injures, de révolte, de jouissances, ou plutôt de pillage. Si bien que la Religion et le Pouvoir doivent proscrire les indépendants, les hérétiques. On criera sans doute, à la Persécution ! comme si les bourreaux persécutaient les criminels. Je me résume. Point d'État sans Dieu ! la Loi ne pouvant être respectée que si elle vient d'en haut ; et actuellement il ne s'agit pas des Italiens mais de savoir qui l'emportera de la Révolution ou du Pape, de Satan ou de Jésus-Christ !

M. Jeufroy approuvait par des monosyllabes, Hurel avec un sourire, le juge de paix en dodelinant la tête. Bouvard et Pécuchet regardaient le plafond, Mme de Noares, la comtesse et Yolande travaillaient pour les pauvres — et M. de Mahurot près de sa fiancée, parcourait les feuilles.

Puis, il y avait des silences, où chacun semblait plongé dans la recherche d'un problème. Napoléon III n'était plus un Sauveur, et même il donnait un exemple déplorable, en laissant aux Tuileries, les maçons travailler le dimanche.

— On ne devrait pas permettre était la phrase ordinaire de M. le Comte. Économie sociale, beaux-arts, littérature, histoire, doctrines scientifiques, il décidait de tout, en sa qualité de chrétien et de père de famille ; — et plût à Dieu que le gouvernement à cet égard eût la même rigueur qu'il déployait dans sa maison. Le Pouvoir seul est juge des dangers de la science ; répandue trop largement elle inspire au peuple des ambitions funestes. Il était plus heureux, ce pauvre peuple, quand les seigneurs et les évêques tempéraient l'absolutisme du roi. Les industriels maintenant l'exploitent. Il va tomber en esclavage !

Et tous regrettaient l'ancien régime, Hurel par bassesse, Coulon par ignorance, Marescot, comme artiste.

Bouvard une fois chez lui, se retrempait avec La Mettrie, d'Holbach, etc. — et Pécuchet s'éloigna d'une religion, devenue un moyen de gouvernement. M. de Mahurot avait communiqué pour séduire mieux ces dames et s'il pratiquait, c'était à cause des domestiques.

Mathématicien et dilettante, jouant des valse sur le piano, et admirateur de Topffer, il se distinguait par un scepticisme de bon goût ; ce qu'on rapporte des abus féodaux, de l'Inquisition ou des Jésuites, préjugés, et il vantait le Progrès, bien qu'il méprisât tout ce qui n'était pas gentilhomme ou sorti de l'École Polytechnique.

M. Jeufroy, de même, leur déplaisait. Il croyait aux sortilèges, faisait des plaisanteries sur les idoles, affirmait que tous les idiomes sont dérivés de l'hébreu ; sa rhétorique manquait d'imprévu ; invariablement, c'était le cerf aux abois, le miel et l'absinthe, l'or et le plomb, des parfums, des urnes — et l'âme chrétienne, comparée au soldat qui doit dire en face du Péché : Tu ne passes pas !

Pour éviter ses conférences, ils arrivaient au château le plus tard possible.

Un jour pourtant, ils l'y trouvèrent.

Depuis une heure, il attendait ses deux élèves. Tout à coup Mme de Noares entra.

— La petite a disparu. J'amène Victor. Ah ! le malheureux.

Elle avait saisi dans sa poche, un dé d'argent perdu depuis trois jours, puis suffoquée par les sanglots : — Ce n'est pas tout ! ce n'est pas tout ! Pendant que je le grondais, il m'a montré son derrière ! Et avant que le Comte et la Comtesse aient rien dit : Du reste, c'est de ma faute, pardonnez-moi !

Elle leur avait caché que les deux orphelins étaient les enfants de Touache, maintenant au bagne.

Que faire ?

Si le Comte les renvoyait, ils étaient perdus — et son acte de charité passerait pour un caprice.

M. Jeufroy ne fut pas surpris. L'homme étant corrompu naturellement il fallait le châtier pour l'améliorer.

Bouvard protesta. La douceur valait mieux.

Mais le Comte, encore une fois s'étendit sur le bras de fer, indispensable aux enfants, comme pour les peuples. Ces deux-là étaient pleins de vices, la petite fille menteuse, le gamin brutal. Ce vol, après tout on l'excuserait, l'insolence jamais, l'éducation devant être l'école du respect.

Donc Sorel, le garde-chasse, administrerait au jeune homme une bonne fessée immédiatement.

M. de Mahurot, qui avait à lui dire quelque chose, se chargea de la commission. Il prit un fusil dans l'antichambre et appela Victor, resté au milieu de la cour, la tête basse :

— Suis-moi dit le Baron.

Comme la route pour aller chez le garde, détournait peu de Chavignolles,

M. Jeufroy, Bouvard et Pécuchet l'accompagnèrent.

À cent pas du château, il les pria de ne plus parler, tant qu'il longerait le bois.

Le terrain dévalait jusqu'au bord de la rivière, où se dressaient de grands quartiers de roches. Elle faisait des plaques d'or sous le soleil couchant. En face les verdure des collines se couvraient d'ombre. Un air vif soufflait.

Des lapins sortirent de leurs terriers, et broutaient le gazon.

Un coup de feu partit, un deuxième, un autre, — et les lapins sautaient, déboulaient. Victor se jetait dessus pour les saisir, et haletait trempé de sueur.

— Tu arranges bien tes nippes dit le baron. — Sa blouse en loques avait du sang.

La vue du sang répugnait à Bouvard. Il n'admettait pas qu'on en pût verser.

M. Jeufroy reprit :

— Les circonstances quelquefois l'exigent. Si ce n'est pas le coupable qui donne le sien, il faut celui d'un autre, — vérité que nous enseigne la Rédemption.

Suivant Bouvard, elle n'avait guère servi, presque tous les hommes étant damnés, malgré le sacrifice de Notre-Seigneur.

— Mais quotidiennement, il le renouvelle dans l'Eucharistie.

— Et le miracle dit Pécuchet se fait avec des mots, quelle que soit l'indignité du Prêtre !

— Là est le mystère, monsieur !

Cependant Victor clouait ses yeux sur le fusil, tâchait même d'y toucher.

— À bas les pattes ! Et M, de Mahurot prit un sentier sous bois.

L'ecclésiastique avait Pécuchet d'un côté, Bouvard de l'autre — et il lui dit :

— Attention, vous savez : Debetur pueris.

Bouvard l'assura qu'il s'humiliait devant le Créateur, mais était indigné qu'on en fît un homme. On redoute sa vengeance, on travaille pour sa gloire ; il a toutes les vertus, un bras, un oeil, une politique, une habitation. Notre Père qui êtes aux cieus, qu'est-ce que cela veut dire ?

Et Pécuchet ajouta :

— Le monde s'est élargi ; la terre n'en fait plus le centre. Elle roule dans la multitude infinie de ses pareils. Beaucoup la dépassent en grandeur, et ce rapetissement de notre globe procure de Dieu un idéal plus sublime. Donc la Religion devait changer. Le Paradis est quelque chose d'enfantin avec ses bienheureux toujours contemplant, toujours chantant — et qui regardent d'en haut les tortures des damnés. Quand on songe que le christianisme a pour base une pomme !

Le curé se fâcha. — Niez la Révélation, ce sera plus simple.

— Comment voulez-vous que Dieu ait parlé ? dit Bouvard.

— Prouvez qu'il n'a pas parlé ! disait Jeufroy.

— Encore une fois, qui vous l'affirme ?

— L'Église !

— Beau témoignage !

Cette discussion ennuyait M. de Mahurot ; — et tout en marchant :

— Écoutez donc le curé ! il en sait plus que vous !

Bouvard et Pécuchet se firent des signes pour prendre un autre chemin, puis à la Croix-Verte : — Bien le bonsoir.

— Serviteur dit le baron.

Tout cela serait conté à M. de Faverges ; et peut-être qu'une rupture s'en suivrait ? tant pis ! Ils se sentaient méprisés par ces nobles ; on ne les invitait jamais à dîner ; et ils étaient las de Mme de Noares avec ses continuelles remontrances.

Ils ne pouvaient cependant garder le De Maistre ; — et une quinzaine après ils retournèrent au château, croyant n'être pas reçus.

Ils le furent.

Toute la famille se trouvait dans le boudoir, Hurel y compris, et par extraordinaire Foureau.

La correction n'avait point corrigé Victor. Il refusait d'apprendre son catéchisme ; et Victorine proférait des mots sales. Bref le garçon irait aux Jeunes Détenus, la petite fille dans un couvent. Foureau s'était chargé des démarches, et il s'en allait quand la Comtesse le rappela.

On attendait M. Jeufroy, pour fixer ensemble la date du mariage qui aurait lieu à la mairie, bien avant de se faire à l'église, afin de montrer que l'on honnissait le mariage civil.

Foureau tâcha de le défendre. Le Comte et Hurel l'attaquèrent. Qu'était une fonction municipale près d'un sacerdoce ! — et le Baron ne se fût pas cru marié s'il l'eût été, seulement devant une écharpe tricolore.

— Bravo ! dit M. Jeufroy, qui entrait. Le mariage étant établi par Jésus...

Pécuchet l'arrêta. — Dans quel évangile ? Aux temps apostoliques on le considérait si peu, que Tertulien le compare à l'adultère.

— Ah ! par exemple !

— Mais oui ! et ce n'est pas un sacrement ! Il faut au sacrement un signe. Montrez-moi le signe, dans le mariage ! Le curé eut beau répondre qu'il figurait l'alliance de Dieu avec l'Église. Vous ne comprenez plus le christianisme ! et la Loi...

— Elle en garde l'empreinte dit M. de Faverges ; sans lui, elle autoriserait la Polygamie !

Une voix répliqua : Où serait le mal ?

C'était Bouvard, à demi caché par un rideau. On peut avoir plusieurs épouses, comme les patriarches, les mormons, les musulmans et néanmoins être honnête homme !

— Jamais s'écria le Prêtre ! l'honnêteté consiste à rendre ce qui est dû. Nous devons hommage à Dieu. Or qui n'est pas chrétien, n'est pas honnête !

— Autant que d'autres dit Bouvard.

Le comte croyant voir dans cette repartie une atteinte à la Religion l'exalta. Elle avait affranchi les esclaves.

Bouvard fit des citations, prouvant le contraire :

— Saint Paul leur recommande d'obéir aux maîtres comme à Jésus.

— Saint Ambroise nomme la servitude un don de Dieu. — Le Lévitique, l'Exode et les Conciles l'ont sanctionnée. — Bossuet la classe pari le droit des gens. — Et Mgr Bouvier l'approuve.

Le comte objecta que le christianisme, pas moins, avait développé la civilisation.

— Et la paresse, en faisant de la Pauvreté, une vertu !

— Cependant, monsieur, la morale de l'Évangile ?

— Eh ! eh ! pas si morale ! Les ouvriers de la dernière heure sont autant payés que ceux de la première. On donne à celui qui possède, et on retire à celui qui n'a pas. Quant au précepte de recevoir des soufflets sans les rendre et de se laisser voler, il encourage les audacieux, les poltrons et les coquins.

Le scandale redoubla, quand Pécuchet eut déclaré qu'il aimait autant le Bouddhisme.

Le prêtre éclata de rire. — Ah ! ah ! ah ! le Bouddhisme.

Mme de Noares leva les bras. — Le Bouddhisme !

— Comment, — le Bouddhisme ? répétait le comte.

— Le connaissez-vous ? dit Pécuchet à M. Jeufroy, qui s'embrouilla.

— Eh bien, sachez-le ! mieux que le christianisme, et avant lui, il a reconnu le néant des choses terrestres. Ses pratiques sont austères, ses fidèles plus nombreux que tous les chrétiens, et pour l'incarnation, Vischnou n'en a pas une, mais neuf ! Ainsi, jugez !

— Des mensonges de voyageurs dit Mme de Noares.

— Soutenus par les francs-maçons ajouta le curé.

Et tous parlant à la fois : — Allez donc — Continuez ! — Fort joli ! — Moi, je le trouve drôle — Pas possible si bien que Pécuchet exaspéré, déclara qu'il se ferait bouddhiste !

— Vous insultez des chrétiennes ! dit le Baron. Mme de Noares s'affaissa dans un fauteuil. La Comtesse et Yolande se taisaient. Le comte roulait des yeux ; Hurel attendait des ordres. L'abbé, pour se contenir, lisait son bréviaire.

Cet exemple apaisa M. de Faverges ; et considérant les deux bonshommes : — Avant de blâmer l'Évangile, et quand on a des taches dans sa vie, il est certaines réparations...

— Des réparations ?

— Des taches ?

— Assez, messieurs ! vous devez me comprendre ! Puis s'adressant à Fourreau : Sorel est prévenu ! Allez-y ! Et Bouvard et Pécuchet se retirèrent sans saluer.

Au bout de l'avenue, ils exhalèrent tous les trois, leur ressentiment. On me traite en domestique grommelait Fourreau ; — et les autres l'approuvant, malgré le souvenir des hémorroïdes, il avait pour eux comme de la sympathie.

Des cantonniers travaillaient dans la campagne. L'homme qui les commandait se rapprocha ; c'était Gorju. On se mit à causer. Il surveillait le cailloutage de la route votée en 1848, et devait cette place à M. de Mahurot, l'ingénieur, celui qui doit épouser Mlle de Faverges ! Vous sortez de là-bas, sans doute ?

— Pour la dernière fois ! dit brutalement Pécuchet.

Gorju prit un air naïf. — Une brouille ? tiens, tiens !

Et s'ils avaient pu voir sa mine, quand ils eurent tourné les talons, ils auraient compris qu'il en flairait la cause.

Un peu plus loin, ils s'arrêtèrent devant un enclos de treillage, qui contenait des loges à chien, et une maisonnette en tuiles rouges.

Victorine était sur le seuil. Des aboiements retentirent. La femme du garde parut.

Sachant pourquoi le maire venait, elle héla Victor.

Tout d'avance, était prêt, et leur trousseau dans deux mouchoirs, que fermaient des épingles. Bon voyage leur dit-elle, heureuse de n'avoir plus cette vermine !

Était-ce leur faute, s'ils étaient nés d'un père forçat ! Au contraire ils semblaient très doux, ne s'inquiétaient pas même de l'endroit où on les menait.

Bouvard et Pécuchet les regardaient marcher devant eux.

Victorine chantonnait des paroles indistinctes, son foulard au bras, comme une modiste qui porte un carton. Elle se retournait quelquefois ; et Pécuchet, devant ses frisettes blondes et sa gentille tournure, regrettait de n'avoir pas une enfant pareille. Élevée en d'autres conditions, elle serait charmante plus tard : quel bonheur que de la voir grandir, d'entendre tous les jours son ramage d'oiseau, quand il le voudrait de l'embrasser ; — et un attendrissement, lui montant du coeur aux lèvres, humecta ses paupières, l'oppressait un peu.

Victor comme un soldat, s'était mis son bagage sur le dos. Il sifflait — jetait des pierres aux corneilles dans les sillons, allait sous les arbres, pour se couper des badines — Foureau le rappela ; et Bouvard, en le retenant par la main jouissait de sentir dans la sienne ces doigts d'enfant robustes et vigoureux. Le pauvre petit diable ne demandait qu'à se développer librement, comme une fleur en plein air ! et il pourrait entre des murs avec des leçons, des punitions, un tas de bêtises ! Bouvard fut saisi par une révolte de la pitié, une indignation contre le sort, une de ces rages où l'on veut détruire le gouvernement.

— Galope ! dit-il. Amuse-toi ! jouis de ton reste !

Le gamin s'échappa.

Sa soeur et lui coucheraient à l'auberge — et dès l'aube, le messenger de

Falaise prendrait Victor pour le descendre au pénitencier de

Beaubourg — une religieuse de l'orphelinat de Grand-Camp emmènerait

Victorine.

Foureau, ayant donné ces détails, se replongea dans ses pensées. Mais Bouvard voulut savoir combien pouvait coûter l'entretien des deux mioches.

— Bah !... L'affaire, peut-être, de trois cents francs ! Le comte m'en a remis vingt-cinq pour les premiers débours ! Quel pingre !

Et gardant sur le coeur, le mépris de son écharpe, Foureau hâtait le pas, silencieusement.

Bouvard murmura :

— Ils me font de la peine. Je m'en chargerais bien !

— Moi aussi dit Pécuchet, la même idée leur étant venue.

Il existait sans doute des empêchements ?

— Aucun ! répliqua Foureau. D'ailleurs il avait le droit comme maire de confier à qui bon lui semblait les enfants abandonnés. — Et après une longue hésitation : — Eh bien oui ! prenez-les ! ça le fera bisquer.

Bouvard et Pécuchet les emmenèrent.

En rentrant chez eux, ils trouvèrent au bas de l'escalier, sous la madone, Marcel à genoux, et qui priait avec ferveur. La tête renversée, les yeux demi clos, et dilatant son bec-de-lièvre, il avait l'air d'un fakir en extase.

— Quelle brute ! dit Bouvard.

— Pourquoi ? Il assiste peut-être à des choses que tu lui jalouserais si tu pouvais les voir. N'y a-t-il pas deux mondes, tout à fait distincts ?

L'objet d'un raisonnement a moins de valeur que la manière de raisonner.

Qu'importe la croyance ! Le principal est de croire.

Telles furent à la remarque de Bouvard les objections de Pécuchet.

CHAPITRE X

Ils se procurèrent plusieurs ouvrages touchant l'Éducation — et leur système fut résolu. Il fallait bannir toute idée métaphysique, — et d'après la méthode expérimentale suivre le développement de la Nature. Rien ne pressait, les deux élèves devant oublier ce qu'ils avaient appris.

Bien qu'ils eussent un tempérament solide, Pécuchet voulait comme un Spartiate les endurcir encore, les accoutumer à la faim, à la soif, aux intempéries, et même qu'ils portassent des chaussures trouées afin de prévenir les rhumes. Bouvard s'y opposa.

Le cabinet noir au fond du corridor devint leur chambre à coucher. Elle avait pour meubles deux lits de sangle, deux cuvettes, un broc. L'oeil-de-boeuf s'ouvrait au-dessus de leur tête ; et des araignées couraient le long du plâtre.

Souvent, ils se rappelaient l'intérieur d'une cabane où l'on se disputait. Une nuit, leur père était rentré avec du sang aux mains. Quelque temps après les gendarmes étaient venus. Ensuite ils avaient logé dans un bois. Des hommes qui faisaient des sabots embrassaient leur mère. Elle était morte ; une charrette les avait emmenés ; on les battait beaucoup, ils s'étaient perdus. Puis ils revoyaient le garde champêtre, Mme de Noares, Sorel, et sans se demander pourquoi cette autre maison, ils s'y trouvaient heureux. Aussi leur étonnement fut pénible quand au bout de huit mois les leçons recommencèrent.

Bouvard se chargea de la petite. Pécuchet du gamin.

Victor distinguait ses lettres, mais n'arrivait pas à former les syllabes. Il en bredouillait, s'arrêtait tout à coup, et avait l'air idiot. Victorine posait des questions. D'où vient que ch dans orchestre a le son d'un q et celui d'un k dans archéologie ? On doit par moments joindre deux voyelles, d'autres fois les détacher. Tout cela n'est pas juste. Elle s'indignait.

Les maîtres professaient à la même heure ; dans leurs chambres respectives — et la cloison étant mince, ces quatre voix, une flûtée, une profonde et deux aiguës composaient un charivari abominable. Pour en finir et stimuler les mioches par l'émulation, ils eurent l'idée de les faire travailler ensemble dans le muséum ; et on aborda l'écriture.

Les deux élèves à chaque bout de la table copiaient un exemple. Mais la position du corps était mauvaise. Il les fallait redresser ; leurs pages tombaient, les plumes se fendaient, l'encre se renversait.

Victorine en de certains jours, allait bien pendant cinq minutes puis traçait des griffonnages ; et prise de découragement restait les yeux au plafond. Victor ne tardait pas à s'endormir, vautré au milieu du bureau.

Peut-être souffraient-ils ? Une tension trop forte nuit aux jeunes cervelles. — Arrêtons-nous dit Bouvard.

Rien n'est stupide comme de faire apprendre par coeur ; mais si on n'exerce pas la mémoire, elle s'atrophiera ; — et ils leur serinèrent les premières fables de La Fontaine. Les enfants approuvaient la fourmi qui thésaurise, le loup qui mange l'agneau, le lion qui prend toutes les parts.

Devenus plus hardis, ils dévastaient le jardin. Mais quel amusement leur donner ?

Jean-Jacques, dans Émile conseille au gouverneur de faire faire à l'élève ses jouets lui-même en l'aidant un peu, sans qu'il s'en doute. Bouvard ne put réussir à fabriquer un cerceau, Pécuchet à coudre une balle.

Ils passèrent aux jeux instructifs, tels que des découpures, un verre ardent. Pécuchet leur montra son microscope ; — et la chandelle étant allumée, Bouvard dessinait avec l'ombre de ses doigts un lièvre ou un cochon sur la muraille. Le public s'en fatigua.

Des auteurs exaltent comme plaisir, un déjeuner champêtre, une partie de bateau ; était-ce praticable, franchement ? Fénelon recommande de temps à autre une conversation innocente. Impossible d'en imaginer une seule !

Ils revinrent aux leçons ; et les boules à facettes, les rayures, le bureau typographique, tout avait échoué, quand ils avisèrent un stratagème.

Comme Victor était enclin à la gourmandise, on lui présentait le nom d'un plat : bientôt il lut couramment dans le Cuisinier français. Victorine étant coquette, une robe lui serait donnée, si pour l'avoir, elle écrivait à la couturière : en moins de trois semaines elle accomplit ce prodige. C'était courtoiser leurs défauts, moyen pernicieux mais qui avait réussi.

Maintenant qu'ils savaient écrire et lire, que leur apprendre ? Autre embarras. Les filles n'ont pas besoin d'être savantes comme les garçons. N'importe ! on les élève ordinairement en véritables brutes, tout leur bagage se bornant à des sottises mystiques.

Convient-il de leur enseigner les langues ? L'espagnol et l'italien prétend le Cygne de Cambrais ne servent qu'à lire des ouvrages dangereux. Un tel motif leur parut bête. Cependant Victorine n'aurait que faire de ces idiomes ; tandis que l'anglais est d'un usage plus commun. Pécuchet en étudia les règles, et il démontrait, avec sérieux, la façon d'émettre le th comme cela, tiens — the, the, the !

Mais avant d'instruire un enfant, il faudrait connaître ses aptitudes. On les devine par la Phrénologie. Ils s'y plongèrent. Puis voulurent en vérifier les assertions sur leurs personnes. Bouvard présentait la bosse de la bienveillance, de l'imagination, de la vénération et celle de l'énergie amoureuse ; vulgo : érotisme.

On sentait sur les temporaux de Pécuchet la philosophie et l'enthousiasme, joints à l'esprit de ruse.

Tels étaient leurs caractères.

Ce qui les surprit davantage, ce fut de reconnaître chez l'un comme l'autre le penchant à l'amitié ; — et charmés de la découverte, ils s'embrassèrent avec attendrissement.

Leur examen, ensuite, porta sur Marcel.

Son plus grand défaut et qu'ils n'ignoraient pas, était un extrême appétit. Néanmoins, Bouvard et Pécuchet furent effrayés en constatant au-dessus du pavillon de l'oreille, à la hauteur de l'oeil, l'organe de l'alimentivité. Avec l'âge leur domestique deviendrait peut-être comme cette femme de la Salpêtrière, qui mangeait quotidiennement huit livres de pain, engloutit une fois douze potages — et une autre, soixante bols de café. Ils ne pourraient y suffire.

Les têtes de leurs élèves n'avaient rien de curieux. Ils s'y prenaient mal sans doute ? Un moyen très simple développa leur expérience. Les jours de marché ils se faufilaient au milieu des paysans sur la Place, entre les sacs d'avoine, les paniers de fromages, les veaux, les chevaux, insensibles aux bousculades — et quand ils trouvaient un jeune garçon, avec son père, ils demandaient à lui palper le crâne dans un but scientifique.

Le plus grand nombre ne répondait même pas. D'autres croyant qu'il s'agissait d'une pommade pour la teigne refusaient vexés — quelques-uns par indifférence se laissaient emmener sous le porche de l'église, où l'on serait tranquille.

Un matin que Bouvard et Pécuchet commençaient leur manoeuvre le curé, tout à coup, parut ; et voyant ce qu'ils faisaient accusa la phrénologie de pousser au matérialisme et au fatalisme. Le voleur, l'assassin, l'adultère, n'ont plus qu'à rejeter leurs crimes sur la faute de leurs bosses.

Bouvard objecta que l'organe prédispose à l'action, sans pourtant vous y contraindre. De ce qu'un homme a le germe d'un vice, rien ne prouve qu'il sera vicieux. Du reste, j'admire les orthodoxes ; ils soutiennent les idées innées, et repoussent les penchants. Quelle contradiction !

Mais la Phrénologie, suivant M. Jeufroy, niait l'omnipotence divine, et il était malséant de la pratiquer à l'ombre du saint-lieu, en face même de l'autel. Retirez-vous ! non ! retirez-vous.

Ils s'établirent chez Ganot, le coiffeur. Pour vaincre toute hésitation Bouvard et Pécuchet allaient jusqu'à régaler les parents d'une barbe ou d'une frisure.

Le docteur, un après-midi vint s'y faire couper les cheveux. En s'asseyant dans le fauteuil, il aperçut reflétés par la glace, les deux phrénologues, qui promenaient leurs doigts sur des caboches d'enfant.

— Vous en êtes à ces bêtises-là ? dit-il.

— Pourquoi, bêtises ?

Vaucorbeil eut un sourire méprisant ; puis affirma qu'il n'y avait point dans le cerveau plusieurs organes. Ainsi, tel homme digère un aliment que ne digère pas tel autre. Faut-il supposer dans l'estomac autant d'estomacs qu'il s'y trouve de goûts ?

Cependant, un travail délasse d'un autre, un effort intellectuel ne tend pas à la fois, toutes les facultés. Chacune a donc un siège distinct.

— Les anatomistes ne l'ont pas rencontré dit Vaucorbeil.

— C'est qu'ils ont mal disséqué reprit Pécuchet.

— Comment ?

— Eh ! oui ! Ils coupent des tranches, sans égard à la connexion des parties, phrase d'un livre — qu'il se rappelait. Voilà une balourdise ! s'écria le médecin. Le crâne ne se moule pas sur le cerveau, l'extérieur sur l'intérieur. Gall se trompe et je vous défie de légitimer sa doctrine, en prenant au hasard, trois personnes dans la boutique.

La première était une paysanne, avec de gros yeux bleus.

Pécuchet, dit en l'observant :

— Elle a beaucoup de mémoire.

Son mari attesta le fait, et s'offrit lui-même à l'exploration.

— Oh ! vous mon brave, on vous conduit difficilement.

D'après les autres il n'y avait point dans le monde un pareil têtù.

La troisième épreuve se fit sur un gamin escorté de sa grand-mère.

Pécuchet déclara qu'il devait chérir la musique.

— Je crois bien ! dit la bonne femme montre à ces messieurs pour voir !

Il tira de sa blouse une guimbarde — et se mit à souffler dedans. Un fracas s'éleva. C'était la porte, claquée violemment par le docteur qui s'en allait.

Ils ne doutèrent plus d'eux-mêmes, et appelant les deux élèves recommencèrent l'analyse de leur boîte osseuse.

Celle de Victorine était généralement unie, marque de pondération — mais son frère avait un crâne déplorable ! une éminence très forte dans l'angle mastoïdien des pariétaux indiquait l'organe de la destruction, du meurtre ; — et plus bas, un renflement était le signe de la convoitise, du vol. Bouvard et Pécuchet en furent attristés pendant huit jours.

Il faudrait comprendre le sens des mots ; ce qu'on appelle la combativité implique le dédain de la mort. S'il fait des homicides, il peut de même produire des sauvetages. L'acquisivité englobe le tact des filous et l'ardeur des commerçants. L'irrévérence est parallèle à l'esprit de critique, la ruse à la circonspection. Toujours un instinct se dédouble en deux parties, une mauvaise, une bonne ; on détruira la seconde en cultivant la première ; et par cette méthode, un enfant audacieux, loin d'être un bandit deviendra un général. Le lâche n'aura seulement que de la prudence, l'avare de l'économie, le prodigue de la générosité.

Un rêve magnifique les occupa ; s'ils menaient à bien l'éducation de leurs élèves, ils fonderaient un établissement ayant pour but de redresser l'intelligence, dompter les caractères, ennoblir le coeur. Déjà ils parlaient des souscriptions et de la bâtisse.

Leur triomphe chez Ganot les avait rendus célèbres — et des gens les venaient consulter, afin qu'on leur dise leurs chances de fortune.

Il en défila de toutes les espèces : crânes en boule, en poire, en pains de sucre, de carrés, d'élevés, de resserrés, d'aplatis, avec des mâchoires de boeuf, des figures d'oiseau, des yeux de cochon — Tant de monde gênait le perruquier dans son travail. Les coudes frôlaient l'armoire à vitres contenant la parfumerie, on dérangeait les peignes, le lavabo fut brisé ; — et il flanqua dehors tous les amateurs, en priant Bouvard et Pécuchet de les suivre, ultimatum qu'ils acceptèrent sans murmurer, étant un peu fatigués de la cranoscopie.

Le lendemain, comme ils passaient devant le jardinet du capitaine, ils aperçurent causant avec lui Girbal, Coulon, le garde champêtre, et son fils cadet Zéphyrin, habillé en enfant de chœur. Sa robe était toute neuve, il se promenait dessous avant de la remettre dans la sacristie — et on le complimentait.

Placquevent pria ces Messieurs de palper son jeune homme, curieux de savoir ce qu'ils penseraient.

La peau du front avait l'air comme tendue ; un nez mince, très cartilagineux du bout, tombait obliquement sur des lèvres pincées ; le menton était pointu, le regard fuyant, l'épaule droite trop haute.

— Retire ta calotte lui dit son père.

Bouvard glissa les mains dans sa chevelure couleur de paille ; puis ce fut le tour de Pécuchet ; et ils se communiquaient à voix basse leurs observations.

— Biophilie manifeste. Ah ! ah ! l'approbativité ! Conscienciosité absente !

Amativité nulle !

— Eh bien ? dit le garde champêtre.

Pécuchet ouvrit sa tabatière, et huma une prise.

— Rien de bon ! hein ?

— Ma foi répliqua Bouvard ce n'est guère fameux.

Placquevent rougit d'humiliation. — Il fera, tout de même, ma volonté.

— Oh ! oh !

— Mais je suis son père, nom de Dieu, et j'ai bien le droit !...

— Dans une certaine mesure reprit Pécuchet.

Girbal s'en mêla :

— L'autorité paternelle est incontestable.

— Mais si le père est un idiot ?

— N'importe dit le Capitaine son pouvoir n'en est pas moins absolu.

— Dans l'intérêt des enfants ajouta Coulon.

D'après Bouvard et Pécuchet, ils ne devaient rien aux auteurs de leurs jours, et les parents, au contraire, leur doivent la nourriture, l'instruction, des prévenances, enfin tout !

Les bourgeois se récrièrent devant cette opinion immorale. Placquevent en était blessé comme d'une injure.

— Avec cela, ils sont jolis, ceux que vous ramassez sur les grandes routes ! ils iront loin ! Prenez garde.

— Garde à quoi ? dit aigrement Pécuchet.

— Oh ! je n'ai pas peur de vous !

— Ni moi, non plus.

Coulon intervint, modéra le garde champêtre, et le fit s'éloigner.

Pendant quelques minutes on resta silencieux. Puis il fut question des dahlias du capitaine qui ne lâcha point son monde, sans les avoir exhibés l'un après l'autre.

Bouvard et Pécuchet rejoignaient leur domicile, quand à cent pas devant eux, ils distinguèrent Placquevent, et Zéphyrin près de lui, levait le coude en manière de bouclier pour se garantir des gifles.

Ce qu'ils venaient d'entendre exprimait sous d'autres formes les idées de M. le comte ; mais l'exemple de leurs élèves témoignerait combien la liberté l'emporte sur la contrainte. Un peu de Discipline était cependant nécessaire.

Pécuchet cloua dans le muséum un tableau pour les démonstrations ; on tiendrait un journal où les actions de l'enfant notées le soir seraient relues le lendemain. Tout s'accomplirait au son de la cloche. Comme Dupont de Nemours, ils useraient de l'injonction paternelle d'abord, puis de l'injonction militaire et le tutoiement fut interdit.

Bouvard tâcha d'apprendre le calcul à Victorine. Quelquefois, il se trompait ; ils en riaient l'un et l'autre ; puis le baisant sur le cou, à la place qui n'a pas de barbe, elle demandait à s'en aller ; il la laissait partir.

Pécuchet aux heures des leçons avait beau tirer la cloche, et crier par la fenêtre l'injonction militaire, le gamin n'arrivait pas. Ses chaussettes lui pendaient toujours sur les chevilles ; à table même, il se fourrait les doigts dans le nez, et ne retenait point ses gaz. Broussais là-dessus défend les réprimandes ; car il faut obéir aux sollicitations d'un instinct conservateur.

Victorine et lui, employaient un affreux langage, disant mé itou pour moi aussi, bère pour boire, al pour elle, un diventiau, de l'iau ; mais comme la grammaire ne peut être comprise des enfants, — et qu'ils la sauront s'ils entendent parler correctement, les deux bonshommes surveillaient leurs discours jusqu'à en être incommodés.

Ils différaient d'opinions quant à la géographie. Bouvard pensait qu'il est plus logique de débiter par la commune. Pécuchet par l'ensemble du monde.

Avec un arrosoir et du sable il voulut démontrer ce qu'était un fleuve, une île, un golfe ; et même sacrifia trois plates-bandes pour les trois continents ; mais les points cardinaux n'entraient pas dans la tête de Victor.

Par une nuit de janvier, Pécuchet l'emmena en rase campagne. Tout en marchant, il préconisait l'astronomie ; les navigateurs l'utilisent dans leurs voyages ; Christophe Colomb sans elle n'eût pas fait sa découverte. Nous devons de la reconnaissance à Copernic, Galilée, Newton.

Il gelait très fort et sur le bleu noir du ciel, une infinité de lumières scintillaient.

Pécuchet leva les yeux. Comment ? pas de grande ourse ; la dernière fois qu'il l'avait vue, elle était tournée d'un autre côté ; enfin il la reconnut puis montra l'étoile polaire, toujours au Nord, et sur laquelle on s'oriente.

Le lendemain, il posa au milieu du salon un fauteuil et se mit à valser autour.

— Imagine que ce fauteuil est le soleil, et que moi je suis la terre ! Elle se meut ainsi.

Victor le considérait plein d'étonnement.

Il prit ensuite une orange, y passa une baguette signifiant les pôles puis l'encercla d'un trait au charbon pour marquer l'équateur. Après quoi, il promena l'orange à l'entour d'une bougie, en faisant observer que tous les points de la surface n'étaient pas éclairés simultanément, ce qui produit la différence des climats, et pour celle des saisons, il pencha l'orange, car la terre ne se tient pas droite ce qui amène les équinoxes et les solstices.

Victor n'y avait rien compris. Il croyait que la terre pivote sur une longue aiguille et que l'équateur est un anneau, étreignant sa circonférence.

Au moyen d'un atlas, Pécuchet lui exposa l'Europe ; mais ébloui par tant de lignes et de couleurs, il ne retrouvait plus les noms. Les bassins et les montagnes ne s'accordaient pas avec les royaumes, l'ordre politique embrouillait l'ordre physique.

Tout cela, peut-être, s'éclaircirait en étudiant l'Histoire.

Il eût été plus pratique de commencer par le village, ensuite l'arrondissement, le département, la province. Mais Chavignolles n'ayant point d'annales, il fallait bien s'en tenir à l'Histoire universelle.

Tant de matières l'embarrassent qu'on doit seulement en prendre les Beautés.

Il y a pour la grecque : Nous combattons à l'ombre, l'envieux qui bannit Aristide et la confiance d'Alexandre en son médecin ; pour la romaine : les oies du Capitole, le trépied de Scévola, le tonneau de Régulus. Le lit de roses de Guatimozin est considérable pour l'Amérique ; quant à la France, elle comporte le vase de Soissons, le chêne de saint Louis, la mort de Jeanne d'Arc, la poule au pot du Béarnais, — on n'a que l'embarras du choix. Sans compter À moi d'Auvergne, et le naufrage du Vengeur !

Victor confondait les hommes, les siècles et les pays.

Cependant, Pécuchet n'allait pas le jeter dans des considérations subtiles et la masse des faits est un vrai labyrinthe.

Il se rabattit sur la nomenclature des rois de France. Victor les oubliait, faute de connaître les dates. Mais si la mnémotechnie de Dumouchel avait été insuffisante pour eux, que serait-ce pour lui !

Conclusion : l'Histoire ne peut s'apprendre que par beaucoup de lectures.

Ils les feraient.

Le dessin est utile dans une foule de circonstances ; or Pécuchet eut l'audace de l'enseigner lui-même, d'après nature ! en abordant tout de suite le paysage. Un libraire de Bayeux lui envoya du papier, du caoutchouc, deux cartons, des crayons, et du fixatif pour leurs oeuvres — qui sous verre et dans des cadres orneraient le musée.

Levés dès l'aurore, ils se mettaient en route, avec un morceau de pain dans la poche ; — et beaucoup de temps était perdu à chercher un site. Pécuchet voulait à la fois reproduire ce qui se trouvait sous ses pieds, l'extrême horizon et les nuages. Mais les lointains dominaient toujours les premiers plans ; la rivière dégringolait du ciel, le berger marchait sur le troupeau — un chien endormi avait l'air de courir. Pour sa part il y renonça.

Se rappelant avoir lu cette définition : Le dessin se compose de trois choses : la ligne, le grain, le grainé fin, de plus le trait de force — mais le trait de force, il n'y a que le maître seul qui le donne il rectifiait la ligne, collaborait au grain, surveillait le grainé fin, et attendait l'occasion de donner le trait de force. Elle ne venait jamais tant le paysage de l'élève était incompréhensible.

Sa soeur, paresseuse comme lui, bâillait devant la table de Pythagore. Mlle Reine lui montrait à coudre — et quand elle marquait du linge, elle levait les doigts si gentiment que Bouvard ensuite, n'avait pas le coeur de la tourmenter avec sa leçon de calcul. Un de ces jours, ils s'y remettraient.

Sans doute, l'arithmétique et la couture sont nécessaires dans un ménage. Mais il est cruel, objecta Pécuchet, d'élever les filles en vue exclusivement du mari qu'elles auront. Toutes ne sont pas destinées à l'hymen, et si on veut que plus tard elles se passent des hommes il faut leur apprendre bien des choses.

On peut inculquer les sciences, à propos des objets les plus vulgaires ; — dire par exemple, en quoi consiste le vin ; et l'explication fournie Victor et Victorine devaient la répéter. Il en fut de même des épices, des meubles, de l'éclairage ; mais la lumière, c'était pour eux la lampe, et elle n'avait rien de commun avec l'étincelle d'un caillou, la flamme d'une bougie, la clarté de la lune.

Un jour, Victorine demanda d'où vient que le bois brûle ; ses maîtres se regardèrent embarrassés, la théorie de la combustion les dépassant.

Une autre fois, Bouvard depuis le potage jusqu'au fromage, parla des éléments nourriciers, et ahurit les deux petits sous la fibrine, la caséine, la graisse et le gluten.

Ensuite, Pécuchet voulut leur expliquer comment le sang se renouvelle, et il pataugea dans la circulation.

Le dilemme n'est point commode ; si l'on part des faits, le plus simple exige des raisons trop compliquées, et en posant d'abord les principes, on commence par l'Absolu, la Foi.

Que résoudre ? combiner les deux enseignements, le rationnel et l'empirique ; mais un double moyen vers un seul but est l'inverse de la méthode ? Ah ! tant pis !

Pour les initier à l'histoire naturelle, ils tentèrent quelques promenades scientifiques.

— Tu vois, disaient-ils en montrant un âne, un cheval, un boeuf, les bêtes à quatre pieds, ce sont des quadrupèdes. Les oiseaux présentent des plumes, les reptiles des écailles, et les papillons appartiennent à la classe des insectes. Ils avaient un filet pour en prendre — et Pécuchet tenant la bestiole avec délicatesse, leur faisait observer les quatre ailes, les six pattes, les deux antennes et la trompe osseuse qui aspire le nectar des fleurs.

Il cueillait des simples au revers des fossés, disait leurs noms ou en inventait, afin de garder son prestige. D'ailleurs, la nomenclature est le moins important de la Botanique.

Il écrivit cet axiome sur le tableau : Toute plante a des feuilles, un calice, et une corolle enfermant un ovaire ou péricarpe qui contient la graine.

Puis il ordonna à ses élèves d'herboriser au hasard dans la campagne.

Victor en rapporta des boutons d'or, sorte de renoncule dont la fleur est jaune. Victorine une touffe de graminées ; il y chercha vainement un péricarpe.

Bouvard qui se méfiait de son savoir fouilla toute la bibliothèque et découvrit dans le Redouté des Dames, le dessin d'une rose ; l'ovaire n'était pas situé dans la corolle, mais au-dessous des pétales.

— C'est une exception, dit Pécuchet.

Ils trouvèrent une rubiacée qui n'a pas de calice.

Ainsi le principe posé par Pécuchet était faux.

Il y avait dans leur jardin des tubéreuses, toutes sans calice. — Une étourderie ! La plupart des Liliacées en manquent.

Mais un hasard fit qu'ils virent une shérardie (description de la plante) — et elle avait un calice.

Allons, bon ! si les exceptions elles-mêmes ne sont pas vraies, à qui se fier ?

Un jour dans une de ces promenades, ils entendirent crier des paons, jetèrent les yeux par-dessus le mur, et au premier moment, ils ne reconnaissaient pas leur ferme. La grange avait un toit d'ardoises, les barrières étaient neuves, les chemins empierrés. Le père Gouy parut : Pas possible ! est-ce vous ? Que d'histoires depuis trois ans, la mort de sa femme entre autres. Quant à lui il se portait toujours comme un chêne.

— Entrez donc une minute.

On était au commencement d'avril — et les pommiers en fleurs alignaient dans les trois mesures leurs touffes blanches et roses ; le ciel couleur de satin bleu, n'avait pas un nuage ; des nappes, des draps et des serviettes pendaient verticalement, attachés par des fiches de bois à des cordes tendues. Le père Gouy les soulevait pour passer quand tout à coup, ils rencontrèrent Mme Bordin, nu-tête, en camisole, — et Marianne lui offrait à pleins bras, des paquets de linge.

— Votre servante, messieurs ! Faites comme chez vous ! moi, je vais m'asseoir, je suis rompue.

Le fermier proposa à toute la compagnie un verre de boisson.

— Pas maintenant dit-elle j'ai trop chaud !

Pécuchet accepta, et disparut vers le cellier avec le père Gouy, Marianne et Victor.

Bouvard s'assit par terre, à côté de Mme Bordin. Il recevait ponctuellement sa rente, n'avait pas à s'en plaindre, ne lui en voulait plus.

La grande lumière éclairait son profil, un de ses bandeaux noirs descendait trop bas, et les frisons de sa nuque se collaient à sa peau ambrée, moite de sueur. Chaque fois qu'elle respirait, ses deux seins montaient. Le parfum du gazon se mêlait à la bonne odeur de sa chair solide ; et Bouvard eut un revif de tempérament, qui le combla de joie. Alors il lui fit des compliments sur sa propriété.

Elle en fut ravie, et parla de ses projets. Pour agrandir les cours, elle abattrait le haut-bord.

Victorine, à ce moment-là, en grimpait le talus et cueillait des primevères, des hyacinthes et des violettes, sans avoir peur d'un vieux cheval, qui broutait l'herbe, au pied.

— N'est-ce pas qu'elle est gentille ? dit Bouvard.

— Oui ! c'est gentil, une petite fille ! et la veuve poussa un soupir, qui semblait exprimer le long chagrin de toute une vie.

— Vous auriez pu en avoir.

Elle baissa la tête.

— Il n'a tenu qu'à vous !

— Comment ?

Il eut un tel regard, qu'elle s'empourpra, comme à la sensation d'une caresse brutale — mais de suite, en s'éventant avec son mouchoir :

— Vous avez manqué le coche, mon cher !

— Je ne comprends pas et sans se lever, il se rapprochait.

Elle le considéra de haut en bas, longtemps, — puis, souriante et les prunelles humides : — C'est de votre faute !

Les draps, autour d'eux, les enfermaient comme les rideaux d'un lit.

Il se pencha sur le coude, lui frôlant les genoux de sa figure.

— Pourquoi ? hein ? pourquoi ? et comme elle se taisait, et qu'il était dans un état où les serments ne coûtent rien, il tâcha de se justifier, s'accusa de folie, d'orgueil : — Pardon ! ce sera comme autrefois !... voulez-vous ?... et il avait pris sa main, qu'elle laissait dans la sienne.

Un coup de vent brusque fit se relever les draps — et ils virent deux paons, un mâle et une femelle. La femelle se tenait immobile, les jarrets pliés, la croupe en l'air. Le mâle se promenant autour d'elle arrondissait sa queue en éventail, se rengorgeait, gloussait, puis sauta dessus, en rabattant ses plumes, qui la couvrirent comme un berceau ; — et les deux grands oiseaux tremblèrent, d'un seul frémissement.

Bouvard le sentit dans la paume de Mme Bordin. Elle se dégagea, bien vite. Il y avait devant eux, béant, et comme pétrifié le jeune Victor qui regardait ; un peu plus loin, Victorine étalée sur le dos en plein soleil, aspirait toutes les fleurs qu'elle s'était cueillies.

Le vieux cheval, effrayé par les paons, cassa sous une ruade une des cordes, s'y empêtra les jambes, et galopant dans les trois cours, traînait la lessive après lui.

Aux cris furieux de Mme Bordin Marianne accourut. Le père Gouy injuriait son cheval : Bougre de rosse ! carcan ! voleur, lui donnait des coups de pied dans le ventre, des coups sur les oreilles avec le manche d'un fouet.

Bouvard fut indigné de voir battre un animal.

Le paysan répondit : — J'en ai le droit ! il m'appartient.

Ce n'était pas une raison.

Et Pécuchet survenant, ajouta que les animaux avaient aussi leurs droits, car ils ont une âme, comme nous, — si toutefois la nôtre existe ?

— Vous êtes un impie s'écria Mme Bordin.

Trois choses l'exaspéraient : la lessive à recommencer, ses croyances qu'on outrageait, et la crainte d'avoir été entrevue tout à l'heure dans une pose suspecte.

— Je vous croyais plus forte dit Bouvard.

Elle répliqua magistralement :

— Je n'aime pas les polissons. Et Gouy s'en prit à eux d'avoir abîmé son cheval, dont les naseaux saignaient. Il grommelait tout bas : Sacrés gens de malheur ! j'allais l'enterrer, quand ils sont venus.

Les deux bonshommes se retirèrent en haussant les épaules.

Victor leur demanda pourquoi ils s'étaient fâchés contre Gouy.

— Il abuse de sa force, ce qui est mal.

— Pourquoi est-ce mal ?

Les enfants n'auraient-ils aucune notion du juste ? Peut-être.

Et le soir, Pécuchet ayant Bouvard à sa droite, sous la main quelques notes, et en face de lui les deux élèves, commença un cours de morale.

Cette science nous apprend à diriger nos actions.

Elles ont deux motifs, le plaisir, l'intérêt — et un troisième plus impérieux : le devoir.

Les devoirs se divisent en deux classes : Primo devoirs envers nous-mêmes, lesquels consistent à soigner notre corps, nous garantir de toute injure. Ils entendaient cela parfaitement. Secundo devoirs envers les autres, c'est-à-dire être toujours loyal, débonnaire, et même fraternel, le genre humain n'étant qu'une seule famille. Souvent une chose nous agréait qui nuit à nos semblables ; l'intérêt diffère du Bien, car le Bien est de soi-même irréductible. Les enfants ne comprenaient pas. Il remit à la fois prochaine, la sanction des devoirs.

Dans tout cela suivant Bouvard, il n'avait pas défini le Bien.

— Comment veux-tu le définir ? On le sent.

Alors les leçons de morale ne conviendraient qu'aux gens moraux ; et le cours de Pécuchet s'arrêta.

Ils firent lire à leurs élèves des historiettes tendant à inspirer l'amour de la vertu. Elles assommèrent Victor.

Pour frapper son imagination, Pécuchet suspendit aux murs de sa chambre des images, exposant la vie du Bon Sujet, et celle du Mauvais Sujet. Le premier, Adolphe, embrassait sa mère, étudiait l'allemand, secourait un aveugle, et était reçu à l'École Polytechnique. Le mauvais, Eugène, commençait par désobéir à son père, avait une querelle dans un café, battait son épouse, tombait ivre mort, fracturait une armoire — et un dernier tableau le représentait au bagne, où un monsieur accompagné d'un jeune garçon disait, en le montrant : Tu vois, mon fils, les dangers de l'inconduite.

Mais pour les enfants l'avenir n'existe pas. On avait beau prêcher, les saturer de cette maxime : le travail est honorable et les riches parfois sont malheureux, ils avaient connu des travailleurs nullement honorés, et se rappelaient le château où la vie semblait bonne. Les supplices du remords leur étaient dépeints avec tant d'exagération qu'ils flairaient la blague et se méfiaient du reste.

On essaya de les conduire par le point d'honneur, l'idée de l'opinion publique et le sentiment de la gloire, en leur vantant les grands hommes, surtout les hommes utiles, tels que Belzunce, Franklin, Jacquard ! Victor ne témoignait aucune envie de leur ressembler.

Un jour qu'il avait fait une addition sans faute, Bouvard cousit à sa veste un ruban qui signifiait la croix. Il se pavana dessous. Mais ayant oublié la mort de Henri IV, Pécuchet le coiffa d'un bonnet d'âne. Victor se mit à braire avec tant de violence et pendant si longtemps, qu'il fallut enlever ses oreilles de carton.

Sa soeur comme lui, se montrait flattée des éloges et indifférente aux blâmes.

Afin de les rendre plus sensibles, on leur donna un chat noir, qu'ils durent soigner ; — et on leur confiait deux ou trois sols pour qu'ils fissent l'aumône. Ils trouvèrent la prétention odieuse ; cet argent leur appartenait.

Se conformant à un désir des pédagogues, ils appelaient Bouvard mon oncle et Pécuchet bon ami mais ils les tutoyaient, et la moitié des leçons, ordinairement, se passait en disputes.

Victorine abusait de Marcel, montait sur son dos, le tirait par les cheveux ; pour se moquer de son bec-de-lièvre, parlait du nez comme lui, — et le pauvre homme n'osait se plaindre, tant il aimait la petite filles. Un soir, sa voix rauque s'éleva extraordinairement. Bouvard et Pécuchet descendirent dans la cuisine. Les deux élèves observaient la cheminée — et Marcel joignant les mains s'écriait : Retirez-le ! c'est trop ! c'est trop !

Le couvercle de la marmite sauta, comme un obus éclate. Une masse grisâtre bondit jusqu'au plafond, puis tourna sur elle-même frénétiquement, en poussant d'abominables cris.

On reconnut le chat, tout efflanqué, sans poil, la queue pareille à un cordon. Des yeux énormes lui sortaient de la tête. Ils étaient couleur de lait, comme vidés et pourtant regardaient.

La bête hideuse hurlait toujours, se jeta dans l'âtre, disparut, puis retomba au milieu des cendres, inerte.

C'était Victor qui avait commis cette atrocité ; — et les deux bonshommes se reculèrent — pâles de stupéfaction et d'horreur. Aux reproches qu'on lui adressa, il répondit comme le garde champêtre pour son fils, et comme le fermier pour son cheval : — Eh bien ? puisqu'il est à moi ! sans gêne, naïvement, dans la placidité d'un instinct assouvi.

L'eau bouillante de la marmite était répandue par terre, des casseroles, les pincettes, et des flambeaux jonchaient les dalles. Marcel fut quelque temps à nettoyer la cuisine — et ses maîtres enterrèrent le pauvre chat dans le jardin, sous la pagode.

Ensuite Bouvard et Pécuchet causèrent longuement de Victor. Le sang paternel se manifestait. Que faire ? Le rendre à M. de Faverges ou le confier à d'autres serait un aveu d'impuissance. Il s'amenderait peut-être un peu.

N'importe ! L'espoir était douteux, la tendresse n'existait plus ! Quel plaisir que d'avoir près de soi un adolescent curieux de vos idées, dont on observe les progrès, qui devient un frère plus tard ; mais Victor manquait d'esprit, de cœur encore plus ! et Pécuchet soupira, le genou plié dans ses mains jointes.

— La soeur ne vaut pas mieux dit Bouvard.

Il imaginait une fille, de quinze ans à peu près, l'âme délicate, l'humeur enjouée, ornant la maison des élégances de sa jeunesse ; et comme s'il eût été son père et qu'elle vînt de mourir, le bonhomme en pleura.

Puis cherchant à excuser Victor, il alléguait l'opinion de Rousseau :

L'enfant n'a pas de responsabilité, ne peut être moral ou immoral. Ceux-là, suivant Pécuchet avaient l'âge du discernement et ils étudièrent les moyens de les corriger.

Pour qu'une punition soit bonne, dit Bentham, elle doit être proportionnée à la faute, sa conséquence naturelle. L'enfant a brisé un carreau, on n'en remettra pas, qu'il souffre du froid. Si, n'ayant plus faim, il redemande d'un plat, cédez-lui ; une indigestion le fera vite se repentir. Il est paresseux ; qu'il reste sans travail ; l'ennui de soi-même l'y ramènera.

Mais Victor ne souffrirait pas du froid, son tempérament pouvait endurer des excès, et la fainéantise lui conviendrait.

Ils adoptèrent le système inverse, la punition médicinale. Des pensums lui furent donnés ; il devint plus paresseux. On le privait de confiture ; sa gourmandise en redoubla.

L'ironie aurait peut-être du succès ? Une fois qu'il était venu déjeuner les mains sales, Bouvard le railla, l'appelant joli coeur, muscadin, gants-jaunes. Victor écoutait le front bas, blêmit tout à coup, et jeta son assiette à la tête de Bouvard — puis furieux de l'avoir manqué, se précipita vers lui. Ce n'était pas trop que trois hommes pour le contenir. Il se roulait par terre, tâchait de mordre. — Pécuchet l'arrosa de loin avec une carafe ; de suite il fut calmé ; — mais enrôlé, pendant trois jours. Le moyen n'était pas bon.

Ils en prirent un autre ; au moindre symptôme de colère, le traitant comme un malade, ils le couchaient dans son lit. Victor s'y trouvait bien, et chantait.

Un jour, il dénicha dans la bibliothèque une vieille noix de coco ; — et commençait à la fendre, quand Pécuchet survint.

— Mon coco !

C'était un souvenir de Dumouchel ! Il l'avait apporté de Paris à Chavignolles, en leva les bras d'indignation. — Victor se mit à rire. Bon ami n'y tint plus — et d'une large calotte l'envoya bouler au fond de l'appartement ; — puis tremblant d'émotion, alla se plaindre à Bouvard.

Bouvard lui fit des reproches. — Es-tu bête avec ton coco ! Les coups abrutissent, la terreur énerve. Tu te dégrades toi-même !

Pécuchet objecta que les châtimens corporels sont quelquefois indispensables. Pestalozzi les employait ; et le célèbre Mélanchthon avoue que sans eux il n'eût rien appris.

Mais des punitions cruelles ont poussé des enfants au suicide ; on en relate des exemples.

Victor s'était barricadé dans sa chambre. Bouvard parlementa derrière la porte ; et pour la faire ouvrir, lui promit une tarte aux prunes. Dès lors il empira.

Restait un moyen, préconisé par Dupanloup : le regard sévère. Ils tâchaient d'imprimer à leurs visages un aspect effrayant et ne produisaient aucun effet.

Nous n'avons plus qu'à essayer de la Religion dit Bouvard.

Pécuchet se récria. Ils l'avaient bannie de leur programme.

Mais le raisonnement ne satisfait pas tous les besoins. Le coeur et l'imagination veulent autre chose. Le surnaturel pour bien des âmes est indispensable, et ils résolurent d'envoyer les enfants au catéchisme.

Reine proposa de les y conduire. Elle revenait dans la maison et savait se faire aimer par des manières caressantes. Victorine changea tout à coup, fut plus réservée, mielleuse, s'agenouillait devant la Madone, admirait le sacrifice d'Abraham, ricanait avec dédain au nom seul de protestant.

Elle déclara qu'on lui avait prescrit le jeûne. Ils s'en informèrent ; ce n'était pas vrai. Le jour de la Fête-Dieu, les juliennes disparurent d'une plate-bande pour décorer le reposoir ; elle nia effrontément les avoir coupées. Une autre fois elle prit à Bouvard vingt sols qu'elle mit dans le plat du sacristain.

Ils en conclurent que la morale se distingue de la Religion ; — quand elle n'a point d'autre base, son importance est secondaire.

Un soir, pendant qu'ils dînaient M. Marescot entra — Victor s'enfuit immédiatement.

Le notaire ayant refusé de s'asseoir, conta ce qui l'amenait. Le jeune Touache avait battu, presque tué son fils.

Comme on savait les origines de Victor et qu'il était désagréable, les autres gamins l'appelaient Forçat ; et tout à l'heure il avait flanqué à M. Arnold Marescot une violente raclée. Le cher Arnold en portait des traces sur la figure. Sa mère est au désespoir, son costume en lambeaux, sa santé compromise, où allons-nous ?

Le notaire exigeait un châtiment rigoureux ; et que Victor ne fréquentât plus le catéchisme, afin de prévenir des collisions nouvelles.

Bouvard et Pécuchet, bien que blessés par son ton rogue, promirent tout ce qu'il voulut, calèrent.

Victor avait-il obéi au sentiment de l'honneur, ou de la vengeance ? En tout cas, ce n'était point un lâche..

Mais sa brutalité les effrayait. La musique adoucissant les moeurs, Pécuchet imagina de lui apprendre le solfège.

Victor eut beaucoup de peine à lire couramment les notes, et à ne pas confondre les termes adagio, presto, sforzando. Son maître s'évertua à lui expliquer la gamme, l'accord parfait, le diatonique, le chromatique et les deux espèces d'intervalles, appelés majeur et mineur.

Il le fit se mettre tout droit, la poitrine en avant, la bouche grande ouverte, et pour l'instruire par l'exemple, poussa des intonations d'une voix fausse ; celle de Victor lui sortait du larynx péniblement tant il le contractait — quand un soupir commençait la mesure, il partait tout de suite, ou trop tard.

Pécuchet néanmoins, aborda le chant en partie double. Il prit une baguette pour tenir lieu d'archet, et faisait aller son bras magistralement, comme s'il avait eu un orchestre derrière lui ; mais occupé par deux besognes, il se trompait de temps ; — son erreur en amenait d'autres chez l'élève, et les yeux sur la portée, fronçant les sourcils, tendant les muscles de leur cou, ils continuaient au hasard, jusqu'au bas de la page.

Enfin Pécuchet dit à Victor : — Tu n'es pas près de briller aux orphéons et il abandonna l'enseignement de la musique. Locke d'ailleurs a peut-être raison : Elle engage dans des compagnies tellement dissolues qu'il vaut mieux s'occuper à autre chose.

Sans vouloir en faire un écrivain il serait commode pour Victor de savoir au moins trousseur une lettre. Une réflexion les arrêta. Le style épistolaire ne peut s'apprendre ; car il appartient exclusivement aux femmes.

Ils songèrent ensuite à fourrer dans sa mémoire quelques morceaux de littérature ; et embarrassés du choix, consultèrent l'ouvrage de Mme Campan. Elle recommande la scène d'Éliacin, les chœurs d'Esther, Jean-Baptiste Rousseau, tout entier.

C'est un peu vieux. Quant aux romans, elle les prohibe, comme peignant le monde sous des couleurs trop favorables.

Cependant, elle permet Clarisse Harlowe et le Père de famille par miss

Opy. — Qui est-ce miss Opy ?

Ils ne découvrirent pas son nom dans la Biographie Michaud. Restait les contes de Fées. Ils vont espérer des palais de diamants dit Pécuchet. La littérature développe l'esprit mais exalte les passions.

Victorine fut renvoyée du catéchisme, à cause des siennes.

On l'avait surprise, embrassant le fils du notaire ; et Reine ne plaisantait pas ! sa figure était sérieuse sous son bonnet à gros tuyaux. Après un scandale pareil, comment garder une jeune fille si corrompue ?

Bouvard et Pécuchet qualifièrent le curé de vieille bête. Sa bonne le défendit. Ils ripostèrent, et elle s'en alla en roulant des yeux terribles, en grommelant : On vous connaît ! on vous connaît !

Victorine effectivement, s'était prise de tendresse pour Arnold, tant elle le trouvait joli avec son col brodé, sa veste de velours, ses cheveux sentant bon ; — et elle lui apportait des bouquets, jusqu'au moment où elle fut dénoncée par Zéphyrin.

Quelle niaiserie que cette aventure ! Les deux enfants étaient d'une innocence parfaite.

Fallait-il leur apprendre le mystère de la génération ? Je n'y verrais pas de mal dit Bouvard. Le philosophe Basedow l'exposait à ses élèves, ne détaillant toutefois que la grossesse et la naissance.

Pécuchet pensa différemment, Victor commençait à l'inquiéter.

Il le soupçonnait d'avoir une mauvaise habitude. Pourquoi pas ? des hommes graves la conservent toute leur vie, et on prétend que le Duc d'Angoulême s'y livrait. Il interrogea son disciple d'une telle façon qu'il lui ouvrit les idées, et peu de temps après n'eut aucun doute.

Alors il l'appela criminel, et voulait comme traitement lui faire lire

Tissot. Ce chef-d'oeuvre, selon Bouvard, était plus pernicieux qu'utile.

Mieux vaudrait lui inspirer un sentiment poétique. Aimé Martin rapporte qu'une mère, en pareil cas, prêta La Nouvelle Héloïse à son fils ; et pour se rendre digne de l'amour, le jeune homme se précipita dans le chemin de la Vertu.

Mais Victor n'était pas capable de rêver un Ange.

— Si plutôt nous le menions chez les dames ?

Pécuchet exprima son horreur des filles publiques.

Bouvard la jugeait idiote ; et même parla de faire exprès un voyage au

Havre.

— Y penses-tu ? on nous verrait entrer !

— Eh bien achète-lui un appareil !

— Mais le bandagiste croirait peut-être que c'est pour moi dit

Pécuchet.

Il lui aurait fallu un plaisir émouvant comme la chasse ; elle amènerait la dépense d'un fusil, d'un chien. Ils préférèrent le fatiguer par l'exercice, et entreprirent des courses dans la campagne.

Le gamin leur échappait. Bien qu'ils se relayassent ils n'en pouvaient plus et le soir, n'avaient pas la force de tenir le journal.

Pendant qu'ils attendaient Victor ils causaient avec les passants — et par besoin de pédagogie, tâchaient de leur apprendre l'hygiène, déploraient la perte des eaux, le gaspillage des fumiers.

Ils en vinrent à inspecter les nourrices, et s'indignaient contre le régime de leurs pouspons. Les unes les abreuvent de gruau, ce qui les fait périr de faiblesse. D'autres les bourrent de viande avant six mois — et ils crèvent d'indigestion. Plusieurs les nettoient avec leur propre salive ; toutes les manient brutalement.

Quand ils apercevaient sur une porte un hibou crucifié, ils entraient dans la ferme et disaient :

— Vous avez tort ; — ces animaux vivent de rats, de campagnols ; on a trouvé dans l'estomac d'une chouette jusqu'à cinquante larves de chenilles.

Les villageois les connaissaient pour les avoir vus, premièrement comme médecins, puis en quête de vieux meubles, puis à la recherche des cailloux, et ils répondaient :

— Allez donc, farceurs ! n'essayez pas de nous en remonter !

Leur conviction s'ébranla. Car les moineaux purgent les potagers, mais gobent les cerises. Les hiboux dévorent les insectes, et en même temps, les chauves-souris, qui sont utiles — et si les taupes mangent les limaces, elles bouleversent le sol. Une chose dont ils étaient certains c'est qu'il faut détruire tout le gibier, funeste à l'Agriculture.

Un soir qu'ils passaient dans le bois de Faverges, ils arrivèrent devant la maison du garde. Sorel au bord de la route gesticulait entre trois individus.

Le premier était un certain Dauphin savetier, petit, maigre, et à figure sournoise. Le second le père Aubain, commissionnaire dans les villages, portait une vieille redingote jaune avec un pantalon de coutil bleu.

Le troisième Eugène, domestique chez M. Marescot, se distinguait par sa barbe, taillée comme celle des magistrats.

Sorel leur montrait un noeud coulant, en fil de cuivre — qui s'attachait à un fil de soie retenu par une brique, ce qu'on nomme un collet ; et il avait découvert le savetier, en train de l'établir.

— Vous êtes témoin, n'est-ce pas ?

Eugène baissa le menton d'une manière approbative — et le père Aubain répliqua :

— Du moment que vous le dites.

Ce qui enrageait Sorel, c'était le toupet d'avoir dressé un piège aux abords de son logement, le gremlin se figurant qu'on n'aurait pas l'idée d'en soupçonner dans cet endroit.

Dauphin prit le genre pleurard.

— Je marchais dessus, je tâchais même de le casser. On l'accusait toujours ; il était bien malheureux !

Sorel, sans lui répondre, avait tiré de sa poche, un calepin, une plume et de l'encre pour écrire un procès-verbal.

— Oh non ? dit Pécuchet.

Bouvard ajouta : Relâchez-le, c'est un brave homme !

— Lui ! un braconnier !

— Eh bien, quand cela serait ! Ils se mirent à défendre le braconnage. On sait d'abord, que les lapins rongent les jeunes pousses ; les lièvres abîment les céréales, sauf la bécasse peut-être...

— Laissez-moi donc tranquille. Et le garde écrivait, les dents serrées.

— Quel entêtement murmura Bouvard.

— Un mot de plus, je fais venir les gendarmes.

— Vous êtes un grossier personnage ! dit Pécuchet.

— Vous, des pas grand'chose, reprit Sorel.

Bouvard s'oubliait, le traita de butor, d'estafier ! — et Eugène répétait : La paix, la paix tandis que le père Aubain gémissait à trois pas d'eux sur un mètre de cailloux.

Troublés par ces voix, tous les chiens de la meute sortirent de leurs cabanes ; on voyait à travers le grillage, leurs prunelles ardentes, leurs mufles noirs, et courant çà et là, ils aboyaient effroyablement.

— Ne m'embêtez plus s'écria leur maître ou bien, je les lance sur vos culottes !

Les deux amis s'éloignèrent, contents d'avoir soutenu le Progrès, la Civilisation.

Dès le lendemain, on leur envoya une citation à comparaître devant le tribunal de simple police, pour injures envers le garde — et s'y entendre condamner à cent francs de dommages et intérêts sauf le recours du ministère public, vu les contraventions par eux commises. Coût six francs, soixante-quinze centimes. Tiercelin, huissier.

Pourquoi un ministère public ? La tête leur en tourna. Puis se calmant, ils préparèrent leur défense.

Le jour désigné, Bouvard et Pécuchet se rendirent à la Mairie, une heure trop tôt. Personne — des chaises et trois fauteuils entouraient une table couverte d'un tapis ; une niche était creusée dans la muraille pour recevoir un poêle, et le buste de l'Empereur occupant un piédocouche dominait l'ensemble.

Il flânèrent jusqu'au grenier, où il y avait une pompe à incendie, plusieurs drapeaux, — et dans un coin par terre d'autres bustes en plâtre : Napoléon sans diadème, Louis XVIII, avec des épaulettes sur un frac, Charles X, reconnaissable à sa lèvre tombante, Louis-Philippe, les sourcils arqués, la chevelure en pyramide. L'inclinaison du toit lui frôlait la nuque et tous étaient salis par les mouches et la poussière. Ce spectacle démoralisa Bouvard et Pécuchet. Les gouvernements leur faisaient pitié quand ils revinrent dans la grande salle.

Ils y trouvèrent Sorel et le garde champêtre, l'un ayant sa plaque au bras, l'autre un képi.

Une douzaine de personnes causaient, incriminées, pour défaut de balayage, chiens errants, manque de lanterne ou avoir tenu pendant la messe un cabaret ouvert.

Enfin Coulon se présenta, affublé d'une robe en serge noire et d'une toque ronde avec du velours dans le bas. Son greffier se mit à sa gauche. Le Maire en écharpe, à droite. — Et on appela, de suite, l'affaire Sorel contre Bouvard et Pécuchet.

Louis-Martial-Eugène Lenepveu, valet de chambre à Chavignolles (Calvados), profita de sa position de témoin, pour épandre tout ce qu'il savait sur une foule de choses étrangères au débat.

Nicolas-Juste Aubain, manouvrier, craignait de déplaire à Sorel et de nuire à ces messieurs, il avait entendu de gros mots, en doutait cependant, allégua sa surdité.

Le juge de paix le fit se rasseoir, puis s'adressant au garde :

Persistez-vous dans vos déclarations ?

— Certainement.

Coulon ensuite demanda aux deux prévenus, ce qu'ils avaient à dire.

Bouvard soutenait n'avoir pas injurié Sorel, mais en défendant Dauphin avoir défendu l'intérêt de nos campagnes. Il rappela les abus féodaux, les chasses ruineuses des grands seigneurs.

— N'importe ! la contravention.

— Je vous arrête ! s'écria Pécuchet. Les mots contravention, crime et délit ne valent rien. — Prendre la peine, pour classer les faits punissables, c'est prendre une base arbitraire. Autant dire aux citoyens : Ne vous inquiétez pas de la valeur de vos actions. Elle n'est déterminée que par le châtement du Pouvoir ; du reste, le Code pénal me paraît une oeuvre irrationnelle, sans principes.

— Cela se peut, répondit Coulon. Et il allait prononcer son jugement :

Attendu...

Mais Foureau qui était ministère public se leva. On avait outragé le garde dans l'exercice de ses fonctions. Si on ne respecte pas les propriétés, tout est perdu. Bref, plaise à M. le juge de paix d'appliquer le maximum de la peine.

Elle fut de dix francs, sous forme de dommages et intérêts envers Sorel.

— Très bien prononça Bouvard.

Coulon n'avait pas fini : — Les condamne à cinq francs d'amende comme coupables de la contravention relevée par le ministère public.

Pécuchet se tourna vers l'auditoire : L'amende est une bagatelle pour le riche mais un désastre pour le pauvre. Moi, ça ne me fait rien ! Et il avait l'air de narguer le tribunal.

— Je m'étonne, dit Coulon, que des Messieurs d'esprit...

— La loi vous dispense d'en avoir répliqua Pécuchet. Le juge de paix siège indéfiniment, tandis que le juge de la cour suprême est réputé capable jusqu'à soixante-quinze ans, — et celui de première instance ne l'est plus à soixante-dix.

Mais sur un geste de Foureau, Placquevent s'avança. Ils protestèrent.

— Ah ! si vous étiez nommés au concours !

— Ou par le conseil général.

— Ou un comité de prud'hommes !

— D'après un titre sérieux.

Placquevent les poussait ; — et ils sortirent, hués des autres prévenus croyant se faire bien voir par cette marque de bassesse.

Pour épancher leur indignation, ils allèrent le soir chez Beljambe.

Son café était vide, les notables ayant coutume d'en partir vers dix heures. On avait baissé le quinquet ; les murs et le comptoir s'apercevaient dans un brouillard.

Une femme survint.

C'était Mélie.

Elle ne parut pas troublée, — et en souriant, leur versa deux bocks.

Pécuchet mal à son aise, quitta vite l'établissement.

Bouvard y retourna seul, divertit quelques bourgeois par des sarcasmes contre le maire, et dès lors fréquenta l'estaminet.

Dauphin, six semaines après fut acquitté, faute de preuves. Quelle honte ! On suspectait ces mêmes témoins, que l'on avait crus déposant contre eux.

Et leur colère n'eut plus de bornes, quand l'Enregistrement les avertit d'avoir à payer l'amende. Bouvard attaqua l'Enregistrement comme nuisible à la propriété.

— Vous vous trompez ! dit le Percepteur.

— Allons donc ! Elle endure le tiers de la charge publique ! Je voudrais des procédés d'impôts, moins vexatoires, un cadastre meilleur, des changements au Régime hypothécaire, et qu'on supprimât la Banque de France, qui a le privilège de l'usure.

Girbal n'était pas de force, dégringola dans l'opinion, et ne reparut plus.

Cependant Bouvard plaisait à l'aubergiste ; il attirait du monde ; et en attendant les habitués, causait familièrement avec la bonne.

Il émit des idées drôles sur l'instruction primaire. On aurait dû, en sortant de l'école, pouvoir soigner les malades, comprendre les découvertes scientifiques, s'intéresser aux Arts ! — Les exigences de son programme le fâchèrent avec Petit ; et il blessa le Capitaine en prétendant que les soldats au lieu de perdre leur temps à la manoeuvre feraient mieux de cultiver des légumes.

Quand vint la question du libre échange, il ramena Pécuchet ; — et pendant tout l'hiver, il y eut dans le café, des regards furieux, des attitudes méprisantes, des injures et des vociférations, avec des coups de poing sur les tables qui faisaient sauter les canettes.

Langlois et les autres marchands, défendaient le commerce national ; Voisin filateur, Oudot gérant d'un laminoir et Mathieu orfèvre l'industrie nationale, les propriétaires et les fermiers l'agriculture nationale, chacun réclamant pour soi des privilèges, au détriment du plus grand nombre. — Les discours de Bouvard et de Pécuchet alarmaient.

Comme on les accusait de méconnaître la Pratique, de tendre au nivellement et à l'immoralité, ils développèrent ces trois conceptions.

Remplacer le nom de famille par un numéro matricule.

Hiérarchiser les Français, — et pour conserver son grade, il faudrait de temps à autre, subir un examen.

Plus de châtimens, plus de récompenses, mais dans tous les villages une chronique individuelle qui passerait à la Postérité.

On dédaigna leur système.

Ils en firent un article pour le journal de Bayeux, une note au Préfet, une pétition aux Chambres, un mémoire à l'Empereur.

Le journal n'inséra pas leur article ; le Préfet ne daigna répondre ; les Chambres furent muettes, et ils attendirent longtemps un pli du Château.

De quoi s'occupait l'Empereur ? de femmes sans doute !

Foureau leur conseilla plus de réserve de la part du sous-préfet.

Ils se moquaient du sous-préfet, du Préfet, et des Conseils de Préfecture, voire du Conseil d'État, la Justice administrative étant une monstruosité, car l'administration par des faveurs et des menaces gouverne injustement ses fonctionnaires. Bref ils devenaient incommodes ; — et les notables enjoignirent à Beljambe de ne plus recevoir ces deux particuliers.

Alors Bouvard et Pécuchet voulurent se signaler par une oeuvre qui forçant les respects, éblouirait leurs concitoyens — et ils ne trouvèrent pas autre chose que des projets d'embellissement pour Chavignolles.

Les trois quarts des maisons seraient démolies ; on ferait au milieu du bourg une place monumentale, un hospice du côté de Falaise, des abattoirs sur la route de Caen et au pas de la Vaque, une église romane et polychrome.

Pécuchet composa un lavis à l'encre de Chine, n'oubliant pas de teinter les bois en jaune, les prés en vert, les bâtiments en rouge ; les tableaux d'un Chavignolles idéal, le poursuivaient dans ses rêves ! Il se retournait sur son matelas. Bouvard, une nuit, en fut réveillé !

— Souffres-tu ?

Pécuchet balbutia : — Haussmann m'empêche de dormir.

Vers cette époque, il reçut une lettre de Dumouchel pour savoir le prix des bains de mer de la côte normande.

— Qu'il aille se promener avec ses bains ! Est-ce que nous avons le temps d'écrire ? Et quand ils se furent procuré une chaîne d'arpenteur, un graphomètre, un niveau d'eau et une boussole, d'autres études commencèrent.

Ils envahissaient les demeures ; souvent les bourgeois étaient surpris d'y voir ces deux hommes plantant des jalons dans les cours. Bouvard et Pécuchet annonçaient d'un air tranquille ce qui en adviendrait. Le Public s'inquiéta car enfin, l'autorité se rangerait peut-être à leur avis ?

Quelquefois, on les renvoyait brutalement. Victor escaladait les murs et montait dans les combles pour y appendre un signal, témoignait de la bonne volonté et même une certaine ardeur.

Ils étaient aussi plus contents de Victorine.

Quand elle repassait le linge elle poussait son fer sur la planche, en chantonnant d'une voix douce, s'intéressait au ménage, fit une calotte pour Bouvard, et ses points de piqué lui valurent les compliments de Romiche.

C'était un de ces tailleurs qui vont dans les fermes, raccommoder les habits. On l'eut quinze jours à la maison.

Bossu, avec des yeux rouges, il rachetait ses défauts corporels par une humeur bouffonne. Pendant que les maîtres étaient dehors il amusait Marcel et Victorine, en leur contant des farces, tirait sa langue jusqu'au menton, imitait le coucou, faisait le ventriloque, et le soir s'épargnant les frais d'auberge, allait coucher dans le fournil.

Or un matin, de très bonne heure, Bouvard sentant une envie de travail vint y prendre des copeaux, pour allumer son feu.

Un spectacle le pétrifia.

Derrière les débris du bahut, sur une paillasse Romiche et Victorine dormaient ensemble.

Il lui avait passé le bras sous la taille — et son autre main, longue comme celle d'un singe, la tenait par un genou, les paupières entrecloses, le visage encore convulsé dans un spasme de plaisir. Elle souriait, étendue sur le dos. Le bâillement de sa camisole laissait à découvert sa gorge enfantine marbrée de plaques rouges par les caresses du bossu. Ses cheveux blonds traînaient, et la clarté de l'aube jetait sur tous les deux une lumière blafarde.

Bouvard, au premier moment avait ressenti comme un heurt en pleine poitrine. Puis une pudeur l'empêcha de faire un pas, un geste. Des réflexions douloureuses l'assaillaient.

— Si jeune ! perdue ! perdue !

Ensuite il alla réveiller Pécuchet, d'un mot lui apprit tout.

— Ah ! le misérable !

— Nous n'y pouvons rien ! Calme-toi !

Et ils furent longtemps à soupirer l'un devant l'autre. Bouvard, sans redingote les bras croisés, Pécuchet au bord de sa couche, pieds nus, et en bonnet de coton.

Romiche devait partir ce jour-là, ayant terminé son ouvrage. Ils le payèrent d'une façon hautaine, silencieusement.

Mais la Providence leur en voulait.

Marcel les conduisit à pas de loup dans la chambre de Victor ; — et leur montra au fond de sa commode une pièce de vingt francs. Le gamin l'avait prié de lui en fournir la monnaie.

D'où provenait-elle ? d'un vol, bien sûr ! et commis durant leurs tournées d'ingénieurs.

Si on la réclamait ils auraient l'air complices.

Enfin ayant appelé Victor ils lui commandèrent d'ouvrir son tiroir ; la pièce n'y était plus.

Tantôt, pourtant, ils l'avaient maniée et Marcel était incapable de mentir. Cette histoire le révolutionnait tellement que depuis le matin, il gardait dans sa poche une lettre pour Bouvard.

Monsieur,

Craignant que M. Pécuchet ne soit malade, j'ai recours à votre obligeance. De qui donc la signature ? Olympe Dumouchel, née Charpeau.

Elle et son époux demandaient dans quelle localité balnéaire, Courseulles, Langrune ou Ouistreham, se trouvait la compagnie la moins bruyante ? tous les moyens de transport, le prix du blanchissage, mille choses.

Cette importunité les mit en colère contre Dumouchel, puis la fatigue les plongea dans un découragement plus lourd.

Ils récapitulèrent tout le mal qu'ils s'étaient donné, tant de leçons, de précautions, de tourments.

— Et songer disaient-ils que nous voulions autrefois, faire d'elle une sous-maîtresse ! et de lui dernièrement un piqueur de travaux !

— Si elle est vicieuse ce n'est pas la faute de ses lectures.

— Moi, pour le rendre honnête, je lui avais appris la biographie de Cartouche.

— Peut-être ont-ils manqué d'une famille, des soins d'une mère.

— J'en étais une ! objecta Bouvard.

— Hélas reprit Pécuchet. Mais il y a des natures dénuées de sens moral ; — et l'éducation n'y peut rien.

— Ah ! oui ! c'est beau, l'éducation.

Comme les orphelins ne savaient aucun métier, on leur chercherait deux places de domestiques, — et puis à la grâce de Dieu ! ils ne s'en mêlèrent plus ! — Et désormais Mon oncle et Bon ami les firent manger à la cuisine.

Mais bientôt ils s'ennuyèrent, leur esprit ayant besoin d'un travail, leur existence d'un but !

D'ailleurs que prouve un insuccès ? Ce qui avait échoué sur des enfants, pouvait être moins difficile avec des hommes ? Et ils imaginèrent d'établir un cours d'adultes.

Il aurait fallu une conférence pour exposer leurs idées. La grande salle de l'auberge conviendrait à cela, parfaitement.

Beljambe, comme adjoint, eut peur de se compromettre, refusa d'abord, puis changea d'opinion, le fit dire par la servante. Bouvard dans l'excès de sa joie, la baisa sur les deux joues.

Le maire était absent, l'autre adjoint Marescot pris tout entier par son étude, ainsi la conférence aurait lieu et le tambour l'annonça, pour le dimanche suivant à trois heures.

La veille seulement, ils pensèrent à leur costume.

Pécuchet, grâce au ciel, avait conservé un vieil habit de cérémonie a collet de velours, deux cravates blanches, et des gants noirs. Bouvard mit sa redingote bleue, un gilet de nankin, des souliers de castor, et ils étaient fort émus en traversant le village.

VOYAGE EN ENFER.

I

Et j'étais au haut du mont Atlas, et de là je contemplais le monde et son or et sa boue, et sa vertu et son orgueil.

II

Et Satan m'apparut, et Satan me dit : "Viens avec moi, regarde, vois ; et puis ensuite tu verras mon royaume, mon monde à moi."

III

Et Satan m'emmena avec lui et me montra le monde.

IV

Et planant sur les airs, nous arrivâmes en Europe. Là il me montra des savants, des hommes de lettres, des femmes, des fats, des pédants, des rois et des sages ; ceux-là étaient les plus fous.

V

Et je vis un frère qui tuait son frère, une mère qui trompait sa fille, des écrivains qui par le prestige de leur plume abusaient du peuple, des prêtres qui trahissaient les fidèles, des pédants qui faisaient languir la jeunesse, et la guerre qui moissonne les hommes.

VI

Là, c'était un intrigant qui, rampant dans la boue, arrivait jusqu'aux pieds des grands, leur mordait le talon ; ils tombaient, et alors il tressaillait de la chute qu'avait faite cette tête en tombant dans la boue.

VII

Là un roi savourait, dans sa couche d'infamie où de père en fils ils reçoivent des leçons d'adultère , il savourait les grâces de la courtisane favorite qui gouvernait la France, et le peuple, lui, applaudissait ; c'est qu'il avait les yeux bandés.

VIII

Et je vis deux géants : le premier, vieux, courbé, ridé et maigre, s'appuyait sur un long bâton tortueux appelé pédantisme ; l'autre était jeune, fier, vigoureux, avait une taille d'hercule, une tête de poète et des bras d'or, il s'appuyait sur une énorme massue que le bâton tortueux avait pourtant abîmée ; la massue, c'était la raison.

IX

Et tous deux se battaient vigoureusement, et enfin le vieillard succomba. Je lui demandai son nom.

— Absolutisme, me dit-il.

— Et ton vainqueur ?

— Il a deux noms.

— Lesquels ?

— Les uns l'appellent : Civilisation, et les autres : Liberté.

X

Et puis Satan me mena dans un temple, mais un temple en ruines.

XI

Et le peuple fondait des cercueils pour en faire des boulets, et la poussière qui y était s'envolait de dépit ; c'est que ce siècle-là, c'était un siècle de sang.

XII

Et les ruines restèrent désertes. Et un homme, un pauvre homme en guenilles, à la tête blanche, un homme chargé de misère, d'infamie et d'opprobre, un de ceux dont le front, ridés de soucis renferme à vingt ans les maux d'un siècle, s'assit là au pied d'une colonne.

XIII

Et il paraissait comme la fourmi aux pieds de la pyramide.

XIV

Et il regarda les hommes longtemps, tous le regardèrent en dédain et en pitié, et il les maudit tous ; car ce vieillard, c'était la Vérité.

XV

— Montre-moi ton royaume ? dis-je à Satan.

— Le voilà !

— Comment donc ?

Et Satan me répondit :

— C'est que le monde, c'est l'enfer.

UNE PENSÉE.

Des fous bondissent, s'élancent et se redressent, fiers et aigus, c'est la valse, c'est le galop.

Et parmi toutes ces fleurs, une s'est élevée plus grande, plus belle et plus odoriférante.

Parmi toutes ces robes, qui m'ont froissé en me faisant tressaillir d'envie, une m'a fait plus tressaillir que les autres.

Parmi toutes ces tailles qui tourbillonnent, ces seins qui se gonflent, ces beaux yeux bleus qui regardent, une a tourbillonné près de moi, un sein a palpité pour moi, des yeux bleus m'ont regardé.

Je l'invite, elle danse ; je presse sa taille, je lui souris à elle, elle, et encore à elle. Se penchant sur moi comme fatiguée, ses lèvres brûlantes me disent un soupir... et je comprends ce soupir. Je la regarde, elle est heureuse, et j'oublie la valse et le monde et toutes ces femmes qui tourbillonnent et ces glaces qui reluisent et ces lumières qui flamboient. Mais le matin arrive, adieu !

Mais la pensée s'est envolée comme la rose qui se flétrit.

Une pensée d'amour c'est une rose de printemps.

NOUVELLES.

La nouvelle que nous avions annoncée dimanche dernier, sur le duel de M. de Saint-Léger avec M. Lireux, est fausse.

Le bal Lalanne a été magnifique, les toilettes étaient superbes et les costumes riches et frais.

Quant au cheval, qu'en dirons-nous ? On nous en dit du bien et du mal.

Il ne pouvait, dit-on, se tenir sur ses pieds de derrière.

Je vous apprendrai que tous les professeurs ont lu mon journal ; dans le prochain numéro, je vous donnerai des détails sur cette affaire.

Le fameux Martin a manqué d'être avalé par son ours Néron. Dans une représentation à Besançon, une lutte cruelle s'est engagée entre l'homme et l'animal, le public effrayé a exigé qu'on baissât le rideau. Pourtant Martin, par l'ascendant qu'il a sur les animaux, est parvenu à renverser son ours.

(HISTOIRE CORSE.)

I

Une superbe frégate à la taille élancée et svelte entrait à voiles déployées dans le port de Gênes. Tout en elle indiquait la maîtresse et la souveraine, jusqu'à sa flamme blanche qui se laissait flotter à la brise du soir avec orgueil et majesté.

L'on voyait sur le gaillard d'arrière un homme qui paraissait le maître, quoiqu'il ne prit aucune part à la manœuvre ; son costume était à moitié grec et italien ; la tête, belle et fière, était entourée de longs cheveux qui venaient s'appuyer en boucles sur ses épaules nues et basanées ; un riche poignard et un long cimeterre pendaient à sa ceinture blanche et bleue, et dont le nœud doré, tombant jusqu'à terre, venait de temps en temps essuyer sur ses sandales rouges, un peu de cendre échappée de sa large pipe de jonc.

Enfin le navire s'était arrêté. Ornano en descendit ; son regard était hautain, et il semblait mépriser toute cette multitude qui montrait du doigt, avec respect et crainte, un homme qui, naguère paysan de Corse aux mains pleines de goudron, n'avait eu d'autre éducation que celle de dompter la tempête, de faire sauter une sainte-barbe, ou de bombarder une ville ; un homme qui n'avait d'autre nom que Pietro Ornano, d'autre seigneurie que sa frégate et d'autres sujets que ses marins. Mais ce paysan, ce corsaire, cet homme aux manières rustiques et sauvages, venait dans Gênes imposer des conditions et faire trembler un doge sur son trône.

La France était en guerre avec Gênes ; elle avait trouvé en Corse un puissant auxiliaire en la personne de San Pietro. C'était une de ces âmes vigoureusement trempées dans les vertus poussées jusqu'à l'excès ; il n'avait d'autre pensée que la gloire, d'autre idole que la gloire, d'autre religion que la gloire ; il ne connaissait d'autre plaisir que de commander ses matelots, de fumer son tabac d'Italie, de regarder l'horizon qui s'enfonce sous les vagues, et de se laisser ballotter par le roulis lorsque la mer est calme, lorsque le vent souffle à peine, lorsque les hirondelles viennent sur le beaupré.

Pourtant depuis quelques jours il était triste, son front se ridait souvent, et l'on pouvait deviner à ses soupirs réitérés, à ses longues rêveries, que quelque chose lui déchirait le cœur et que son âme était en proie à des sentiments inconnus jusqu'alors.

II

Les portes du palais s'ouvrirent devant le marin ; les gardes lui présentèrent les armes, le grand escalier fut couvert de tapis, son nom résonna dans la salle du trône, et le doge lui-même descendit pour le recevoir.

— Je suis venu, dit San Pietro, pour traiter avec toi des conditions de la paix. La France, mon alliée, pour prix de mes services, m'a donné le pouvoir de les faire à mon gré. Écoute, je ne te demande ni or ni sang, mais je te demande ce qui m'est plus cher, à moi, que tous tes sujets, fussent-ils des rois, que ton trône, fût-il celui du monde ; je te demande ta fille, je te demande Vanina.

— À lui, Vanina ? répétèrent sourdement tous les courtisans assemblés.

— Oui, continua le corsaire, oui, à moi Vanina ! ou demain je fais bombarder Gênes, demain j'aurai Vanina ; et à toi l'esclavage et le malheur. Ton trône ? je le foulerai aux pieds, et ton palais, j'en ferai une prison pour toi. Vous pensiez donc qu'aucun sentiment ne pouvait m'émouvoir, vous croyiez que l'amour ne pouvait surgir de ce cœur de marin ; vous croyez que les passions ne remuent pas aussi fort le cœur d'un paysan que celui d'un roi ? Et pourtant s'il est ici une tête couronnée et un corsaire, le corsaire est roi et le monarque est esclave.

— Soit, répondit le doge, tu peux être le maître, mais souviens-toi de mes paroles, San Pietro : jamais, jamais, tu n'auras ma fille, je te la refuse ; et si tu peux conquérir ce trône, si tu peux, dans ta rage de tigre, le souiller et l'anéantir, si tu peux dans ta vengeance féroce incendier ce palais, si tu peux, démon, briser mon sceptre et ma couronne..., jamais tu n'auras Vanina, et Gênes sera plutôt ton esclave que ma fille ta maîtresse ! En effet, quelquefois la servitude forcée ennoblit les rois, mais le déshonneur volontaire les souille et les flétrit.

— Eh bien, demain, tu n'auras plus Vanina, dit le corsaire d'un ton solennel ; dans trente jours tu n'auras plus Gênes et dans trente et un jours, à un seul mot du corsaire, cette tête tombera.

Puis il descendit les degrés du palais, et, se retournant tout à coup avec ironie et dédain :

— Il est dommage, dit-il, de brûler une si belle colonnade !

III

Vers minuit, on vit débarquer une douzaine d'hommes sur la grève ; il y en avait un qui, couvert d'un masque noir, portait une longue dague et un riche cimenterre ; deux pistolets reluisaient à sa ceinture, et le clair de lune, qui venait frapper sur les canons, semblait lui faire deux étoiles à ses côtés. À l'aide d'une échelle de corde ils escaladèrent le grand mur des jardins du doge. Déjà l'homme au masque noir s'apprêtait à dresser son échelle pour monter sur la terrasse, quand une balle vint siffler à ses oreilles et renverser un de ses compagnons... Puis il y eut du sang, des cadavres, des cris, et Vanina fut enlevée.

Quand ils furent loin en mer, quand ils ne virent plus les phares de Gênes, l'homme ôta son masque, et la jeune fille évanouie reprit ses sens.

Elle pleura son père, ses esclaves, ses jardins où le soir elle aimait à contempler la mer, à entendre les vagues qui venaient mourir sur le rivage ; elle pleura son beau palais, ses bains de porphyre et ses cygnes du Gange.

Pourtant chaque jour apportait moins d'ennuis, de regrets et de larmes, et un peu plus d'amour pour Ornano.

Au bout d'un mois, le corsaire tint sa promesse ; avec quatre frégates il vint à l'improviste attaquer Gênes, Vanina était avec lui. L'entrée du port était fermée et ses bassins défendus ; deux bordées de canon suffirent et la palissade sauta.

Alors il entra, mais il ne s'aperçut pas que derrière lui les trois autres navires n'avaient pu passer et qu'il se trouvait emprisonné dans un port qu'il avait forcé ; alors, écumant de rage, il jura sur sa tête qu'il tuerait de sa propre main quiconque parlerait de se rendre.

Une minute auparavant un homme s'était jeté à la mer sur les ordres de Vanina.

— Que lui as-tu ordonné ? demanda-t-il à Vanina.

— Oh ! excuse-moi, pardon, Ornano ; mais je t'aimais et je lui ai ordonné d'aller demander grâce à mon père.

— Une carabine ! s'écria aussitôt San Pietro furieux, une carabine pour qu'il n'aille pas jusqu'à terre.

Mais on ne distinguait plus le marin perdu dans la fumée des canons. Ornano était resté pensif, la tête baissée sur sa poitrine ; son regard fixé sur Vanina était sinistre ; ses lèvres, pâles et tremblantes, semblaient se contracter d'un rire lugubre.

Un homme aux armes du doge aborda le navire et demanda à parler à Ornano ; il lui remit un message qu'il ouvrit en tremblant.

Vanina, appuyée sur son épaule, le parcourut avec avidité.

— Ta grâce, dit-elle.

Il pâlit, tourna sur elle un regard plein de pitié et d'amour, puis, s'adressant à l'envoyé :

— Ce soir, vous saurez ma réponse !

MATTEO FALCONE

OU

DEUX CERCUEILS POUR UN PROSCRIT.

C'était en Corse, dans un grand champ, sur un tas de foin que, à moitié éveillé, Albano, couché sur le dos, caressait sa chatte et ses petits, tout en regardant les nuages qui passaient sur le fond d'azur et le soleil qui reluisait de son éclat de pourpre et dardait ses rayons sur la plaine bordée de coteaux.

C'était un bel enfant qu'Albano : de longs cheveux tombaient en boucles sur ses épaules, à chaque sourire vous auriez dit une parole de joie, à chaque regard un éclair dans les yeux.

Il entend des coups de fusil qui se succèdent, il se détourne en sursaut, et aussitôt un homme vient se jeter en courant sur le tas de foin ; ses cheveux étaient épars, ses vêtements étaient en lambeaux, la peau de son genou était déchirée, beaucoup de sang s'en écoulait, et l'on voyait à la trace de ses pas que là un proscrit avait passé.

— Enfant, lui dit-il, cède-moi ta place. Oh ! je t'en prie ! que je me cache !

Albano jouait toujours avec sa chatte.

— Par grâce ! par pitié, oh ! cache-moi !

— Que voulez-vous ?

— Cache-moi !

Et il lui jeta une pièce de monnaie qui, en tombant, affaissa le foin.

Et le proscrit s'était mis sous la paille.

Albano pour un moment avait abandonné son jouet, et prenant sa pièce à deux mains, couché sur le ventre, il la faisait sautiller en souriant.

Au bout de cinq minutes, une douzaine de gardes l'entouraient. Un d'eux, qui marchait à leur tête et qui paraissait leur chef, s'approcha d'Albano et lui dit :

— Enfant, n'as-tu pas vu un homme courir par ici ? il était blessé, avait les habits déchirés.

— De qui voulez-vous parler ?

— D'un homme que nous cherchons.

— Du tout, je n'ai rien vu, si ce n'est une chèvre qui cherchait son maître ; encore marchait-elle à pas lents et je vous assure qu'elle était en fort bon état. Est-ce là votre affaire ?

— Tu te moques de la justice, Albano.

— Et pourquoi êtes-vous venus me réveiller ?

— Il le fallait.

— Allez à tous les diables !

— Ah ! c'est ainsi que tu traites la justice du canton ? Tiens, misérable.

Et il fit semblant de le mettre en joue.

— Vous n'oseriez, dit l'enfant avec fermeté, car mon père me vengerait, et, voyez-vous, mon père c'est Matteo Falcone, le plus intrépide chasseur de Corse et le plus vigoureux lutteur du canton.

Le prudent officier mit bas son arme et se tournant vers ses compagnons :

— Allons, dit-il, il n'y a pas moyen d'en tirer quelque chose.

Puis il se retourna vers Albano, et, lui présentant une montre, il ajouta :

— Albano, si on te la donnait ?

— Quoi ?

— Voudrais-tu ? ...

Et l'enfant resta muet quelques instants, ballotté par l'envie d'avoir et un reste d'honneur qui lui surgissait alors plus fort et plus terrible, pour lui dire tout bas, mais avec puissance : Albano, tu es un lâche !

— Si tu nous le montrais, continua l'officier.

Albano lança un regard perçant sur le tas de foin, puis il prit la montre, et, la posant par terre, il la regarda luire aux rayons du soleil.

En ce moment arriva Matteo Falcone, père d'Albano. Il s'informa de tout ce que c'était, ce que signifiaient ces cris et cette scène de sang.

— Rien, lui dit-on, un prisonnier qui s'est enfui ; il s'était caché sous ce tas de foin et votre fils nous en a avertis... grâce à cette montre, dit l'officier en l'indiquant du doigt.

Le fugitif fut tiré de dessous le tas de foin, ses genoux chancelaient, ses lèvres étaient pâles et ses yeux rouges de colère, ses mains palpitantes tâtonnaient à sa ceinture comme pour y chercher un poignard ; il n'y trouva qu'une plaie profonde et retira son poing tout ensanglanté.

Promenant ses yeux autour de lui, il rencontra le regard de Matteo et lui dit :

— C'est donc toi qui m'as livré ; va, tu es un lâche ! Sais-tu ce que j'ai fait, moi ? J'ai voulu venger une injure faite à ma fille ; j'ai frappé sur le prince, et son sang est retombé sur ma tête pour se mêler au mien. Adieu ! ils m'emmènent à l'échafaud ; adieu ! et l'on saura que Matteo est un traître !

— Ah ! le roi sera content, dit tout bas l'officier ; votre fils nous a été d'une grande utilité.

Le montagnard ne dit rien et mit une amorce à sa longue carabine.

Le soir, le Corse dit à Albano de le suivre jusque derrière la colline.

Il avait déjà pris son fusil et se disposait à sortir, quand sa femme lui demanda si elle ne pouvait pas aussi l'accompagner.

— Non, femme, reste, je te l'ordonne !

Et il y avait dans ces paroles un ton si positif et si imposant qu'elle tomba attérée sur le banc de pierre, et les regarda partir, muette d'anxiété et d'angoisse.

Un quart d'heure après, elle entendit un coup de fusil et le bruit que fait quelque chose en tombant dans l'eau... Elle poussa un sourd râlement, s'affaissa par terre, puis elle se releva et un rire étrange contracta ses lèvres.

Le lendemain, c'était à Ajaccio, on venait de retirer un enfant de la rivière. Oh ! le pauvre enfant ! de beaux cheveux blonds tombaient sur ses épaules, ses lèvres étaient tachetées de noir, ses mains, liées par un chapelet, étaient jointes comme pour la prière ; sa poitrine était percée d'une balle et l'on distinguait encore sa sanglante trace...

Une femme accourt, pâle, échevelée, et regarde longtemps fixement le cadavre ; elle se cramponna aux barreaux de la morgue et répétait avec douleur :

— Oh mon enfant ! mon enfant !

Puis elle tomba par terre en poussant un cri d'agonie...

Aussitôt arriva le fossoyeur apportant un cercueil.

— Vous vous êtes trompé, dit quelqu'un de la foule, il en faut deux !

CHEVRIN

ET LE ROI DE PRUSSE

OU

L'ON PREND SOUVENT LA TÊTE D'UN ROI
POUR CELLE D'UN ÂNE.

Votre grand-père ne vous a-t-il jamais parlé de Frédérick, roi de Prusse ? C'était un grand homme sec et courbé, à cheveux poudrés, et qui s'appuyait toujours sur une longue canne de jonc ; le collet de son habit vert, qu'il ne brossait jamais, de son habit vert tout râpé et qui l'avait accompagné à la conquête de la Poméranie, était encore rendu plus sale par une longue queue de cheveux qui lui tombait au milieu du dos. Eh bien, cet homme, d'un génie si vaste et qui, à ce qu'il semble, ne devait s'occuper que de conquêtes et de batailles, avait encore le temps non seulement d'écrire à Voltaire, oh ! cela vous le savez, mais encore de plaisanter avec ses courtisans.

Un jour il appela Chevrin, lui remit une petite boîte en lui disant affectueusement :

— Chevrin, je t'ai toujours connu comme un ami fidèle, Voici un gage de ma reconnaissance.

Vous voudriez bien savoir ce que c'était que cette boîte ; un moment, je vais vous le dire.

Elle était petite, de bois de palissandre, incrustée d'or et ornée de pierres précieuses.

Chevrin l'emporte chez lui, l'ouvre avec impatience et voit non son brevet de général, non quelques billets de banque, ni une décoration, ni un beau poignard, ni une lettre de noblesse, ni une nomination à la chancellerie, ni même quelques pistoles, ni même une bague, ni même un simple bijou, ni même la plus petite chose, ni même le plus mauvais madrigal, mais c'était un portrait en miniature : les narines étaient ouvertes, la bouche béante si bien qu'elle semblait braire, avec ses oreilles gracieusement rabattues sur son col, et ses grands yeux ternes étaient ouverts comme l'original.

Ce n'était rien moins qu'un âne en toutes ses parties.

Chevrin resta muet à cet aspect, toutes ses espérances déçues, toutes ses illusions envolées comme un brouillard. Oh ! combien d'illusions, d'espérances, de rêves d'ambition se sont envolés comme un brouillard ! Oh ! combien d'illusions, d'espérances, de rêves d'ambition se sont évanouis devant... une tête d'âne !

Il lui vint une idée, non à l'âne, mais à l'homme. Il pensa que le roi oubliait ses services, qu'il abandonnait son ancien ami de bataille, et il pleura. Oh ! combien de pleurs ont coulé devant une tête d'âne !

Puis il pensa que le roi avait voulu plaisanter et il sourit, comme on a souri... devant une tête d'âne ; ensuite, pour mieux la voir, il l'approcha de la fenêtre. Combien n'a-t-on pas mis au jour de têtes d'ânes !

Néanmoins il se promit une vengeance.

Qu'on veuille bien se transporter à quelques mois de là. C'était à la table du roi de Prusse ; arrivé au dessert, Chevrin tire une boîte de sa poche ; c'était la certaine petite boîte qui contenait le portrait d'âne, mais cette fois elle était ouverte, et chacun, prenant une miniature renfermée dedans, regardait le roi scrupuleusement et ramenait ses yeux vers la peinture disant : "Oui, c'est bien lui, sa bouche mi-ouverte semble parler ; c'est bien là ses larges narines et ses grands yeux ouverts."

Elle arrive enfin à Voltaire qui, criant plus fort en sa qualité de philosophe, dit au roi :

— Ah ! sire, je n'ai jamais rien vu de si ressemblant.

Le roi, qui se ressouvenait élu présent qu'il avait fait à Chevrin, croyait que c'était une repréailles ; il trépignait d'indignation, était rouge de colère, et enfin, n'en pouvant plus, il se jette sur le portrait, le regarde et dit ensuite :

— Je prenais mon portrait pour celui d'un âne.

Or on convint qu'il n'y a pas grande différence entre la tête d'un roi et celle d'un âne, puisque le possesseur s'y méprend.

DERNIÈRE SCÈNE

DE LA MORT DE MARGUERITE DE BOURGOGNE.

Connaissez-vous la Normandie, ce beau pays si rempli de vieux castels dont chacun éveille le souvenir d'un nom célèbre ? la Normandie, où chaque champ a eu sa bataille, chaque pierre son nom ? la Normandie si remplie de vieilles légendes, de contes fantastiques, de traditions populaires qui tous se rattachent à quelques lambeaux de notre histoire du moyen âge ?

Eh bien, sur les bords de la Seine, les ruines du Château-Gaillard sont encore là debout, sur le roc, et semblent se rire, à la face de chaque génération qui naît et qui meurt, des sept siècles qui, en passant, n'ont fait que lui arracher petit à petit quelques pierres qui roulent dans le ravin quand l'ouragan gronde et que la pluie tombe.

Alors, en 1316, il était jeune encore. Au haut, c'était son drapeau blanc dont les flots se roulaient au souffle du vent ; à l'intérieur les gardes, et au bas, dans un cachot, une femme qui gémissait et regardait le soleil couchant d'un air d'adieu, de rage et de désespoir.

Elle était jeune encore, cette femme, vingt-six ans ; vingt-six ans, et pas un sourire à la bouche ; vingt-six ans, et peut-être le nombre de ses crimes surpassait-il celui de ses jours !

Vingt-six ans ! et c'était la Marguerite de Bourgogne, la Marguerite aux orgies sanglantes à la tour de Nesle ; Marguerite, la Femme aux nuits d'insomnie, aux rêves de sang ; Marguerite, la reine de France.

Ce jour-là, elle avait demandé en grâce qu'on lui permît de regarder plus longtemps à travers les barreaux de sa cellule ; elle avait demandé à prendre l'air plus longtemps, comme si elle eût voulu en prendre pour l'éternité. Plusieurs fois la main du geôlier s'avança pour fermer le volet.

— Encore cinq minutes, disait-elle d'une voix tendre et suppliante.

Et le geôlier avait soin d'aller chez lui, de retourner son sablier, ayant compté le temps qu'il avait mis à venir et celui qu'il mettrait à retourner au cachot ; puis il revenait de nouveau.

Enfin elle vit un cavalier qui s'avavançait au galop, et rentra dans sa chambre en pensant à ce que pouvait être cet homme qui se dirigeait en toute hâte vers la porte du donjon.

Peu de temps, après la porte du cachot roula sur ses gonds, et un homme se présenta. Il s'arrêta debout sur le seuil de la porte.

— Quoi, c'est vous ! lui dit Marguerite, vous, vous encore ici, Lyonnet ! Oh ! Lyonnet, il faut que tu sois mon démon pour me poursuivre ainsi jusque dans ma prison, pour m'accabler jusque dans mon cercueil.

Et elle se prit à rire amèrement :

— Écoute, Marguerite, tous les deux nous voulions un sceptre pour appui, et un peuple pour esclave. Eh bien, Marguerite, toi tu as tué ton père et tu es reine de France ; moi je n'ai tué personne et je ne suis rien.

— Tu m'accuses de la mort de mon père, Lyonnet, tandis que c'est toi, au contraire, toi qui a pris le poignard.

— Oui, cela est juste.

— D'où vient que tu me poursuis toujours ?

— C'est que, vois-tu, Marguerite, en commençant à t'aimer j'avais aimé une enfant pure et candide, et que maintenant, Marguerite, je hais l'enfant qui est la femme adultère.

— Non, tu ne m'as jamais aimée !

— Oh ! Marguerite, oui je t'aimais et je t'ai donné mon bonheur, car je me suis étourdi sur le crime de ton père, et j'ai perdu ma foi, et maintenant tout mon être est le mélange de tous les vices, de toute la haine qui peuvent tenir dans le cœur d'un homme ; mais cette haine a débordé du vase des passions, quelques gouttes sont tombées sur toi et te rongent.

— Ciel ! serais-tu ici l'exécuteur ?

— Écoute, Marguerite ! Non, tu ne m'as jamais aimé ! tu croyais pouvoir me dire dans mon cachot : “Lyonnet, tu m'as abaissée à la prière”, tu voyais mes larmes sans pitié, tu contemplais mon orgueil qui venait mourir aux pieds d'un assassin ; en bien, j'assisterai à ton agonie, je contemplerai tes dernières convulsions, je verrai la main gluante de l'exécuteur s'abaisser sur ta tête défaillante, et je la verrai, cette tête, tomber et rebondir sur le passé sanglant. Eh bien, maintenant, Marguerite, les temps sont changés et c'est moi qui suis le maître, et toi la victime ; oui, Marguerite, j'ai ordre de Louis de t'étrangler avec tes cheveux.

— Lyonnet, tu ne te ressouviens pas de nos amours, en Bourgogne, de tes promesses et de tes serments ?

— Non, non, à toi les orgies à la tour de Nesle, à toi la trace de sang que l'on voyait sur ses murs, à toi les cadavres que la Seine chaque matin roulait dans son lit ; à toi la honte, à toi l'ignominie, à toi la mort, à toi la malédiction !

— Oh ! grâce ! grâce, Lyonnet ! Nous partirons, nous irons vivre loin d'ici, vivre dans notre premier amour, oublier tout comme un rêve sanglant. Grâce ! grâce !

— Eh ! faisais-tu grâce à ceux qui, dans la tour de Nesle, te demandaient la vie sous le poignard de tes assassins ? Marguerite, malgré tous tes crimes, malgré toutes tes nuits sanglantes et tes orgies infâmes, quelque chose n'est-il pas resté ? As-tu quelque prière à faire ? Oh ! dis-la, et vite, car cette heure-ci est ta dernière.

Marguerite s'agenouilla, prononça quelques mots en balbutiant. Était-ce des sanglots ou une prière ?

— Relève-toi, dit Lyonnet en la prenant par le bras ; bien d'autres me font attendre comme toi ; ils me demandent successivement une heure, une demi-heure, une minute, mais je donne plus : l'éternité !

— Oh ! ne me parle pas de l'éternité !

— Allons, Marguerite, défais ton bonnet, tes cheveux. Oh ! ils étaient beaux, tes cheveux ! c'était ta joie et ton orgueil. Oh ! tes cheveux ! qu'ils s'ondulaient bien sur tes épaules ! Oh ! tes cheveux ! qu'ils ont reçu de baisers brûlants et passionnés !

Aussitôt il en prit deux mèches et en entoura le cou de Marguerite.

On entendit un sourd râlement, un corps tomba par terre et la belle Marguerite était un cadavre !

Le lendemain on porta un cercueil à Vernonet, on creusa là une Fosse et l'on mit dessus une simple pierre avec cette inscription :

CI-GÎT

MARGUERITE DE BOURGOGNE

REINE DE FRANCE.

Des siècles ont passé sur cette tombe, le temps a rongé le cadavre, l'herbe a caché l'inscription. Le temps efface tout, les rois eux-mêmes ; mais leurs crimes — oui — mais plus tard.

PORTRAIT DE LORD BYRON.

C'était un de ces hommes à hautes conceptions, à idées généreuses et progressives, aux violentes passions, à une âme tout à la fois sensible et magnanime, bizarre en un mot ; lord Byron, c'était le fils du siècle.

Il ne croyait à rien, si ce n'est à tous les vices, à un Dieu vivant, existant pour le plaisir de faire le mal ; il ne croyait à rien, si ce n'est à l'amour de la patrie, à la puissance de son génie et à la fascination des yeux de sa maîtresse ; au delà, tout dans le monde n'était pour lui que préjugés, ambition, avarice.

L'honneur d'une femme lui semblait une rose, mais une rose dont chacun en passant pouvait prendre le parfum, le faner et le flétrir. Il eut cent maîtresses, n'en aima qu'une, et encore, celle-là, il la rudoyait et la dédaignait pour son amour fou et effréné. Il avait constamment une vingtaine de chevaux dans son écurie, il les adorait tous. Il n'aimait pas la France, parce qu'en France il ne fait pas assez de brouillards ni assez de neige ; en France on ne respire pas, comme à Venise, l'air embaumé de quelque villa.

C'était un athée, et il restait des journées entières dans une église, plongé dans une contemplation muette ou une méditation profonde.

Quand il était en Angleterre, il sortait seul, à cheval, et il aimait à faire blanchir d'écume sa gentille jument arabe, en contemplant la fumée de sa cigarette qui s'envolait au souffle du vent et qui se mêlait au brouillard de décembre.

Il fréquentait les tavernes, les écuries et les cochers ; souvent, sur la place, on le vit boxer avec les grooms. Il était chéri du peuple et haï de la noblesse. Plusieurs fois il fut sur le point d'adresser des discours à la multitude.

À Venise, souvent, le soir, il prenait un gondolier et faisait ainsi plusieurs lieues en mer, se laissant balloter par le roulis ; rentré chez lui, il se défaisait de ses habits de deuil et restait toute la nuit à regarder une tête de mort posée au milieu de sa cheminée. Il aimait l'Italie, il l'adorait comme une mère ou une amante ; il l'aimait, parce que là on y trouve des cœurs qui aiment ou qui haïssent, des yeux qui vous lancent des éclairs d'amour ou de passion ; là on y trouve toujours quelque femme belle et inconnue, comme un songe doré de jeune homme ; là on y trouve ou amour ou poignard ; là on y trouve toujours quelques sons d'une guitare et d'une voix suave, qui résonnent le soir au clair de lune sur les eaux blanches du lac voisin ; là on y trouve enfin toujours quelque sujet de drame ou de roman.

Byron ne trouvait rien de beau comme la liberté, rien de hideux comme l'or. Plusieurs fois il affronta le danger par plaisir ou par vanité, et, en Grèce, il préféra la mort à une saignée. Il y alla pour concourir à la renaissance d'un pays mort par l'esclavage ; il alla pour relever le char de la Liberté de la fange où l'avaient enfoncé les tyrans, mais cette fange-là elle ennoblit, elle immortalisa Byron, le fils du siècle.

LE MOINE DES CHARTREUX

OU

L'ANNEAU DU PRIEUR.

Il y avait déjà huit jours que les caveaux de la Grande-Chartreuse avaient retenti du chant des morts, à l'enterrement du prieur, lorsque le Frère Bernardo, couché dans sa cellule, se rappela toute cette scène de deuil, et les plus petites circonstances de cette triste journée vinrent se représenter à sa mémoire, fraîches et récentes encore.

Il voyait de là sa longue robe, sa ceinture de corde, sa barbe blanche, sa couche de marbre et ses mains posées en croix sur sa poitrine ; à cette pensée il s'arrêta. C'était cette même pensée qui le torturait depuis si longtemps, c'est-à-dire depuis quelques jours, qui ne lui laissait pas un instant de sommeil, pas une heure de repos ; cette même pensée qu'il aurait voulu pour tout au monde effacer, anéantir, et qui se représentait là, toujours plus forte et plus puissante, parce qu'elle était belle et gracieuse. Il se releva, se mit à genoux et chercha un peu de repos dans la prière. Oh ! non, ce fut en vain ; toujours là, toujours là !

Il alla à sa fenêtre pour voir si le charme d'une nuit tranquille, si le silence de la nature endormie n'inspireraient pas à son âme plus de repos que la prière ou la vue d'un christ. Non ! et pourtant l'air était pur, le ciel sans nuage, la lune sereine ; la campagne était belle, quelques cabanes, un bois et un vaste château en formaient l'horizon.

Et son front se rida, et il pensa encore à la tombe du prieur ; la même image vint se représenter à son esprit, et ses lèvres balbutiaient convulsivement quelques mots qui mouraient en naissant : “Oh, l'avoir ! le tenir ! le posséder ! rêver un monde dans une prison, penser à la vie dans un sépulcre ! Oui, j'irai, je le prendrai, cet anneau !”

En effet, n'était-il pas naturel que ce pauvre homme, qui n'avait pas la réalité pour jouir, souhaitât des illusions pour rêver ? Et on savait dans le couvent que cet anneau de prieur se rattachait à des souvenirs de jeunesse et d'amour, dont sa piété n'avait pu se défaire, car après la passion abattue il reste dans le cœur de l'homme des racines inviolables qui se rattachent à d'anciens souvenirs comme le lierre qui, pourtant mort, embrasse le chêne sur lequel il a grandi !

“Oh ! continuait Bernardo en regardant la forêt, là dedans peut-être se promène un jeune homme qui aspire à longs traits sa vie de bonheur, contemplant avec amour et extase un ciel pur et azuré, couvert de sa robe dorée ; il peut porter au loin ses yeux où respirent la vigueur et l'avenir, sans qu'ils retombent avec dédain sur les barreaux de la cage d'un homme !”

Puis regardant les châteaux “Oh ! là dedans il y a des hommes qui vivent, la valse peut-être bondit sur le parquet, saccadée et délirante. Il y a des femmes qui tourbillonnent entraînées dans les bras de leurs danseurs ; il y a des laquais aux livrées d'or, des chevaux dont la parure a peut-être coûté plus d'heures de travail que mes heures d'ennui ; il y a des lustres aux mille reflets, des diamants qui brillent dans les glaces ; il y a des roses de la vie !”

Puis il se remit sur son lit en cherchant le sommeil ; et il voyait dans un coin l'anneau qui brillait, comme si Satan le lui eût présenté sans cesse. Il se retourna, et il vit encore l'anneau dans tout son éclat.

Respirant à peine, il s'assit. “Maintenant, pensait-il en regardant la lune qui se reflétait sur les barreaux de sa cellule et sur le christ d'étain suspendu à son lit, maintenant il y en a qui vivent heureux et contents, sans penser à la veille, au lendemain, à la vie, à l'éternité, et qui vivent pour le jour dont ils recueillent les joies comme le parfum qui s'exhale d'une fleur. Mais partons ! tout dort, le jour va bientôt venir (à peine était-il minuit)”, et il lui semblait que l'aube pénétrât dans sa cellule ainsi que son anneau, souvenir du monde, qui allait habiter avec lui dans le tombeau de sa vie.

Aussitôt il prit un sac d'outils et la clef du caveau, qu'il s'était procurés, alluma une lanterne, descendit l'escalier et arriva à la porte de l'église qu'il ouvrit d'une main tremblante.

Chaque pas qu'il faisait lui semblait le pas de quelqu'un qui marchait derrière lui, et il se retournait en frissonnant, aussi pâle que les morts qui l'environnaient.

Il arrive haletant à la porte du caveau, l'ouvre et la referme.

Il descendit tous les degrés ; sur le dernier il s'arrêta et il plongea son regard dans un horizon de sépulcres, — et son regard se reporta ailleurs, et il ne vit encore que la mort, et la mort toujours. “Vite, vite, ouvrons le tombeau ! car peut-être va-t-on bientôt s'apercevoir de mon absence, peut-être même est-on déjà sur mes traces !” Et il voulut prendre sa lanterne et remonter un degré, mais la lanterne lui glissa des mains et il ne put lever le pied ; il prêta l'oreille, et n'entendit que le cri lointain des chouettes et des hiboux, mêlés au sifflement du vent qui s'en tonnait sous les voûtes. Alors il trembla comme la Feuille, ses dents claquèrent, ses jambes pliaient sous lui, car tout ce qui alors lui rappelait la vie était la mort pour son âme en torture. Enfin il avança et se mit à compter les tombes et à lire les inscriptions. À chaque marbre qu'il touchait, il lui semblait que le mort allait se réveiller pour le damner et le maudire. Pourtant il arrive à la tombe du prier, l'ouvre, le déshabille de son linceul... l'anneau est là qui reluit comme dans ses rêves.

“Où donc est le forfait, disait-il, de prendre quelque chose à un cadavre ? En jouit-il de son anneau, puisqu'il n'a plus ni vie, ni souvenir, ni monde à rêver ?” et il saisit cette main froide et décharnée, s'arrêta encore un instant et regarda avec peine cette barbe blanche, cet air de majesté répandu sur le visage du vieillard. Oh ! c'est alors qu'il aurait voulu qu'il n'y eût dans le cœur des hommes ni remords ni conscience, qu'il aurait voulu oublier le passé, le présent même, et ne penser qu'à l'avenir et à ses rêves ! Et il touchait la main d'un cadavre !

Il arracha l'anneau, le passa à son doigt avec frénésie, puis reprit ses tenailles et recloua le cercueil. Aussitôt il entendit la cloche qui rappelait les moines à la prière de nuit, se leva... mais il se sentit retenu avec force par le bas de sa robe ; il tomba à la renverse et alla se fracasser le crâne contre la paroi du caveau, et son sang rejaillit sur le cercueil du prieur.

Une année se passa, puis deux, puis plusieurs, jusqu'à ce que l'on ouvrit le caveau pour enterrer un autre prieur. On trouva un squelette entouré d'une robe dont le bas était pris dans les clous du cercueil voisin ; son crâne était horriblement mutilé, un anneau était à son doigt. On creusa la terre à l'endroit même et on l'enterra par pitié ; le soir on dit un De profundis pour le repos de l'âme d'un corps inconnu que l'on avait trouvé dans les caveaux.

Eh bien ! il avait voulu l'anneau pour avoir la vie, lui ; il avait vécu, car rêver, craindre, attendre, posséder à l'agonie, c'est vivre ; à lui comme à bien d'autres, sa richesse fut dans le tombeau, et ses espérances vinrent se briser sous un suaire de mort.

MORT DU DUC DE GUISE

I

LE CLUB DU GUISARD.

— À notre brave duc de Guise !

— À la réussite de ses projets !

— Et mort aux royalistes !

Puis à ces paroles succédaient le bruit des verres qui s'entrechoquaient, le bourdonnement de toutes ces voix, les embrassades, et des serments tout à la fois terribles et féroces, furieux et frénétiques.

— Cher duc, dit La Chapelle-Marteau, ce dîner-là est peut-être le dernier que nous Faisons ensemble.

— Le dernier, et pourquoi ?

— Tiens, regarde ce billet et lis.

“Donnez-vous de garde ; on est sur le point de vous jouer un mauvais tour.” (Historique.)

— La plaisanterie est bonne ! Un crayon que je réponde à ce Nostradamus de malheur, un crayon !

Personne n'en avait.

— Eh bien, Mandreville, donne-moi ton poignard.

Et le Balafré, après en avoir noirci la pointe à la lampe suspendue au milieu d'eux, écrivit : “On n'oserait”, puis il jeta le billet sous la table.

La Chapelle-Marteau restait pensif ; le coude appuyé, et ses yeux se fixaient sur le duc de Guise.

— Eh quoi, ami, dit-il tout à coup, est-ce que ce billet n'éveille pas en vous des soupçons ?

— Sur le roi, n'est-ce pas ?

— Oui, et sur l'entretien qu'il a eu ce matin avec sa mère.

— Eh, savez-vous, dit le cardinal son frère, qui n'avait jusqu'alors desserré les dents que pour laisser sortir quelques bouffées de son tabac d'Égypte, savez-vous que la reine Catherine est roi, et qu'elle vous hait, cher ami ?

— Oui, je le sais, hélas, répondit le duc, dont la physionomie se rembrunissait de plus en plus ; je sais que le roi a de sombres projets et que mon nom l'opprime et le gêne ; que ma réputation de vaillance et de gloire l'humilie ; je sais que mon regard le fait trembler, lui, Henri de Valois, assis sur son trône ; je sais que s'il n'emploie le bourreau, il se servira de l'assassin... Mandreville, passe-moi la bière !

Et il se versa avec vivacité, puis continua :

— C'est pourquoi, mes bons amis, je voudrais avoir un conseil de vous.

— Nous sommes tous prêts.

Et déposant leurs verres, ils se mirent à écouter en silence.

— Je suis d'avis, dit le Balafré, d'aller passer quelques jours à Orléans.

— Quitter ! partir d'ici ! dit l'archevêque de Lyon en prenant son verre et en le brisant avec violence sur la table, je ne vous reconnais pas là, duc ; comment ? fuir Blois au moment où les États semblent se prêter à vos vues, abandonner une conquête presque déjà finie ? Non ! Non ! Quitter Henri au moment où sa couronne plie sous vos mains fortes et puissantes, au moment où son sceptre va se briser en éclats, où son trône va vous servir de marchepied à un trône, mais à un trône qui remplacera le sien avec plus de grandeur et de gloire ! au moment où vous avez pu convoquer tant de membres de la Sainte-Union, vous, maintenant maître du clergé, du tiers état et de la noblesse ; maintenant que vous êtes roi, vous abandonnez vos titres, votre royaume, le fruit de tant d'adresse et d'industrie, et tout cela pourquoi ? pour une femme qui gronde et un enfant qui menace !

— Croix-Dieu ! dit Mandreville, si l'avis de l'archevêque n'est pas le meilleur que j'aie entendu de ma vie, je veux perdre ma place du paradis. Oui, Henri est un roi Faible et imbécile ; c'est un enfant que votre roi, chétif arbrisseau qu'emportera le premier souffle d'une révolution.

— Eh bien soit, dit le Guisard, en prenant sa moustache, soit, je me moque aussi bien d'Henri que du poignard de ses assassins, et puisque la mort doit venir, qu'elle vienne me prendre d'un coup de stylet ou dans mon lit, peu m'importe, "car mes affaires sont réduites en tels termes que je la verrais entrer par la Fenêtre, je ne voudrais pas sortir par la porte pour Fuir" . (Historique.)

— Vive le duc de Guise ! vive le duc de Guise !

À ce cri ils se retirèrent, puis bientôt l'on n'entendit plus que le bruit de leurs bottes éperonnées qui résonnaient sur les dalles du grand escalier.

II

CHARLOTTE DE BEAUNE.

Le duc de Guise était revenu à sa place, quand deux coups de marteaux résonnèrent à la porte. Une jeune femme entra, ses dents claquaient, ses cheveux étaient en désordre, ses yeux égarés, ses lèvres tremblaient et une pâleur livide était empreinte sur tous ses traits.

— Oh ! cher Balafrê, dit-elle en entrant, tu ne sais pas tout ce que j'ai souffert ; oui, j'étais là à épier le moment, l'instant, la minute où je pourrais te parler.

— Qu'as-tu à me dire ?

— Ce n'est point un trône à t'annoncer, un trône dont tout à l'heure tu élevais déjà la gloire ; écoute, demain, tu dois mourir.

— Terreur d'enfant !

— Oui, tu dois mourir, te dis-je. Non, ce n'est pas une terreur d'enfant, ce ne sont pas des paroles de pauvre Femme ; le duc d'Alençon m'a dit que demain...

— Ensuite ?

— Que demain il ne resterait du duc de Guise qu'un cadavre mutilé.

— Comment ?

— Il m'a dit que son frère allait proposer au conseil de t'assassiner demain.

— Lui ? assassiner quelqu'un ? il n'oserait !

— Oh ! de grâce ! quitte Blois !

— Non ! plutôt quitter la vie !

— Oh ! mais tu es bien cruel. Oui, oui, je t'en prie, Fuis loin d'ici, repousse-moi, méprise-moi, mais par grâce, fuis !

— Ce ne serait jamais qu'avec toi, avec mon royaume et ma couronne.

— Tu plaisantes, ô mon Dieu !

— Et toi, tu as peur.

— Oui, je tremble, je tremble de crainte pour toi ; mais toi, demain, tu trembleras du frisson de la mort.

— Soit ! mais, Charlotte, un baiser avant la tombe, et je dormirai tranquille.

Et la nuit se passa en caresses et en joyeuses amours.

III

LE CONSEIL DU ROI.

Pendant que le duc de Guise discutait avec ses amis sur le moyen de s'emparer du trône d'Henri III, celui-ci discutait avec les siens sur celui qui serait propre à le conserver. Catherine l'avait prévu ; l'assassinat était alors à la mode. Ayant convoqué son conseil, le roi se leva tout à coup en disant :

— Mes chers amis, il a trop longtemps que le duc est roi et le roi duc. Maintenant il faut que tout change et rentre à la place où la Providence l'a placé. Oui, oui, M. de Guise voudrait gouverner, il voudrait un trône et je lui donnerai un cercueil ; je veux que, dès demain, la France soit débarrassée de cet autre monarque, et moi de ce compagnon à la royauté.

— Il n'est qu'un moyen, dit le baron de Rieux, un procès en Parlement.

— Et de faux témoins, ajoutait le duc de Maintenon, l'accusant de conjuration, de lèse-majesté, d'attentat sur le roi, que sais-je ! enfin quelque chose de semblable, puis une prison perpétuelle.

— Non, non, dit Henri, “mettre le Guisard en prison, ce serait mettre le sanglier dans un filet trop Faible, il romprait nos cordes” .
(Historique.)

— Et un procès, vous dis-je, continua le baron de Rieux.

— À lui, un procès ? Oh ! non, il serait capable d'en faire un à ses juges. Oh ! non, non, des épées et des poignards, messieurs. Qui m'aime parmi vous ?

Et huit poignards se brandirent dans l'air.

— Eh bien, demain, dit le roi, demain sa tête tombera, demain il n'y aura d'autre roi que Henri III.

IV

UN ASSASSINAT PAR UN ROI.

— Larchant, tu lui présenteras une requête au bas de l'escalier ; Effrenati, tu te jetteras à ses jambes ; Saint-Malines, tu lui donneras le premier coup ; toi, Saignac, tu l'achèveras.

Et il posa trente gardes dans l'escalier, huit dans le cabinet.

Puis il rentra dans sa chambre. De toute la nuit il ne dormit pas, on eût dit qu'il s'agissait d'une bataille ou du sort de deux peuples. Oui tout ce conseil, tous ces gardes, tous ces assassins, tous ces appareils de guerre ne devaient servir enfin qu'à la mort d'un seul homme ; mais cet homme, c'était le duc de Guise. À la Saint-Bartlémy, Charles vit sans sourciller tout un peuple massacré par ses ordres, prêt à frapper son ennemi, Henri tremblait.

Le matin, le Balafré Put arrêté à la grille du château par un homme qui lui dit, les larmes aux yeux :

— Duc, vous ne sortirez pas d'ici.

— Allons, mon pauvre ami, va, sois tranquille, il y a longtemps que je suis en garde contre les pressentiments.

Arrivé au grand escalier, il se prit à saigner du nez.

— Du sang, encore, dit — il en riant amèrement.

Puis il continua à marmotter quelques paroles.

C'était bien là ce même duc de Guise, ferme et incrédule, et qui laissait échapper de temps à autre quelques marques de faiblesse comme d'autres en laissent échapper de grandeur.

Tout à coup Revol entra en tremblant ; il était pâle et ses jambes pliaient sous lui.

— Monsieur de Guise, dit-il, Sa Majesté vous demande, elle est en son vieux cabinet.

Le duc s'y rendit, et là il n'y vit point le roi, mais quelques gardes qu'il salua ; un d'entre eux lui marcha sur le pied. Était — ce le dernier avertissement de quelque ami ?

Aussitôt Montlery s'élance, le saisit par le bras, et, lui enfonçant le poignard, il s'écrie :

— Traître, tu en mourras !

Effrenati se jette à ses jambes, Saint-Malines lui porte un autre grand coup de poignard de la gorge dans la poitrine, Saignac lui enfonce l'épée dans les reins, Sariaac s'approche de lui avec un stylet à lame écossaise et le lui enfonce dans le dos jusqu'à la garde. Le duc de Guise ne peut plus se soutenir, et il va mourir sur le lit du roi son assassin.

Il fallait donc que ce lit si honteux, témoin des débauches des rois, vit mourir en un seul homme toute la gloire d'un siècle !

Quelques minutes après, quand le cadavre fut froid comme le marbre, quand les épées et les poignards furent retirés, alors Henri entra pour contempler sa victime ; il lui donna un coup de pied à la tête en lui crachant au visage.

Un instant pourtant, ayant bien considéré toutes ces plaies profondes, cette terrible et mâle figure et dont les yeux ternes et livides semblaient lui reprocher son crime, oui, un instant, Henri trembla devant le cadavre du duc de Guise.

UN PARFUM À SENTIR

OU
LES BALADINS

Deux mots

Ces pages écrites sans suite, sans ordre, sans style, devront rester ensevelies dans la poussière de mon tiroir et si je me hasarde à les montrer à un petit nombre d'amis ce sera une marque de confiance dont je dois avant tout leur expliquer la pensée.

Mettre en présence et en contact la saltimbanque laide, méprisée, édentée, battue par son mari, la saltimbanque jolie, couronnée de fleurs, de parfums et d'amour, les réunir sous le même toit, les faire déchirer par la jalousie jusqu'au dénouement qui doit être bizarre et amer puis ensuite ayant montré toutes ces douleurs cachées, toutes ces plaies fardées par les faux rires et les costumes de parades, après avoir soulevé le manteau de la prostitution et du mensonge, faire demander au lecteur : À qui la faute ?

La faute ce n'est certes à aucun des personnages du drame.

La faute c'est aux circonstances, aux préjugés, à la société, à la nature qui s'est faite mauvaise mère.

Je demanderai ensuite aux généreux philanthropes qui n'ont d'autres preuves du progrès intellectuel que les chemins de fer et les écoles primaires, je leur demanderai à ces heureux savants s'ils ont lu mon conte quel remède ils apporteraient aux maux que je leur ai montrés. Rien n'est-ce pas ? et s'ils trouvaient le mot ils diraient ..a....

La faute, c'est à cette divinité sombre et mystérieuse qui née avec l'homme subsiste encore après son néant, qui s'aposte à la face de tous les siècles et de tous les empires et qui rit dans sa férocité en voyant la philosophie et les hommes se tordre dans leurs sophismes pour nier son existence tandis qu'elle les presse tous dans sa main de fer comme un géant qui jongle avec des crânes desséchés !

La parade allait commencer. Quelques musiciens accordaient leurs hautbois et leurs déchirants violons, des groupes se formaient autour de la tente, et des yeux de paysans se fixaient avec étonnement et volupté sur la grande enseigne où étaient écrits en lettres rouges et noires ces mots gigantesques : troupe acrobatique du sieur Pedrillo.

Plus loin sur un carré de toile peinte l'on distinguait facilement un homme aux formes athlétiques nu comme un sauvage et levant sur son dos une quantité énorme de poids. Une banderole tricolore lui sortait de la bouche sur laquelle était écrit : Je suis l'Hercule du Nord.

Vous dire ce que le pierrot hurla sur son estrade, vous le savez aussi bien que moi, certes dans votre enfance vous vous êtes plus d'une fois arrêté devant cette scène grotesque et vous avez ri comme les autres des coups de poing et des coups de pied qui viennent à chaque instant interrompre l'Orateur au milieu de son discours ou de sa narration.

Dans la tente c'était un spectacle différent : trois enfants dont le plus jeune avait à peine sept ans, sautaient sur la balustrade intérieure de l'escalier, ou bien s'exerçaient sur la corde à la Représentation.

Débiles et faibles, leur teint était jaune et leurs traits indiquaient le malheur et la souffrance.

À travers leur chemisette rose et bordée d'argent, à travers le fard qui couvrait leurs joues, à travers leur sourire gracieux qu'ils répétaient alors, vous eussiez vu sans peine des membres amaigris, des joues creusées par la faim et des larmes cachées.

— Dis donc Auguste, disait le plus grand à un autre qui s'élevait avec la seule force du poignet de terre sur la corde, dis donc, répétait-il à voix basse et comme craignant d'être entendu d'un homme à figure sinistre qui se promenait autour d'eux, il me semble qu'il y a bien longtemps que maman est partie.

— Oh oui bien longtemps, reprit-il avec un gros soupir.

— Ne t'avais-je pas défendu, Ernesto de jamais parler de cette femme-là ? Elle m'ennuyait, elle est partie au diable, tant mieux, mais tais-toi, la première fois que tu m'échaufferas les oreilles avec son nom, je te battraï.

Et l'homme sortit dans la rue après cette recommandation.

— Il est toujours comme ça, reprit l'enfant aussitôt que Pedrillo fut sorti, n'ouvrant la bouche que pour nous dire des choses dures et qui vous font mal à l'âme. Oh il est bien méchant, notre pauvre mère au moins elle nous aimait celle-là.

— Oh maman n'est-ce pas, dit le plus jeune, il m'en ennuie bien, et il se mit à pleurer.

— Comme il la battait, dit Auguste, parce qu'il disait qu'elle était laide, pauvre femme.

— Essuie donc tes larmes, voilà le monde qui entre, il faut sourire au contraire.

Chacun prit sa place sur les bancs, et bientôt la tente se trouva pleine. La parade était finie et Pedrillo était rentré lui-même après avoir répété plusieurs fois de suite : Messieurs, messieurs, on ne paye qu'en sortant.

D'abord, le plus jeune des enfants monta d'un pas assez leste l'escalier qui conduisait à la corde. Les premiers pas furent incertains, mais bientôt il fut encouragé par la phrase banale de Pedrillo qui suivant des yeux ses moindres gestes lui répétait à chaque instant :

— Courage monsieur courage, bien très bien, vous aurez du sucre ce soir.

Il descendit.

Son autre frère monta après lui, et il se hasarda à faire quelques sauts, il tomba [sur la] tête ; Pedrillo le releva avec un regard furieux. Il alla se cacher en pleurant.

Le tour était à Ernesto.

Il tremblait de tous ses membres, et sa crainte augmenta lorsqu'il vit son père prendre une petite baguette de bois blanc qui jusqu'alors était restée sur le sol.

Les spectateurs l'entouraient, il était sur la corde, et le regard de Pedrillo pesait sur lui.

Il fallait avancer.

Pauvre enfant, comme son regard était timide et suivait scrupuleusement les contours de la baguette qui restait à bout portant devant ses yeux comme le fond du gouffre lorsqu'on est penché sur le bord d'un précipice.

De son côté la baguette suivait chaque mouvement du danseur, l'encourageait en s'abaissant avec grâce, le menaçait en s'agitant avec fureur, lui indiquait la danse en marquant la mesure, sur la corde. En un mot c'était son ange gardien, sa sauvegarde ou plutôt, le glaive de Damoclès pendu sur sa tête par l'idée d'un faux pas.

Depuis quelque temps le visage d'Ernesto se contractait convulsivement, l'on entendait quelque chose qui sifflait dans l'air, et les yeux du danseur aussitôt s'emplissaient de grosses larmes qu'il avait peine à dévorer.

Cependant il descendit bientôt, il y avait du sang sur la corde.

L'Hercule du Nord, nom théâtral de Pedrillo, avait commencé ses tours de force lorsqu'on entendit la sentinelle qui veillait à la porte se disputer avec quelqu'un du dehors.

— Non vous n'entrerez pas vous dis-je, vous n'entrerez pas.

— Je veux entrer moi.

— On ne reçoit pas des gens comme vous.

— Je veux parler à Pedrillo, moi, je veux lui parler, entendez-vous ?

— Corbleu, répétait le bon soldat irrité, corbleu vous dis-je, on n'entre pas ici habillée comme vous êtes. On ne reçoit pas des mendiants.

Cette dispute détourna l'attention des spectateurs. Pedrillo alla voir qui est-ce qui le demandait.

— Ah, ah c'est toi vieille sorcière, dit-il à une femme en haillons, et dont l'aspect était misérable. Je ne m'attendais pas à te voir de sitôt. Où étais-tu donc partie ? Mais tiens tu me diras tout cela plus tard. Entre Marguerite, nous représentons maintenant, entre tu vas nous servir, - tu vas sauter, entends-tu, fais de ton mieux.

Il n'y avait pas à répliquer, pourtant elle se hasarda à lui dire :

— Pedrillo tu vois bien qu'ils vont se moquer de moi, je suis mal habillée, et voulait dire autre chose mais elle n'osa.

— Entre, entre.

Il le fallut, mais aussitôt que les spectateurs la virent un murmure s'éleva accompagné d'un rire moqueur, de ce rire féroce que l'on donne à l'homme qui tombe, de ce rire dédaigneux que l'Orgueil en habits dorés jette à la prostitution, de ce rire que l'enfant souffle sur le papillon dont il arrache les ailes.

Ce ne fut pas sans peine que Marguerite monta l'escalier, à peine avait-elle fait deux pas qu'elle tomba lourdement à terre, un cri perçant sortit de sa poitrine, la baguette était rompue en morceaux.

En peu d'instants la tente fut déserte. La plupart des spectateurs sortirent.

Cette dernière scène domestique avait scandalisé le plus grand nombre et désenchanté un petit garçon aux joues rondes et rosées qui jusqu'alors avait souhaité d'être danseur de corde pour avoir des pantalons roses, et des bottines de maroquin.

II

— Ne t'en avais-je pas bien [prévenu] ? dit Marguerite lorsqu'elle fut seule avec ses enfants et Pedrillo.

— Qu'avais-tu donc ?

— Je suis malade, je souffre encore, va. Oh je souffre beaucoup, Pedrillo, si tu m'aimais comme je t'aime.

— Allons, vas-tu recommencer tes plaintes Marguerite, tu sais bien que ça m'ennuie. Voyons qu'as-tu donc eu ?

— Tu le sais mieux que moi. Comment, tu ne te souviens pas de ce jour où je suis tombée comme aujourd'hui... J'avais la jambe cassée... Le soir je ne voulus pas manger, je pleurais trop, je ne voulais pas te dire que désormais je t'étais devenue inutile. Je ne voulais pas aller à l'hôpital de peur d'abandonner Ernesto et Garofa.

— Eh bien tu as pourtant été à l'hôpital.

— Hélas oui, sans cela j'allais mourir.

Et les saltimbanques se retirèrent sous une toile à matelots derrière laquelle était posée sur des charbons la soupe du dîner qui bouillait à petit feu.

La nuit était venue, elle était froide et humide, un vent de novembre soufflait avec violence, et faisait trembler les arbres du boulevard, de temps en temps même il pénétrait dans la tente et venait faire vaciller la chandelle autour de laquelle étaient groupés les danseurs de corde. Rangés en rond autour d'une énorme grosse caisse, chacun tenait devant lui son écuelle dont la vapeur réchauffait [ses] doigts tremblotants.

Le mince flambeau qui les éclairait, tranchant sur l'obscurité de la nuit, se reflétait sur leurs visages ainsi groupés et leur donnait un air étrange et singulier.

Tous étaient silencieux, et attendaient que quelqu'un interrompît le silence, ce fut Pedrillo.

— Eh bien, dit-il en regardant Marguerite et en reprenant sa phrase qu'il avait commencée il y avait une demi-heure, c'était donc là que tu étais partie... Maintenant es-tu guérie ?

Marguerite leva la tête, regarda un moment ses enfants, puis la rabaissa et se prit à pleurer : non, dit-elle tout doucement, non je boite encore.

— Que ferai-je de toi Marguerite, voyons à quoi seras-tu bonne ?

La pauvre femme se pencha vers son mari, lui dit quelques mots à l'oreille, - Enfants, reprint celui-ci, allez dormir, - Entendez-vous, dépêchez-vous donc.

Cette phrase parut étrange, à Garofa qui dit d'un air attristé :

— Et du sucre ?

Pedrillo sourit amèrement : - Tu seras bien heureux si tu as du pain demain, pauvre enfant. Ce sourire était forcé. Ses lèvres bleuies par le froid laissèrent voir deux rangées de dents blanches et ses grands yeux noirs se fixaient sur l'enfant d'une manière qui lui fit peur.

En ce moment-là le vent redoublant de violence faisait craquer la cabane.

— Du sucre, mais pourtant tu m'en avais promis ?

— Tais-toi te dis-je.

— Oh papa je t'en prie.

Il le repoussa fortement, et le pauvre enfant s'en alla coucher en pleurant.

Pedrillo souffrait tout autant que lui, un mouvement convulsif lui faisait claquer les dents.

— Comme tu l'as rudoyé, dit Marguerite.

— C'est vrai, il resta dans une rêverie profonde et comme endormi même dans des pensées déchirantes.

Un second coup de vent vint éteindre la chandelle.

— J'ai froid, dit Marguerite en se rapprochant de lui, j'ai bien froid, prête-moi ton manteau.

— Mon manteau... mais je l'ai vendu mon manteau.

— Pourquoi ?

— Pour du pain Marguerite... ne faudra-t-il pas que je t'en donne aussi ?

— Que voulais-tu donc me dire tout à l'heure, que tu as fait retirer les enfants ?

— Ce que je voulais te dire, je ne sais...

— Mais j'ai bien froid.

— Que faire Marguerite, je n'ai plus rien, rien... il s'arrêta et reprit, rien qu'une balle...

— Oh par grâce pour moi Pedrillo.

Et elle l'entoura de ses deux bras rouges et amaigris.

À voir ainsi cette femme laide et couverte de haillons, embrasser avec tant d'amour cet homme qui la repoussait comme par un sentiment naturel, à voir cette misère et cette tendresse, c'était un spectacle hideux et sublime.

— Alors, dit Pedrillo, demain tu iras sur la place, avec tes enfants, tu prendras mon violon et tu tâcheras de faire que nous ayons du pain.

Une demi-heure après les baladins étaient tous endormis, le vent s'était apaisé.

La lune débarrassée de ses nuages qui l'entouraient, resplendissait belle et claire dans une blanche gelée d'hiver et argentait l'enseigne qui avait cessé de bondir et de se replier sur elle-même. La tente était tranquille, pourtant on entendait quelquefois des soupirs et des sanglots.

C'était une femme qui pleurait.

III

Le lendemain Marguerite se leva de bonne heure, elle n'avait pas dormi de la nuit ; ses mains étaient trempées d'une sueur moite et malade. Une humidité fiévreuse avait rougi ses pieds, sa tête était chaude et brûlante.

Elle prit le violon de Pedrillo, un vieux tapis de Perse, et sortit avec Ernesto et Garofa.

N'avez-vous jamais rencontré par un temps de neige ou d'hiver quelque figure de mendiant accroupi aux portiques d'une église ? Le soir au détour d'une rue sombre et étroite ne vous êtes-vous point senti arrêté par votre manteau ? Vous vous détourniez... et c'était quelque mendiant en haillons, quelque pauvre femme qui vous disait en pleurant ces mots amers : J'ai faim, et puis elle sanglotait quand votre ombre s'échappant s'arrêtait à la porte d'un spectacle entre les équipages et les livrées d'or.

Vous vous êtes peut-être rappelé ensuite au milieu d'un entracte ces figures tristes et décolorées vues à la lueur du réverbère, et si votre âme est bonne et généreuse, vous êtes sorti pour les revoir et les secourir. Mais il n'était plus temps... la femme peut-être était entrée au lupanar. Acheter un morceau de pain. Une vie de prostitution, et le mendiant se débattait entre les arches du Pont-Neuf tandis que l'orchestre grondait et que les mains applaudissaient d'enthousiasme.

Pour moi rien ne m'attriste tant que la misère cachée sous les haillons de la richesse, que le galon d'un laquais autour des cheveux nus de la pauvreté, qu'un chant qui couvre des sanglots, qu'une larme sous une goutte de miel.

Aussi je plains d'un amour bien sincère les baladins et les filles de joie.

Mais si vous aviez rencontré Marguerite avec ses deux enfants, Marguerite jouant du violon et ses enfants sautant sur le tapis, si vous aviez vu l'indifférence de cette foule curieuse et barbare qui s'avancait avec son regard stupide et ironique, votre coeur eût saigné devant cet excès d'égoïsme parvenu à son plus beau degré de logique.

C'est vrai, la société a bien autre chose à faire que de regarder une baladine et ses marmots, l'état s'occupe fort peu si elle [a] du pain, d'abord il n'a point d'argent à lui donner, ne faut-il pas qu'il paye ses 86 bourreaux ?

En effet, je l'avoue par une rude matinée de novembre personne n'est disposé à s'arrêter sur la place pour regarder des tours de force ? Qui se fût arrêté avec intérêt devant Marguerite ?

Ses cheveux étaient rouges et retenus par un peigne de corne blanche. Sa taille était large et mal faite. Quant à sa robe on ne la voyait pas, car un morceau de toile percé de couleur brune l'entourait jusqu'aux genoux, puis l'oeil descendant jusqu'à terre trouvait un mollet gros et mal fait entouré d'un bas rose, puis des pieds informes serrés dans des brodequins d'un cuir épais et cassé. Elle n'avait sur la tête qu'un bonnet de gaze, avec des rubans roses et quelques fleurs fanées qui tombaient sur ses joues pâles et sur sa mâchoire sans dents.

Il y avait déjà près d'une heure qu'Ernesto et Garofa s'épuisaient pour attirer les yeux de la foule, Marguerite avait plus d'une fois appelé de sa voix rauque et couverte de larmes, à la générosité des gens qui passaient devant eux, lorsqu'un brillant carrosse attelé de deux chevaux blancs passa auprès des danseurs en leur jetant de la boue sur leurs vêtements. Le manteau et les bas roses de Marguerite en furent couverts, elle baissa les yeux sur son violon et répandit quelques larmes qui coulèrent le long du bois et vinrent se perdre dans l'intérieur de l'instrument. Ses larmes redoublèrent et elle se cacha la tête sous son manteau. Alors elle fut en proie à une sorte de rêverie bizarre et déchirante. Elle se figurait entourée de carrosses qui lui jetaient de la boue, elle se voyait sifflée, méprisée, honnie, elle voyait ses enfants mourir de faim autour d'elle, son mari devenu fou, alors tous ses souvenirs repassèrent dans son esprit, elle voyait son lit, où [elle] était couchée à l'hôpital, elle se ressouvint de la soeur qui la soignait, des coups que Pedrillo lui avait donnés la veille, de l'accueil qu'on lui avait fait lorsqu'elle parut... et tous ses souvenirs passaient dans son esprit comme des ombres paraissant, disparaissant, et s'effaçant tour à tour. Elle ne dormait pas, mais elle rêvait, et ses yeux baissés sur sa poitrine répandaient des larmes qui étaient chaudes en tombant sur ses mains.

Depuis quelque temps elle ne jouait plus, ses enfants continuaient de danser, et l'on s'était arrêté en les voyant ainsi exécuter leurs exercices tandis que la femme tenait son violon sans en tirer une seule note.

Bientôt elle se réveilla en sursaut - Cette figure ébahie, avec ses deux grands yeux gris s'ouvrant tout à coup sembla grotesque et fit rire. Son accoutrement bizarre, ses bas roses avec son manteau troué et qui était presque pareil au tapis étendu sur le pavé, ses fleurs fanées et ses cheveux rouges étaient ridicules, une seule parole se fit entendre, - Qu'elle est laide, - et l'on s'en alla en riant.

Il faisait froid, bien froid même, Marguerite ne sentait plus ses doigts et n'avait pas la puissance de les remuer, elle laissa tomber le violon... il se brisa et les morceaux rebondirent sur le tapis en rendant un son criard et faussé.

Elle le regarda encore sautiller quelque temps, les bras croisés et la poitrine haletante. Qu'allait dire Pedrillo lorsqu'il verrait revenir Marguerite sans argent, sans argent.

Oh cette pensée-là torturait Marguerite, elle lui serrait le coeur, et le lui déchirait sans pitié. Mille projets ridicules d'éviter la colère de son mari lui venaient à l'esprit comme un cauchemar et puis s'évanouissaient poussés par d'autres plus bizarres encore.

Tantôt, elle voulait fuir avec ses enfants, où ? elle l'ignorait ! mais fuir, au moins, fuir le regard pénétrant et atroce de Pedrillo, fuir son rire lugubre, fuir ces mots : Qu'allons-nous devenir Marguerite ?

Une autre fois, elle pensait à Dieu,... puis elle invoquait Satan, et souhaitait mourir,... et elle tenait à la vie pour ses enfants. Que seraient-ils devenus sans elle ?

Enfin roulant le vieux tapis et enveloppant les éclats du violon, elle partit de cette place, où elle avait reçu tant d'affronts, versé tant de larmes.

Une idée riante lui vint à l'esprit, elle sourit légèrement,... c'est qu'elle pensait qu'en vendant son manteau ou le tapis, elle pourrait apporter de l'argent à Pedrillo, et faire raccommoder son violon.

.....

Mais Pedrillo à son tour lui demanderait qu'est-ce qu'elle avait fait de son manteau.

Cette triste objection qu'elle se fit à elle-même, la rendit encore plus malheureuse, et elle accusa le ciel de lui avoir donné une minute l'espérance qui battue par la réalité fouette l'âme et la martyrise.

Il était environ alors deux ou trois heures d'après-midi, le soleil était beau et venait réchauffer comme il arrive de temps en temps dans les dimanches d'hiver toute une ville qui se promène sur les boulevards. C'était l'heure des vêpres, beaucoup de monde s'agitait dans les rues, et quelques boutiques étaient ouvertes.

Marguerite s'arrêta devant celle d'un pâtissier à l'entour de laquelle quelques gâteaux sortant du four répandaient une vapeur tiède et odoriférante et qui venait chatouiller le nez des passants.

Lorsqu'elle s'arrêta aux vitres, elle vit dans l'intérieur une mère de famille avec deux enfants qui étaient à peu près de l'âge d'Ernesto et de Garofa.

Tous les deux c'étaient de gentils garçons à la chevelure blonde, au teint frais et rosé. Leurs habits étaient propres et bien faits et leur linge dépassant à travers leur cravate de satin était blanc comme le sucre qui couvrait leurs gâteaux.

Cette vue fit mal à Marguerite.

À côté de la dame en chapeau et en manteau vert avec une ceinture en corde d'or se tenait une femme de chambre qui portait dans ses bras un petit épagneul noir. Quand les enfants en eurent assez ils donnèrent leurs restes à l'animal qu'ils engageaient à prendre à force de caresses. Marguerite trépignait de colère elle qui avait faim, elle à qui ses enfants avaient demandé déjà plus d'une fois dans la journée du pain, un seul morceau de pain, son front était brûlant, et elle s'appuyait contre le carreau pour le refroidir.

Quand la dame eut payé les friandises elle sortit avec ses enfants, et sa robe de soie en passant effleura avec bruit les mains de Marguerite.

Par un singulier sentiment dont elle aurait eu peine à se rendre compte elle-même, elle resta encore longtemps le visage collé contre les vitres ; mais le pâtissier ennuyé la renvoya avec une injure.

Qu'avait-elle à dire ?

En traversant une rue sombre et tortueuse, elle vit étendue sur un lit une femme qui chantait des chansons obscènes. Alors elle repensa à Pedrillo, à ce qu'elle allait devenir... et puis elle regarda cette femme longtemps, elle écouta les chants...

— Oh non non - Qui voudrait de moi ?

IV

L'or roulait sur les tables. C'était une maison de jeu mais non un tripot autorisé par la loi, un tripot du Palais-Royal, où vous avez vu venir des ministres, des princes, des banquiers, avec leur cravate aussi bien mise qu'à l'ordinaire, avec une impassibilité de regard qui indiquait qu'ils étaient experts dans cet infâme commerce.

Mais une maison de jeu avec toute sa prostitution hideuse, un de ces taudis où parfois le lendemain on trouve quelque cadavre mutilé entre des verres brisés et des haillons tout rouges de sang.

La salle était basse et ses murs enfumés ; des hommes salement vêtus entouraient des tables autour desquelles d'autres visages se tassaient avec avidité, et leurs yeux flamboyaient à travers leurs épais sourcils, leurs dents se serraient, leurs mains se crispaient de rage. Et malgré les rides sombres de leur front vous auriez lu peut-être bien des crimes qui s'amoncelaient avec leurs angoisses.

Quelques femmes à moitié nues se promenaient paisiblement autour d'eux. Et plus loin dans un coin deux hommes armés debout devant une jeune fille couchée sur le pavé et liée avec des cordes tiraient à la courte paille.

— Vous frémissez peut-être, aimable lectrice, à la peinture de cette moitié de la société, la maison de jeu, l'autre c'est l'hôpital et la guillotine.

Ah voyez-vous jeune enfant, c'est que faussée par une éducation vicieuse, vous n'êtes pas descendue jusque dans la misère, vous n'avez pas vu son délire, vous n'avez pas entendu ses hurlements de rage, vous n'avez pas sondé ses plaies, vous n'avez pas compris ses douleurs amères, son désespoir et ses crimes.

Ah pauvre jeune fille c'est qu'il est des lieux dont vous ignorez l'existence, c'est qu'on vous a caché un mot qui est toute notre société : prostitution.

Puis quand le silence de l'attente avait fait place au bruit aigre du râteau, alors c'étaient les jurons les plus terribles, des serments hideux, des vengeances qui s'accomplissaient à l'instant de leur création, et la lueur de la lampe venait briller sur la lame de quelque poignard qui s'enfonçait dans la poitrine d'un homme.

Et alors le maître séparait les combattants en jetant une femme au milieu d'eux.

La porte violemment ébranlée remua tout à coup. On ouvrit.

Un homme entra.

Il avait un costume de Baladin. Sa taille était grande, une profusion de cheveux noirs et en désordre, lui couvraient les yeux, et empêchaient d'en voir l'expression. Mais elle devait être terrible dans ce moment-là. Sa main droite se tenait fortement serrée,... tenez, dit-il en jetant son argent sur une table,... tenez... et il s'arrêta pour pousser un rire convulsif... voilà dix francs.

Oh plaignez-le, ce joueur, ce baladin, cet homme de mauvaise vie, cet homme qui n'aime pas [ses] enfants. Qui bat sa femme. Oh plaignez-le parce que c'est un infâme, un baladin, un homme de mauvaise vie, un homme qui bat sa femme, et qui n'aime pas ses enfants.

C'est que la misère a voulu qu'il soit baladin, la faim lui a tellement aiguisé les dents qu'elle l'a poussé dans une maison de jeu. Son éducation l'a fait un homme de mauvaise vie, sa femme est laide, rouge, édentée. Oh une femme rouge, et ses enfants lui déplaisent parce qu'ils lui disent J'ai faim : et ce cri-là lui fait mal car il n'a rien à leur donner.

Plaignez-le. Tout à l'heure, sa femme est rentrée,... elle avait cassé son violon,... elle n'apportait pas de pain.

Il était 6 heures d'après-midi, il faisait froid et tous avaient faim.

Vouliez-vous qu'il laissât mourir ses enfants, ses pauvres enfants, qui les mains jointes comme devant l'autel rampaient à ses genoux, en lui disant avec un sourire et des larmes - du pain - .

À genoux les mains jointes devant un Saltimbanque - vous voyez bien que la misère fait faire des bassesses.

Et puis dans son désespoir, il avait battu sa femme, il avait maudit ses enfants, il avait appelé Satan... il avait chargé son pistolet... par un sentiment machinal il l'avait laissé tomber puis, la tête lui brûlait, tout tournait autour de lui, et il avait vendu son arme... il se trouvait alors dans une maison de jeu,... et c'est avec une sollicitude bien douloureuse qu'il regardait ses deux pièces rouler sur le tapis, ses deux pièces qui allaient décider de sa vie, de celle de ses enfants, de celle de sa femme.

Maintenant s'il perd, il se mettra brigand, assassin peut-être. - On le conduira sur l'échafaud, les mères en passant le montreront à leurs enfants comme un monstre, comme un être hideux dont un seul de ses regards peut faire mal et sa tête roulera sur les planches humides,... et la foule en passant, donnera encore des malédictions à son tronçon... Eh, voilà un bien grand coupable - C'est un homme qui avait faim.

Sa femme, si elle n'en meurt pas de douleur, elle mourra de misère ou bien encore elle se mettra ignoble fille de joie.

Et la foule lui crachera au visage en riant. C'est la femme d'un assassin, c'est une fille publique - et elle est laide -

Quant à ses enfants, la charité des hôpitaux les ramass[er]a peut-être ; on les élèv[er]a dans une crainte religieuse des autres hommes, on les séquestrera de la société. On leur donnera un habit s'ils ont froid, un morceau de pain s'ils ont faim. - Mais leurs larmes - Ah elles resteront longtemps à couler sur leur visage, elles creuseront leurs joues...

Les enfants des riches, en passant leur jetteront parfois, quelque or bien brillant, avec un rire d'ironie.

Et puis devenus hommes ils machineront des crimes en haine de cette société qui les a maudits parce qu'ils sont les fils du maudit.

Voilà tout ce qui tournait, sautait, tourbillonnait, dansait dans Pedrillo.

Toutes ces idées-là se réalisaient dans son imagination ; il ne les inventait pas mais il les voyait, il les sentait.

Mais il ne comprenait pas par exemple pourquoi sa famille était malheureuse. Non il ne le comprenait pas, et se raidissant contre le ciel, s'il l'avait pu il aurait détruit la création, il aurait anéanti Dieu.

Sa respiration était forcée... il soupirait par moments... il croyait peut-être devenir fou. Il a vingt francs... il les prend avec joie, les serre, les embrasse,... il les rejette avec un geste d'orgueil...

La salle résonne de cris... pour qui cet or passe à travers les dents du râteau qui déborde de la table ?.. C'est à Pedrillo riche de dix mille francs.

... Il rit, il pleure, il saute, il les rejette encore une fois l'insensé, il est heureux maintenant. Dix mille francs. C'est un homme vertueux... il peut s'acheter un habit, donner une robe à sa femme, à ses enfants des jouets, dix mille francs - Il peut, avec son or dans ses poches jeter à la misère son contingent d'opprobre, c'est un homme honnête - dix mille francs - Ah Ah - Ses traits se décomposent, son rire s'apaise, son regard est moins vif, sa tête moins haute. - Ah - ah, il n'a plus que 400 francs... il pose sa main à sa poitrine... il a encore 50 francs... il jette un léger cri de douleur... il n'a plus que 5 francs... maintenant... rien.

La mauvaise fortune ne paraissait point l'avoir accablé - et comme son voisin lui en demanda la Cause : tenez, dit-il avec le même rire et le même accent qu'il avait eus en jetant ses dix francs - tenez et il découvrit sa poitrine, elle était toute sanglante, et ses mains avaient de la chair humaine au bout des ongles.

Il était nuit, mais une nuit sombre, sans astre, une de ces nuits qui font peur, qui vous font voir des fantômes, et des spectres dansant sur le mur blanc des cimetières, de ces nuits dont le vent fait frémir d'horreur et dresser les cheveux sur la tête, de ces nuits où l'on entend au loin le cri plaintif de quelque chien rôdant autour d'un hôpital.

Pedrillo était sorti de la maison de jeu.

L'air frais de la nuit vint rafraîchir son front et lui rendre le sentiment réel de sa position. Mais peu à peu l'imagination prit le dessus. Il rêvait en marchant, tous les objets qu'il voyait prenaient une forme gigantesque. Les arbres que le vent faisait frémir avec plus de furie que la nuit précédente lui apparaissaient comme des géants hideux, toutes les maisons étaient pour lui des tripots, entendait-il le bruit d'un orchestre en passant près d'un bal c'était la musique de l'enfer ; une femme passait-elle en tournoyant près d'un rideau rouge, c'était une courtisane. Le bruit des verres sur le plateau c'était une orgie. Bientôt la neige tomba, et regardant ses habits il se voyait entouré d'un linceul.

C'était ainsi assiégé qu'il parcourait les rues en courant. Quelquefois il s'arrêtait et s'asseyait sur une borne, il regardait quelque rayon de la lune, et les nuages qui roulaient sur les étoiles.

Ils prenaient tous les formes les plus bizarres et les plus grotesques. C'étaient des monstres, grimaçants... puis des tas d'or... une femme avec ses enfants... un lion rugissant dans sa cage... une morgue et un cadavre sur la dalle humide... et il entendait le sifflement des monstres, le bruit de l'or résonnant sur les tables.

Il voyait les larmes de cette femme et de ses enfants, il entendait le rugissement du lion... il sentait l'odeur cadavéreuse de ce corps déjà verdâtre. Il le regarda longtemps puis le nuage prit une autre forme... il eut peur, se mit à courir n'osant regarder derrière lui ; et quand il arriva à sa tente... il était haletant hors d'haleine et ses traits étaient bouleversés.

Marguerite était sur sa porte à l'attendre.

Elle n'osa rien lui demander, car elle comprit assez, elle dont le malheur avait plus d'une fois coupé son âme, elle comprit la sueur qui coulait de son visage. Elle vit pourquoi ses yeux étaient rouges de colère. Elle devina les choses qu'il pensait, à travers la pâleur de son front, et elle savait ce que voulaient dire ses claquements de dents.

Ils restèrent tous deux ainsi sans rien dire, sans se communiquer ni leur peine ni leur désespoir. - Mais leurs yeux pourtant avaient parlé et s'étaient dit des pensées tristes et déchirantes.

Le lendemain quand les enfants s'éveillèrent Pedrillo leur ordonna de faire leurs paquets, lui-même défit sa tente, la plia dans la voiture. Et à neuf heures du matin, tirée par la rossaille, la carriole roulait lentement sur le pavé. La pluie n'avait point cessé depuis la veille, elle venait battre sur les parois de bois de la voiture. Son bruit régulier avec celui du vent et le mouvement des soupentes endormirent peu à peu les baladins entassés sur leurs toiles et leurs costumes [de] parades.

Déjà tous, les yeux fermés, se laissaient balancer par les secousses, lorsque Ernesto qui conduisait le cheval rencontra deux voitures qui portaient une ménagerie. En passant à côté de celle de nos gens le montreur d'animaux reconnut à travers les vitres couvertes de vapeur la tête de Pedrillo. Or Pedrillo c'était une vieille connaissance.

Il réveilla la troupe en faisant claquer son fouet, et le premier mot qu'il adressa à son compagnon fut un juron accompagné des quelques F et autant de B puis après cet exorde il commença sa phrase en disant : Il fait joliment du bouillon aujourd'hui. Le père Éternel se vide la vessie.

Pedrillo leva sa figure bleuie et regarda cet homme avec surprise.

— Tiens c'est toi, dit-il étonné en ouvrant la lucarne.

— Parbleu est-ce que tu ne me reconnais pas ? Tu es donc bien fier. Pourtant tu n'as pas l'air trop bien fortuné. Et je crois que tu n'es pas foutu pour avoir une ménagerie comme la mienne. Ce disant il montra du doigt ses cages et une jeune fille assise à ses côtés.

Au premier village qu'ils rencontrèrent ils firent entrer leurs voitures sous le hangar d'une ferme ; et là les baladins descendirent et s'embrassèrent.

Pedrillo n'eut point de mal à embrasser Isabella. Mais quant à Isambart ce fut bien différent.

— Comment l'appelles-tu ? demanda-t-il à son ami.

— Marguerite.

— C'est une fraîche marguerite.

Et il toucha délicatement du bout de ses lèvres le front rougeâtre.

— Ah ça, continua-t-il, nous voilà réunis. Veux-tu voyager ensemble - Nous associer ?

— Mais... hum... hum comme tu voudras.

Il ne fallait pas laisser échapper une aussi belle condition - Pedrillo le comprit bien, il lui frappa vigoureusement dans la main en disant :

— Soit - tu es un brave -

Isambart fit la grimace mais il n'y avait plus moyen de reculer, et puis la famille de Pedrillo, pensait-il, fera des tours de corde tandis que moi je montrerai mes animaux, tout le monde y gagnera - Après ça qu'il prenne Isabellada s'il veut je n'y tiens guère.

Ils attendirent que la pluie fût passée, remontèrent dans les carriages pour se diriger vers la ville la plus voisine où ils devaient donner des représentations. Quand Isambart disait ce mot, il ôtait son chapeau et ajoutait : À l'aimable société qui s'y trouvera.

VI

Vous avez vu cent fois Isambart. C'est un homme petit, trapu, au teint frais et rosé, au nez rouge, aux yeux gris. C'est lui qui dans toutes les troupes d'acrobates, vous a fait rire si vous êtes enfant, et pitié si vous êtes plus grand.

C'est lui qui avec ses bas rouges, sa culotte courte, ses souliers à larges boucles d'argent, son chapeau à l'hidalgo, gris, ras, et orné d'une plume de coq, c'est lui dis-je qui reçoit toujours la craie au milieu du visage, en en frappant la corde, c'est lui qui tombe par terre, reçoit les claques,... c'est lui qui allumant les quinquets se laisse dégringoler du haut de l'échelle. Puis il prend un air grave et singeant le régisseur il s'avance le chapeau sous le bras annoncer le programme.

Marguerite vous la connaissez aussi, c'est elle qui reçoit les trois sous que chaque spectateur doit donner en sortant, elle a les sabots aux pieds, des bas blancs bien tirés sur le mollet, et un mouchoir d'indienne sur la tête en forme de béret.

Vous avez vu Pedrillo. C'est cet homme grand, mince, marqué de petite vérole, qui saute sur la corde d'un pas léger, et qui bondit et qui saute sans balancier.

Depuis deux ans nos deux troupes vivaient en bonne intelligence, et la famille de Pedrillo ne s'était pas repentie de son association. Tous vivaient heureux, tranquilles, sans souci, mangeant le soir ce qu'ils avaient gagné tout le jour... Marguerite seule était malheureuse.

Et pourtant,... son mari ne la battait plus... ses enfants avaient du pain.

Ah c'est que Isabellada était jeune, jolie, elle avait vingt ans ; ses dents étaient blanches, ses yeux beaux, ses cheveux noirs, sa taille fine, son pied mignon. Et Marguerite était laide, elle avait 40 ans, les yeux gris, les cheveux rouges, la taille grosse, le pied large. L'une était la femme et l'autre l'amante. L'une était celle qui donnait toujours des reproches,... et l'autre de si ardents baisers. - Isabellada était devenue mère, et elle avait un enfant aussi beau qu'elle. C'était le second amour de Pedrillo.

Isambart avait regardé tout cela d'un oeil de philosophe, et s'était contenté de faire là-dessus une mauvaise pointe en disant que l'on n'aurait plus besoin d'aller chercher de l'eau pour faire la soupe puisqu'on avait deux mers sous la tente. Il le répétait à tout venant et disait ensuite : n'est-ce pas que je suis farceur ?, et il en avait pour une demi-heure à rire.

Ce qui humiliait davantage Marguerite c'était cette comparaison perpétuelle de tous les jours, de tous les instants, qu'elle avait à soutenir avec Isabellada.

Ce mépris qui s'attachait à sa personne, à tout ce qu'elle faisait, mais ce qui lui faisait le plus de mal c'était lorsqu'elle entendait le soir les baisers des deux amants heureux, lorsqu'elle les voyait s'entrelacer de leurs bras sans crainte, sans pudeur. Mais avec amour. Et puis l'enfant de Pedrillo, elle [le] haïssait d'une jalousie sombre et amère.

Un jour, c'était dans l'été ; toute la troupe à l'exception des enfants dansait dans le carrefour d'une rue assez déserte.

Marguerite et Isabellada dansaient aussi. Pauvre Marguerite.

Pedrillo un bonnet chinois sur la tête, des timbales aux genoux, une flûte de Pan à la bouche, frappant de la grosse caisse, composait tout l'orchestre. Isabellada en robe blanche, une écharpe rose autour du cou, sautait, dansait, tourbillonnait sur le vieux tapis de Perse.

Son regard était vif et lançait des éclairs ; sa taille était fine, svelte et se pliait et s'abaissait et se dressait comme le cou d'un cygne.

Oh non ce n'était point une robe, c'était un léger jupon blanc avec des fleurs brodées au bas, un léger jupon tombant au milieu des cuisses sur des bas roses qui les serraient avec volupté.

C'était sa valse, sa danse, tourbillonnante comme des pensées d'amour qui bondissent dans le coeur d'un poète.

Et sa gorge si blanche, blanche comme du marbre le plus blanc, sa gorge, si pure, si fraîche, si suave... Et sa tête... et ses yeux... et son sourire...

Oh la gorge d'une femme quand elle est jeune et jolie, quand on la sent comme une rose à travers la mousseline sautillante au mouvement de sa danse, oh la gorge d'une femme, n'est-ce pas que c'est là... dans vos rêves d'amour... dans vos nuits d'insomnies... dans ces nuits que l'on passe à pleurer et à maudire sa mère. N'est-ce pas que c'est sur sa gorge que vous a[vez] posé votre tête toute chaude et toute bouillante, c'est sur sa gorge que vous avez tressailli d'amour, que toutes les fibres de votre âme ont vibré comme la lyre touchée par le doigt d'une jeune fille et se sont raidies de volupté comme les muscles d'un athlète.

N'est-ce pas entre ses deux seins que vous avez dévoré de si ardents baisers.

N'est-ce pas dans son regard si doux que vous avez bu la vie, n'est-ce pas dans ses sourires que vous avez vécu.

N'est-ce pas que son pied mignon, sa jambe si bien faite étaient là sur votre lit à s'entrelacer dans les vôtres ?

Et puis sa figure, sur cette gorge, sur cette taille de femme, sur tout cet ensemble de gracieux, de céleste, de divin, il y avait dans son regard, dans le mouvement de sa prunelle, dans le bruit que sa robe faisait en tournant dans l'air, dans la manière dont son pied pivotait sur le tapis troué, quelque chose d'inexprimable et d'inouï, de rêveur et de pur.

Elle n'avait pas l'air d'une femme, ainsi sautant, tourbillonnant, dansant... Oh non ce n'était pas une femme c'était une pensée d'amour.

À la voir ainsi au milieu de cette musique aigre et bizarre, entre Isambart et Marguerite,... c'était un diamant sur un tas de boue.

Isambart faisait encore l'insipide paillasse, il avait un justaucorps, des bas bleus et blancs, et une perruque moitié rouge, moitié noire. - Sous ce costume grotesque il disait mille choses plaisantes, ennuyeuses.

Et Marguerite que faisait-elle ?

Elle souffrait, elle pleurait en silence. Oui mais [pour] vous ce n'est rien, souffrir, pleurer.

Je comprends.

Eh bien... chaque spectateur qui venait regarder avec extase la sylphide jetait les yeux sur l'autre femme qui était là à quelques pas.

Que faisait-elle ?

Des tours de force.

Oui à côté de cette jeune fille si belle, si fraîche, se trouvait là comme contrepoids une femme rouge aux joues épaisses, aux pieds mal faits, à la tenue déhanchée. Elle s'avancait aussi au son de la même musique. Et ses pieds touchaient le même tapis que ceux d'Isabellada... Oui cette femme qui sautait si légèrement, qui vous inondait des éclairs de sa brillante prunelle, qui faisait tressaillir votre corps d'un long frisson d'amour quand sa robe en passant effleurait vos cuisses,... c'était une baladine comme Marguerite. Elle était au même degré que cette masse de chair qui se contournait avec force, qui marchait la tête renversée au même niveau que les pieds, ne laissant apercevoir sous sa longue robe bleue qu'un ventre à la place d'une tête et que des seins qui tombaient avec dégoût et pesanteur.

Puis lorsqu'elle se relevait son visage était couleur de pourpre, ses yeux tout violets et pleins de sang, et ses veines gonflées.

Et sur tout cet ensemble grotesque, il y avait pourtant répandu un certain air de courtisane, de flatterie, sa bouche sans dents voulait sourire elle faisait une grimace, son regard ennui et pèse, mais elle déplaît souverainement lorsqu'elle dit d'une voix aigre et d'un ton de pie-grièche :

“Et regardez bien messieurs comme ceci est difficile.”

Et la musique continuait, Isabella dansait, sautait, tourbillonnait comme des pensées d'amour dans le cœur d'un poète.

De temps en temps quelque chose se faisait entendre dans un plat qui était sur le tapis.

— Y a gras, dit Isambart en défaisant sa perruque.

VII

Vous ne savez peut-être pas ce que sont les quatre masques qui s'avancent crochés tous ensemble dans la rue du théâtre.

Il y a un pierrot avec une tête de boeuf, c'est un homme petit, large, de bonne humeur et qui promet de s'en donner une bosse, c'est son expression.

À sa gauche est un domino noir qui marche la tête baissée,... ce domino a l'air d'une femme.

Puis c'est un Diavolo assez bien fait qui parle tout bas à une jolie Suissesse au cotillon court, et qui porte fièrement une tête sans masque.

Singulière chose qu'un bal masqué.

Ne croyez pas que je vous parle de ceux de l'Opéra qui naissent au mois de janvier, et meurent le mardi-gras, des bals de l'Opéra, où l'on s'ennuie, où je n'ai jamais été parce que là encore, vous voyez sur le masque la lunette d'or du banquier, sous la patte du singe le gant parfumé d'un dandy. Non. Mais c'était un bal du peuple, où il va seul, les manches retroussées, où pour 20 sous il rit toute une nuit dans sa bonne grosse joie.

Un bal où l'on s'intrigue plus qu'aux autres, où il est de mauvais goût de se fâcher, et que les directeurs bravant les préjugés des saisons livrent au public si le dimanche est beau, et si le pain n'est pas cher.

C'est à ces bals-là qu'il y a des danses impudiques et qui vous feraient rougir pauvre fille.

Et si vous [y] alliez le lendemain vous ne seriez plus vierge peut-être.

Et l'on s'y amuse pourtant, l'on est heureux - les hommes sans pudeur - les femmes souillées - sans honneur.

On est heureux sans vertus.

Singulier n'est-ce pas ? Vous ne vous êtes pas douté qu'on pût être heureux sans vertus.

— C'est vrai pourtant. En ce cas, à quoi servent-elles ?

Vous avez reconnu ces masques... ce sont nos saltimbanques.

Jadis ils n'avaient pas de pain, et aujourd'hui ils courent au théâtre.

C'est qu'ils ont de l'argent, oui de l'Argent. D'où leur vient-il ? d'Isabellada. Ne croyez point que ce soit aux animaux d'Isambart, et à ses grimaces, aux tours de force de Marguerite qu'ils doivent leur fortune.

Du tout ! C'est à cette belle enfant qui saute maintenant une valse hongroise, au milieu du bal, éperdue, enivrée, accablée d'applaudissements, de fleurs et du brouhaha d'une salle entière qui trépigne de joie.

Un seul masque reste pensif sur sa banquette. Il est triste, et les applaudissements de la salle le font pleurer. La grâce d'Isabellada lui est à charge.

C'est qu'aussi là comme autre part, il est venu apporter sous son masque et sa jalousie amère, et sa haine furieuse et ses peines, et ses plaies saignantes et ses blessures profondes.

C'est le domino noir.

Quant à Isambart il dansait, lourdement, criait fort, intriguait le premier venu et puis il allait s'asseoir à la table de jeu, avec d'autres pierrots, trichait, riait aux éclats, faisait du vacarme, attroupait tout le monde autour de lui, et puis il recommençait. Marguerite depuis quelque temps l'avait perdu de vue, lorsqu'elle se sentit frappée sur l'épaule.

Elle se retourna.

C'était un pierrot avec une tête de boeuf.

Elle reconnut notre homme.

Mais lorsque celui-ci vint à lui dire - Je te connais bien, beau masque - ce n'était plus sa voix - non bien sûr ce n'était pas lui - Qu'en savait-elle après tout, car il y en avait tant d'autres du même costume et cette mode de porter des têtes d'animaux était alors fort en usage.

Quant à la voix elle était déguisée sous le masque.

— Je te connais bien, dit le pierrot, veux-tu que je te dise ton nom ?

— Oui.

— Marguerite La Rouge Laide.

Cette voix grêle et chevrotante, cette figure stupide de boeuf ouvrant ses larges narines, avec son rire imbécile fit peur à Marguerite. Elle se tapit dans son coin en tremblant.

— Tiens regarde, continua-t-il, cette jeune fille sauter là-bas, - la reconnais-tu ?

Et il montrait Isabellada, et sa large figure riait toujours, et sa voix continuait :

— Elle est plus jolie que toi, vois-tu comme son sein palpite, avec grâce, comme ses mains sont blanches, comme son costume lui dessine bien sa taille ?

Marguerite trépignait d'impatience, elle se mordait les lèvres, et commença à pleurer, et l'on vit ses larmes couler sur son masque noir et y laisser une trace blanche.

Et la tête de boeuf riait toujours ouvrant ses larges narines et ses lèvres s'écartaient avec une stupidité qui avait quelque chose de féroce, il continua avec plus de vitesse :

— Ce soir après le bal quand les lumières seront éteintes, lorsque tu retourneras dans ta tente joindre tes enfants, tu entendras non loin de toi le bruit des baisers d'amour.

— Oh grâce, grâce.

Et le masque riait de plus belle. Il se mit même à agiter ses longues manches autour de la tête de Marguerite et à lui en caresser les joues.

— Et cette femme que tout le monde admire maintenant sera à un seul homme. À ton mari.

— Ah pitié Isambart, pitié.

— Tenez, dit-il en riant et en s'adressant au public, en voilà une qui se fâche parce que je lui dis que son mari en caresse une autre, il se retourna vers Marguerite, l'amena dans l'embrasure d'une fenêtre. Alors elle ne pouvait plus lui échapper, il pouvait lui cracher toutes ces injures à la face, il pouvait lui raconter jusqu'au bout toutes les peines qu'elle avait eues, lui dire combien elle était laide, lui montrer toute la différence qu'il y avait entre elle et la danseuse, lui peindre jusqu'au dernier détail l'amour de Pedrillo, il pouvait lui représenter avec chaleur leurs entrelacements dans le lit nuptial, leurs mots à moitié dits, leurs soupirs entrecoupés.

C'est ce qu'il fit.

— Tu seras éveillée demain par les éclats de rire d'un enfant, ce sera le leur.

— Ô Isambart que t'ai-je fait ?

— Rien mais tu me déplaïs, tantôt quand je te voyais faire tes tours, que j'aurais eu de plaisir à jeter de la boue sur ta robe bleue, à tirer tes cheveux, à meurtrir tes seins. Je sais bien, tu ne m'as jamais rien fait - tu es peut-être meilleure qu'une autre. Mais enfin tu me déplaïs, je te souhaite du mal. C'est un caprice. D'abord pourquoi pleurer toujours, avoir un air si sombre, une démarche si déplaisante, une tournure qui me fait bisquer enfin ?

Et puis toujours geindre et se lamenter, - eh bien morbleu, pourquoi ne t'en vas-tu pas d'avec nous, car nous te nourrissons et ce n'est jamais pour toi que nous recevons de l'argent.

Tes enfants dis-tu ? et bien le bureau les ramassera bien. Moi à ta place, je ferais la vie au moins...

.....

Ah non t'es trop laide.

Oh mais quand je vois tes yeux de chat à travers ton masque... qué figure qui me déplaît... il quitta son air en colère et partit en riant aux éclats.

Isabellada, épuisée, demanda à Pedrillo à s'en aller, et en quittant le bal, elle s'appuya sur son bras langoureusement, laissa voir sa gorge décollée, et son dos couvert d'une sueur odoriférante.

On l'applaudit encore.

VIII

Pedrillo en effet laissa seule Marguerite, et alla du côté de la ménagerie. Isambart les laissa tranquilles, se coucha vite, et ne se réveilla que le lendemain à une heure d'après-midi.

Le domino noir ôta son masque qui l'étouffait, et resta le coude appuyé sur la table, regardant brûler la chandelle et enfoncée dans ses souvenirs du bal.

Les paroles d'Isambart lui revenaient à l'esprit, elle entendait son rire éclatant perçant à travers son masque.

C'était le souvenir de la danse d'Isabellada qui lui faisait mal, tous ces applaudissements pour une autre, tous ces dédains pour elle, l'amour de Pedrillo pour son enfant. Et la tête de boeuf lui revenait encore dans l'esprit, avec ses narines ouvertes, et son rire féroce.

Son expression stupide l'effrayait encore.

Je ne sais si vous avez comme moi étudié, tous ces visages grotesques. Mais il y en a quelques-uns dont l'auteur doit être bien athée et bien misanthrope pour réunir sur le même carton la ressemblance de la brute avec l'homme.

La haine sans cause [d'Isambart] lui avait fait une singulière impression. Sa haine avait pour motif qu'elle marchait mal, que ses cheveux étaient rouges et qu'elle aimait ses enfants.

Ce remède ignoble à ses maux qu'il lui avait proposé... cette insulte outrageante de lui avoir fait sentir qu'on la nourrissait par pitié, qu'elle leur était à charge, tout cela la faisait souffrir, elle qui aimait tant son Pedrillo, elle qui n'avait demandé au ciel qu'une vie d'amour, qu'un mari qui l'aim[ât], qui comprît toutes ses tendres affections et qui sentît toute la poésie qu'il [y] avait dans ce coeur de Baladine, de femme honnie, méprisée de la société.

Ah, se disait-elle en elle-même, lorsqu'elle voyait passer en chapeau une femme honnête, - pourquoi ne suis-je point comme elle ? ; - et alors l'envie lui prenait au coeur. Quand elle voyait danser Isabellada - elle demandait au ciel pourquoi la nature ne l'avait point faite ainsi. Et elle haïssait la maîtresse de son mari - Oh dans ces moments-là quand elle avait froid, quand elle voyait Pedrillo vivre heureux et content - alors [elle] était méchante et ne croyait plus en Dieu.

Encore elle se serait passée d'argent - Elle demanda de l'amour à la société - On lui rit à la face - De l'humanité - On lui montra le chemin de l'hôpital - De la pitié - C'est une baladine - Ah de la pitié à une baladine - À une voleuse d'enfants, à une coureuse des rues -

Eh bien à cette société qui n'avait voulu lui donner ni pain, ni amour, ni pitié, elle voua la haine et la jalousie. À Dieu qu'elle avait imploré tant de fois les genoux sur le pavé, les larmes aux yeux, à Dieu qui n'écoula pas ses prières, elle donna l'impiété.

À la nature qui l'avait maltraitée le mépris.

Aussi quand elle voyait des gens riches, heureux, estimés, dont on prenait soin, elle leur souhaitait les calamités les plus grandes. Elle riait des prières des pauvres, de leurs vœux, de leurs reliques, et en passant elle crachait sur le seuil des églises.

Quand elle voyait une femme gracieuse, au doux sourire, aux yeux tendres et langoureux, aux cheveux de jais, au cou d'albâtre, elle se moquait de la foule qui l'admirait. Elle se disait :

— Qu'aurait-il fallu pour qu'elle fût comme moi ? Des cheveux d'une autre couleur, des yeux plus petits, une taille moins bien faite. Et elle serait comme Marguerite. Si son mari ne l'avait point aimée, l'avait méprisée, l'avait battue, elle serait laide, méprisée comme

Marguerite.

C'est dans ces pensées-là qu'elle était alors puis peu à peu elle s'assoupit. Elle dormait le coude appuyé sur la table, la joue dans la main et la chandelle brûlait toujours.

IX

Le lendemain elle fut réveillée par la voix d'Ernesto qui se disputait avec Isabellada.

Elle se mit à les écouter.

— Pourquoi me l'avez-vous pris ? N'était-ce pas à moi ? Je veux la ravoir.

Marguerite s'habilla à la hâte, se cacha derrière la voiture aux animaux, et les regarda sans rien dire.

Elle vit la soeur d'Isambart, qui tenait la couverture d'un de ses enfants, et qui ne voulait pas lui rendre.

Elle avait déjà bien d'autres motifs pour haïr cette femme sans que celui-ci vînt s'y joindre encore, elle ne put supporter plus longtemps cette vue, elle sauta en un seul bond sur elle, lui arracha la couchette.

— Encore, toujours toi Isabellada. Elle prononça ce mot de la manière la plus dure qu'il lui était possible car son harmonie lui déplaisait.

— N'est-ce point assez, continua-t-elle avec verve et chaleur, n'est-ce point assez que tu viennes chez nous t'y établir, y dominer, y faire la souveraine, que tu prennes mon mari, que tu me l'enlèves tous les jours de ma couche pour le porter dans la tienne, n'est-ce pas assez, fille de Satan, de nous insulter en public par ta beauté que tu prostitues à l'admiration du premier venu, dis, réponds, n'est-ce pas assez, l'infamie et l'outrage ne sont-ils pas portés assez haut sans que tu viennes encore arracher les linges qui cachent le sang de nos plaies ? - Il retomberait sur toi, le sang, prends-y garde.

Ah ah, les belles filles, les jolies à qui tout le monde jette des fleurs, des louanges, de l'argent, vous nous donnez en échange le mépris, la honte et la misère.

Tiens Pedrillo, regarde si je n'ai pas raison.

— Qu'y a-t-il Isabellada ?

— Son enfant a voulu prendre la couverture du mien - et Marguerite soutient que c'est à elle.

— Marguerite qu'as-tu à dire ?

— Elle ment Pedrillo, ne l'écoute pas.

— C'est toi Marguerite, et il la repoussa durement dans la tente.

Là elle s'arracha les cheveux, déchira ses habits, se roula par terre, se mit le visage en sang.

Elle se releva.

Il faut donc boire l'amertume jusqu'à la lie, eh bien oui encore, encore, - Isabellada, danse mieux s'il est possible, Pedrillo aime-la plus encore et moi je vous haïrai davantage.

Tout à coup, elle se jeta aux genoux de Pedrillo qui entraît dans la tente au même moment.

— Que viens-tu faire ici ?

— Prendre de l'argent.

— Pour qui ?

— Pour elle.

— Ah oui, elle, elle, toujours.

Ah Pedrillo, tu l'aimes donc bien ?

— Oui.

— Grâce, oh ne m'accable plus de sa présence, de son nom, de sa beauté. Je t'en prie aime-moi. Que te faut-il pour te plaire ? Mais je t'en prie ne me parle plus.

Cette femme, le visage ensanglanté, les habits déchirés, pleurant, se tordant de rage à ses pieds, l'attendrit un moment.

— Que veux-(tu] ma Marguerite ?

— Pedrillo laisse pour maintenant, mais un jour quand elle, tu m'entends, Elle, quand elle m'aurait tuée par ses insultes, tu sais comme le lion de Numidie, rugit bien dans sa cage, tu sais avec quelle volupté il dévore la viande qu'on lui donne le soir. Eh bien, un jour je te demanderai, le même honneur.

— Qu'as-tu voyons, Marguerite, reviens à toi.

— Ce que j'ai. Je suis jalouse, ah tu ne l'as jamais été toi. Ce que j'ai, je suis folle peut-être, je n'en sais rien. Mais je la hais et je t'aime.

X

Il fait chaud, le soleil darde ses rayons sur la route pleine de poussière, et les pommiers qui la bordent ont leurs feuilles toutes brûlées - C'est par ces vigoureuses chaleurs du mois de juin qu'il est doux de se laisser balloter par le mouvement de la calèche, de s'abandonner à quelque rêve plein de poésie tandis que les rideaux bleus des vasistas sont fermés et laissent passer cependant quelque petit nuage de poussière chassé par le vent et qui vient couvrir vos habits.

Cela est vrai. Mais tout le monde ne voyage pas en calèche, et nos baladins dormaient alors dans leurs carrioles. Marguerite et Pedrillo marchent à pied, et causent tous deux. Le silence n'était alors interrompu que par le son de leurs voix qui se faisait seul entendre au milieu de la campagne, par le pas des chevaux sur la poussière, et par le bourdonnement d'une abeille qui bourdonnait autour de la cage du lion et l'empêchait de se livrer à ses rêves ; car il en avait peut-être aussi, lui ; il pensait, à son soleil d'Afrique, à sa tanière qu'il avait laissée bien loin là-bas dans d'autres pays, il pensait à son vaste désert, à la lionne qui couchait avec lui sous l'ombre du palmier, et il mordait le bout de ses griffes avec mélancolie.

Laissons-le penser à son bonheur d'autrefois, laissons-le rêver à ses joies brutales, et revenons aux peines de Marguerite.

— Tu l'aimes donc bien, dit-elle tout à coup.

— Eh bien oui Marguerite, pourquoi toujours le demander ?

— Que lui trouves-tu de bien ?

— Tout - mais tu m'ennuies, que veux-tu ?

— La mort.

— Ah tu es folle.

— Peut-être, - tu es méchant, je ne te demande pas l'amour, je ne te demande pas la pitié, mais je te demande, la cause de cet amour puis la mort après.

— Quant à la cause je n'en sais rien, dit Pedrillo d'un ton courroucé. Quant à la mort, je t'en prie, Marguerite, tu sais que l'homme a des accès de colère.

— Et la femme des accès de jalousie, répondit Marguerite en riant ironiquement, oui de jalousie. C'est-à-dire de haine. Je te demandais la cause de ton amour pour Isabellada, eh bien moi je vais te dire la cause de ma haine pour elle et pour toi.

— Marguerite prends garde.

— Non - la voilà, la cause, elle est belle, je hais les belles parce que je suis laide. Tu l'aimes, et je la hais, je hais ceux qu'on aime, tu es heureux, toi, je hais les heureux, vous êtes riches et je hais les riches, parce qu'on ne m'aime pas, parce que je suis malheureuse, et misérable.

Pourquoi hein Pedrillo, pourquoi m'as-[tu] rejetée toujours comme quelque chose dont on a honte ? Ah oui, parce que tu craignais la risée publique, eh bien je te hais parce que j'aime ce que la société méprise, j'aime les baladins, moi, j'aime les filles de joie, et celles du dernier rang, et je déteste ton Isabellada. Oh si je pouvais je l'écraserais sous mon pied, avec quelle joie je piétinerais sur son corps, sur ses seins, sur sa tête, sur sa figure, je la mangerais, je la dévorerais avec plaisir.

Pedrillo fit un geste de colère.

— Marguerite prends garde, le lion est là dans sa cage. De grâce finis, pas un mot.

— Il fallait que tu fusses un homme sans pudeur et sans âme pour me mépriser ainsi, pour bafouer, pour salir, pour traîner dans la boue cette pauvre Marguerite qui t'aimait tant, qui s'était jetée dans tes bras, pleine de poésie et d'amour, et que tu as repoussée du pied comme un chien galeux qui veut lécher son maître.

— Ô Marguerite, Marguerite, tu vas me faire faire quelque chose d'odieux, d'horrible.

— Encore cette femme, elle avait des enfants et leur père les traitait sans pitié, pas de pain quelquefois - Et s'ils ne sont pas morts, c'est que Dieu a veillé sur eux. Le sanglier, la bête féroce, dévore quelquefois ses enfants, mais il ne les fait pas périr dans les agonies de la faim - Eh bien oui va jette-moi si tu veux à ce lion, je ne te demanderai ni secours ni pardon. Non car si tu m'as abreuvée d'amertume, je t'empoisonnerai d'injures, d'insultes et de reproches. Écoute, écoute j'en ai encore à dire, écoute que je dise encore une fois que je hais Isabellada. Oui je la déteste, je voudrais l'avoir entre mes mains, l'écraser, la déchirer de mes ongles et plonger ma tête dans son sang, et m'y désaltérer en la replongeant encore.

Le lion rugit dans sa cage, il fait sonner sa queue, il remue sa crinière, et la gueule ouverte il attend une femme que Pedrillo a dans ses bras.

Celui-ci ouvre la porte et la précipite.

Déjà le fier animal l'avait saisie lorsqu'Isambart survenu à ses rugissements arracha Marguerite. Elle avait la poitrine déchirée et ses mains portaient l'empreinte de ses griffes.

XI

Quelle est cette femme qui sort en chancelant de l'hôpital ? Sa taille est grosse, ses cheveux rouges, son regard stupide. Un bonnet de dentelle avec des fleurs sales lui couvre la tête, ses habits sont déchirés et son aspect est misérable et fait pitié. C'est une folle.

Vous voyez bien que son rire est étrange, ses mots entrecoupés, qu'elle court, qu'elle s'arrête. Bien sûr. C'est une folle.

Ses mains et son visage [ont] des balafres. Bien sûr. C'est Marguerite. Oui c'était elle.

Elle marcha ainsi pendant deux jours, ne sachant où elle allait, sans avoir rien pris, rien ramassé, rien que la boue qu'on lui jetait en passant.

Les gamins couraient après elle et lorsqu'elle se détournait pour leur dire : il fallait que vous soyez sans pudeur et sans âme, sa figure grimaçant, son costume, et ses fleurs sur le bonnet déchiré les faisaient rire, et ils l'accablaient de leurs huées et de leurs cris de dédain.

Fatiguée, harassée, n'en pouvant plus, elle tomba presque évanouie sur le gazon d'un boulevard.

Tout à coup elle releva la tête, promena ses regards hébétés autour d'elle - et s'écria d'une voix tonnante, - Mes enfants où sont-ils ? - Auguste - Ernesto - Garofa -

Un tilbury vint à passer.

Une grande dame s'y charrait à son aise. Son cachemire blanc tombait derrière jusque sur le siège du domestique. Les plumes blanches et noires de son chapeau s'agitaient avec grâce dans l'air. Son sourire était doux, sa taille fine. Elle paraissait heureuse, elle avait des diamants, un équipage, des cachemires, et des colliers d'or.

Marguerite courut vers elle, s'accrocha aux rayons de la voiture et avec des trépignements de colère :

— N'est-ce pas assez d'infamie et d'injures sans venir, arracher le linge qui couvrait nos plaies ?... c'est toi Isabellada. Oh va je te reconnais bien, c'est toujours cet air de courtisane cette taille impudique.

Elle ne se trompait pas.

Un jour qu'Isabellada dansait sur la place, un grand seigneur la vit, et depuis ce jour elle devint sa dame de compagnie.

— Quelle est cette femme ? dit le monsieur qui était en tilbury.

— Je ne sais, une folle sans doute.

— Si je suis folle, peut-être.

— John chassez-la.

Le domestique lui donna des coups de fouet sur le visage. Mais elle restait toujours accrochée aux rayons de la roue.

— Non je ne m'en irai pas, disait-elle, écoute, écoute encore, si tu m'as abreuvée d'amertumes je peux t'empoisonner d'insultes, de reproches et d'outrages.

— La folle ! la folle ! criait le peuple en courant après Marguerite.

Elle s'arrêta, se frappa le front.

— La mort, dit-elle en riant.

Et elle se dirigea à grands pas vers la Seine.

On venait de retirer un cadavre de l'eau, et il était exposé à la morgue.

C'était une femme, un bonnet de dentelle avec des fleurs sales lui couvrait la tête, ses habits étaient déchirés et laissaient voir des membres amaigris. Quelques mouches venaient bourdonner à l'entour et lécher le sang figé sur sa bouche entr'ouverte, ses bras gonflés étaient bleuâtres, et couverts de petites taches noires.

Le soleil était sur son déclin et un de ses derniers rayons perçant à travers les barreaux de la morgue vint frapper sur ses yeux à moitié fermés et leur donner un éclat singulier.

Ce corps couvert de balafres, de marques de griffes, gonflé, verdâtre, exposé ainsi sur la dalle humide était hideux et faisait mal à voir.

L'odeur nauséabonde, qui s'exhalait de ce cadavre en lambeaux, et qui faisait éloigner tous les passants oisifs, attira deux élèves en médecine.

— Tiens, dit l'un d'eux après l'avoir considérée quelque temps, elle était à l'hôpital l'autre jour. Il se tut et l'examina attentivement.

C'était un véritable élève en médecine, avec un habit vert râpé, couvert de duvet, une casquette rouge, et une pipe de faïence dans laquelle il fumait le fin Maryland.

— Mais si nous l'achetions ?

— Que voudrais-tu en faire ?

— Gare, cria la voix d'un cocher. C'était celui du tilbury de l'autre jour qui conduisait Mademoiselle à l'Opéra.

Nos disciples d'Esculape se rangèrent aussitôt.

En se retournant, le fumeur laissa tomber sa pipe.

— Sacré nom de Dieu, dit-il en frappant du pied, voilà la troisième que je casse de la journée.

Moralité

Maître Michel de Montaigne, Gascon docte et prud'homme, bardereau, a dict :

Cecy est un livre de bonne foy... je donne mon advis, non comme bon mais comme mien.

Moi je dirai aussi que c'est de bonne foy que sont écrites ces pages. Et même je les ai composées avec feu et enthousiasme.

J'ai voulu tonner contre les préjugés et je ferai peut-être crier contre un auteur aussi impudent que moi.

Quant à ce que j'ai mis comme titre Un parfum à sentir j'ai voulu dire par là que Marguerite était un parfum à sentir, j'aurais pu ajouter une fleur à voir, car pour Isabellada, sa beauté était tout.

Maintenant de peur que la très Sainte Église Catholique, Apostolique et Romaine, ne lance contre moi ses foudres à cause de mon titre cocasse

Conte philosophique, immoral, moral (ad libitum)

je me justifierai quand on m'aura fait la définition de ce qui est moral d'avec ce qui ne l'est pas.

Ce que vous voudrez

Vous ne savez peut-être pas quel plaisir c'est ! composer !

Écrire, oh écrire c'est s'emparer du monde, de ses préjugés, de ses vertus et le résumer dans un livre.

C'est sentir sa pensée naître, grandir, vivre, se dresser debout sur son piédestal, et y rester toujours.

Je viens donc d'achever ce livre étrange, bizarre, incompréhensible. Le premier chapitre, je l'ai fait [en] un jour. J'ai été ensuite pendant un mois sans y travailler, en une semaine, j'en ai fait 5 autres, et en deux jours je l'ai achevé.

Je [ne] vous donnerai pas d'explications sur sa pensée philosophique. Elle en a une, triste, amère, sombre et sceptique... cherchez-la -

Je suis maintenant fatigué, harassé, et je tombe de lassitude sur mon fauteuil sans avoir la force de vous remercier si vous m'avez lu, ni celle de vous engager à ne pas le faire si vous ne connaissez pas le titre de mon originale production.

LA FEMME DU MONDE .

D'où je conclus, Dieu me pardonne et le Diable m'emporte, que Satan fait la queue au Père éternel.

Auberge des Adrets.

I

Tu ne me connais pas, frêle et chétive créature ; eh bien, écoute.

II

Mon nom est maudit sur la terre ; pourtant le malheur, le désespoir, l'envie qui y dominant en tyrans m'appellent souvent à leur secours.

III

Je me réjouis dans les grandes cités et je dirige mes coups sur les peuples des villes.

IV

Pourtant je vais aussi chez le laboureur, je prends ses brebis dans son étable, je prends la chèvre qui broute sur la colline, le chamois qui bondit sur le rocher aigu ; je prends l'oiseau dans son vol, et le roi sur son trône.

V

Du jour où Adam et sa compagne furent chassés du paradis, moi, la fille de Satan, je me tins depuis ce temps à la face de tous les empires, de tous les siècles, de toutes les dynasties de rois, que je brisais sous mes pieds de squelette.

VI

En vain j'ai entendu des peuples dévorés par la peste crier après la vie, en vain j'ai vu des rois qui se cramponnaient à leur couronne, en vain j'ai vu les larmes d'une mère qui me demandait son enfant ; leur prière me semblait ridicule.

VII

Et je broyais avec avidité, sous mes dents, brillante jeunesse, empire puissant, siècles pleins de gloire et d'honneur, rois, empereurs ; j'effaçais leur blason, leur gloire, et, dans mes mains décharnées, je réduisais en poudre le sceptre doré aussi facilement que la houlette du pasteur.

VIII

J'aime à m'introduire dans le lit d'une jeune fille, à creuser lentement ses joues, à lui sucer le sang, à la saisir peu à peu et à la ravir à son amant, à ses parents qui pleurent et sanglotent sur cette pauvre rose si vite fanée.

IX

Alors je me réjouis sur son front encore blanc, je contemple ses lèvres ridées par la fièvre, j'entends avec plaisir le bourdonnement des mouches qui viennent autour de sa tête, comme signes de putréfaction.

X

Et je ris avidement en voyant les vers qui rampent sur son corps.

XI

J'aime à prendre place aux banquets royaux, aux gais repas champêtres ; je m'assieds sur la pourpre, je m'étends sur l'herbe, et mon doigt glacé s'applique sur le front des seigneurs, sur le front du peuple.

XII

Souvent, en entendant les éclats de rire des enfants, en les voyant se parer de fleurs, je les ai emportés dans mes bras ; j'ai orné ma tête de leurs bouquets et j'ai ri comme eux ; mais, à ce son creux et sépulcral qui sortait de ma maigre poitrine, on reconnaissait que c'était une voix de fantôme.

XIII

Non, pourtant ! Ce fantôme était la plus vraie de toutes les vérités de la terre.

XIV

Et contre elle venant se briser tout, tout, et le fils de Dieu lui-même.

XV

Car cite-moi une vague de l'Océan, une parole de haine ou d'amour, un souffle dans l'air, un vol dans les cieux, un sourire sur les lèvres, qui ne soit effacé.

XVI

Tout l'avenir, te dis-je, viendra tomber devant ma faux tranchante, — et même le monde.

XVII

Jadis, au temps des Caligula et des Néron, je hurlais dans l'arène, je venais aider Messaline à ses obscènes supplices, je frappais les chrétiens, et je rugissais dans le Colisée avec les tigres et les lions.

XVIII

En France, au temps des rois, je venais siéger à leurs conseils ; j'étais alors, par exemple, la Saint-Barthélemy.

XIX

Rien ne m'a échappé, pas même le siècle de Voltaire qui s'élevait haut et grand, la tête fière et le visage arrogant, tout boursoufflé de philosophe, de corruption et d'emphase ; je lui ai envoyé 93.

XX

Le siècle du grand homme ne m'a pas échappé non plus, qui, avec son air de cagotisme et sa main de philanthrope, est une vieille courtisane qui revient de ses fautes et commence une nouvelle vie.

XXI

Eh bien, à lui, si content de ses colonies d'Afrique, de ses chemins, de ses voitures à vapeur, je lui ai envoyé un fléau, une peste, mais une peste qui vient comme une bombe éclater au milieu d'un banquet plein de parfums et de femmes, qui vous prend les hommes, les enfants, et les étouffe aussitôt, le choléra, le hideux choléra qui, avec ses ongles noirs, son teint vert, ses dents jaunes, ses membres qui se convulsionnent, entraîne l'homme à la tombe plus vite que la flèche ne traverse les airs, que l'éclair ne fend les cieux.

XXII

Il est vrai de dire que les sangsues du docteur Broussais, la vaccine, le pête de Regnault aîné, le remède infaillibles pour les maladies secrètes, m'ont déconcertée un peu ; alors j'ai réuni mes forces et j'ai donné la Chambre des Pairs, la mascarade, l'attentat du 28, et la loi Fieschi.

XXIII

J'aime la voix d'une vieille femme qui prie sur un mort.

XXIV

J'aime le tintement rauque et glapissant des cloches.

XXV

J'aime à entendre vibrer son marteau alors qu'il frappe minuit, et que les sorciers se rendent au sabbat avec des sifflements étranges et aigus.

XXVI

Je bondis de volupté quand je me vautre à mon aise dans un beau char de parade, quand les hommes déploient la vanité jusqu'au bout ; c'est un curieux spectacle.

Allons donc, chien, rends des honneurs au chien qui pourrit sur la borne !

Allons donc, société, rends donc des honneurs au riche qui passe dans un corbillard ; les chevaux, tout couverts d'argent, font étinceler le pavé ; les dais, reluisants d'or et de pierreries, sont magnifiques ; on fait des discours sur les vertus du défunt ; il était libéral sans doute, et magnifique ; les pauvres ont deux sous, un pain et un cierge ; il dépensait splendidement son argent.

Allons donc, chien, fais le panégyrique du chien que dévorent les corbeaux ; dis qu'il mangeait avec gloutonnerie son morceau de cheval qu'on lui jetait chaque soir.

XXVII

J'aime encore à détailler toutes les souffrances qu'endurent ceux que je prends dans mes embrassements.

Maintenant, me reconnais-tu ? J'ai une tête de squelette, des mains de fer, et dans ces mains une faux.

On m'appelle la Mort.

Le linceul qui entourait ses os se déchira et laissa voir à nu des entrailles à demi pourries que suçait un serpent.

LA PESTE A FLORENCE

Gve Flaubert

C'est que je te hais d'une haine de frère

Al. Dumas (Don Juan de Marana)

La Peste à Florence

Septembre 1836

I

Il y avait autrefois à Florence une femme d'environ 60 ans que l'on appelait Beatricia. Elle habitait dans le quartier le plus misérable de la ville et ses seuls moyens de vivre se réduisaient à dire la bonne aventure aux grands seigneurs et à vendre quelques drogues à ses voisins pauvres lorsqu'ils étaient malades. La mendicité complétait ses revenus.

Elle avait été grande [dame] dans sa jeunesse. Mais alors elle était si voûtée qu'on lui voyait à peine la figure. Ses traits étaient irréguliers, elle avait un grand nez aquilin, de petits yeux noirs, un menton allongé et une large bouche d'où sortaient deux ou trois dents longues, jaunes et chancelantes [qui] répandaient sans cesse de la salive sur sa lèvre inférieure. Son costume avait quelque chose de bizarre et d'étrange. Son jupon était bleu et sa camisole noire. Quant à ses chaussures - elle marchait toujours nu-pieds en s'appuyant sur un bâton plus haut qu'elle.

Joignez à cela une magnifique chevelure blanche qui lui couvrait les épaules et le dos et qui tombait des deux côtés de son visage sans ordre et sans soin car elle n'avait pas même un simple bandeau pour les retenir.

Le jour et une partie de la nuit elle se promenait dans les rues de Florence mais le soir elle rentrait chez elle pour manger et pour dire la Bonne aventure à ceux qui n'avaient pas voulu s'arrêter en public devant une pareille femme et qui avaient honte de leur superstition.

Un jour donc elle fut accostée par deux jeunes gens de distinction qui lui ordonnèrent de les conduire chez elle. Elle obéit et se mit à marcher devant eux.

Pendant la route et en traversant les rues sombres et tortueuses du vieux quartier de la ville le plus jeune des deux témoignait ses craintes à l'autre et lui reprochait l'envie démesurée qu'il avait de se faire dire son avenir.

— Quelle singulière idée as-tu, lui disait-il, de vouloir aller chez cette femme. - Cela est-il sensé ? - Songe que maintenant il est près de huit heures, que le jour baisse, songe encore qu'en allant dans ce sale quartier de la plus vile populace, nos riches épées, les plumes de nos feutres, et nos fraises de dentelles peuvent faire supposer qu'il y a de l'or...

— Ah tu es fou Garcia, interrompit François, quel lâche tu fais.

— Mais enfin cette femme la connais-tu ? Sais-tu son nom ?

— Oui. C'est Beatricia.

Ce mot produisit un singulier effet sur le jeune homme et l'arrêta tout court d'autant plus que la devineresse entendant prononcer son nom s'était retournée - et cette pâle figure le fixant avec ses longs cheveux blancs que le vent agitait légèrement le fit tressaillir.

Garcia comprima sa crainte et continua de marcher silencieusement mais se rapprochant de plus en plus de son frère François.

Enfin au bout d'une demi-heure de marche ils arrivèrent devant une longue allée qu'il fallait traverser avant d'arriver chez Beatricia.

— Tu peux faire tes opérations ici, lui dit Garcia en s'adressant à la vieille femme.

— Impossible, attendez encore quelques instants, nous voici arrivés, et elle ouvrit une porte qui donnait sur un escalier tortueux et en bois de chêne.

Après avoir monté bien des marches Beatricia ouvrit une autre porte. C'était celle de son cabinet éclairé par une lampe suspendue au plafond. Mais sa pâle lumière éclairait si peu que l'obscurité était presque complète. Pourtant avec quelque soin et comme l'appartement était bas et petit on voyait dans l'ombre quelques têtes de morts, et si la main par hasard tâtonnait sur une grande table ronde qui se trouvait là, elle rencontrait aussitôt des herbes mouillées et de longs cheveux encore tout sanglants.

— Vite dépêche-toi, dit François.

Beatricia lui prit la main et l'ayant amené sous la lampe, elle lui dit :

— Tiens, vois-tu ces trois lignes en forme d'M ? - Cela est signe de Bonheur. - Les autres lignes qui s'entrecroisent et s'entrelacent vers le pouce indiquent qu'il y aura des trahisons, ta famille, toi-même, tu mourras par la trahison d'un de tes proches. Mais je te le dis, tu verras bientôt réussir tes projets. Va.

— À moi, dit Garcia d'une voix tremblante. Beatricia lui prit sa main droite.

— Elle était brûlante.

— Ta vie sera entremêlée de biens et de maux. Mais le cancer de l'envie et de la haine te rongera le coeur, le glaive du meurtre sera dans ta main et tu trouveras dans le sang de ta victime l'expiation des humiliations de ta vie - Va.

— Adieu femme de l'enfer, dit Garcia en lui jetant une pièce d'or qui roula sur les pavés et alla frapper un crâne. Adieu, femme de Babylone, que la malédiction du ciel tombe sur ta maison et sur ta science et fasse que d'autres ne se laissent point prendre à tes discours... Ils sortirent aussitôt et l'escalier résonnait encore du bruit de leurs pas que Beatricia contemplait par sa fenêtre les étoiles qui brillaient au ciel et la lune qui argentait les toits de Florence.

II

Rentré chez Cosme son père, Garcia ne put fermer l'oeil de la nuit, il se leva n'en pouvant plus car la fièvre battait avec violence dans ses artères, et il rêva toute la nuit à la prédiction de Beatricia.

Je ne sais si comme moi vous êtes superstitieux mais il faut avouer qu'il [y] avait dans cette vieille femme aux longs cheveux blancs, dans son costume, dans toute sa personne, dans ses paroles sinistres, dans cet appareil lugubre qui décorait son appartement avec des crânes humains et avec des cheveux d'exécutés quelque chose de fantastique, de triste et même d'effrayant qui devait, au 17<sup>e</sup> siècle, en Italie, à Florence et la nuit effrayer un homme tel que Garcia de Médicis.

Il avait alors vingt ans. C'est-à-dire que depuis vingt ans il était en proie aux railleries, aux humiliations, aux insultes de sa famille. En effet c'était un homme méchant, traître et haineux que Garcia de Médicis mais qui dit que cette méchanceté maligne, cette sombre et ambitieuse jalousie qui tourmentèrent ses jours ne prirent pas naissance dans toutes les tracasseries qu'il eut à endurer ?

Il était faible, et maladif. François était fort et robuste, Garcia était laid, gauche, il était mou, sans énergie, sans esprit. François était un beau cavalier aux belles manières, c'était un galant homme. Il maniait habilement un cheval, et forçait le cerf aussi aisément que le meilleur chasseur des états du Pape.

C'était donc l'aîné le chéri de la famille. À lui tous les honneurs, les gloires, les titres et les dignités. Au pauvre Garcia l'obscurité et le mépris.

Cosme chérissait son fils aîné. Il avait demandé pour lui le cardinalat, il était sur le point de l'obtenir tandis que le cadet était resté simple lieutenant dans les troupes de son père.

Il y avait déjà longtemps que la haine de Garcia couvait lentement dans son coeur. Mais la prédiction de la vieille compléta l'oeuvre que l'orgueil avait commencée. Depuis qu'il savait que son frère allait être cardinal, cette idée-là lui faisait mal. Dans sa haine il souhaitait la mort de François. - Oh comment, se disait-il à lui-même en pleurant de rage et la tête dans ses mains. Oh comment, cet homme que je déteste sera Monseigneur le Cardinal François, plus qu'un duc, plus qu'un roi, presque le pape. Et moi... Ah moi son frère, toujours pauvre et obscur, comme le valet d'un bourgeois. - Quand on verra dans les rues de Florence la voiture de Monseigneur qui courra sur les dalles - si quelqu'enfant ignorant des choses de ce monde demande à sa mère :

— Quels sont ces hommes rouges derrière le Cardinal ?

— Ses valets.

— Et cet autre qui le suit à cheval habillé de noir ?

— Son frère. Son frère qui le suit à cheval. Ah dérision et pitié - Et dire - qu'il faudra respecter ce Cardinal, dire qu'il faudra l'appeler Monseigneur, se prosterner à ses pieds.

Ah quand j'étais jeune et pur, quand je croyais encore à l'avenir, au bonheur, à Dieu, - je méprisais les sarcasmes de l'impie. Ah je comprends maintenant, les joies du sang, les délices de la vengeance, et l'athéisme et l'impureté - et il sanglotait.

Le jour était déjà venu quand on vit de loin accourir un courrier aux armes du pape. Il se dirigea vers le palais ducal.

Garcia le vit, et il pleura amèrement.

III

C'était par une folle nuit d'Italie au mois d'août, à Florence. Le palais ducal était illuminé, le peuple dansait sur les places publiques. Partout c'était des danses, des rires et du bruit. Pourtant la peste avait exercé ses ravages sur Florence et avait décimé ses habitants.

Au palais aussi c'était des danses, des rires et du bruit mais non de joie. Car la peste là aussi avait fait ses ravages dans le coeur d'un homme, l'avait comprimé et l'avait endurci mais une autre peste que la contagion. Le malheur qui étreignait Garcia dans ses serres cruelles le serra si fort qu'il le broya comme le verre du festin entre les mains d'un homme ivre.

Or c'était Cosme de Médicis qui donnait toutes [ces] réjouissances publiques parce que son fils chéri François de Médicis était nommé Cardinal. C'était sans doute pour distraire le peuple des événements sinistres qui le préoccupaient, pauvre peuple - que l'on amuse avec du fard et des costumes de théâtre tandis qu'il agonise. Oh c'est que souvent un rire cache une larme.

Peut-être qu'au milieu de la danse dans le salon du duc quelqu'un des danseurs allait tomber sur le parquet et se convulsionner à la lueur des lustres et des glaces. Qui dit que cette jeune femme ne va pas s'évanouir tout à coup ? Peut-être son délire commence-t-il. Tenez, voyez-vous ses mains qui se crispent, ses pieds qui trépignent, ses dents qui claquent - Elle agonise, elle râle, ses mains défaillantes errent sur sa robe de satin, et elle expire dans sa parure de bal.

La fête était resplendissante et belle. Cosme avait appelé tous les savants et les artistes de l'Italie. Le Cardinal François était au comble de la gloire et des honneurs.

On lui jetait des couronnes, des fleurs, des odes, des vers. C'était des louanges et des flatteries, des adulations.

Dans un coin de la salle on voyait à un des groupes les plus considérables un homme vêtu de noir dont le maintien sérieux annonçait sans doute quelque profession savante. C'était le docteur Roderigo le médecin et l'ami des Médicis.

C'était un singulier homme que le docteur Roderigo. Alchimiste assez distingué pour son époque il était peu versé dans la science qui le faisait vivre et savait bien mieux celle dont il ne s'occupait que comme passe-temps.

L'étude des livres et celle des hommes avaient imprimé sur sa figure un certain sourire sceptique et moqueur qui effaçait légèrement les rides sombres de son front. Dans sa jeunesse il avait beaucoup étudié surtout la philosophie et la théologie mais au fond n'y ayant trouvé que doute et dégoût et il avait abandonné l'hypothèse pour la réalité et le livre pour le monde.

Autre livre aussi où il y a tant à lire.

Il était alors à s'entretenir avec le comte Salfieri et le duc de Florence. Il aimait particulièrement l'entretien de ce dernier parce qu'il trouvait là quelqu'un qui écoutait tous ses discours sans objection et qui y répondait toujours par un oui approbatif et lorsqu'on a une opinion hasardeuse, un système nouveau, on préfère l'exposer devant un homme supérieur à vous par le sang et inférieur par les moyens.

Voilà pourquoi le docteur Roderigo qui était un homme de beaucoup d'esprit aimait la société de Cosme II de Médicis qui n'en avait guère.

Il y avait déjà près de deux heures qu'il tenait le duc dans une dissertation sur les miracles de l'Ancien Testament et déjà plusieurs [fois] Cosme s'était avoué vaincu car à sa religion simple et naïve Roderigo opposait de puissantes objections et une logique vive et pressante.

— Rangez-vous donc, lui dit Salfieri, vous empêchez cette jeune fille de danser, allons autre part, ici nous gênons. Voulez-vous une partie de dés ?

— Volontiers, répondit le médecin saisissant cette occasion de finir la conversation car il avait quelquefois peur d'humilier le complaisant prince.

Quant à celui-ci après chaque entretien qu'il avait eu avec son médecin il s'en allait toujours avec une croyance de moins, une illusion détruite et un vide de plus dans l'âme. Il le quittait en disant tout bas : Ce diable de Roderigo - il est bien instruit, il est bien habile. Mais Dieu me pardonne si ce n'est pas péché de croire un pareil homme - pourtant ce qu'il dit est vrai.

Et le lendemain il courait entamer avec lui quelque discussion philosophique.

Sa magnificence s'était largement déployée dans la fête de ce jour, et rarement on en avait vu de pareille, tout était beau, digne et somptueux, c'était riche, c'était grandiose.

Mais au milieu de toutes ces figures où le luxe et la richesse éclataient, au milieu de ces femmes parées de perles, de fleurs et de diamants, entre les lustres, les glaces, au bruit du bolero qui bondissait, au milieu de ce bourdonnement de la fête, au retentissement de l'or sur les tables, au milieu donc de tout ce qu'il y avait d'enivrant dans le bal, d'entraînant dans la danse, d'enchanteur dans cette longue suite d'hommes et de femmes richement parés où il n'y avait que doux sourires, galantes paroles on voyait donc - apparaître là au milieu du bal comme le spectre de Banco la haute figure de Garcia - sombre et pâle.

— Il était venu là aussi lui - tout comme un autre - apporter au milieu des rires et de la joie sa blessure saignante et son profond chagrin. Il contemplait tout cela d'un oeil morne et triste, comme quelqu'un d'indifférent aux petites joies factices de la vie, comme le mourant regarde le soleil sur son grabat d'agonie.

À peine si depuis le commencement du bal quelqu'un lui avait adressé la parole, il était seul au milieu de tant de monde, seul avec son chagrin qui le rongeaient et le bruit de la danse lui faisait mal, la vue de son frère l'irritait à un tel point que quelquefois en regardant toute cette foule joyeuse et en pensant à lui-même, à lui désespéré et misérable sous son habit de courtisan, il touchait à la garde de son épée et qu'il était tenté de déchirer avec ses ongles la femme dont la robe l'effleurait en passant l'homme qui dansait devant pour narguer la fête et pour nuire aux heureux.

Son frère s'aperçut qu'il était malade et vint à lui d'un air bienveillant.

— Qu'as-tu Garcia ? lui dit-il - Qu'as-tu, ta main crève ton gant, tu tourmentes la garde de ton épée.

— Moi oh je n'ai rien, Monseigneur.

— Tu es fier Garcia.

— Oh oui, je suis fier va, bien fier, plus fier que toi peut-être, c'est la fierté du mendiant qui insulte le grand seigneur dont le cheval l'éclabousse et il accompagna ces derniers mots d'un rire forcé.

Le cardinal lui avait tourné le dos en haussant les épaules, et il alla recevoir les félicitations du duc de Bellamonte qui arrivait alors suivi d'un nombreux cortège.

— Un homme venait de s'évanouir sur une banquette, le premier valet qui passait par là le prit dans ses bras et l'emmena hors de la salle.

Personne ne s'informa de cet homme.

— C'était Garcia.

IV

Quelques archers rangés en ordre dans la cour attendaient l'arrivée des seigneurs pour partir - Car leurs chevaux étaient impatients et ils piaffaient tous désireux qu'ils étaient de courir dans la plaine. - Les chiens que chaque cavalier tenait en laisse aboyaient autour d'eux en leur mordant les jambes et déjà plus d'un juron, plus d'un coup de cravache avaient calmé l'ardeur de quelques-uns.

Le duc et sa famille étaient prêts et n'attendaient plus que quelques dames et le bon docteur Roderigo qui arriva monté sur une superbe mule noire. La grande porte s'ouvrit et l'on se mit en route, les hommes montés sur des chevaux, et la carabine sur l'épaule et le couteau de chasse au côté gauche.

Quant aux dames elles suivaient par-derrière montées sur des haquenées et le faucon au poing.

Cosme et le Cardinal ouvraient la marche, en passant sous la porte la jument de ce dernier eut peur de la toque rouge d'une des sentinelles et fit un bond qui faillit renverser son cavalier.

— Mauvais présage, grommela le duc.

— Bah est-ce que vous croyez à ces niaiseries-là, vous plaisantez sans doute, dit Roderigo. Cosme se tut et enfonça l'éperon dans le flanc de son cheval qui partit au trot - On le suivit.

Le bruit des chevaux sur le pavé et celui des épées qui battaient sur la selle firent mettre tous les habitants aux fenêtres pour voir passer le cortège de Monseigneur le duc Cosme II de Médicis qui allait à la chasse avec son fils le Cardinal.

Arrivée sur une grande place la compagnie se divisa en trois bandes différentes. Le premier piqueur donna du cor et les cavaliers partirent au galop dans les rues de Florence.

Cosme était avec Roderigo, Garcia avec François et Bellamonte avec les dames et les archers devait forcer le gibier.

Le temps était sombre et disposé à l'orage. L'air était étouffant et les chevaux étaient déjà blancs d'écume.

Il fait beau dans les bois, on y respire un air frais et pur. Alors on était en plein midi et chacun éprouvait la douce sensation que procure l'ombrage lorsque l'on voit au loin passer quelque rayon du soleil à travers les branches. Car il faut vous dire que l'on était alors dans la forêt.

Garcia vêtu de noir, sombre et pensif, avait suivi machinalement son frère qui s'était écarté pour aller à la piste du cerf dont il venait tout à l'heure de perdre les traces. Ils se trouvèrent bientôt isolés et seuls dans un endroit où le bois devenant de plus en plus épais, il leur fut impossible d'avancer. Ils s'arrêtèrent, descendirent de cheval et s'assirent sur l'herbe.

— Te voilà donc Cardinal, dit vivement Garcia qui jusqu'alors avait été silencieux et triste. Ah te voilà Cardinal, il tira son épée. Un Cardinal, et il rit de son rire forcé et éclatant dont le timbre avait quelque chose de cruel et de féroce - — Cela t'étonne Garcia ?

— Oh non, te souviens-tu de la prédiction de Beatricia ?

— Oui, eh bien ?

— Te souviens-tu de sa chambre où il y avait des cheveux d'exécutés et des crânes humains - te souvient-il de ses longs cheveux blancs ? N'est-ce pas hein mon Cardinal, n'est-ce pas que cette femme avait quelque chose de satanique dans sa personne et d'inférieur dans son regard ? - Et ses yeux brillaient avec une expression qui fit frémir François.

— Où veux-tu en venir avec cette femme ?

— Te souvient-il de sa prédiction ? - te souvient-il qu'elle t'avait dit que tes projets réussiraient ? Oui n'est-ce pas ? tu vois que j'ai la mémoire bonne quoiqu'il y ait deux jours et que ces deux jours aient été pour moi aussi longs que des siècles. Ah il y a dans la vie des jours qui laissent le soir plus d'une ride au front. Et des larmes roulaient dans ses yeux.

— Tu m'ennuies Garcia, lui dit brusquement son frère.

— Je t'ennuie. Ah. Eh bien tes projets ont réussi. La prédiction s'est accomplie, mais oublies-tu qu'elle avait dit que le cancer de la jalousie et de la rage m'abîmerait l'âme ? oublies-tu qu'elle avait dit que le sang serait mon breuvage et un crime la joie de ma vie ? oublies-tu cela ? - Va sa prédiction est juste. Vois-tu la trace des larmes que j'ai versées depuis deux jours ? Vois-tu les places de ma tête où manquent les cheveux ? Vois-tu les marques rouges de mes joues ? Vois-tu comme ma voix est cassée et affaiblie ? Car j'ai arraché mes cheveux de colère, je me suis déchiré le visage avec les ongles et j'ai passé les nuits à crier de rage et de désespoir.

Il sanglotait et on eût dit que le sang allait sortir de ses veines.

— Tu es fou Garcia, dit le Cardinal en se levant effrayé.

— Fou. Ah oui fou. Assassin peut-être. Écoute, Monseigneur le Cardinal François nommé par le pape. Écoute notre vie c'était un duel terrible à mort mais un duel à outrage dont le récit fait frémir d'horreur, tu as eu l'avantage jusqu'alors, la société t'a protégé. Tout est juste et bien fait - Tu m'as supplicié toute ma vie, je t'égorge maintenant, - et il l'avait renversé d'un bras furieux et tenait son épée sur sa poitrine.

— Oh pardon, pardon Garcia, disait François d'une voix tremblante - que t'ai-je fait ?

— Ce que tu m'as fait tiens ?

Et il lui cracha au visage.

— Je te rends injure pour injure, mépris pour mépris, tu es Cardinal j'insulte ta dignité de Cardinal, tu es beau, fort et puissant j'insulte ta force, ta beauté et ta puissance. Car je te tiens sous moi, tu palpites de crainte sous mon genou. Ah tu trembles. Tremble donc et souffre comme j'ai tremblé et souffert. Tu ne savais pas toi dont la sagesse est si vantée combien un homme ressemble au démon quand l'injustice l'a rendu bête féroce. Ah je souffre de te voir vivre tiens.

.....

Et un cri perçant partit de dessous le feuillage et fit envoler un nid de chouettes.

Garcia remonta sur son cheval et partit au galop. Il avait des taches de sang sur sa fraise de dentelles.

Les bons habitants de Florence furent réveillés vers minuit par un grand bruit de chevaux et de cavaliers qui traversaient les rues avec des torches et des flambeaux.

C'était monseigneur le duc qui revenait de la chasse.

Plus loin suivaient silencieusement quatre valets portant une litière, ils avaient l'air de vouloir passer inaperçus et ils marchaient à petits pas. À côté d'eux il y avait un homme qui paraissait leur chef. Il était triste, enveloppé dans son manteau et la tête baissée sur sa poitrine, il semblait vouloir comprimer des larmes.

Quand on arriva au château du duc une femme courut au-devant des chasseurs en demandant où était le Cardinal. Quand elle aperçut la litière elle demanda au duc son mari :

— Qu'y a-t-il là-dedans ?

L'homme au manteau lança à Garcia un regard sévère et froid puis hésitant quelques secondes il dit avec un accent qui faisait mal à entendre :

— Un cadavre -

Un demi-jour éclairait l'appartement et les rideaux bien fermés n'y laissaient entrer qu'une lumière douce et paisible.

Un homme s'y promenait à grands pas. C'était un vieillard. Il paraissait [avoir] des pensées qui lui remuaient fortement l'âme, tantôt il allait à sa table et y prenait une épée nue qu'il examinait avec répugnance, tantôt il allait vers le fond où était tendu un large rideau noir autour duquel venaient bourdonner les mouches. Il faisait frais dans cette chambre et l'on y sentait même quelque chose d'humide et de sépulcral semblable à l'odeur d'un amphithéâtre de dissection.

Enfin il s'arrêta tout à coup et frappant du pied avec colère : - Oh Oui - Oui que justice se fasse - il le faut. - Le sang du juste crie vengeance vers nous - Eh bien vengeance. Et il ordonna à un de ses valets d'appeler Garcia.

Celui-ci arriva bientôt, ses lèvres étaient blanches et ridées comme quelqu'un qui sort d'un accès de fièvre et ses cheveux noirs rejetés en arrière laissaient voir un front pâle où la malédiction de Dieu semblait empreinte.

— Vous m’avez demandé mon père ? dit-il en [entrant].

— Oui. Ah tu es déjà en toilette, tu as changé d’habits. Ce ne sont pas ceux que tu portais hier. Les taches se font bien voir sur un vêtement noir n’est-ce pas, Garcia ? Tes doigts sont humides. - Oh tu as bien lavé tes mains, tu t’es parfumé les cheveux.

— Mais pourquoi ces questions mon père ?

— Pourquoi ? Ah.

Garcia mon fils - N’est-ce pas sur mon honneur que la chasse est un royal plaisir mais quelquefois on oublie son gibier et s’il ne se trouvait pas quelqu’un assez complaisant pour le ramasser...

Il prit son épée et amenant Garcia au fond de la salle, il ouvrit le rideau de la main gauche et détournant les yeux - Vois et contemple !!!

Étendu sur un lit le cadavre était nu, et le sang suintait encore de ses blessures. Sa figure était horriblement contractée, ses yeux étaient ouverts et tournés du côté de Garcia - Et ce regard morne et terne de cadavre lui fit claquer des dents. Sa bouche était entr’ouverte et quelques mouches à viande venaient bourdonner jusque sur ses dents, il y en avait alors cinq ou six qui restèrent collées dans du sang figé qu’il avait sur la joue puis il y avait ce teint livide de la peau, cette blancheur des ongles et quelques meurtrissures sur les bras et les genoux.

Garcia resta muet de stupeur et d’étonnement. - Il tomba à genoux, froid et immobile comme le cadavre du Cardinal. Quelque chose siffla dans l’air.

L’on entendit le bruit d’un corps pesant qui tombait sur le parquet et un râle horrible, un râle forcené, un râle d’enfer retentit sous les voûtes.

Florence était en deuil - ses enfants mouraient par la peste. Depuis un mois elle régnait en souveraine dans la ville mais depuis deux jours surtout sa fureur avait augmenté. Le peuple mourait en maudissant Dieu et ses ministres, il blasphémait dans son délire et sur son lit d’angoisse et de douleur, s’il lui restait un mot à dire c’était une malédiction. Et puisqu’il était sûr de sa fin prochaine il se vautrait en riant stupidement dans la débauche et dans toute la boue du vice.

C'est qu'il est dans l'existence d'un homme de tels malheurs, des douleurs si vives, des désespoirs si poignants que l'on abandonne pour le plaisir d'insulter celui qui nous fait souffrir et que l'on jette avec mépris sa dignité d'homme comme un masque de théâtre. - Et l'on se livre à ce que la débauche a de plus sale, le vice de plus dégradant, on expire en buvant et au son de la musique.

C'est l'exécuté qui s'enivre avant son supplice.

C'est alors que les philosophes devraient considérer l'homme quand ils parlent de sa dignité et de l'esprit des masses.

Un événement important était pourtant venu distraire Florence plongée au milieu de ses cris de désespoir, et de ses prières, de ses vœux ridicules.

C'était la mort des deux fils de Cosme de Médicis que le fléau n'avait pas plus épargnés que le dernier laquais du dernier bourgeois.

C'était ce jour-là qu'on fêtait leurs obsèques et le peuple pour un instant s'était soulevé de son matelas, avait ouvert sa fenêtre de ses mains défaillantes et moites de sueur pour avoir la joie de contempler deux grands seigneurs que l'on portait en terre.

Le convoi passait triste et recueilli dans son deuil pompeux, au milieu de Florence.

Les corps de Garcia et de François étaient étendus sur des brancards tirés par des mules noires.

Tout était calme et paisible et l'on n'entendait que le pas lent des mules sur le pavé, le bruit du brancard dont les timons craquaient à chaque mouvement puis les chants [de] mort qui gémissaient à l'entour de ces deux cadavres puis dans le lointain de divers côtés on entendait comme un chant de tristesse le glas funèbre de la cloche qui gémissait de sa forte voix d'airain.

À côté des brancards marchaient le docteur Roderigo, le duc de Bellamonte, le comte de Salfieri.

— Est-il possible, dit ce dernier en s'adressant au médecin, est-il possible qu'un homme tué de la peste ait de si larges balafres ? Et il lui montrait les blessures de Garcia.

— Oui quelquefois. Ce sont des ventouses, et l'on n'entendait que le chant des morts et le glas funèbre des cloches qui gémissaient par les airs.

CONTE.

Dans une rue étroite et sans soleil de Barcelone vivait, il y a peu de temps, un de ces hommes au front pâle, à l'œil terne, creux, un de ces êtres sataniques et bizarres tels qu'Hoffmann en déterrerait dans ses songes.

C'était Giacomo le libraire.

Il avait trente ans et il passait déjà pour vieux et usé ; sa taille était haute, mais courbée comme celle d'un vieillard ; ses cheveux étaient longs, mais blancs ; ses mains étaient fortes et nerveuses, mais desséchées et couvertes de rides ; son costume était misérable et déguenillé, il avait l'air gauche et embarrassé, sa physionomie était pâle, triste, laide, et même insignifiante. On le voyait rarement dans les rues, si ce n'est les jours où l'on vendait à l'enchère des livres rares et curieux. Alors, ce n'était plus le même homme indolent et ridicule, ses yeux s'animaient, il courait, il marchait, il trépignait, il avait peine à modérer sa joie, ses inquiétudes, ses angoisses et ses douleurs ; il revenait chez lui haletant, essoufflé, hors d'haleine, il prenait le livre chéri, le couvrait des yeux, et le regardait et l'aimait comme un avaré son trésor, un père sa fille, un roi sa couronne.

Cet homme n'avait jamais parlé à personne, si ce n'est aux bouquinistes et aux brocanteurs ; il était taciturne et rêveur, sombre et triste ; il n'avait qu'une idée, qu'un amour, qu'une passion : les livres ; et cet amour, cette passion le brûlaient intérieurement, lui usaient ses jours, lui dévoraient son existence.

Souvent, la nuit, les voisins voyaient, à travers les vitres du libraire, une lumière qui vacillait, puis elle s'avancait, s'éloignait, montait, puis quelquefois elle s'éteignait ; alors ils entendaient frapper à leur porte et c'était Giacomo qui venait rallumer sa bougie qu'une rafale avait soufflée.

Ces nuits fiévreuses et brûlantes, il les passait dans ses livres. Il courait dans les magasins, il parcourait les galeries de sa bibliothèque avec extase et ravissement ; puis il s'arrêtait, les cheveux en désordre, les yeux fixes et étincelants, ses mains tremblaient en touchant le bois des rayons ; ils étaient chauds et humides.

Il prenait un livre, en retournait les feuillets, en tâtait le papier, en examinait les dorures, le couvert, les lettres, l'encre, les plis, et l'arrangement des dessins pour le mot finis ; puis il le changeait de place, le mettait dans un rayon plus élevé, et restait des heures entières à en regarder le titre et la forme.

Il allait ensuite vers ses manuscrits, car c'étaient les enfants chéris ; il en prenait un, le plus vieux, le plus usé, le plus sale, il en regardait le parchemin avec amour et bonheur, il en sentait la poussière sainte et vénérable, puis ses narines s'enflaient de joie et d'orgueil, et un sourire venait sur ses lèvres.

Oh ! il était heureux, cet homme, heureux au milieu de toute cette science dont il comprenait à peine la portée morale et la valeur littéraire ; il était heureux, assis entre tous ces livres, promenant les yeux sur les lettres dorées, sur les pages usées, sur le parchemin terni ; il aimait la science comme un aveugle aime le jour.

Non ! ce n'était point la science qu'il aimait, c'était sa forme et son expression ; il aimait un livre, parce que c'était un livre, il aimait son odeur, sa forme, son titre. Ce qu'il aimait dans un manuscrit, c'était sa vieille date illisible, les lettres gothiques bizarres et étranges, les lourdes dorures qui chargeaient ses dessins ; c'étaient ses pages couvertes de poussière, poussière dont il aspirait avec délice le parfum suave et tendre ; c'était ce joli mot finis, entouré de deux Amours, portés sur un ruban, s'appuyant sur une fontaine, gravé sur une tombe ou reposant dans une corbeille entre des roses, les pommes d'or et les bouquets bleus.

Cette passion l'avait absorbé tout entier, il mangeait à peine, il ne dormait plus, mais il rêvait des nuits et des jours entiers à son idée fixe : les livres.

Il rêvait à tout ce que devait avoir de divin, de sublime et de beau une bibliothèque royale, et il rêvait à s'en faire une aussi grande que celle d'un roi. Comme il respirait à son aise, comme il était fier et puissant, lorsqu'il plongeait sa vue dans les immenses galeries où son œil se perdait dans les livres ! il levait la tête ? des livres ! il l'abaissait ? des livres ! à droite, à gauche, encore !

Il passait dans Barcelone pour un homme étrange et infernal, pour un savant ou un sorcier.

Il savait à peine lire.

Personne n'osait lui parler, tant son front était sévère et pâle ; il avait l'air méchant et traître, et pourtant jamais il ne toucha à un enfant pour lui nuire ; il est vrai que jamais il ne fit l'aumône.

Il gardait tout son argent, tout son bien, toutes ses émotions pour ses livres ; il avait été moine, et pour eux il avait abandonné Dieu ; plus tard il leur sacrifia ce que les hommes ont de plus cher après leur Dieu : l'argent ; ensuite il leur donna ce qu'on a de plus cher après l'argent : son âme.

Depuis quelque temps surtout, ses veilles étaient plus longues ; on voyait plus tard sa lampe des nuits qui brûlait sur ses livres, c'est qu'il avait un nouveau trésor : un manuscrit.

Un matin, entra dans sa boutique un jeune étudiant de Salamanque. Il paraissait riche, car deux valets de pied tenaient sa mule à la porte de Giacomo ; il avait une toque de velours rouge, et des bagues brillaient sur ses doigts.

Il n'avait pourtant pas cet air de suffisance et de nullité habituel aux gens qui ont des valets galonnés, de beaux habits et la tête creuse ; non, cet homme était un savant, mais un riche savant, c'est-à-dire un homme qui, à Paris, écrit sur une table d'acajou, a des livres dorés sur tranches, des pantoufles brodées, des curiosités chinoises, une robe de chambre, une pendule en or, un chat qui dort sur un tapis et deux ou trois femmes qui lui font lire ses vers, sa prose et ses contes, qui lui disent : vous avez de l'esprit, et qui ne le trouvent qu'un fat.

Les manières de ce gentilhomme étaient polies ; en entrant il salua le libraire, fit une profonde révérence, et lui dit d'un ton affable :

— N'avez-vous point ici, maître, des manuscrits ?

Le libraire devint embarrassé et répondit en balbutiant :

— Mais, seigneur, qui vous l'a dit ?

— Personne, mais je le suppose.

Et il déposa sur le bureau du libraire une bourse pleine d'or, qu'il fit sonner en souriant ainsi que tout homme qui touche à de l'argent dont il est le possesseur.

— Seigneur, reprit Giacomo, il est vrai que j'en ai, mais je ne les vends pas, je les garde.

— Et pourquoi ? qu'en faites-vous ?

— Pourquoi, monseigneur ? — et il devint rouge de colère — ce que j'en fais ? Oh ! non, vous ignorez ce que c'est qu'un manuscrit !

— Pardon, maître Giacomo, je m'y connais, et pour en donner la preuve, je vous dirai que vous avez ici la Chronique de Turquie !

— Moi ? oh ! on vous a trompé, monseigneur.

— Non, Giacomo, répondit le gentilhomme ; rassurez-vous, je ne veux point vous le voler, mais vous l'acheter.

— Jamais !

— Oh ! vous me le vendrez, répondit l'écolier, car vous l'avez ici, il a été vendu chez Ricciami le jour de sa mort.

— Eh bien, oui, seigneur, je l'ai, c'est mon trésor, c'est ma vie. Oh ! vous ne me l'arracherez pas ! Écoutez ! je vais vous confier un secret : Baptisto, vous savez Baptisto, le libraire qui demeure sur la place Royale, mon rival et mon ennemi, eh bien, il ne l'a pas, lui, et moi je l'ai !

— Combien l'estimez-vous ?

Giacomo s'arrêta longtemps et répondit d'un air fier :

— Deux cents pistoles, monseigneur.

Il regarda le jeune homme d'un air triomphant ayant l'air de lui dire : vous allez vous en aller, c'est trop cher, et pourtant je ne le donnerai pas à moins.

Il se trompa, car celui-ci lui montrant la bourse :

— En voilà trois cents, dit-il.

Giacomo pâlit, il fut près de s'évanouir.

— Trois cents pistoles ? répéta-t-il, mais je suis un fou, monseigneur, je ne le vendrai pas pour quatre cents.

L'étudiant se mit à rire en fouillant dans sa poche, dont il tira deux autres bourses.

— Eh bien, Giacomo, en voilà cinq cents. Oh ! non, tu ne veux pas le vendre, Giacomo ? mais je l'aurai, je l'aurai aujourd'hui, à l'instant, il me le faut, dussé-je vendre cette bague donnée dans un baiser d'amour, dussé-je vendre mon épée garnie de diamants, mes hôtels et mes palais, dussé-je vendre mon âme ; il me faut ce livre, oui, il me le faut à toute force, à tout prix ; dans huit jours je soutiens une thèse à Salamanque, il me faut ce livre pour être docteur, il me faut être docteur pour être archevêque, il me faut la pourpre sur les épaules pour avoir la tiare au front.

Giacomo s'approcha de lui et le regarda avec admiration et respect comme le seul homme qu'il ait compris.

— Écoute, Giacomo, interrompit le gentilhomme, je vais te dire un secret qui va faire ta fortune et ton bonheur : ici il y a un homme, cet homme demeure à la barrière des Arabes, il a un livre, c'est le Mystère de saint Michel.

— Le Mystère de saint Michel ? dit Giacomo en poussant un cri de joie, oh ! merci, vous m'avez sauvé la vie.

— Vite ! donne-moi la Chronique de Turquie.

Giacomo courut vers un rayon ; là, il s'arrêta tout à coup, s'efforça de pâler, et dit d'un air étonné :

— Mais, monseigneur, je ne l'ai pas.

— Oh ! Giacomo, tes ruses sont bien grossières et tes regards trahissent tes paroles.

— Oh ! monseigneur, je vous jure, je ne l'ai pas.

— Mais tu es un vieux fou, Giacomo ; tiens, voilà six cents pistoles.

Giacomo prit le manuscrit et le donna au jeune homme :

— Prenez-en soin, dit-il, lorsque celui-ci s'éloignait en riant et disait à ses valets en montant sur sa mule :

— Vous savez que votre maître est un fou, mais il vient de tromper un imbécile. L'idiot de moine bourru ! répéta-t-il en riant, il croit que je vais être pape !

Et le pauvre Giacomo restait triste et désespéré, appuyant son front brûlant sur les carreaux de sa boutique, en pleurant de rage et regardant avec peine et douleur son manuscrit, objet de ses soins et de ses affections, que portaient les grossiers valets du gentilhomme.

— Oh ! sois maudit ! homme de l'enfer ! sois maudit, maudit cent fois, toi qui m'as volé tout ce que j'aimais sur la terre. Oh ! je ne pourrai vivre maintenant ! je sais qu'il m'a trompé, l'infâme, il m'a trompé. S'il en était ainsi, oh ! je me vengerai ! Courons vite à la barrière des Arabes. Si cet homme allait me demander une somme que je n'ai pas ? que faire alors ? Oh ! c'est à en mourir !

Il prend l'argent que l'étudiant avait laissé sur son bureau et sortit en courant.

Pendant qu'il allait par les rues, il ne voyait rien de tout ce qui l'entourait, tout passait devant lui comme une fantasmagorie dont il ne comprenait pas l'énigme, il n'entendait ni la marche des passants ni le bruit des roues sur le pavé ; il ne pensait, il ne rêvait, il ne voyait qu'une chose : les livres. Il pensait au Mystère de saint Michel, il se le créait dans son imagination, large et mince avec un parchemin, orné de lettres d'or, il tâchait de deviner le nombre des pages qu'il devait contenir ; son cœur battait avec violence comme celui d'un homme qui attend son arrêt de mort.

Enfin il arriva.

L'étudiant ne l'avait pas trompé ! !

Sur un vieux tapis de Perse tout troué étaient étendus par terre une dizaine de livres. Giacomo, sans parler à l'homme qui dormait à côté, couché comme ses livres, et ronflait au soleil, tomba à genoux, se mit à parcourir d'un œil inquiet et soucieux dans les dos de livres, puis il se leva, pâle et abattu, et éveilla le bouquiniste en criant, et lui demanda :

— Eh l'ami, n'avez-vous pas ici le Mystère de saint Michel ?

— Quoi ! dit le marchand en ouvrant les yeux, ne voulez-vous pas parler d'un livre que j'ai ? regardez !

— L'imbécile ! dit Giacomo en frappant du pied, en as-tu d'autres que ceux-là ?

— Oui, tenez, les voici.

Et il lui montra un petit paquet de brochures liées avec des cordes. Giacomo les rompit, en lut le titre en une seconde.

— Enfer ! dit-il, ce n'est pas cela. Ne l'as-tu pas vendu par hasard ? Oh ! si tu le possèdes, donne, donne ; cent pistoles, deux cents, tout ce que tu voudras.

Le bouquiniste le regardant étonné :

— Oh ! vous voulez peut-être parler d'un petit livre que j'ai donné hier, pour huit maravédis, au curé de la cathédrale d'Oviedo ?

— Te souviens-tu du titre de ce livre ?

— Non.

— N'était-ce pas : Mystère de saint Michel ?

— Oui, c'est cela.

Giacomo s'écarta à quelques pas de là et tomba sur la poussière comme un homme fatigué d'une apparition qui l'obsède.

Quand il revint à lui, il faisait soir et le soleil qui rougissait à l'horizon était à son déclin. Il se leva et rentra chez lui, malade et désespéré.

Huit jours après, Giacomo n'avait pas oublié sa triste déception, et sa blessure était encore vive et saignante ; il n'avait point dormi depuis trois nuits, car ce jour-là devait se vendre le premier livre qui ait été imprimé en Espagne, exemplaire unique dans le royaume. Il y avait longtemps qu'il avait envie de l'avoir ; aussi fut-il heureux, le jour qu'on lui annonça que le propriétaire était mort.

Mais une inquiétude lui tenait à l'âme : Baptisto pourrait l'acheter, Baptisto, qui, depuis quelque temps, lui enlevait, non les chalands, peu lui importait ! mais tout ce qui paraissait de rare et de vieux, Baptisto dont il haïssait la renommée d'une haine d'artiste. Cet homme lui devenait à charge, c'était toujours lui qui enlevait les manuscrits ; aux ventes publiques, il enchérissait et il obtenait. Oh ! que de fois le pauvre moine, dans ses rêves d'ambition et d'orgueil, que de fois il vit venir à lui la longue main de Baptisto, qui passait à travers la foule comme aux jours de vente, pour venir lui enlever un trésor qu'il avait rêvé si longtemps, qu'il avait convoité avec tant d'amour et d'égoïsme ! Que de fois aussi il fut tenté de finir avec un crime ce que ni l'argent ni la patience n'avait pu faire ; mais il refoulait cette idée dans son cœur, tâchait de s'étourdir sur la haine qu'il portait à cet homme, et s'endormait sur ses livres.

Dès le matin, il fut devant la maison dans laquelle la vente allait avoir lieu ; il y fut avant le commissaire, avant le public, et avant le soleil.

Aussitôt que les portes s'en ouvrirent, il se précipita dans l'escalier, monta dans la salle et demanda ce livre. On le lui montra ; c'était déjà un bonheur.

Oh ! jamais il n'en avait vu de si beau et qui lui complût davantage. C'était une bible latine, avec des commentaires grecs ; il la regarda et l'admira plus que tous les autres, il le serrait entre ses doigts en riant amèrement, comme un homme qui se meurt de faim et qui voit de l'or.

Jamais, non plus, il n'avait tant désiré. Oh ! qu'il eût voulu alors, même au prix de tout ce qu'il avait, de ses livres, de ses manuscrits, de ses six cents pistoles, au prix de son sang, oh ! qu'il eût voulu avoir ce livre ! Vendre tout, tout pour avoir ce livre ; n'avoir que lui, mais l'avoir à lui ; pouvoir le montrer à toute l'Espagne, avec un rire d'insulte et de pitié pour le roi, pour les princes, pour les savants, pour Baptisto, et dire : À moi ! à moi ce livre ! — et le tenir dans ses deux mains toute sa vie, le palper comme il le touche, le sentir comme il le sent, et le posséder comme il le regarde !

Enfin l'heure arriva. Baptisto était au milieu, le visage serein, l'air calme et paisible. On arriva au livre, Giacomo offrit d'abord vingt pistoles, Baptisto se tut et ne regarda pas la bible. Déjà le moine avançait la main pour saisir ce livre, qui lui avait coûté si peu de peines et d'angoisses, quand Baptisto se mit à dire : quarante. Giacomo vit avec horreur son antagoniste qui s'enflammait à mesure que le prix montait plus haut.

— Cinquante ! cria-t-il de toutes ses forces.

— Soixante ! répondit Baptisto.

— Cent.

— Quatre cents.

— Cinq cents, ajouta le moine avec regret.

Et tandis qu'il trépignait d'impatience et de colère, Baptisto affectait un calme ironique et méchant. Déjà la voix aiguë et cassée de l'huissier avait répété trois fois : cinq cents, déjà Giacomo se rattachait au bonheur ; un souffle échappé des lèvres d'un homme vint le faire évanouir, car le libraire de la place Royale se pressant dans la foule, se mit à dire : six cents. La voix de l'huissier répéta six cents quatre fois, et aucune autre voix ne lui répondit ; seulement on voyait, à un des bouts de la table, un homme au front pâle, aux mains tremblantes, un homme qui riait amèrement de ce rire des damnés du Dante ; il baissait la tête, la main dans sa poitrine, et quand il la retira, elle était chaude et mouillée, car il avait de la chair et du sang au bout des ongles.

On se passa le livre de main en main pour le faire parvenir à Baptisto ; le livre passa devant Giacomo, il en sentit l'odeur, il le vit courir un instant devant ses yeux, puis s'arrêter à un homme qui le prit et l'ouvrit en riant. Alors le moine baissa la tête pour cacher son visage, car il pleurait.

En retournant par les rues, sa démarche était lente et pénible, il avait sa figure étrange et stupide, sa tournure grotesque et ridicule ; il avait l'air d'un homme enivré, car il chancelait ; ses yeux étaient à moitié fermés, il avait les paupières rouges et brûlantes ; la sueur coulait sur son front, et il balbutiait entre ses dents, comme un homme qui a trop bu et qui a pris trop de sa part au banquet de la fête.

Sa pensée n'était plus à lui, elle errait comme son corps, sans avoir de but ni d'intention ; elle était chancelante, irrésolue, lourde et bizarre ; sa tête lui pesait comme du plomb, son front le brûlait comme un brasier.

Oui, il était ivre de ce qu'il avait senti, il était fatigué de ses jours, il était soûl de l'existence.

Ce jour-la — c'était un dimanche — le peuple se promenait dans les rues en causant et en chantant. Le pauvre moine écouta leurs causeries et leurs chants ; il ramassa dans la route quelques bribes de phrases, quelques mots, quelques cris, mais il lui semblait que c'était toujours le même son, la même voix, c'était un brouhaha vague, confus, une musique bizarre et bruyante qui bourdonnait dans son cerveau et l'accablait.

— Tiens, disait un homme à son voisin, as-tu entendu parler de l'histoire de ce pauvre curé d'Oviedo, qui fut trouvé étranglé dans son lit ?

Ici c'était un groupe de femmes qui prenaient le frais du soir sur leurs portes ; voici ce qu'entendait Giacomo en passant devant elles :

— Dites donc, Martha, savez-vous qu'il y a eu, à Salamanque, un jeune riche, don Bernardo, vous savez ? celui qui, lorsqu'il vint ici il y a quelques jours, avait une mule noire si jolie et si bien équipée, et qui la faisait piaffer sur les pavés ; eh bien, le pauvre jeune homme, on m'a dit ce matin à l'église, qu'il était mort.

— Mort ? dit une jeune fille.

— Oui, petite, répondit la femme ; il est mort ici, à l'auberge de Saint-Pierre ; d'abord il se sentit mal à la tête, enfin il eut la fièvre, et au bout de quatre jours on le porta en terre.

Giacomo en entendit encore d'autres ; tous ces souvenirs le firent trembler, et un sourire de férocité vint errer sur sa bouche.

Le moine rentra chez lui épuisé et malade ; il se coucha par terre sous le banc de son bureau et dormit. Sa poitrine était oppressée, un son rauque et creux sortait de sa gorge ; il s'éveilla avec la fièvre ; un horrible cauchemar avait épuisé ses forces.

Il faisait nuit alors, et onze heures venaient de sonner à l'église voisine. Giacomo entendit des cris : "Au feu ! au feu". Il ouvrit ses vitres, alla dans les rues et vit en effet des flammes qui s'élevaient au delà des toits ; il rentra chez lui et il allait reprendre sa lampe pour aller dans ses magasins, quand il entendit devant ses fenêtres, des hommes qui passaient en courant et qui disaient : "C'est sur la place Royale, le feu est chez Baptisto".

Le moine tressaillit, un rire éclatant partit du fond de son cœur, et il se dirigea avec la foule vers la maison du libraire.

La maison était en feu, les flammes s'élevaient, hautes et terribles, et, chassées par les vents, elles s'élançaient vers le beau ciel bleu d'Espagne, qui planait sur Barcelone agitée et tumultueuse, comme un voile sur des larmes.

On voyait un homme à moitié nu, il se désespérait, s'arrachait les cheveux, se roulait par terre en blasphémant Dieu et en poussant des cris de rage et de désespoir, c'était Baptisto.

Le moine contemplait son désespoir et ses cris avec calme et bonheur, avec ce rire féroce de l'enfant riant des tortures du papillon dont il a arraché les ailes.

On voyait, dans un appartement élevé, des flammes qui brûlaient quelques liasses de papiers.

Giacomo prit une échelle, l'appuya contre la muraille noircie et chancelante, l'échelle tremblait sous ses pas, il monta en courant, arriva à cette fenêtre. Malédiction ! ce n'était que quelques vieux livres de librairie, sans valeur, ni mérite. Que faire ? il était entré, il fallait ou avancer au milieu de cette atmosphère enflammée ou redescendre par l'échelle dont le bois commençait à s'échauffer. Non ! il avança.

Il traversa plusieurs salles, le plancher tremblait sous ses pas, les portes tombaient lorsqu'il en approchait, les solives se pendaient sur sa tête, il courait au milieu de l'incendie, haletant et furieux.

Il lui fallait ce livre ! il le lui fallait ou la mort !

Il ne savait où diriger sa course, mais il courait.

Enfin il arriva devant une cloison qui était intacte, il la brisa avec un coup de pied et vit un appartement obscur et étroit ; il tâtonnait, sentit quelques livres sous ses doigts, il en toucha un, le prit et l'emporta hors de cette salle. C'était lui ! lui, le Mystère de saint Michel ! Il retourna sur ses pas, comme un homme éperdu et en délire, il sauta par-dessus les trous, il volait dans la flamme, mais il ne retrouva point l'échelle qu'il avait dressée contre le mur ; il arriva à une fenêtre et descendit en dehors, se cramponnant avec les mains et les genoux aux sinuosités, ses vêtements commençant à s'enflammer, et, lorsqu'il arriva dans la rue, il se roula dans le ruisseau pour éteindre les flammes qui le brûlaient.

Quelques mois se passèrent, et l'on n'entendait plus parler du libraire Giacomo, si ce n'est comme un de ces hommes singuliers et étranges, dont la multitude rit dans les rues parce qu'elle ne comprend point leurs passions et leurs manies.

L'Espagne était occupée d'intérêts plus graves et plus sérieux. Un mauvais génie semblait peser sur elle ; chaque jour, de nouveaux meurtres et de nouveaux crimes, et tout cela paraissait venir d'une main invisible et cachée ; c'était un poignard suspendu sur chaque toit et sur chaque famille ; c'était des gens qui disparaissaient tout à coup sans qu'on ait aucune trace du sang que leur blessure avait répandu ; un homme partait pour un voyage, il ne revenait plus ; on ne savait à qui attribuer cet horrible fléau, car il faut attribuer le malheur à quelqu'un d'étranger, mais le bonheur à soi.

En effet, il est des jours si néfastes dans la vie, des époques si funestes pour les hommes, que, ne sachant qui accabler de ses malédictions, on crie vers le ciel ; c'est dans ces époques malheureuses pour les peuples que l'on croit à la fatalité.

Une police vive et empressée avait tâché, il est vrai, de découvrir l'auteur de tous ces forfaits, l'espion soudoyé s'était introduit dans toutes les maisons, avait écouté toutes les paroles, entendu tous les cris, vu tous les regards, et il n'avait rien appris.

Le Procureur avait ouvert toutes les lettres, brisé tous les cachets, fouillé dans tous les coins, et il n'avait rien trouvé.

Un matin pourtant, Barcelone avait quitté sa robe de deuil pour aller s'entasser dans les salles de la Justice où l'on allait condamner à mort celui que l'on supposait être l'auteur de tous ces horribles meurtres. Le peuple cachait ses larmes dans un rire convulsif, car lorsqu'on souffre et qu'on pleure c'est une consolation bien égoïste, il est vrai, mais enfin, celle de voir d'autres souffrances et d'autres larmes.

Le pauvre Giacomo, si calme et si paisible, était accusé d'avoir brûlé la maison de Baptisto, d'avoir volé sa Bible ; il était chargé encore de mille autres accusations.

Il était donc là, assis sur les bancs des meurtriers et des brigands, lui, l'honnête bibliophile ; le pauvre Giacomo, qui ne pensait qu'à ses livres, était donc compromis dans les mystères de meurtre et d'échafaud.

La salle regorgeait de peuple. Enfin le Procureur se leva et lut son rapport ; il était long et diffus, à peine si on pouvait en distinguer l'action principale des parenthèses et des réflexions. Le Procureur disait qu'il avait trouvé dans la maison de Giacomo la Bible qui appartenait à Baptisto, puisque cette Bible était la seule en Espagne ; or il était probable que c'était Giacomo qui avait mis le feu à la maison de Baptisto pour s'emparer de ce livre rare et précieux. Il se tut et se rassit essoufflé.

Quant au moine, il était calme et paisible et ne répondit pas même par un regard à la multitude qui l'insultait.

Son avocat se leva, il parla longtemps et bien ; enfin quand il crut avoir ébranlé son auditoire, il souleva sa robe et en tira un livre, il l'ouvrit et le montra au public. C'était un autre exemplaire de cette Bible.

Giacomo poussa un cri, et tomba sur son banc en s'arrachant les cheveux. Le moment était critique, on attendait une parole de l'accusé, mais aucun son ne sortit de sa bouche ; enfin il se rassit, regarda ses juges et son avocat comme un homme qui s'éveille.

On lui demanda s'il était coupable d'avoir mis le feu chez Baptisto.

— Non, hélas ! répondit-il.

— Non ?

— Mais allez-vous me condamner ? Oh ! condamnez-moi, je vous en prie ! la vie m'est à charge, mon avocat vous a menti, ne le croyez pas. Oh ! condamnez-moi, j'ai tué don Bernardo, j'ai tué le curé, j'ai volé le livre, le livre unique, car il n'y en a pas deux en Espagne. Messeigneurs, tuez-moi, je suis un misérable.

Son avocat s'avança vers lui et lui montrant cette Bible :

— Je puis vous sauver, regardez !

Giacomo prit le livre, le regarda.

— Oh ! moi qui croyais que c'était le seul en Espagne ! Oh ! dites-moi, dites-moi que vous m'avez trompé. Malheur sur vous !

Et il tomba évanoui.

Les juges revinrent et prononcèrent son arrêt de mort.

Giacomo l'entendit sans frémir et il parut même plus calme et plus tranquille. On lui fit espérer qu'en demandant sa grâce au pape il l'obtiendrait peut-être, il n'en voulut point, et demanda seulement que sa bibliothèque fût donnée à l'homme qui avait le plus de livres en Espagne.

Puis lorsque le peuple se fut écoulé, il demanda à son avocat d'avoir la bonté de lui prêter son livre ; celui-ci le lui donna.

Giacomo le prit amoureusement, versa quelques larmes sur les feuillets, le déchira avec colère, puis il en jeta les morceaux à la figure de son défenseur, en lui disant :

— Vous en avez menti, monsieur l'avocat ! Je vous disais bien que c'était le seul en Espagne !

RAGE ET IMPUISSANCE .

CONTE MALSAIN
POUR LES NERFS SENSIBLES ET LES ÂMES DÉVOTES.

Dieu n'est qu'un mot rêvé pour expliquer le monde.

Alp. de Lamartine.

Tout dormait calme et paisible dans le village de Mussen. De toutes les lumières qui avaient disparu lentement et les unes après les autres, une seule brillait encore aux vitres de ce bon monsieur Ohmlin, le médecin du pays.

Minuit venait de sonner à la petite église, la pluie tombait par torrents, et la neige, sortie des flancs du mont Pilate, tourbillonnait dans l'air emportée par les rafales de l'avalanche, la grêle résonnait sur les toits.

Cette lumière isolée éclairait une chambre basse, où était assise une femme d'environ soixante et quelques années. Elle était voûtée et couverte de rides, elle cousait, mais la fatigue souvent, surmontant son courage, lui faisait fermer les yeux et pencher la tête ; puis, si quelque coup de vent plus furieux et plus bruyant que tous les autres venait à faire craquer les auvents, si la pluie redoublait de violence, alors elle se réveillait de son assoupissement, tournait ses petits yeux creux sur la chandelle, dont la longue flammèche jetait encore quelque lueur autour d'elle, frissonnait, rapprochait son fauteuil de la cheminée, puis faisait un signe de croix. C'était une de ces bonnes et honnêtes filles qui naissent et meurent dans les familles, qui servent leurs maîtres jusqu'à la mort, prennent soin des enfants et les élèvent.

Celle-ci avait vu naître M. Ohmlin, elle avait été sa nourrice, plus tard sa servante ; aussi tremblait-elle alors pour son pauvre maître, parti dès le matin dans les montagnes et qui n'était point encore de retour ; elle n'osait plus reprendre son ouvrage, se tenait assise près du foyer, les bras croisés, les pieds sur l'âtre et la tête baissée sur ses mains ; elle écoutait avec terreur le vent qui sifflait dans la serrure et hurlait sur la montagne. Triste et pensive, elle tâchait de se rappeler une de ces légendes si terribles et si sanglantes qu'on contait chez elle, jadis, dans sa jeunesse, quand toute la famille, réunie autour du Foyer, écoutait avec plaisir une histoire de meurtre ou de fantôme qui se passait aussi dans les montagnes, par une nuit d'hiver bien sombre et bien froide, au milieu des glaciers, des neiges et des torrents.

C'est dans ces souvenirs d'enfance qu'errait ainsi son imagination, et la vieille Berthe se retraçait ainsi toute sa vie, qui s'était passée monotone et uniforme, dans son village, et qui, dans un cercle si étroit, avait eu aussi ses passions, ses angoisses et ses douleurs.

Mais bientôt elle entendit sur le pavé de la place voisine, avec les aboiements sinistres et lugubres d'un chien, le pas saccadé d'un mulet ; elle tressaillit, se leva de sa chaise en s'écriant : "c'est lui !", puis elle courut à la porte et l'ouvrit. Après quelques instants, un homme parut dans la salle, il était entouré d'un large manteau brun tout blanc de neige, l'eau ruisselait sur ses vêtements.

— Du feu, Berthe, dit-il en entrant, du feu ! je me meurs de froid.

La vieille fille sortit, puis revint au bout de quelques minutes, apportant dans ses bras des copeaux et un fagot qu'elle alluma avec les tisons blanchis qui jetaient encore quelque chaleur dans la cheminée. Aussitôt un feu clair et pétillant éclaira l'appartement, M. Ohmlin retira son manteau, qui laissa voir un homme de taille ordinaire, maigre, mais fort de complexion. Ses joues étaient creuses et pâles, et quand il eut ôté son chapeau, on vit un crâne large et blanc, couvert de peu de cheveux noirs. Il avait l'aspect sérieux et réservé, sa barbe noire lui donnait un aspect triste et sombre, tempéré par un sourire bienveillant qui régnait sur ses lèvres.

Il s'assit, mit ses pieds sur les chenets et caressa un de ces beaux chiens des Alpes assis à ses côtés ; l'animal regardait tristement son maître et lui léchait ses mains humides, rougies par le froid.

— Eh bien, comment ça va-t-il ? dit Berthe en se rapprochant, vos dents ?

— Mal, Berthe, oh ! bien mal ! cet air froid des montagnes me fait souffrir ; il y a quatre nuits que je n'ai fermé l'œil, ce n'est pas cette nuit que je dormirai.

— Ici, Fox ! (c'était le nom du chien favori qui était étendu aux pieds du médecin).

Fox se mit à faire entendre ce son singulier et traînard que Berthe avait entendu lorsqu'il était arrivé avec son maître.

— Tais-toi, Fox, tais-toi !

La pauvre bête se mit à geindre, comme quelqu'un qui souffre ou qui pleure.

— Tais-toi, Fox, poursuivit Berthe, tais-toi !

Et elle le repoussa rudement du pied.

— Pourquoi veux-tu le faire taire ? dit M. Ohmlin, il est de mauvaise humeur ; dame ! c'est tout simple, il est fatigué et il a faim.

— Tiens ! dit Berthe en lui jetant un morceau de pain, qu'elle alla chercher dans une armoire placée à côté de la cheminée, tiens ! Fox vit le pain d'un œil terne et humide, tourna sa belle tête noire vers son maître et le regarda tristement.

— Pauvre bête, dit-il, qu'as-tu ?

— C'est signe de malheur, dit Berthe ; Dieu et saint Maurice nous en préservent !

— Vieille Folle ! il est malade.

— Avez-vous Faim ? Que voulez-vous ?

— Moi, oh ! rien, je vais dormir s'il m'est possible, ou plutôt non, j'ai encore quelques pilules d'opium, je vais en essayer ; adieu, Berthe, éteins le feu et dors bien, ma brave fille. Quant à toi, Fox, à la niche !

Et il ouvrit la porte qui donnait sur la cour. Fox n'obéit point, il se coucha par terre et se traîna aux pieds de M. Ohmlin ; celui-ci, impatienté, le laissa et monta précipitamment dans sa chambre, il se coucha même avec le frisson de la fièvre, avala son opium et s'endormit dans des rêves d'or.

Quant à Berthe, elle dormait profondément et était pourtant réveillée quelquefois par les gémissements plaintifs du pauvre Fox, qui était resté dans l'escalier. La neige avait diminué, les nuages s'étaient évanouis et la lune commençait à se montrer derrière les sommets du mont Pilate.

Le matin, vers les neuf heures, la vieille Berthe s'éveilla, fit sa prière et descendit dans la salle ; la porte n'était point ouverte, elle s'en étonna : "Comme il dort aujourd'hui, le pauvre homme ! se dit-elle, probablement il va bientôt sortir", mais aussitôt maître Bernardo arriva ; c'était un médecin des environs.

— Où est-il ? dit-il en entrant.

— Dans sa chambre, je pense ; allez voir, il dort encore.

Celui-ci monta et entra sans cérémonie en criant :

— Allons ! levez-vous donc ! il est tard. M. Ohmlin ne répondit pas, sa tête était penchée hors de son lit, et ses bras étaient étendus hors de la couche. Bernardo s'en approcha et le remuant avec violence :

— Diable ! il a le sommeil dur !

Mais le corps céda aux mouvements de la main et retomba dans sa position première, comme un cadavre.

Bernardo pâlit, il prit ses mains, elles étaient froides ! il s'approcha de sa bouche, il ne respirait pas ! il mit ses doigts sur sa poitrine, pas un battement !

Il resta pâle et stupéfait, regarda les paupières et les ouvrit, pas un regard ! il ne vit que cet œil terne et à demi fermé qu'ont les morts dans leur sommeil.

Bernardo sortit de la chambre du médecin en courant, Berthe lui demanda ce qu'il avait, il ne répondit pas ; seulement il était pâle et ses lèvres étaient blanches.

Quelques heures après, une douzaine de médecins, tous tristes et calmes, entouraient le lit de leur confrère, et un seul mot errait sur leurs lèvres : il est mort !

Chacun s'approchait du corps inanimé, le retournait dans tous les sens, puis s'écartait avec horreur et dégoût en disant : il est mort !

Un seul d'entre eux osa croire que ce cadavre n'était qu'endormi, et manquant de preuves, il ne put appuyer sa prévision et finit par se rendre à l'avis des autres médecins.

C'était un de ces jours d'hiver tristes et pluvieux, une pluie fine battait dans l'air, et des flocons de neige blanchissaient les rues du village. Ce jour-là il était triste aussi, le village ! son père, son bienfaiteur était mort ! Les maisons étaient fermées, on ne se parlait pas, les enfants ne riaient plus sur la place, les hommes étaient attendris et l'on pleurait.

Le modeste convoi s'avancait vers le cimetière, beau de sa douleur ; quelques hommes, vêtus de noir, portaient le cercueil dont le drap noir se blanchissait de neige ; les enfants aux têtes blondes suivaient par derrière, silencieux et étonnés ; les prêtres chantaient tout bas, car les larmes couvraient leurs voix.

Un ami suivait le mort dans sa tombe, mais celui-là, sa douleur était profonde et triste, plus désespérée et plus certaine que celle de tous ces hommes ; celui-là était-ce une femme ? un enfant ? une maîtresse ? un ami ? Non ! c'était un chien, le pauvre Fox, marchant la tête baissée, suivant son maître avec des cris plaintifs et des larmes aussi grosses que celles d'un homme.

Le cimetière était à mi-côte, le chemin était glissant et boueux, on n'entendait que le pas des prêtres et des hommes dont les gros souliers ferrés s'enfonçaient dans la boue ; puis le chant des morts, la neige qui tombait, la pluie qui roulait dans les ornières et le vent qui agitait le drap du cercueil.

Enfin on creusa la terre, on y déposa le coffre avec quelques prières et pour l'éternité, le fossoyeur jeta dessus quelques pelletées de terre, qui résonnèrent sur le bois de chêne en rendant un son vide et creux.

On se sépara, la grille de fer résonna dans ses gonds, et le cimetière redevint silencieux et paisible.

De tous les amis du convoi, un seul était resté, Fox, couché sur la terre et regardant avec tristesse les bougies vacillantes qui s'éloignaient dans le brouillard, et ces longs vêtements noirs qui s'abaissaient lentement et comme des ombres, dans la vallée brumeuse.

La nuit arriva bientôt, belle et blanche de sa lune, dont la lueur mélancolique s'abattait sur les tombes comme le doute sur le mourant.

M. Ohmlin dormait toujours d'un sommeil lourd et pesant ; il rêvait et c'étaient des songes beaux d'illusions, voluptueux d'amour et d'enchantements. Il rêvait l'Orient ! l'Orient, avec son soleil brûlant, son ciel bleu, ses minarets dorés, ses pagodes de pierre ; l'Orient ! avec sa poésie toute d'amour et d'encens ; l'Orient ! avec ses parfums, ses émeraudes, ses fleurs, ses jardins aux pommes d'or ; l'Orient ! avec ses Fées, ses caravanes dans les sables ; l'Orient ! avec ses sérails, séjour des fraîches voluptés. Il rêvait, l'insensé, des ailes blanches des anges qui chantaient les versets du Coran aux oreilles du Prophète ; il rêvait des lèvres de femmes pures et rosées, il rêvait de grands yeux noirs qui n'avaient d'amour que pour lui, il rêvait cette peau brune et olivâtre des femmes de l'Asie, doux satin qu'effleure si souvent dans ses nuits le poète qui les rêve ; il rêvait tout cela ! Mais le réveil allait venir, morne, impitoyable, comme la réalité qu'il apporte.

Il rêvait l'amour dans une tombe ! mais le rêve s'efface, et la tombe reste.

Il ouvre les yeux, se sent entouré dans de longs plis, il s'en dégage, palpe de ses mains tremblantes le bois qui l'entoure, sur sa tête, sur les côtés, partout, partout... Il se tâte lui-même, se sent nu. Oh ! c'est un songe, un songe horrible, infernal, un cauchemar ! Arrière toute idée d'éternité, lui qui veut s'accrocher à la vie !

Mais l'éternité est là, couchée avec toi, dans son lit de noces, t'attirant vers elle, riant derrière ta tête avec une grimace de démon.

Il a peur, peur de ce squelette hideux, dont il lui semble palper les os sur sa poitrine. Oh ! non ! c'est impossible !

Et il voulut se rendormir, oublier tout cela, s'étourdir sur la réalité, effacer de sa pensée cette masse de plomb qui pesait sur sa tête et se bercer dans d'autres rêves.

Non ! il avait trop rêvé. Ah ! d'autres rêves maintenant ? rêve l'éternité si tu veux. Eh bien, l'Orient ? maintenant rêve donc l'Orient dans ta tombe, dans une pensée de volupté et dans des rêves dorés ! Non ! non ! l'agonie et les rêves d'enfer, l'agonie qui s'arrache les cheveux, se tord de désespoir, appelle Satan et maudit Dieu !

Pourtant sa première terreur fut muette et calme, c'était un étonnement étrange et stupide, une stupeur d'idiot. "Oh ! non, non, se disait-il, voulant se faire illusion, non ! cela est impossible ! Oh ! non, mourir ainsi dans une tombe, mourir de désespoir et de faim, oh ! ce serait affreux !", et il touchait tout ce qui l'entourait. "Mais je suis un fou ! je rêve ! Ce bois ? eh bien, c'est ma couche ; ce linge ? mon drap... mais un enfer ! une tombe ! un linceul.", et il poussa un de ces rires amers qui eût retenti bien fort s'il n'eût pas éclaté dans une tombe.

Et puis il avait froid, il se sentait nu, et l'humidité du sépulcre humectait sa peau ; il tremblait, ses dents claquaient, la fièvre battait dans ses artères ; il se sentit piqué au doigt, le porta à ses yeux, il ne vit rien, il faisait si noir ! à ses lèvres, il sentit l'odeur du sang ; il s'était écorché à un clou de sa tombe.

"Mourir ! mourir ainsi, sans secours, sans pitié ! Oh ! non ! je sortirai de cet enfer, je sortirai de cette tombe. Cela ne s'est jamais vu, c'est à devenir fou avant de mourir de désespoir... Et oui, je vais mourir... Oh ! mourir ! ne plus rien voir de tout ce qui se passe sur cette terre ; la nature, les champs, le ciel, les montagnes, tout cela, je vais le quitter, je les ai quittés pour toujours !" et il se tordait dans sa tombe comme le serpent sous les griffes du tigre.

Il pleurait de rage, il s'arrachait les cheveux, criait après la vie, lui, si plein de force et de santé.

Que de larmes il versa sur ses mains ! que de cris il jeta dans sa tombe ! que de coups de colère dont il frappa son cercueil ! Il prit son linceul, le déchira avec ses ongles, le mit en pièces avec ses dents ; il lui fallait quelque chose à broyer, à anéantir sous ses mains, lui qui se sentait si impitoyablement écrasé sous celles de la fatalité. Enfin il s'arrêta dans son désespoir, s'étendit sur sa planche, ferma les yeux et pensa à Dieu.

Un rayon d'espérance vint briller dans sa tombe, il pensa à son âme dont il doutait depuis longtemps ; il crut à Dieu qu'il blasphémait tout à l'heure, et il espéra la vie dont il désespérait.

Il prêta l'oreille, entendit sur sa tête un bruit faible et léger, il lui semblait qu'on grattait la terre sur lui ; plus il écoutait, plus le bruit devenait fort. Il sourit de bonheur, joignit les mains et pria Dieu : "Oh ! merci ! merci ! tu m'as rendu la vie. Tu me la donnes donc, la vie ? je ne mourrai pas dans cette tombe hideuse et froide ? je mourrai, mais plus tard, car je ne serai vieux que dans bien des années ! Je vais vivre, la vie est à moi, ses délices, ses joies", et il pleurait de bonheur, il maudit son scepticisme d'homme du monde et ses préjugés impies : "Merci, merci, Dieu, de m'avoir rendu tout cela !".

Il entendit distinctement sur sa tête des pas d'hommes, on venait le délivrer, oh ! c'était sur ! Quelque âme charitable aura eu pitié de son malheur, on se sera douté que dans cette tombe était un homme au lieu d'un cadavre, et on vient le déterrer, c'est tout simple, la chose est certaine, positive. Oh ! béni soit l'homme qui vient lui donner la vie ! Oh ! béni soit celui-là ! Son cœur battait avec violence, il riait de bonheur ; s'il eût pu, il aurait sauté de joie.

Les pas se rapprochèrent, puis s'écartèrent ; et tout redevint calme.

C'était le fossoyeur qui venait chercher sa pioche qu'il avait oubliée, et, comme il pleuvait, il craignait qu'elle ne se rouillât.

Un bon enfant, ce fossoyeur, qui fumait une petite pipe allemande, avait un chapeau de paille des montagnes, et aimait le vin du Rhin. Il avait l'âme charitable, car lorsqu'il vit un chien sale et couvert de boue, qui s'amusait à bouleverser la terre bénite, au lieu de le tuer comme tout autre eût fait à sa place, il se contenta de le repousser du piéd.

M. Ohmlin écouta longtemps, bien longtemps, rien ! il écouta encore, rien ! Oh ! c'était fini, il fallait mourir ! Mourir, comme il l'avait prévu, de cette mort horrible et cruelle qui arrive à chaque minute, vous brûle à petit feu, vous mange avec délices ! Et quand mourir ? Quand finira ce supplice, cette agonie, ce rôle qui dure des siècles ?

Et il se mit à rire de pitié pour ses anciennes croyances, et puisque le ciel n'avait pas voulu le sauver, il appela l'enfer ; l'enfer vint à son secours et lui donna l'athéisme, le désespoir et les blasphèmes.

D'abord, il douta de Dieu, puis il le nia, puis il en rit, puis il insulta ce mot : "Bah ! se disait-il en riant d'un rire forcé, où est-il le créateur des misères ? ou est-il ? qu'il vienne me délivrer s'il existe !... Je te nie, mot inventé par les heureux ; je te nie, tu n'es qu'une puissance fatale et stupide, comme la foudre qui tombe et qui brûle."

Et il s'arrachait les cheveux et se déchirait le visage avec les ongles : "Tu crois que j'irai te prier à mon heure dernière ? Oh ! je suis trop fier et trop malheureux, je n'irai pas t'implorer, je t'abhorre ! L'éternité ? je la nie ! Ton paradis ? chimère ! Ton bonheur céleste ? je le méprise ! Ton enfer ? je le brave ! l'éternité ? c'est une tête de mort qu'on trouvera dans quelques mois, ici, à ma place." ·

Le rire était sur son front et les larmes étouffaient sa voix : « Moi, bénir la main qui me frappe ! embrasser le bourreau ! Oh ! si tu peux prendre la forme humaine, viens dans ma tombe avec moi, que je t'emporte aussi vers l'éternité qui te dévorera un jour, que je te livre au néant qui te donne son nom. Viens ! viens ! que je te broie, que je t'écrase entre ma tombe et moi, que je mange ta chair ! Fais-toi quelque chose de palpable pour que je puisse te déchirer en riant !". Ses dents claquaient, comme celles du démon quand il fut vaincu par le Christ ; il était furieux, bondissant, se roulant dans sa tombe en maudissant Dieu avec des cris à la bouche et le désespoir dans l'âme : "Où es-tu ? Dieu du ciel, viens, si tu existes ! Pourquoi ne me délivres-tu pas ? Si tu existes, pourquoi m'as-tu fait malheureux ? quel plaisir as-tu à me voir souffrir ? Si je ne croyais pas en toi, c'est que j'étais malheureux. rends-moi la vie, je t'aimerai... si cela ne dépend pas de toi, en bien, fais-le, puisque tu es tout-puissant ; fais-le, donne-moi la foi !... pourquoi veux-tu que je ne croie pas en toi ? tu vois que je souffre, que je pleure ; abrège mes souffrances, taris mes larmes !”.

Puis il s’arrêta, effrayé de ses blasphèmes, il eut peur et trembla. Il avait peur, et de quoi ? la terre pouvait s’effacer, les révolutions pouvaient remuer la poussière du globe, peu lui importait ! il aurait toujours assez d’air pour respirer, même pendant quelques minutes, dans sa tombe, air corrompu, humide, échauffé et qui sentait le cadavre.

Mais il avait peur de l’éternité qu’il bravait, de ce mot dont il se moquait en riant, couché sur le dos, accroupi, la face vers le ciel, qui était pour lui les deux planches d’un cercueil. Pour son malheur, il doutait encore ; il n’était sur de rien.

Ne croyez pas les gens qui se disent athées, ils ne sont que sceptiques et nient par vanité. Eh bien, lorsqu’on doute et qu’on a des souffrances, on veut effacer toute probabilité, avoir la réalité vide et nue ; mais le doute augmente et vous ronge l’âme.

Il n’entendait que les aboiements de son chien, qui pleurait sa mort ou devinait son malheur. “Pauvre ami !” dit-il, et il versa une larme de tendresse, la seule, qui le soulagea.

Il était fatigué, avait les membres brisés, il avait faim, faim et rien sous la dent ! Enfin il se tourna sur le dos, se raccroupit en se pelotonnant, s’efforça de briser son cercueil : “Je sortirai d’ici malgré toi, se disait-il avec fureur, je vivrai malgré ta volonté !”.

Et, tourné sur le ventre, il s’efforça avec des soubresauts et des secousses convulsives, de faire ployer cette planche dure comme du fer.

Enfin, par un dernier effort de rage et de désespoir, il la brisa.

A la vue de cette tombe entr’ouverte, ou plutôt sentant craquer son cercueil sur son dos, un rire vainqueur éclata sur sa bouche, il se crut libre. Mais la terre était là, haute de six pieds, la terre qui allait l’écraser s’il faisait le moindre mouvement, car, soutenue jusque-là par le cercueil, elle ne pouvait plus rester dans la position première et, au moindre dérangement des planches, elle allait tomber.

M. Ohmlin s’en aperçut, il pâlit et faillit s’évanouir ; il resta longtemps immobile, n’osant faire le moindre geste ; enfin il voulut tenter un dernier effort qui devait le tuer ou le sauver : la terre fraîchement remuée ne lui offrirait point une forte résistance, il voulait se lever brusquement et la fendre avec sa tête.

Le désespoir rend fou.

Il se leva, mais la planche du cercueil s'abaissa sur sa tête, il la vit, elle tomba.

Les gens les plus patients s'ennuient de tout ; c'est un vieux proverbe, il est vrai, car notre bon fossoyeur, ennuyé des aboiements de ce chien mélancolique, dont nous avons déjà parlé, s'avisa de savoir ce qu'il y avait donc là de si intéressant ; il creusa la terre dans l'espoir d'y trouver quelque chose, un trésor, peut-être, qui sait ?

Ce qui l'étonna fort, c'est que le coffre était brisé "Diable ! voilà qui est drôle ! il y a là-dessous quelque chose", et il leva la planche. Voici ce qu'il vit et ce qu'il racontait plus tard, lorsqu'il voulait se faire passer pour brave :

Le cadavre était tourné sur le ventre, son linceul était déchiré, sa tête et son bras droit étaient sous sa poitrine : "Quand je l'ai retourné avec ma pelle, je vis qu'il avait des cheveux dans la main gauche, il s'était dévoré l'avant-bras ; sa figure faisait une grimace qui me fit peur, il y avait de quoi ; ses yeux, tout grands ouverts, sortaient à fleur de tête ; les nerfs de son cou étaient raides et tirés, on voyait ses dents blanches comme de l'ivoire, car ses lèvres ouvertes, relevées par les coins, découvraient ses gencives comme s'il eût ri en mourant."

Quant à Fox, il quitta le cimetière, alla courir dans les montagnes et fut un jour tué par des chasseurs qui n'avaient rien tiré et qui lui lâchèrent un coup de fusil pour passe-temps.

Pour Berthe, elle quitta le coin de son feu, et fut désignée par les enfants du village sous le nom de Berthe la folle. Les sous, quand la lune était belle, quand le vent hurlait sur la montagne, quand la neige blanchissait la terre, on voyait une vieille femme qui parcourait le chemin du cimetière en pleurant. Un jour, elle se jeta dans le torrent qui est au pied de la colline où s'élèvent les tombes et les cyprès.

MORALITÉ (CYNIQUE)

POUR INDIQUER LA CONDUITE QUE L'ON DOIT TENIR À SON HEURE DERNIÈRE.

Maître Michel de Montaigne, honnête gas, prud'homme et de bonace nature, a souvent dit en ses écrits : que sais-je ? et maître François Rabelais, tourangeau chinonais, curé de Meudon, docteur en médecine, bon viveur, grand suceur du piot, chiffonneur de filles et joyeux sceptique, a encore plus souvent dit en les siens : peut-être !

Eh bien, aimable et courageux lecteur, et vous bienveillante et peu dormeuse lectrice, que pensez-vous qu'eût répondu notre homme du cercueil, si quelque maladroït lui eût demandé son avis sur la bonté de Dieu ? Eût-il répondu : peut-être ? existe-t-elle ? que sais-je ?

Pour moi, je pense qu'il eût dit : j'en doute ou je la nie.

Et si le même malotru eut continué ses sottises questions, en lui représentant la bonté de ce même Dieu miséricordieux, il aurait envoyé au Diable l'escogriffe en lui répondant : Bran, comme dit Pantagruel festoyant et troublé par l'arrivée de Panurge ; et notre homme eût bien fait, car lorsqu'on crève ainsi, écorché d'âme, autant encore jurer après l'équarisseur.

Or, de ceci je conclus provisoirement : qu'il ne faut point troubler les mourants dans leur agonie, les morts dans leur sommeil, les amants au lit, les suceurs du piot devant Dame-Jeanne, et le Père éternel dans ses bêtises.

J'engage aussi, et voilà toute la moralité de cette sottise œuvre, j'engage donc, ayant trouvé la conduite du sus-écrit docteur louable et bonne, j'engage tous les marmots à jeter la galette à la tête du pâtissier lorsqu'elle n'est point sucrée, les suceurs du piot leur vin quand il est mauvais, les mourants leurs âmes quand ils crèvent, et les hommes leur existence à la face de Dieu lorsqu'elle est amère.

REVE D'ENFER

Dans cette nouvelle fantastique, le Créateur promet un nouvel homme, dépourvu d'âme. Le duc Arthur d'Almaroës, alchimiste dépourvu d'âme, est tenté par Satan. Ce dernier rend la jeune Juiletta éperduement amoureuse du Duc, qui la repousse. La jeune femme est désespérée, et par le poids de cette culpabilité, Satan pense pouvoir se saisir de l'âme d'Arthur, vainement puisqu'il en est dépourvu. De son côté, Juiletta hante les falaises, attendant que vienne à elle Arthur.

RÊVE D'ENFER

I

La terre dormait d'un sommeil léthargique, point de bruit à sa surface, et l'on n'entendait que les eaux de l'océan qui se brisaient en écumant sur les rochers. La chouette faisait entendre son cri dans les cyprès, le lézard baveux se traînait sur les tombes, et le vautour venait s'abattre sur les ossements pourris du champ de bataille.

Une pluie lourde et abondante obscurcissait la lumière douteuse de la lune, sur laquelle roulaient, roulaient et roulaient encore les nuages gris qui passaient sur l'azur.

Le vent de la tempête agitait les vagues et faisait trembler les feuilles de la forêt ; il sifflait dans les airs tantôt fort, tantôt faible, comme un cri aigu domine les murmures.

Et une voix sortit de la terre et dit :

— Fini le monde ! que ce soit aujourd'hui sa dernière heure !

— Non, non, il faut que toutes les heures sonnent.

— Hâte-les, dit la première voix. Extermine l'homme dans un septième chaos et ne crée pas d'autres mondes.

— Il y en a encore un, supérieur à celui-ci.

— Tu veux dire plus misérable, répondit la voix de la terre. Oh ! finis, pour le bien de tes créatures ; puisque tu as manqué jusqu'à présent toutes tes oeuvres, au moins ne fais rien désormais.

— Si, si, répondit la voix du ciel, les autres hommes se sont plaints de leur faiblesse et de leurs passions ; celui-là sera fort et sans passions.

Quant à son âme...

Ici la voix de la terre se mit à rire d'un rire éclatant, qui remplit l'abîme de son immense dédain.

II

Le duc Arthur d'Almaroës était alchimiste, ou du moins il passait pour tel, quoique ses valets eussent remarqué qu'il travaillait rarement ; que ses fourneaux étaient toujours cendre et jamais brasier, que ses livres entrouverts ne changeaient jamais de feuillet ; néanmoins il restait des jours, des nuits et des mois entiers sans sortir de son laboratoire, plongé dans de profondes méditations, comme un homme qui travaille, qui médite. On croyait qu'il cherchait l'or, l'élixir de longue vie, la pierre philosophale. C'était donc un homme bien froid au-dehors, bien trompeur d'apparence : jamais sur ses lèvres ni un sourire de bonheur ni un mot d'angoisse, jamais de cris à sa bouche, point de nuits fiévreuses et ardentes comme en ont les hommes qui rêvent quelque chose de grand ; on eût dit, à le voir ainsi sérieux et froid, un automate qui pensait comme un homme.

Le peuple (car il faut le citer partout, lui qui est devenu maintenant le plus fort des pouvoirs et la plus sainte des choses, deux mots qui semblent incompatibles si ce n'est à Dieu : la sainteté et la puissance), le peuple donc était persuadé que c'était un sorcier, un démon, Satan incarné. C'était lui qui riait, le soir, au détour du cimetière, qui se traînait lentement sur la falaise en poussant des cris de hibou ; c'était lui que l'on voyait danser dans les champs avec les feux follets ; c'était lui dont on voyait, pendant les nuits d'hiver, la figure sombre et lugubre planant sur le vieux donjon féodal, comme une vieille légende de sang sur les ruines d'une tombe.

Souvent, le soir, lorsque les paysans assis devant leurs portes se reposaient de leur journée en chantant quelque vieux chant du pays, quelque vieil air national que les vieillards avaient appris de leurs grands-pères et qu'ils avaient transmis à leurs enfants, qu'on leur avait appris dans leur jeunesse et que jeunes ils avaient chanté sur le haut de la montagne où ils menaient paître leurs chèvres, alors, à cette heure de repos où la lune commence à paraître, où la chauve-souris voltige autour du clocher de son vol inégal, où le corbeau s'abat sur la grève, aux pâles rayons d'un soleil qui se meurt, à ce moment, dis-je, on voyait paraître quelquefois le duc Arthur.

Et puis on se taisait quand on entendait le bruit de ses pas, les enfants se pressaient sur leurs mères et les hommes le regardaient avec étonnement ; on était effrayé de ce regard de plomb, de ce froid sourire, de cette pâle figure, et si quelqu'un effleurait ses mains, il les trouvait glaciales comme la peau d'un reptile.

Il passait vite au milieu des paysans silencieux à son approche, disparaissait promptement et se perdait à la vue, rapide comme une gazelle, subtil comme un rêve fantastique, comme une ombre, et peu à peu le bruit de ses pas sur la poussière diminuait et aucune trace de son passage ne restait derrière lui, si ce n'est la crainte et la terreur, comme la pâleur après l'orage.

Si quelqu'un eût été assez hardi pour le suivre dans sa course ailée, pour regarder où tendait cette course, il l'eût vu rentrer dans le vieux donjon en ruines, autour duquel nul n'osait approcher le soir, car on entendait des bruits étranges qui se perdaient dans les meurtrières des tours, et, la nuit, il s'y promenait régulièrement un grand fantôme noir, qui étendait ses larges bras vers les nues et qui de ses mains osseuses faisait trembler les pierres du château, avec un bruit de chaînes et le râle d'un mourant.

Eh bien, cet homme qui paraissait si infernal et si terrible, qui semblait être un enfant de l'enfer, la pensée d'un démon, l'oeuvre d'un alchimiste damné, lui dont les lèvres gercées semblaient ne se dilater qu'au toucher frais du sang, lui dont les dents blanches exhalaient une odeur de chair humaine, eh bien, cet être infernal, ce vampire funeste n'était qu'un esprit pur et intact, froid et parfait, infini et régulier, comme une statue de marbre qui penserait, qui agirait, qui aurait une volonté, une puissance, une âme, enfin, mais dont le sang ne battrait point chaleureusement dans les veines, qui comprendrait sans sentir, qui aurait un bras sans une pensée, des yeux sans passion, un coeur sans amour.

Arrière aussi tout besoin de la vie, toute réalité matérielle ! tout pour la pensée, pour l'extase, mais une extase vague et indéfinie, qui se baigne dans les nuages, qui se mire dans la lune et qui tient de l'instinct et de la constitution, comme le parfum à la fleur.

Sa tête était belle, son regard était beau, ses cheveux étaient longs et s'ondulaient merveilleusement sur ses épaules en longs flots d'azur, lorsqu'il se penchait et se repliait lui-même sur son dos aux formes allongées, et dont la peau argentée d'un reflet de neige était douce comme le satin, blanche comme la lune.

Les autres créatures avaient eu avant lui des passions, un corps, une âme, et ils avaient agi tous pêle-mêle dans un tourbillon quelconque, se ruant les uns sur les autres, se poussant, se traînant ; il y en avait eu d'élevés, d'autres de foulés aux pieds ; tous les autres hommes enfin s'étaient pressés, entassés et remués dans cette immense cohue, dans ce long cri d'angoisse, dans ce prodigieux bourbier qu'on nomme la vie.

Mais lui, lui, esprit céleste, jeté sur la terre comme le dernier mot de la création, être étranger et singulier, arrivé au milieu des hommes sans être homme comme eux, ayant leur corps à volonté, leurs formes, leur parole, leur regard, mais d'une nature supérieure, d'un coeur plus élevé et qui ne demandait que des passions pour se nourrir, et qui, les cherchant sur la terre d'après son instinct, n'avait trouvé que des hommes, que venait-il donc faire ? il était rétréci, usé, froissé par nos coutumes et par nos instincts.

Aurait-il compris nos plaisirs charnels, lui qui n'avait de la chair que l'apparence ? les chauds embrassements d'une femme, ses bras humides de sueur, ses larmes d'amour, sa gorge nue, tout cela l'aurait-il fait palpiter un matin, lui qui trouvait au fond de son coeur une science infinie, un monde immense ?

Nos pauvres voluptés, notre mesquine poésie, notre encens, toute la terre avec ses joies et ses délices, que lui faisait tout cela, à lui qui avait quelque chose des anges ? Aussi il s'ennuyait sur cette terre, mais de cet ennui qui ronge comme un cancer, qui vous brûle, qui vous déchire, et qui finit chez l'homme par le suicide. Mais lui ! le suicide ? Oh ! que de fois on le surprit, monté sur la haute falaise, regardant d'un rire amer la mort qui était là devant, lui riant en face et le narguant avec le vide de l'espace qui se refusait à l'engloutir !

Que de fois il contempla longtemps la gueule d'un pistolet, et puis, comme il le jetait avec rage, ne pouvant s'en servir, car il était condamné à vivre ! Oh ! que de fois il passa des nuits entières à se promener dans les bois, à entendre le bruit des flots sur la plage, à sentir l'odeur des varechs qui noircissent les rochers ! Que de nuits il passa appuyé sur un roc et promenant dans l'immensité sa pensée qui volait vers les nues !

Mais toute cette nature, la mer, les bois, le ciel, tout cela était petit et misérable ; les fleurs ne sentaient rien sur ses lèvres ; nue, la femme était pour lui sans beauté, le chant sans mélodie, la mer sans terreur.

Il n'avait point assez d'air pour sa poitrine, point assez de lumière pour ses yeux et d'amour pour son coeur.

L'ambition ? un trône ? de la gloire ? jamais il n'y pensa. La science ? les temps passés ? mais il savait l'avenir, et dans cet avenir il n'avait trouvé qu'une chose qui le faisait sourire de temps en temps, en passant devant un cimetière.

Aurait-il craint Dieu, lui qui se sentait presque son égal et qui savait qu'un jour viendrait aussi, où le néant emporterait ce Dieu comme ce Dieu l'emportera un jour. L'aurait-il aimé, lui qui avait passé tant de siècles à le maudire ?

Pauvre coeur ! comme tu souffrais, gêné, déplacé de ta sphère et rétréci dans un monde comme l'âme dans le corps.

Souvent un instinct moqueur de lui-même lui portait une coupe à ses lèvres, le vin les effleurait sans qu'un sourire vînt les dilater, et puis il s'apercevait qu'il avait fait quelque chose de fade et d'inutile ; il prenait une rose et la retirait bien vite comme une épine. Un jour il voulut être musicien, il avait une idée sublime, étrange, fantastique, que n'auraient peut-être pas comprise les hommes, mais pour laquelle se serait damné Mozart, une idée de génie, une idée d'enfer, quelque chose qui rend malade, qui irrite et qui tue.

Il commença, la foule éperdue trépignait, et criait d'enthousiasme, puis, muette et tremblante, elle se prosterna sur le pavé des dalles et écouta. Des sons purs et plaintifs s'élevaient dans la nef et se perdaient sous les voûtes, c'était sublime ; ce n'était qu'un prélude. Il voulut continuer, mais il brisa l'orgue entre ses mains.

Rien pour lui désormais ! tout était vide et creux ; rien, qu'un immense ennui, qu'une terrible solitude, et puis des siècles encore à vivre, à maudire l'existence, lui qui n'avait pourtant ni besoins, ni passions, ni désirs ! Mais il avait le désespoir !

III

Il se résigna, et sa nature supérieure lui en donna les moyens ; il alla vivre seul et isolé dans un village d'Allemagne, loin du séjour des hommes qui lui étaient à charge.

Un château en ruines, situé sur une haute colline, lui parut un séjour conforme à sa pensée, et dès le soir il l'habita.

Il vivait donc ainsi seul, sans suite, sans équipages, presque sans valets, et renfermé en lui-même, bornant sa société à lui-même ; son nom n'en acquérait ainsi chaque jour qu'une existence de plus en plus problématique ; les gens qui le servaient ignoraient le son de sa voix, ils ne connaissaient de son regard qu'un oeil terne et à demi fermé qui se tournait froidement sur eux en les faisant frémir ; du reste, ils étaient entièrement libres, c'est-à-dire que leur maître ne leur faisait aucun reproche, à peine s'il leur donnait des ordres.

Le château qu'habitait le comte avait pris à la longue quelque chose de la tristesse de ses hôtes ; les murailles noircies, les pierres sans ciment, les ronces qui l'entouraient, cet aspect silencieux qui planait sur ses tours, tout cela avait quelque chose de féérique et d'étrange. C'était pire au-dedans : de longs corridors obscurs, des portes qui claquaient la nuit violemment et qui tremblaient dans leur châssis, des fenêtres hautes et étroites, des lambris enfumés, et puis de place en place, dans les galeries, quelque ornement antique, l'armure d'un ancien baron, le portrait en pied d'une princesse, un bois de cerf, un couteau de chasse, un poignard rouillé, et souvent, dans quelques recoins sans lumière, des décombres, des plâtras qui tombaient du plafond du vieux salon lorsque le vent, par quelque soirée d'hiver, s'entonnait dans les longues galeries avec plus de fureur que de coutume, avec des mugissements plus prolongés.

Le concierge (c'était un vieillard aussi décrépi que le château) faisait sa tournée tous les jours dans l'après-midi ; il commençait par le grand escalier de pierre dont la rampe était ôtée depuis que le dernier possesseur l'avait vendue pour un arpent de terre ; il le montait lentement, et, arrivé dans la galerie principale, il ouvrait toutes les chambres, toutes portant leurs anciens numéros, toutes vides et délabrées, après avoir eu pourtant leur destination et leur emploi. Là, c'était le vieux salon, immense appartement carré dont on distinguait encore quelques lambeaux du velours cramoisi qui, dans le dernier siècle, en avait fait le somptueux ornement, la fraîche beauté ; d'abord, ce fut la salle du plaid, puis la chapelle, puis le salon. Alors il était encombré par une centaine de bottes de foin, déposées en cet endroit depuis vingt ans environ, et qui se pourrissaient à la pluie qui pénétrait facilement par les carreaux, chassée par le vent du soir ; le reste du salon était occupé par des vieux fauteuils, des harnais usés, quelques selles mangées par les vers et une grande quantité de fagots et de bois sec. Le concierge ne l'ouvrait jamais, si ce n'est pour y pousser quelque chose de vieux et de cassé, qu'il jetait négligemment et qui allait tomber sur un vieux tableau, sur une statue de jardin ou sur les fauteuils dépaillés. Il reprenait sa course lente et paisible au milieu du corridor et faisait retentir du bruit de ses souliers ferrés les larges dalles de pierre, qui en gardaient l’empreinte ; puis il revenait sur ses pas, regardant les nids d’hirondelles, s’établissant de jour en jour dans le château, comme dans leur domaine, et qui volaient et repassaient par les fenêtres du corridor dont toutes les vitres étaient étendues par terre, cassées et pêle-mêle, avec leurs encadrements en lames de plomb.

De grands peupliers bordaient le château ; ils se courbaient souvent au souffle de l’océan, dont le bruit des vagues se mêlait à celui de leurs feuilles, et dont l’air âpre et dur avait brûlé l’écorce. Une percée pratiquée dans le feuillage laissait voir, des plus hautes fenêtres, la mer qui s’étendait immense et terrible, devant ce château sinistre qui n’en semblait qu’un lugubre apanage.

Là, c’était le pont-levis, maintenant on y passe sur une terrasse ; ici les créneaux, mais ils tremblent sous la main, et au moindre choc les pierres tombent ; plus haut, le donjon, jamais le concierge n’y alla, car il l’avait abandonné, ainsi que les étages supérieurs, aux chauves-souris et aux hiboux qui voltigeaient le soir sur les toits, avec leurs cris lugubres et leurs longs battements d’ailes.

Les murs du château étaient lézardés et couverts de mousse, il y avait à leur contact quelque chose d’humide et de gras, qui pressait sur la poitrine et qui faisait frissonner ; on eût dit la trace gluante d’un reptile.

C’était là qu’il vivait. Il aimait les longues voûtes prolongées, où l’on n’entendait que les oiseaux de nuit et le vent de la mer ; il aimait ces débris soutenus par le lierre, ces sombres corridors et toute cette apparence de mort et de ruine ; lui, qui était tombé de si haut pour descendre si bas, il aimait quelque chose de tombé aussi ; lui, qui était désillusionné, il voulait des ruines, il avait trouvé le néant dans l’éternité, il voulait la destruction dans le temps. Il était seul au milieu des hommes ! il voulut s’en écarter tout à fait et vivre au moins de cette vie qui pouvait ressembler à ce qu’il rêvait, à ce qu’il aurait dû être.

Le duc Arthur était assis dans un large fauteuil en maroquin noir, le coude appuyé sur sa table, la tête dans ses mains. La chambre qu'il habitait était grande et spacieuse, son plafond noirci par la fumée du charbon ; quant aux lambris, ils étaient cachés par une immense quantité de pots de terre, d'alambics, de vases, d'équerres et d'instruments rangés sur des tablettes.

Dans un coin était le fourneau, avec le creuset pour les magiques opérations ; puis, çà et là, sur des cendres encore chaudes, quelques livres entrouverts, dont quelques feuillets étaient arrachés à moitié et qui semblaient avoir été touchés par une main fiévreuse et brûlante, parcourus avec un regard avide et qui n'y avait rien lu.

Aucune lumière n'éclairait l'appartement, et quelques charbons qui se mouraient dans le fourneau jetaient seuls quelque lueur au plafond en décrivant un cercle lumineux et vacillant.

L'alchimiste restait depuis longtemps dans son immobile position : enfin il se leva, alla vers son creuset et le considéra quelque temps. La lueur rougeâtre des charbons illumina tout d'un coup son visage en le colorant d'un éclat fantastique. C'était bien là un de ces fronts pâles d'alchimistes d'enfer, ses yeux creux et rougis, sa peau blanche et tirée, ses mains maigres et allongées, tout cela indiquait bien les nuits sans sommeil, les rêves brûlants, les pensées du génie.

Et vous croyez que ce sourire d'amertume est un sourire de vanité ? vous croyez que ces joues creuses se sont amaigries sur les livres, que son teint s'est blanchi à la chaleur du charbon, et que celui-là maintenant qui pleurerait de rage si c'était un jeune homme, cherche un nom, une immortalité ? vous croyez que ces livres jetés avec colère, ces feuillets déchirés, et que cette main qui se crispe et qui se déchire, vous croyez qu'il se désespère ainsi pour n'avoir point trouvé une parcelle d'or, un poison qui fait vivre ?

Il allait retourner à sa place quand il aperçut, sur la muraille noircie, des lignes brillantes qui se dessinaient fortement et qui formèrent bientôt un monstre hideux et singulier, semblable à ces animaux que nous voyons sur le portique de nos cathédrales, affamé, les flancs creux, avec une tête de chien, des mamelles qui pendent jusqu'à terre, un poil rouge, des yeux qui flamboient et des ergots de coq.

Il se détacha de la muraille tout à coup et vint sauter sur le fourneau ; on entendit le bruit de ses pattes grêles et fines sur les pavés du creuset.

— Que me veux-tu ? dit-il à Arthur.

— Moi ? rien ! Mais, n'es-tu point l'esprit damné qui perd les hommes, qui torture leur âme ?

— Eh bien, oui, repartit le monstre avec un cri de joie, oui, je suis Satan.

— Que me veux-tu ? que viens-tu faire ici ?

— T'aider.

— Et à quoi ?

— À trouver ce que tu cherches, l'or, l'élixir.

— Vraiment oui ! Tu ne sais donc pas que je peux vivre des mondes, qu'une pensée de ma tête peut faire rouler l'or à mes pieds ? Non, Satan, si tu n'as de pouvoir que sur cela, quitte-moi, fuis, car tu ne peux me servir.

— Non, non, je resterai, dit Satan avec un singulier sourire, je resterai !

La vanité est ma fille aînée, elle me donne les âmes de tous ceux qui la prennent, pensa-t-il en lui-même, j'aurai son âme !

En ce moment, les charbons qui s'éteignaient jetèrent encore quelques nappes de lumière, qui passèrent sur la figure d'Arthur ; elle apparut à Satan plus belle et plus terrible que celle des damnés, et même des plus beaux.

— Tiens, sortons d'ici, lui dit Arthur, le vent agite les arbres, la mer gronde et le rivage est dévasté. Viens ! nous parlerons mieux de l'éternité et du néant au bruit de la tempête, devant la colère de l'océan.

Ils sortirent. Le chemin qui conduisait au rivage était pierreux et ombragé par les grands arbres noirs qui entouraient le château. Il faisait froid, la terre était sèche et dure ; il faisait sombre, pas une étoile au ciel, pas un rayon de la lune.

Arthur marchait, la tête nue et le visage découvert, il allait lentement, et prenait plaisir à se sentir le visage effleuré par sa chevelure bleue et soyeuse. Il aimait le fracas du vent et le bruit sinistre des arbres qui se penchaient avec violence. Satan était derrière ; il sautillait légèrement sur les pierres, sa tête était baissée et il hurlait plaintivement.

Enfin ils arrivèrent à la plage, le sable en était frais, mouillé, couvert de coquilles et de varechs, qui roulaient vers la mer avec les galets entraînés par le reflux. Ils s'arrêtèrent tous les deux.

Arthur riait sauvagement au bruit des flots.

— Voici ce que j'aime, dit-il, ou plutôt ce que je hais le moins, mais cette colère n'est pas assez brutale, assez divine. Pourquoi le flot s'arrête-t-il et cesse-t-il de monter ? Oh ! si la mer s'étendait au-delà du rivage et des rochers, comme elle irait loin, comme elle courrait, comme elle bondirait ! ce serait plaisir de la voir, mais cela...

— Tu veux donc la mort, dit Satan, la mort dans tout ?

— C'est le néant que j'implore.

— Et pourquoi ? tu crois donc que rien ne subsiste après le corps ? que l'oeil fermé ne voit plus et que la tête froide et pâle n'a point de pensée ?

— Oui, je crois cela, pour moi du moins.

— Et que veux-tu enfin ? que désires-tu ?

— Le bonheur !

— Le bonheur ? y penses-tu ? le bonheur !... tu l'auras dans la science, tu l'auras dans la gloire, tu l'auras dans l'amour.

— Oh ! nulle part ! Je l'ai cherché longtemps, je ne l'ai jamais trouvé ; cette science était trop bornée, cette gloire trop étroite, cet amour trop mesquin.

— Tu te crois donc supérieur aux autres hommes ? tu crois que ton âme...

— Oh ! mon âme !... mon âme !...

— Tu n'en as donc pas ? tu ne crois à rien... pas même à Dieu ? Oh ! tu succomberas, homme faible et vaniteux, tu succomberas, car tu as refusé mes offres ; tu succomberas comme le premier homme. Que son regard était fier, comme il était insolent et fort de son bonheur, lorsque, se promenant dans l'Éden, il contemplait d'un oeil béant et surpris ma défaite et mes larmes ! et lui aussi je le vis succomber, je le vis ramper à mes pieds, je le vis pleurer comme moi, maudire et blasphémer comme moi ; nos cris de désespoir se mêlèrent ensemble et nous fûmes dès lors des compagnons de torture et de supplice. Oh ! oui, tu tomberas comme lui, tu aimeras quelque chose.

— Et tu me prends donc pour un homme, Satan ? pour un de ces êtres communs et vulgaires qui croupissent sur ce monde où un vent de malheur m'a jeté dans sa démence et où je me meurs faute d'air à respirer, faute de choses à sentir, à comprendre et à aimer ? Tu crois que cette bouche mange, que ces dents broient, que je suis asservi à la vie comme un visage dans un masque ? Si je découvrais cette peau qui me recouvre, tu verrais que moi aussi, Satan, je suis un de ces êtres damnés comme toi, que je suis ton égal et peut-être ton maître. Satan, peux-tu arrêter une vague ? peux-tu pétrir une pierre entre tes mains ?

— Oui.

— Satan, si je voulais, je te broierais aussi entre mes mains. Satan, qu'as-tu qui te rende supérieur à tout ? qu'as-tu ? est-ce ton corps ? mets ta tête au niveau de mon genou et de mon pied, je l'écraserai sur le sol. Qu'as-tu qui fasse ta gloire et ton orgueil, l'orgueil, cette essence des esprits supérieurs ? Qu'as-tu ? réponds !

— Mon âme.

— Et combien de minutes dans l'éternité peux-tu compter où cette âme t'ait donné le bonheur ?

— Cependant, quand je vois les âmes des hommes souffrir comme la mienne, c'est alors une consolation pour mes douleurs, un bonheur pour mon désespoir ; mais toi, qu'as-tu donc de si divin ? est-ce ton âme ?

— Non ! c'est parce que je n'en ai pas.

— Pas d'âme ? eh quoi ! c'est donc un automate vivifié par un éclair de génie ?

— Le génie ! oh ! le génie ! dérision et pitié ! À moi le génie ? ah !

— Pas d'âme ? et qui te l'a dit ?

— Qui me l'a dit ? je l'ai deviné... Écoute, et tu verras. Lorsque je vins sur cette terre, il faisait nuit, une nuit comme celle-ci, froide et terrible. Je me souviens d'avoir été apporté par les vagues sur le rivage... Je me suis levé et j'ai marché. Je me sentais heureux alors, la poitrine libre ; j'avais au fond de moi quelque chose de pur et d'intact, qui me faisait rêver et songer à des idées confuses, vagues, indéterminées, j'avais comme un ressouvenir lointain d'une autre position, d'un état plus tranquille et plus doux ; il me semblait, lorsque je fermais les yeux et que j'écoutais la mer, retourner vers ces régions supérieures où tout était poésie, silence et amour, et je crus avoir continuellement dormi. Ce sommeil était lourd et stupide, mais qu'il était doux et profond ! en effet, je me souviens qu'il fut un instant où tout passait derrière moi et s'évaporait comme un songe. Je revins d'un état d'ivresse et de bonheur pour la vie et pour l'ennui ; peu à peu ces rêves que je croyais retrouver sur la terre disparurent comme ce songe ; ce cœur se rétrécit, et la nature me parut avortée, usée, vieillie, comme un enfant contrefait et bossu qui porte les rides du vieillard.

Je tâchai d'imiter les hommes, d'avoir leurs passions, leur intérêt, d'agir comme eux, ce fut en vain, c'est comme l'aigle qui veut se blottir dans le nid du pivoet. Alors tout s'assombrit à ma vue, tout ne fut plus qu'un long voile noir, l'existence une longue agonie, et la terre un sépulcre où l'on enterrait tout vif, et puis quand, après bien des siècles, bien des âges, quand, après avoir vu passer devant moi des races d'hommes et des empires, je ne sentis rien palpiter en moi, quand tout fut mort et paralysé à mon esprit, je me dis : "Insensé, qui veux le bonheur et n'as point d'âme ! insensé, qui as l'esprit trop haut, le cœur trop élevé, qui comprends ton néant, qui comprends tout, qui n'aimes rien, qui crois que le corps rend heureux et que la matière donne le bonheur ! Cet esprit, il est vrai, était élevé, ce corps était beau, cette matière était sublime, mais pas d'âme ! pas de croyance ! pas d'espoir !"

— Et tu te plains ! lui dit Satan, en traînant ses mamelles sur le sable et s'étendant de toute sa longueur, tu te plains ! Heureux, bénis le ciel au contraire, tu mourras ! Tu ne désires rien, Arthur, tu n'aimes rien, tu vis heureux, car tu ressembles à la pierre, tu ressembles au néant. Oh ! de quoi te plains-tu ? qui te chagrine ? qui t'accable ?

— Je m'ennuie.

— Ton corps, pourtant, ne peut-il point te procurer les plaisirs des hommes ?

— Les voluptés humaines, n'est-ce pas ? leurs grands baisers, leurs tièdes étreintes ? Oh ! je n'en ai jamais goûté, je les dédaigne et les méprise.

— Mais une femme ?

— Une femme ? Ah ! je l'étoufferais dans mes bras, je la broierais de mes baisers, je la tuerais de mon haleine.

Oh ! je n'ai rien, tu as raison, je ne veux rien, je n'aime rien, je ne désire rien... Et toi, Satan, tu voudrais mon corps, n'est-ce pas ?

— Un corps ? Oh ! oui, quelque chose de palpable, qui sente, qui se voie, car je n'ai qu'une forme, un souffle, une apparence. Oh ! si j'étais un homme, si j'avais sa large poitrine et ses fortes cuisses... aussi je l'envie, je le hais, j'en suis jaloux... Oh ! mais je n'ai que l'âme, l'âme, souffle brûlant et stérile, qui se dévore et se déchire lui-même ; l'âme ! mais je ne peux rien, je ne fais qu'effleurer les baisers, sentir, voir, et je ne peux pas toucher, je ne peux pas prendre ; je n'ai rien, rien, je n'ai que l'âme. Oh ! que de fois je me suis traîné sur les cadavres de jeunes filles encore tièdes et chauds ! que de fois je m'en suis retourné désespéré et blasphémant ! Que ne suis-je la brute, l'animal, le reptile ! au moins il a ses joies, son bonheur, sa famille ; ses désirs sont accomplis, ses passions sont calmées. Tu veux une âme, Arthur ? Une âme ! mais y songes-tu bien ? Veux-tu être comme les hommes ? veux-tu pleurer pour la mort d'une femme, pour une fortune perdue ? veux-tu maigrir de désespoir, tomber des illusions à la réalité ? Une âme ! mais veux-tu les cris de désespoir stupide, la folie, l'idiotisme ? une âme ! tu veux donc croire ? tu t'abaisserais jusqu'à l'espoir ? Une âme ! tu veux donc être un homme, un peu plus qu'un arbre, un peu moins qu'un chien ?

— Eh bien non, dit Arthur en s'avançant dans la mer, non, je ne veux rien !

Puis il se tut, et Satan le vit bientôt courir sur les flots, sa course était légère et rapide et les vagues scintillaient sous ses pas.

— Oh ! dit Satan, dans sa haine jalouse, heureux, heureux... tu as l'ennui sur la terre, mais tu dormiras plus tard, et moi, moi, j'aurai le désespoir dans l'éternité, et quand je contemplerai ton cadavre...

— Mon cadavre ? dit Arthur, qui t'a dit que je mourrai ? Ne te l'ai-je pas dit ? je n'espère rien, pas même la mort.

— Les moyens les plus terribles...

— Essaie, dit Arthur qui s'était arrêté un instant sur la vague qui le ballottait doucement, comme s'il se fût tenu debout sur une planche.

Satan se tut longtemps et pensa à l'alchimiste : "Je l'ai trompé, se dit-il, il ne croit pas à son âme. Oh ! tu aimeras, tu aimeras une femme, mais, à celle-là je lui donnerai tant de grâce, tant de beauté, tant d'amour, qu'il l'aimera... car c'est un homme, malgré son orgueil et sa science."

— Écoute, Arthur, lui dit-il, demain tu verras une fille de tes montagnes, tu l'aimeras.

Arthur se mit à rire.

— Pauvre sot, lui dit-il, je veux bien essayer, ou plutôt essaie de me tuer, si tu l'oses !

— Non, dit Satan, je n'ai de pouvoir que sur les âmes. Et il le quitta.

Arthur était resté sur les rochers, et quand la lune commença à paraître, il ouvrit ses immenses ailes vertes, déploya son corps blanc comme la neige, et s'envola vers les nues.

V

Il faisait soir et le soleil rougeâtre et mourant éclairait à peine la vallée et les montagnes. C'était à cette heure du crépuscule où l'on voit, dans les prés, des fils blancs qui s'attachent à la chevelure des femmes et à leurs vêtements de dentelles et de soyeuses étoffes ; c'était à cette heure où la cigale chante de son cri aigu, dans l'herbe et sous les blés. Alors on entend dans les champs des voix mystérieuses, des concerts étranges, et puis, bien loin, le bruit d'une sonnette qui s'apaise et diminue, avec les troupeaux qui disparaissent et qui descendent. À cette heure, celle qui garde les chèvres et les vaches hâte son pas, court sans regarder derrière elle, et puis s'arrête de temps en temps, essoufflée et tremblante, car la nuit va venir et l'on rencontre dans le chemin quelques hommes et des jeunes gens, et puis elle a seize ans, la pauvre enfant, et elle a peur.

Julietta rassemble ses vaches et se dirige vers le village, dont on distinguait quelques cabanes, mais, ce jour-là, elle était triste, elle ne pouvait plus pour cueillir des fleurs et pour les mettre dans ses cheveux. Non ! plus de sauts enfantins à la vue d'une belle marguerite que son pied allait écraser, plus de chants joyeux, ce jour-là, plus de ces notes perlées, de ces longues roulades ; non ! plus de joie ni d'ivresse, plus ce joli cou blanc qui se courbait en arrière, et d'où sortait en dansant une musique légère et toute chaude d'harmonie, mais, au contraire, des soupirs répétés, un air rêveur, des larmes dans les yeux, et une longue promenade, bien rêveuse et bien lente, au milieu des herbes, sans faire attention qu'elle marche dans la rosée et que ses vaches ont disparu, tant la jeune fille est nonchalante et toute mélancolique.

Que de fois, dans ce jour, elle courut après son troupeau ; que de fois elle revint se rasseoir, lasse et ennuyée, et là, penser, ou plutôt ne penser à rien ! Elle était oppressée, son cœur brûlait, il désirait quelque chose de vague, d'indéterminé, il s'attachait à tout, quittait tout, il avait l'ennui, le désir, l'incertitude ; ennui, rêve du passé, songe sur l'avenir, tout cela passait dans la tête de l'enfant, couchée sur l'herbe et qui regardait le ciel les mains sur son front. Elle avait peur d'être ainsi seule au milieu des champs, et pourtant elle y avait passé son enfance, se jouant dans les bois et courant dans les moissons ; le bruit du feuillage la faisait trembler, elle n'osait se retourner, il lui semblait toujours voir derrière sa tête la figure de quelque démon grimaçant avec un rire horrible.

Elle regarda longtemps les rayons rougeâtres du soleil qui diminuait de plus en plus, et qui décrivait, de place en place, des cercles lumineux qui s'agrandissaient, disparaissaient, puis revenaient bientôt ; elle attendit que la cloche de l'église eût fini de sonner et quand ses dernières vibrations furent perdues dans le lointain, alors elle se leva péniblement, courut après son troupeau, et se mit en marche pour retourner chez son père.

Tout à coup elle vit, à une cinquantaine de pas, une vingtaine de petites flammes qui s'élevaient de la terre ; les flammes disparurent, mais au bout de quelques minutes, Julietta les revit encore ; elles se rapprochèrent peu à peu, et puis une disparaissait, puis une autre, une troisième, et enfin la dernière qui sautillait, s'allongeait et dansait avec vivacité et folie. Les vaches s'arrêtèrent tout à coup, comme si un instinct naturel leur prescrivait de ne plus avancer, et firent entendre un beuglement plaintif qui se traîna longtemps, monotone, et puis mourut lentement.

Les flammes redoublèrent, et l'on entendait distinctement des rires éclatants et des voix d'enfants. Julietta pâlit et s'appuya sur la corne d'une génisse, immobile et muette de terreur ; elle entendit des pas derrière sa tête, elle sentit ses joues effleurées par un souffle brûlant et un homme vint se placer debout devant elle.

Il était richement vêtu, ses habits étaient de soie noire, sa main gantée reluisait de diamants ; au moindre de ses gestes on entendait un bruit de sonnettes argentines, comme mêlées à des pièces d'or ; sa figure était laide, ses moustaches étaient rouges, ses joues étaient creuses, mais ses yeux brillaient comme deux charbons, ils étincelaient sous une prunelle épaisse et touffue comme une poignée de cheveux ; son front était pâle, ridé, osseux, et la partie supérieure en était soigneusement cachée par une toque de velours rouge. On eût dit qu'il craignait de montrer sa tête.

— Enfant, dit-il à Julietta, belle enfant !

Et il l'attira vers lui d'une main puissante, avec un sourire qu'il tâchait de faire doux et qui n'était qu'horrible.

— Aimes-tu quelqu'un ?

— Oh ! laissez-moi, dit la jeune fille, je me meurs entre vos bras ! vous m'écrasez !

— Eh quoi ! personne ? continua le chevalier. Oh ! tu aimeras quelqu'un, car je suis puissant, moi, je donne la haine et l'amour. Tiens, asseyons-nous ici, continua-t-il, sur le dos de ta vache blanche.

Celle-ci se coucha sur le côté et prêta le flanc, l'inconnu s'assit sur son cou, il tenait d'une main une de ses cornes et de l'autre la taille de Julietta.

Les feux follets avaient cessé, le soleil n'éclairait plus, il faisait presque nuit et la lune, pâle et faible, luttait avec le jour.

Julietta regardait l'étranger avec terreur ; son regard était terrible.

— Laissez-moi ! dit-elle, oh ! laissez-moi, au nom de Dieu !

— Dieu ? reprit-il amèrement, et il se mit à rire. Julietta, continua-t-il, connais-tu le duc Arthur d'Almaroës ?

— Je l'ai vu quelquefois, mais c'est comme de vous, j'en ai peur... Oh ! laissez-moi, laissez-moi ; il faut que je m'en aille... mon père ! oh ! s'il savait...

— Ton père ! eh bien ?

— S'il savait, vous dis-je, que vous me retenez ainsi, le soir... oh ! mais il vous tuerait !

— Je te laisse libre, Julietta, pars !

Et il laissa tomber son bras qui la tenait vivement étreinte.

Elle ne put se lever, quelque chose l'attachait au ventre de l'animal qui geignait tristement et humectait l'herbe de sa langue baveuse ; il râlait et remuait sa tête sur le sol comme s'il se mourait de douleur.

— Eh bien, Julietta, pars ; qui t'empêche ?

Elle s'efforça encore, mais rien ne put lui faire faire un mouvement, sa volonté de fer se brisait devant la fascination de cet homme et son pouvoir magique.

— Qu’êtes-vous donc ? lui dit-elle, quel mal vous ai-je fait ?

— Aucun... mais parlons du duc Arthur d’Almaroës. N’est-ce pas qu’il est riche, qu’il est beau ?

Ici il se tut, se frappa le front de ses deux mains : “Oh ! qu’il vienne ! qu’il vienne donc !”

Et puis ils restèrent ainsi tous deux longtemps, bien longtemps, la jeune fille tremblante, et lui l’oeil fixé sur elle et la contemplant avidement.

— Es-tu heureuse ? lui demanda-t-il.

— Heureuse ? Oh, non !

— Que te faut-il ?

— Je ne sais, mais je n’aime rien, rien ne me plaît, surtout aujourd’hui, je suis bien triste, et ce soir encore... votre air méchant... Oh ! j’en deviendrai folle !

— N’est-ce pas, Julietta, que tu voudrais être reine ?

— Non !

— N’est-ce pas, Julietta, que tu aimes l’église et son encens, sa haute nef, ses murailles noircies et ses chants mystiques ?

— Non.

— Tu aimes la mer, les coquilles au rivage, la lune au ciel et des rêves dans tes nuits ?

— Oh ! oui ! j’aime tout cela.

— Et qu’y rêves-tu dans tes nuits, Julietta ?

— Que sais-je ?

Et elle devint toute pensive.

— N’est-ce pas que tu souhaites une autre vie, des voyages lointains ? n’est-ce pas que tu voudrais être la feuille de rose pour rouler dans l’air, être l’oiseau qui vole, le chant qui se perd, le cri qui s’élance ? n’est-ce pas que le duc Arthur est beau, riche et puissant ! Et lui aussi, il aime les rêves, les sublimes extases.

“Oh ! qu’il vienne ! qu’il vienne ! continua-t-il tout bas, qu’il vienne ! elle l’aimera et d’un amour chaud, brûlant, entier, ils se perdront tous deux.”

La lune roulait sous les nuages, elle éclairait la montagne, la vallée et le vieux château gothique, dont la sombre silhouette se dessinait au clair de lune comme un fantôme sur le mur du cimetière.

— Levons-nous, dit l’inconnu, et marchons !

L'étranger prit Julietta et l'entraîna sur ses pas, les vaches bondissaient, galopaient dans les champs, elles couraient, éperdues, les unes après les autres, puis revenaient autour de Julietta en sautant et en dansant ; on n'entendait que le bruit de leurs pas sur la terre et la voix du cavalier aux éperons d'or qui parlait et parlait toujours d'un son singulier comme un orgue. Il y avait longtemps qu'ils marchaient ainsi, le chemin était facile, et ils marchaient rapidement sur l'herbe fraîche, glissante sous les pieds comme une glace polie. Julietta était fatiguée, ses jambes s'affaissaient sous son corps.

— Quand arriverai-je ? demandait-elle souvent.

Et son regard mélancolique s'élançait dans l'horizon qui ne lui offrait qu'une obscurité profonde. Enfin elle reconnut, après bien longtemps, la mesure de son père. L'étranger était toujours à ses côtés, il ne disait plus rien, seulement son visage était gai et il souriait comme un homme heureux ; quelques mots d'une langue inconnue s'échappaient de ses lèvres, et puis il prêtait l'oreille attentivement, silencieux et la bouche béante.

— Aimes-tu le duc Arthur ? demanda-t-il encore une fois.

— Je le connais à peine, et puis, que vous importe ?

— Tiens, le voilà ! lui dit-il.

En effet, un homme passa devant eux, il était nu jusqu'à la ceinture, son corps était blanc comme la neige, ses cheveux étaient bleus et ses yeux avaient un éclat céleste.

L'inconnu disparut aussitôt.

Julietta se mit à courir, puis, arrivée à une porte en bois entourée d'une haie, elle se cramponna au marteau de fer et sonna à coups redoublés. Un vieillard vint ouvrir, c'était son père.

— Pauvre enfant, lui dit-il, d'où viens-tu ? entre !

Et la jeune fille aussitôt se précipita dans la maison, où sa famille l'attendait depuis plusieurs heures avec angoisse ; chacun aussitôt poussa des cris de joie, on l'embrassa, on la questionna, et l'on se mit à table autour d'un énorme pot en fer d'où s'exhalait une vapeur épaisse.

— As-tu ramené les vaches ? lui demanda sa mère.

Et sur sa réponse affirmative, elle lui prescrivit d'aller les traire. Julietta sortit et revint au bout de quelques minutes, apportant un énorme seau de fer-blanc qu'elle déposa avec peine sur la table... mais c'était du sang.

— Ciel ! du sang ! s'écria Julietta - elle devint pâle et tomba sur les genoux de sa mère - oh ! c'est lui !

— Qui ?

— Lui enfin, lui qui m'a retardée.

— Qu'est-ce ?

— Je ne sais !

— C'est moi, s'écria une voix qui partait du fond de l'appartement, avec un rire perçant.

En effet l'étranger et le duc Arthur étaient collés contre la muraille.

Le vieillard sauta sur son fusil accroché dans sa cheminée, et les ajusta.

— Grâce pour lui ! s'écria Julietta en se jetant violemment autour de son cou.

Mais la balle était partie, on n'entendait plus rien, les deux fantômes disparurent ; seulement, au bout de quelques instants, une vitre se cassa et une balle vint rouler sur les pavés.

C'était celle que Satan renvoyait.

VI

Tout cela était étrange, il y avait là-dessous quelque sorcellerie, quelque piège magique ; et puis, ce lait changé en sang, cette apparition bizarre, le retard de Julietta, son regard effaré, sa voix chevrotante, et cette balle qui venait rebondir autour d'eux, avec leur rire sinistre échappé du mur, tout cela fit pâlir et trembler la famille ; on se serra les uns contre les autres et l'on se tut aussitôt. Julietta s'appuya la tête dans la main gauche, posa le coude sur la table, et défaisant le ruban qui retenait ses cheveux, elle les laissa tomber sur ses épaules, puis, ouvrant les lèvres, elle se mit à chanter entre ses dents, bien bas il est vrai ; elle murmurait un vieux refrain, aigre et monotone, qui sortait en sifflant ; elle se balançait légèrement sur la chaise et paraissait vouloir s'endormir au son de sa voix, son regard était insignifiant et à demi fermé, sa tenue était nonchalante et rêveuse.

On l'écoutait avec étonnement, et c'était toujours les mêmes sons, aigus et faibles, le même bourdonnement ; puis peu à peu il s'apaisa, et il devint si faible et si grêle qu'il mourut entre ses dents.

La nuit se passa ainsi, triste et longue, car chacun n'osait remuer de sa place, n'osait dire une parole ni regarder derrière soi. Le vieillard s'assoupit profondément dans son fauteuil de bois, sa femme ferma bientôt les yeux de crainte et d'ennui ; quant à ses deux fils, ils baissèrent la tête dans leurs mains et cherchèrent un sommeil qui ne vint que bien tard, mais troublé par des rêves sinistres.

Il eût fallu voir toutes ces têtes sommeillantes et abattues, réunies autour d'une lumière mourante qui éclairait leur front soucieux d'une teinte pâle et lugubre : celle du vieillard était grave, sa bouche était entrouverte, son front était couvert de ses cheveux blancs, et ses mains décharnées reposaient sur ses cuisses ; la vieille femme, qui était posée devant lui, tournait de temps en temps la tête de côté et d'autre, son visage était ridé par une singulière expression de malheur et d'amertume ; et puis il y avait la figure pâle et paisible de Julietta, avec ses longs cheveux blonds qui balayaient la table, sa chanson monotone qui sifflait entre ses dents blanches, et son regard doux et enivré.

Elle ne dormit pas, mais elle passa les heures de la nuit à écouter le beuglement plaintif de sa vache blanche qui, renfermée dans son étable, souffrait aussi, la pauvre bête, et se tordait peut-être d'agonie sur sa litière humide de sueur.

En effet, quand le jour fut venu et que Julietta sortit pour l'aller faire paître dans les champs, elle portait sur le cou l'empreinte d'une griffe.

Elle sortit, monta la colline d'un pas rapide ; arrivée au haut, elle s'assit, mais le bas de ses vêtements et ses pieds ruisselaient, elle avait marché dans la rosée, tant, ce jour, elle était folle et dormeuse tout à la fois ; elle courait, puis s'arrêtait tout à coup, portait sa main à son front, et regardait de tous côtés s'il n'allait pas venir.

Il ! car elle aimait, la pauvre enfant ! elle aimait un grand seigneur, riche, puissant, qui était beau cavalier, avait des yeux fiers et un sourire hautain ; elle aimait un homme étrange, inconnu, un démon incarné, une créature, pensait-elle, bien élevée et bien poétique.

Non ! rien de tout cela, car elle aimait le duc Arthur d'Almaroës.

D'autres fois, elle retombait dans ses rêveries et souriait amèrement, comme doutant de l'avenir, et puis elle pensait à lui, elle se le créait là, assis sur l'herbe perlée, à côté d'elle ; il était là, là, lui disant de douces paroles, la regardant fixement de son regard puissant ; et sa voix était douce, était pure, était vibrante d'amour, c'était une musique toute nouvelle et toute sublime. Elle resta ainsi longtemps, les yeux fixés sur l'horizon qui lui apparaissait toujours aussi morne, aussi vide de sens, aussi stupide.

Le soir arriva enfin, après ce long jour d'angoisses, aussi long que la nuit qui l'avait précédé. Julietta resta encore longtemps après le coucher du soleil, et puis elle revint, elle descendit lentement la montagne, s'arrêtant à chaque pas et écoutant derrière elle, et elle n'entendait que la cigale qui sifflait sous l'herbe, et l'épervier qui rentrait dans son nid en volant à tire-d'aile.

Elle s'en allait donc ainsi triste et désespérée, la tête baissée sur son sein tout gonflé de soupirs, tenant de sa main gauche la corde tout humide qui tenait sa pauvre vache blanche qui boitait de l'épaule droite. C'était sur celle-là que Satan s'était assis.

Arrivée à l'endroit où l'inconnu l'avait quittée, la veille, et où le duc Arthur lui était apparu, elle s'arrêta instinctivement, retint fortement sa génisse qui, luttant naturellement contre elle, l'entraîna de quelques pas.

Arthur se présenta aussitôt, elle lâcha la corde, et la vache se mit à bondir et à galoper vers son étable.

Julietta le regarda avec amour, avec envie, avec jalousie ; il passa en la regardant comme il regardait les bois, le ciel, les champs.

Elle l'appela par son nom ; il fut sourd à ses cris comme au bêlement du mouton, au chant de l'oiseau, aux aboiements du chien.

— Arthur, lui dit-elle avec désespoir, Arthur, oh ! Arthur, écoute !

Et elle courut sur ses pas, et se traîna à ses vêtements, et elle balbutiait en sanglotant ; son coeur battait avec violence, elle pleurait d'amour et de rage. Il y avait tant de passion dans ces cris, dans ces larmes, dans cette poitrine qui se soulevait avec fracas, dans cet être faible et aérien qui se traînait les genoux sur le sol, tout cela était si éloigné des cris d'une femme pour une porcelaine brisée, du bêlement du mouton, du chant de l'oiseau, de l'aboiement du chien, qu'Arthur s'arrêta, la regarda un instant... et puis il continua sa route.

— Oh ! Arthur, écoute de grâce un instant ! car je t'aime, je t'aime ! Oh ! viens avec moi, nous irons vivre ensemble sur la mer, loin d'ici, ou bien, tiens ! nous nous tuerons ensemble.

Arthur marchait toujours.

— Écoute, Arthur ! mais regarde-moi ! je suis donc bien hideuse, bien laide ? tu n'es donc pas un homme, toi, que ton coeur est froid comme le marbre et dur comme la pierre !

Elle tomba à genoux à ses pieds, en se renversant sur le dos comme si elle allait mourir. Elle mourait, en effet, d'épuisement et de fatigue, elle se tordait de désespoir, et voulait s'arracher les cheveux, et puis elle sanglotait avec un rire forcé, des larmes qui étouffaient sa voix ; ses genoux étaient déchirés et couverts de sang à se traîner ainsi sur les cailloux ; car elle aimait d'un amour déchirant, entier, satanique ; cet amour la dévorait toujours, il était furieux, bondissant, exalté.

C'était bien un amour inspiré par l'enfer, avec ces cris désordonnés, ce feu brûlant qui déchire l'âme, use le coeur ; une passion satanique, toute convulsive et toute forcée, si étrange qu'elle paraît bizarre, si forte qu'elle rend fou.

— À demain, n'est-ce pas, oh, Arthur ! Une grâce ! une grâce ! et je te donnerai tout après, mon sang, ma vie, mon âme, l'éternité si je l'avais ! tu me tueras si tu veux, mais à demain ! à demain sur la falaise... Oh ! n'est-ce pas ? au clair de lune... la belle chose qu'une nuit d'amour sur les rochers, au bruit des flots, n'est-ce pas, Arthur ?... à demain ?

Et il laissa tomber nonchalamment de ses lèvres dédaigneuses deux mots :

— À demain !

VII

À demain ! Oh ! demain ! et elle courut comme une folle vers la falaise, on ne la revit plus dans le village, elle avait disparu du pays. Satan l'avait emportée.

VIII

Il faisait nuit, la lune brillait pure et blanche, et, dégagée de ses nuages, sa lumière éclairait le cabinet d'Arthur, dont il avait laissé la fenêtre ouverte ; il se penchait sur la rampe de fer et humait avec délices l'air frais de la nuit. Il entendit ce même bruit de pattes fines et légères sur les carreaux de son fourneau, il se retourna. C'était Satan, mais, cette fois, plus hideux et plus pâle encore ; ses flancs étaient amaigris, et sa gueule béante laissait voir des dents verdâtres comme l'herbe des tombeaux.

— Eh bien, Satan, lui dit Arthur, eh bien, est-il vrai maintenant que j'aime quelqu'un ? crois-tu que j'aie été ému par ces cris, par ces larmes et par ces convulsions forcées ?

— Vraiment, lui répondit le démon en frémissant sur ses quatre pattes, vraiment tu es donc bien insensible ! et tu l'as laissée mourir ?

— Elle est morte ? dit Arthur en le regardant froidement.

— Non ; mais elle t'attend.

— Elle m'attend ?

— Oui, sur la falaise. Ne lui avais-tu pas promis ? il y a longtemps qu'elle y est, elle t'attend.

— Eh bien, j'irai.

— Tu iras ? eh bien, Arthur, je ne te demande que cette dernière grâce ; après, tu feras de moi tout ce qu'il te plaira, je t'appartiens.

— Et que veux-tu que je fasse ?

— Crois-tu que je tienne beaucoup à ton âme, moi ? tu l'aimeras, te dis-je...

Arthur, ne m'as-tu pas dit que tu voudrais avoir des passions, un amour fort et brûlant, étranger des autres amours ? eh bien, tu l'aurais, cet amour... mais moi, à mon tour, n'est-ce pas ? tu me donneras ton âme ?

— Je n'en ai pas.

— Tu le crois, mais tu en as une, car tu es un homme puisque tu aimeras.

Satan était habitué à voir tant d'orgueil et de vanité qu'il ne croyait qu'à cela ; le malheur ne voit que le vice, l'affamé ne sent que la faim.

— Un homme ? Satan ! dis, en as-tu vu des hommes qui puissent s'étendre dans les airs jusqu'aux nuages ? - et il déploya ses ailes vertes - en as-tu vu des cheveux comme ceux-là ? - et il montra sa chevelure bleue. - As-tu vu chez aucun d'eux un corps blanc comme la neige, une main aussi forte que celle-là, Satan - et il lui serrait fortement la peau entre ses ongles - enfin, y en a-t-il qui ose jamais t'insulter ainsi ? Puisque tu désires mon âme, tue-moi de suite, écrase ma tête dans tes dents, déchire-moi de tes griffes, essaie et vois si je suis un homme.

Et Satan bondissait sur le pavé, il écumait de rage et, dans ses sauts convulsifs, il allait se frapper les reins sur le plafond ; Arthur était paisible.

— Satan, lui dit-il, tu es fort en effet, tu es puissant, je sens que tu peux m'anéantir d'un seul coup, essaie, essaie, ah ! de grâce, tue-moi !... Oui, j'ai une âme, je te la donne, mon âme ; tue-moi, cela t'est facile, car je ne suis qu'un homme.

Le démon sauta sur sa gorge avec un cri infernal qui partait de ses entrailles ; il voulut le saisir, la peau lui glissa sous les dents. Arthur se dégagea la poitrine ; Satan s'élança d'un bond furieux, les griffes en avant, il retomba sans pouvoir effleurer l'épiderme qui était intact et poli ; il bondissait, furieux, éperdu, un aboiement rauque courait sur ses lèvres ensanglantées, ses yeux flamboyaient, il trépignait ; Arthur se coucha sur le sol, étendit ses ailes. Satan glissait dessus, il s'y traînait, y rampait, ouvrait la gueule pour le déchirer, ses griffes s'usaient comme à déchirer un roc ; il bavait, haletant, rouge de colère : pour la première fois il se trouvait vaincu. Et puis l'autre... L'autre riait mollement, et ce rire paisible était éclatant, sonore et comme mêlé à un bruit de fer ; le souffle bruyant qui s'exhalait de sa gorge repoussait Satan, comme la furieuse vibration d'une cloche d'alarme qui bondit dans la nef, rugit, ébranle les piliers et fait tomber la voûte.

Il fallait voir aux prises ces deux créatures toutes bizarres, toutes d'exception, l'une toute spirituelle, l'autre charnelle et divine dans sa matière ; il fallait voir en lutte l'âme et le corps et cette âme, cet esprit pur et aérien, rampant, impuissant et faible devant la morgue hautaine de la matière brute et stupide.

Ces deux monstres de la création se trouvaient en présence comme pour se haïr et se combattre, c'était une guerre acharnée, à mort, une guerre terrible... et qui devait finir entre eux, comme chez l'homme... par le doute et l'ennui.

C'était deux principes incohérents qui se combattaient en face ; l'esprit tomba d'épuisement et de lassitude devant la patience du corps.

Et qu'ils étaient grands et sublimes, ces deux êtres qui, réunis ensemble, auraient fait un Dieu, l'esprit du mal et la force du pouvoir ! Que cette lutte était terrible et puissante, avec ces cris d'enfer, ces rires furieux, et puis tout l'édifice en ruines qui tremblait sous les pas, et dont les pierres remuaient comme dans un rêve !

Enfin, quand Satan eut bien des fois sauté et retombé sur le sol, haletant et fatigué, l'oeil terne, la peau humide d'une sueur glaciale, les griffes cassées ; quand Arthur l'eut contemplé longtemps, épuisé de rage et de colère, rampant tristement à ses pieds ; quand il eut savouré longtemps le rôle qui s'échappait de sa poitrine, quand il eut compté les soupirs d'agonie qu'il ne pouvait retenir et qui lui brisaient le coeur, enfin, quand, revenu de sa cruelle défaite, Satan leva la tête défaillante vers son vainqueur, il trouva encore ce regard d'automate froid, et impassible, qui semblait rire dans son dédain.

— Et toi aussi, lui dit Arthur, tu t'es laissé vaincre comme un homme... et par orgueil encore ! Crois-tu maintenant que j'aie dit vrai ?

— Tu n'es peut-être pas un homme, dit Satan... mais tu as une âme...

— Eh bien, Satan, j'irai demain sur la falaise.

Et le lendemain, quand le concierge fit sa tournée dans les corridors, il trouva que les dalles étaient dérangées et usées toutes, de place en place, comme par une griffe de fer. Le brave homme en devint fou.

IX

Julietta attendait le duc, elle l'attendait jour et nuit, courant sur les rochers, elle l'attendait en pleurant, elle l'attendait depuis quatre années.

Car les ans passent vite dans un récit, dans la pensée ; ils coulent vite dans le souvenir, mais ils sont lents et boiteux dans l'espérance.

Le jour, elle se promenait sur la plage, écoutait la mer et regardait de tous côtés s'il n'allait pas venir ; et puis quand le soleil avait échauffé les roches, quand, épuisée, elle tombait de fatigue, alors elle s'endormait sur le sable, et puis se relevait pour aller cueillir des fruits, chercher le pain que des âmes charitables déposaient dans une fente de rochers.

La nuit elle se promenait sur les falaises, errante ainsi avec ses longs vêtements blancs, sa chevelure en désordre, et des cris de douleur ; et elle restait assise des heures entières sur un roc aigu, à contempler, au clair de lune, les vagues brisées qui venaient mourir sur la grève et mousser en blanches écumes entre les rochers et les galets.

Pauvre folle ! disait-on, si jeune et si belle ! vingt ans à peine... et plus d'espoir !... Dame ! c'est sa faute aussi, elle est folle d'amour, d'amour pour un prince ; c'est l'orgueil qui l'a perdue, elle s'est donnée à Satan.

Oui, bien folle, en effet, d'aimer le duc Arthur, bien folle de ne point étouffer son amour, bien folle de ne point se tuer de désespoir ; mais elle croyait à Dieu et elle ne se tua pas.

Il est vrai que souvent elle contemplait la mer et la falaise, haute de cent pieds, et puis qu'elle se mettait à sourire tout bas, avec une grimace des lèvres qui faisait peur aux enfants ; bien folle de s'arrêter devant une idée de croire à Dieu, de le respecter, de souffrir pour son plaisir, de pleurer pour ses délices. Croire à Dieu, Julietta, c'est être heureuse ; tu crois à Dieu et tu souffres ! Oh ! tu es bien folle en effet ! Voilà ce que te diront les hommes.

Mais non, au désespoir avait succédé l'abattement, aux cris furieux les larmes ; plus d'éclairs de voix, de profonds soupirs, mais des sons dits tout bas et retenus sur les lèvres, de peur de mourir en les criant.

Ses cheveux étaient blancs, car le malheur vieillit ; il est comme le temps, il court vite, il pèse lourd et il frappe fort ; mais, plus encore, il faut moins de larmes au désespoir pour amaigrir un homme que de gouttes d'eau à la tempête pour creuser la pierre d'une tombe ; les cheveux se blanchissent en une nuit.

Ses cheveux étaient blancs, ses habits déchirés, mais ses pieds s'étaient durcis à marcher sur la terre, à s'écorcher aux ronces et aux chardons ; ses mains étaient crevassées par le froid et par l'air âpre de l'océan, qui dessèche et qui brûle comme les gelées du Nord ; et puis elle était pâle, amaigrie, avait les yeux creux et ternes, que vivifiait encore un rayon d'amour, qu'éclairait une étincelle d'enfer ; sa bouche était entrouverte et comme contractée par un mouvement des lèvres involontaire et convulsif. Mais elle avait toujours le teint doré et brûlé du soleil, elle avait toujours ce regard étrange qui séduit et qui attire, c'était toujours cette âme sublime et passionnée, que Satan avait choisie pour tenter la matière endormie, le corps dénué de sens, la chair sans volupté.

Quand elle voyait un homme, elle courait vers lui, se jetait à ses pieds, l'appelait Arthur, et puis s'en retournait triste, désespérée, en disant : "Ce n'est pas lui ! il ne vient pas !"

Et l'on disait : Oh ! la pauvre folle, si jeune et si belle, vingt ans à peine... et plus d'espoir !

C'était par une nuit belle, radieuse d'étoiles, toute blanche, toute azurée, toute calme comme la mer, qui était tranquille et douce, qui venait battre légèrement les rochers de la falaise.

Julietta était là, toujours rêveuse et solitaire, et puis, je ne sais si c'est un songe, mais Arthur lui apparut.

Arthur ! oh ! mais toujours froid, toujours calme.

— Je t'attends, lui dit Julietta, il y a longtemps que je suis au rendez-vous !

Sa voix tremblait.

— Assieds-toi avec moi, sur cette roche, ô mon Arthur, assieds-toi. Que te faut-il ? la lune est belle, les étoiles brillent, la mer est calme, il fait beau ici, Arthur... oh ! assieds-toi et causons.

Arthur s'étendit à côté d'elle.

— Que me veux-tu, Julietta, lui dit-il, pourquoi es-tu plus triste que les autres femmes ? pourquoi m'as-tu demandé à venir ici ?

— Pourquoi ?... ô Arthur... mais je t'aime !

— Qu'est-ce ?

— Eh quoi ? quand je te regarde ainsi, tiens, avec ce sourire - et elle passa son bras autour de sa taille - quand tu sens mon haleine, quand de mes cheveux j'effleure ta bouche, eh bien, dis, est-ce que tu ne sens pas là, sur la poitrine, quelque chose qui bat et qui respire ?

— Non ! non ! mais tu es une femme, toi, tu as une âme, oui, je comprends ; moi, je n'en ai pas d'âme - il la regarda avec fierté - et qu'est-ce que l'âme, Julietta ?

— Que sais-je ?... mais je t'aime ! Oh ! l'amour ! l'amour, Arthur, tiens, vous blanchit les cheveux, les miens.

Elle le contempla, elle se traîna sur sa poitrine, elle l'accabla de ses baisers et de ses caresses ; et lui, il restait toujours calme sous les embrassements, froid sous les baisers.

Il fallait voir cette femme, s'épuisant d'ardeur, prodiguant tout ce qu'elle avait de passion, d'amour, de poésie, de feu dévorant et intime, pour vivifier le corps léthargique d'Arthur, qui restait insensible à ces lèvres brûlantes, à ces bras convulsifs, comme l'attouchement du lézard au contact de la brute. Julietta était bondissante d'amour, comme Satan l'était de rage et de colère.

Elle passa bien des heures sur les joues d'Arthur, qui regardait le ciel azuré, qui pensait sans doute aussi à des rêves sublimes, à des amours, sans penser qu'il avait là, devant lui, dans ses bras, une réalité céleste, un amour d'exception, tout brûlant et tout exalté.

Julietta ! il la laissa tomber épuisée ; puis elle tenta un dernier effort... et courut vers les rochers les plus élevés et s'élança d'un seul bond ; il se fit un silence de quelques secondes, et Arthur entendit le bruit d'un corps lourd qui tombe dans l'eau.

Et la nuit était belle, toute calme, toute azurée comme la mer, elle était douce, tranquille, et ses vagues venaient mourir mollement sur la plage, et puis les vagues roulaient, tombaient et apportaient sur le rivage des coquilles, de la mousse et des débris de navires.

Une vint rouler longtemps, elle s'étendit au loin, puis se recula, puis revint ; elle déposa quelque chose de lourd et de grand.

C'était un cadavre de femme.

— Eh bien ? dit Arthur, en regardant Satan.

Et quand celui-ci eut vu que son front était toujours pâle et uni, que son oeil était sec et sans larmes :

— Non ! non ! tu n'as pas d'âme, je me suis trompé, continua-t-il en le regardant avec envie, mais j'aurai celle-là.

Et il enfonça son pied crochu dans la gorge du cadavre.

Et plusieurs siècles se passèrent.

La terre dormait d'un sommeil léthargique, point de bruit à sa surface et l'on n'entendait que les eaux de l'océan qui se brisaient en écumant ; elles étaient furieuses, montaient dans l'air en tourbillonnant, et le rivage remuait à leurs secousses comme entre les mains d'un géant. Une pluie fine et abondante obscurcissait la lumière douteuse de la lune, le vent cassait la forêt, et les cieux pliaient sous leur souffle comme le roseau à la brise du lac.

Il y avait dans l'air comme un bruit étrange de larmes et de sanglots, on eût dit le râle d'un monde.

Et une voix s'éleva de la terre et dit :

— Assez ! assez ! j'ai trop longtemps souffert et ployé les reins, assez ! Oh ! grâce ! ne crée point d'autre monde !

Et une voix douce, pure, mélodieuse comme la voix des anges s'abattit sur la terre et dit :

— Non ! non ! c'est pour l'éternité, il n'y aura plus d'autre monde !

MOEURS ROUENNAISES - UNE LEÇON D'HISTOIRE NATURELLE GENRE COMMIS

Depuis Aristote jusqu'à Cuvier, depuis Pline jusqu'à M. de Blainville, on a fait des pas immenses dans la science de la nature. Chaque savant est venu apporter à cette science son contingent d'observations et d'études ; on a voyagé, fait des découvertes importantes, tenté de périlleuses excursions d'où l'on n'a rapporté le plus souvent que de petites fourrures noires, jaunes ou tricolores ; et puis l'on était bien aise de savoir que l'ours mangeait du miel, et qu'il avait un faible pour les tartes à la crème.

Ce sont de bien grandes découvertes, je l'avoue : mais aucun homme n'a songé encore à parler du commis, l'animal le plus intéressant de notre époque.

Aucun sans doute n'a fait des études assez spéciales, n'a assez médité, assez vu, assez voyagé, pour pouvoir parler du commis avec ample connaissance de cause.

Un autre obstacle se présentait ; comment classer cet animal ? À quelle famille le rattacher ?... Car on a hésité longtemps entre le bradype, le hurleur et le chacal. Bref, la question resta indécise, et on laissa à l'avenir le soin de résoudre ce problème avec celui de découvrir le principe du genre chien.

En effet, il était difficile de classer un animal si peu logique dans sa complexion. Sa casquette de loutre faisait opiner pour une vie aquatique ainsi que sa redingote à longs poils bruns, tandis que son gilet de laine épais de quatre pouces prouvait certainement que c'était un animal des pays septentrionaux ; ses ongles crochus l'auraient fait prendre pour un carnivore, s'il eût eu des dents.

Enfin l'académie des sciences avait statué pour un digitigrade ; malheureusement on reconnut bientôt qu'il avait une canne en bois de fer, et que parfois il faisait ses visites du jour de l'an en fiacre et allait dîner à la campagne en coucou.

Pour moi, que ma longue expérience a mis à même d'instruire le genre humain, je puis parler avec la confiance modeste d'un savant zoologue. Mes fréquents voyages dans les bureaux m'ont laissé assez de souvenirs pour décrire les animaux qui les peuplent, leur anatomie, leurs mœurs. J'ai vu toutes les espèces de commis, depuis le commis de barrière jusqu'au commis d'enregistrement. Ces voyages m'ont entièrement ruiné, et je prie mes lecteurs de faire une souscription pour un homme qui s'est dévoué à la science et a usé pour elle deux parapluies, douze chapeaux (avec leurs coiffes en toile cirée) et six ressemelages de bottes.

Le commis a depuis trente-six ans jusqu'à soixante, il est petit, replet, gras et frais ; il a une tabatière dite queue de rat, une perruque rousse, des lunettes en argent pour le bureau et un mouchoir de rouenneries. Il crache souvent, et lorsque vous éternuez, il vous dit : "Dieu vous bénisse". Il subit des variations de pelage selon le changement des saisons. En été, il porte un chapeau de paille, un pantalon de nankin qu'il a soin de préserver des taches d'encre en étalant dessus son mouchoir. Ses souliers sont en castor et son gilet en coutil. Il a invariablement un faux col de velours. Pour l'hiver, c'est un pantalon bleu avec une énorme redingote qui le préserve du froid. La redingote est l'élément du commis, comme l'eau celui des poissons.

Originaire de l'ancien continent, il est malheureusement fort répandu dans nos pays. Ses mœurs sont douces ; il se défend quand on l'attaque.

Il reste le plus souvent célibataire, et mène alors la vie de garçon.

La vie de garçon !

C'est-à-dire qu'au café il dit mademoiselle à la dame du comptoir, prend le sucre qui lui reste sur son plateau et se permet parfois le fin cigare de trois sous. Oh ! mais alors le Commis est infernal ! Le jour qu'il a fumé, il se sent belliqueux, taille quatre plumes avant d'en trouver une bonne, rudoie le garçon de bureau, laisse tomber ses lunettes et fait des pâtés sur ses registres, ce qui le désole considérablement.

D'autres fois le commis est marié. Alors il est citoyen paisible et vertueux, et n'a plus la tête chaude de sa jeunesse. Il monte sa garde, se couche à neuf heures, ne sort pas sans parapluie. Il prend son café au lait tous les dimanches matin, et lit le Constitutionnel, l'Écho, les Débats ou quelqu'autre journal de cette force.

Il est chaud partisan de la charte de 1830 et des libertés de juillet. Il a du respect pour les lois de son pays, crie vive le roi ! devant un feu d'artifice, et blanchit son baudrier tous les samedis soir. Le commis est enthousiaste de la garde nationale ; son coeur s'allume au son du tambour, et il court à la place d'armes, sanglé et étranglé dans son col en fredonnant : "Ah quel plaisir d'être soldat !"

Quant à sa femme, elle garde la maison tout le long du jour, raccommode les bas, fait des manchettes en toile pour son époux, lit les mélodrames de l'Ambigu et trempe la soupe : c'est là sa spécialité.

Quoique chaste, le commis a pourtant l'esprit licencieux et enjoué ; car il dit ma belle enfant aux jeunes personnes qui entrent dans le bureau. De plus, il est abonné aux romans de Paul de Kock, dont il fait ses lectures favorites, le soir, auprès de son poêle, les pieds dans ses pantoufles et le bonnet de soie noire sur la tête.

Il faut voir cet intéressant bipède au bureau, copiant des contrôles. Il a ôté sa redingote et son col, et travaille en chemise, c'est-à-dire en gilet de laine.

Il est penché sur son pupitre, la plume sur l'oreille gauche : il écrit lentement en savourant l'odeur de l'encre qu'il voit avec plaisir s'étendre sur un immense papier : il chante entre ses dents ce qu'il écrit, et fait une musique perpétuelle avec son nez ; mais lorsqu'il est pressé, il jette avec ardeur les points, les virgules, les barres, les fions et les paraphes. Ceci est le comble du talent. Il s'entretient avec ses collègues du dégel, des limaces, du repavage du port, du pont de fer et du gaz. S'il voit, à travers les épais rideaux qui lui bouchent le jour, que le temps est pluvieux, il s'écrie subitement : "Diable, va y avoir du bouillon" Puis il se remet à la besogne.

Le commis aime la chaleur, il vit dans une étuve perpétuelle. Son plus grand plaisir est de faire rougir le poêle du comptoir. Alors il rit du rire de l'heureux : la sueur de la joie inonde son visage qu'il essuie avec son mouchoir et en soufflant régulièrement ; mais bientôt, étouffant sous le poids du bonheur, il ne peut retenir cette exclamation : "Qu'il fait bon ici !"

Et quand il est au plus fort de cette béatitude, il copie avec une nouvelle ardeur : sa plume va plus vite que de coutume, ses yeux s'allument, il oublie de remettre le couvercle de sa tabatière, et, emporté par l'ivresse, il se lève tout à coup de sa place et revient bientôt dans le sanctuaire, apportant dans ses bras une énorme bûche ;

il s'approche du poêle, s'en écarte à diverses reprises, en ouvre la porte avec une règle, puis jette le morceau de bois en s'écriant : "Encore une allumette !" Et il reste quelques moments, debout, la bouche béante, à écouter avec délices la flamme qui fait trembler le tuyau en rendant un bruit sourd et agréable.

Si par malheur vous laissez la porte ouverte en entrant dans le bureau, le commis devient furieux, ses ongles se redressent, il gratte sa perruque, frappe du pied, jure, et vous entendez sortir d'entre les registres, les contrôles, les nombreux cahiers d'additions et de divisions, vous entendez sortir une voix glapissante qui crie : "Fermez la porte, corbleu ! vous ne savez donc pas lire ? Regardez l'avis qui est à la porte du comptoir. La chaleur va s'en aller, mâtin !"

Ne vous avisez pas de l'appeler commis ; dites au contraire : Monsieur l'employé.

L'employé a de longs ongles, et c'est un de ses plus doux passe-temps que de les gratter avec son grattoir.

L'employé apporte le matin son petit pain dans sa poche, ouvre son pupitre, prend sa casquette à larges bords verts et attend que le garçon lui ait apporté son déjeuner de beurre salé ou son fromage quotidien.

Lorsque le jour commence à baisser, l'employé se réjouit fort de voir la porte du comptoir s'entr'ouvrir et de voir entrer la personne qui doit allumer les quinquets.

Car le quinquet est pour le bureaucrate un long sujet de conversation, de discussion et une cause de disputes entre lui et ses semblables. À peine est-il allumé, qu'il regarde si la mèche est bonne, s'il ne file pas, et puis quand il a haussé le bouton à une hauteur démesurée, lorsqu'il a cassé cinq ou six verres, alors il se plaint amèrement de son sort, et dit souvent, avec l'accent de la plus profonde tristesse, que la lumière lui blesse la vue, et c'est pour s'en préserver qu'il a cette énorme casquette qui étend son ombre sur le papier de son voisin. Le voisin déclare qu'il est impossible d'écrire sans y voir, et veut lui faire ôter sa casquette ; mais le rusé commis l'enfonce davantage sur ses oreilles et il a même soin de mettre la gorgette.

Il va tous les dimanches au spectacle, se place aux secondes, ou au parterre : il siffle le lever du rideau et applaudit le vaudeville. Quand il est jeune, il va faire sa partie de dominos entre les entractes.

Quelquefois il perd, alors il rentre chez lui, casse deux assiettes, n'appelle plus sa femme mon épouse, oublie Azor, mange avidement le bouilli réchauffé de la veille, sale avec fureur les haricots, et puis s'endort dans des rêves de contrôle, de dégels, de repavages et de soustractions.

J'ai dit, je crois, tout ce qu'il y avait à dire sur le commis en général, ou du moins je sens que la patience du lecteur commence à se lasser. J'ai encore dans mes cartons de nombreuses observations sur les diverses espèces de ce genre, telles que le commis de barrière, le commis de rouenneries, le commis douanier, qui s'élève quelquefois jusqu'au rang de maître d'études, se lance dans la littérature et rédige des affiches et des feuillets ; le commis-voyageur, l'employé de mairie et mille autres encore.

Tel est le fruit ingrat des veilles de ma vie studieuse. Mais si des temps meilleurs se font plus tard sentir, si les orages politiques qui tendent à augmenter diminuent, eh bien ! je pourrai alors reparaître sur la scène et publier la suite de ce cours de zoologie, immense échelon social qui s'étend depuis le commis de barrière jusqu'au caissier de l'agent de change.

I

À moi donc mes souvenirs d'insomnie, à moi mes rêves de pauvre fou. Venez tous, venez tous, mes bons amis les diabolins, vous qui la nuit sautez sur mes pieds, courez sur mes vitres, montez au plafond et puis violets, verts, jaunes, noirs, blancs, avec de grandes ailes, de longues barbes, remuez les cloisons de la chambre, les ferrures de ma porte et de votre souffle faites vaciller la lampe qui pâlit sous vos lèvres verdâtres.

Je vous vois bien souvent dans les pâles nuits d'hiver venir tous paisiblement, couverts de grands manteaux bruns qui tranchent bien sur la neige des toits, avec vos petits crânes osseux comme des têtes de morts, - vous arrivez tous par le trou de ma serrure - et chacun va réchauffer ses longs ongles à la barre de ma cheminée qui jette encore une tiède chaleur.

Venez tous enfants de mon cerveau, donnez-moi pour le moment quelques-unes de vos folies, de vos rires étranges, et vous m'aurez épargné une préface comme les Modernes et une invocation à la muse comme les Anciens.

— ConteZ-nous votre voyage au Brésil, mon cher ami, disait par une belle soirée du mois d'août Mme de Lansac à son [neveu] Paul. - Cela amusera Adèle.

Or Adèle était une jolie blonde bien nonchalante qui se pendait à son bras, dans les allées sablées du parc.

M. Paul répondit : - mais ma tante j'ai fait un excellent voyage, je vous assure.

— Vous me l’avez déjà dit

— Ah, fit-il, et il se tut.

Le silence des promeneurs dura longtemps, et chacun marchait sans penser à son voisin, l’un effeuillant une rose, l’autre remuant de ses pieds le sable des allées, un troisième regardant la lune à travers les grands ormes que leurs branches entr’écartées laissaient apparaître limpide et calme.

Encore... la lune, mais elle doit nécessairement jouer un grand rôle. C’est le sine qua non de toute oeuvre lugubre, comme les claquements de dents et les cheveux hérissés. Mais enfin ce jour-là il y avait une lune.

Pourquoi me l’ôter ma pauvre lune ? Ô ma lune je t’aime. Tu reluis bien sur le toit escarpé du château, tu fais du lac une large bande d’argent et à ta pâle lueur chaque goutte d’eau de la pluie qui vient de tomber, chaque goutte d’eau dis-je, suspendue au bout d’une feuille de rose semble une perle sur un beau sein de femme. Ceci est bien vieux. Mais coupons là et revenons à nos moutons, comme dit Panurge.

Cependant dans cette nonchalance affectée, dans cet abandon rêveur de cette grande fille dont la taille se penche si gracieusement sur le bras de son cousin il y a je ne sais quoi de langoureux et de roucoulant, dans ces belles dents blanches qui se montrent pour sourire, dans ces cheveux blonds qui encadrent en larges boucles ce visage pâle et mignon - il y a dans tout cela un parfum d’amour qui porte à l’âme une sensation délicieuse.

Ce n’était point une beauté méridionale et ardente, - une de ces filles du Midi, à l’oeil brûlant comme un volcan, aux passions brûlantes aussi, - son oeil n’était pas noir, sa peau n’avait point un velouté d’Andalouse, mais c’était quelque chose d’une forme vaporeuse et mystique comme ces fées scandinaves, au cou d’albâtre, aux pieds nus sur la neige des montagnes, et qui apparaissent dans une belle nuit étoilée, sur le bord d’un torrent, légères et fugitives au garde qui chante ses chants d’amour.

Son regard était bleu et humide - son teint était pâle, c’était une de ces pauvres jeunes filles qui ont des gastrites de naissance, boivent de l’eau, tapotent sur un piano bruyant la musique de Liszt, aiment la poésie, les tristes rêveries, les amours mélancoliques, et ont des maux d'estomac.

Elle aimait - qui donc ? ses cygnes qui glissaient sur l'étang, - ses singes qui croquaient des noix que sa jolie main blanche leur passait à travers les barreaux de leurs cages, - et puis encore ses oiseaux, son écureuil, les fleurs du parc, ses beaux livres dorés sur tranche et... son cousin, son ami d'enfance M. Paul qui avait de gros favoris noirs, qui était grand et fort, qui [devait] l'épouser dans quinze jours.

Soyez sûr qu'elle sera heureuse avec un tel mari, c'est un homme sensé par excellence et je comprends dans cette catégorie tous ceux qui n'aiment point la poésie, qui ont un bon estomac et un coeur sec, qualités indispensables pour vivre jusqu'à cent ans et faire sa fortune. L'homme sensé est celui qui sait vivre sans payer ses dettes, sait goûter un bon verre de vin, profite de l'amour d'une femme [comme] d'un habit dont on se couvre pendant quelque temps et puis qui le jette avec toute la friperie des vieux sentiments qui sont passés de mode.

En effet, - vous répondra-t-il, qu'est-ce que l'amour ? - une sottise - j'en profite.

Et la tendresse ?

Une niaiserie, disent les géomètres, or je n'en ai point.

Et la poésie ?

Qu'est-ce que ça prouve ? aussi je m'en garde.

Et la religion ? - la patrie ? l'art ?

Fariboles et fadaises.

Pour l'âme, il y a longtemps que Cabanis et Bichat nous ont prouvé que les veines donnent au coeur et voilà tout -

Voilà l'homme sensé, celui qu'on respecte et qu'on honore, car il monte sa garde nationale, s'habille comme tout le monde, parle morale et philanthropie, vote pour les chemins de fer - et l'abolition des maisons de jeu.

Il a un château, une femme, un fils qui sera notaire, une fille qui se mariera à un chimiste. Si vous le rencontrez à l'Opéra, - il a des lunettes d'or, un habit noir, une canne et prend des pastilles de menthe pour chasser l'odeur du cigare car la pipe lui fait horreur, cela est si mauvais ton.

Paul n'avait point encore de femme mais il allait en prendre une - sans amour et par la raison que ce mariage-là doublerait sa fortune, et il n'avait eu besoin que de faire une simple addition pour voir qu'il serait riche alors de 50 mille livres de rente.

Au collègue il était fort en mathématiques.

Quant à la littérature il avait toujours trouvé ça bête.

La promenade dura longtemps, silencieuse et toute contemplative de la belle nuit bleue qui enveloppait les arbres, le bosquet, l'étang, dans un brouillard d'azur que perçaient les rayons de la lune comme si l'atmosphère eût été couverte d'un voile de gaze.

On ne rentra dans le salon que vers onze heures. Les bougies pétillaient et quelques roses tombées de la jardinière d'acajou étaient étendues sur le parquet ciré, pêle-mêle, effeuillées et foulées aux pieds.

— Qu'importe, il y en avait tant d'autres.

Adèle sentait ses souliers de satin humectés par la rosée. Elle avait mal à la tête et s'endormit sur le sofa - un bras pendant à terre.

Mme de Lansac était partie donner quelques ordres pour le lendemain et fermer toutes les portes, tous les verrous, il ne restait que Paul et Djalioh. Le premier regardait les candélabres dorés, la pendule de bronze dont le son argenté sonna minuit - le piano de Pape, - les tableaux, les fauteuils - la table de marbre blanc, le sofa tapissé - puis allant à la fenêtre et regardant vers le plus fourré du parc : Demain à 4 heures il y aura du lapin.

Quant à Djalioh il regardait la jeune fille endormie. - Il voulut dire un mot - mais il fut dit si bas, si craintif, qu'on le prit pour un soupir.

Si c'était un mot ou un soupir peu importe. Mais il y avait là dedans toute une âme.

III

Le lendemain en effet, par un beau lever de soleil, - le chasseur partit accompagné de sa grande levrette favorite, - de ses deux chiens bassets et du garde qui portait dans une large carnassière la poudre, les balles, le plomb, tous les ustensiles de chasse et un énorme pâté de canards que notre fiancé avait commandé lui-même depuis deux jours. Le piqueur sur son ordre donna du cor et ils s'avancèrent à grands pas vers la plaine.

Aussitôt à une fenêtre du second étage un contrevent vert s'ouvrit et une tête entourée de longs cheveux blonds apparut à travers le jasmin qui montait le long du mur et dont le feuillage tapissait les briques rouges et blanches du château.

Elle était en négligé - ou du moins vous l'auriez présumé d'après l'abandon de ses cheveux, le laisser-aller de sa pose et l'entre-bâillement de sa chemise garnie de mousseline, décolletée jusqu'aux épaules, et dont les manches ne venaient que jusqu'aux coudes. - Son bras était blanc, rond, charnu mais par malheur il s'égratigna quelque peu contre la muraille en ouvrant précipitamment la fenêtre pour voir partir Paul. Elle lui fit un signe de main et lui envoya un baiser.

Paul se détourna et après avoir regardé longtemps cette tête d'enfant fraîche et pure au milieu des fleurs, après avoir réfléchi que tout cela serait bientôt à lui et les fleurs et la jeune fille et l'amour qu'il y avait dans tout cela - il dit... Elle est gentille.

Alors une main blanche ferma l'auvent, - l'horloge sonna 4 heures, le coq se mit à chanter et un rayon de soleil passant à travers la charmille vint darder sur les ardoises du toit.

Tout redevint silencieux et calme.

À dix heures, - M. Paul n'était pas de retour. On sonna le déjeuner - et l'on [se] mit à table.

La salle était haute et spacieuse, meublée à la Louis XV. - Sur les dessus de la cheminée, on voyait à demi effacée par la poussière une scène pastorale. C'était une bergère bien poudrée, couverte de mouches, avec des paniers au milieu de ses blancs moutons, l'amour volait au-dessus d'elle et un joli carlin était étendu à ses pieds assis sur un tapis brodé où l'on voyait un bouquet de roses lié par un fil d'or. Aux corniches étaient suspendus des oeufs de pigeon enfilés les uns aux autres et peints en blanc, avec des taches vertes.

Les lambris étaient d'un blanc pâle et terni, décorés çà et là de quelques portraits de famille et puis des paysages colorés - représentant des vues de Norvège ou de Russie, des montagnes de neige - des moissons ou bien des vendanges. - Plus loin des gravures encadrées en noir. Ici c'est le portrait en pied de quelque président au parlement avec ses peaux d'hermine et sa perruque à trois marteaux, plus loin un cavalier allemand qui fait caracolier son cheval dont la queue longue et fournie se replie dans l'air et ondule comme les anneaux d'un serpent. Enfin quelques tableaux de l'école flamande avec ses scènes de cabaret, ses gaillardes figures toutes bouffies de bière et son atmosphère de fumée de tabac, sa joie, ses gros seins nus, ses gros rires sur de grosses lèvres et ce franc matérialisme qui règne depuis l'enfant dont la tête frisée se plonge dans un pot de vin jusqu'aux formes charnues de la bonne Vierge assise dans sa niche noircie et enfumée.

Du reste les fenêtres hautes et larges répandaient une vive lumière dans l'appartement qui malgré la vétusté de ces meubles ne manquait pas d'un certain air de jeunesse, - si vous aviez vu les deux fontaines de marbre aux deux bouts de la salle - et les dalles noires et blanches qui la pavaient. Mais le meuble principal, celui qui donnait le plus à penser et à sentir était un immense canapé bien vieux, bien doux, bien mollet, tout chamarré de vives couleurs, de vert, de jaune, d'oiseaux de paradis, de bouquets de fleurs, le tout parsemé richement sur un fond de satin blanc et moelleux. Là sans doute, bien des fois après que les domestiques avaient enlevé les débris du souper, - la châtelaine s'y rendait et assise sur ces frais coussins de satin, la pauvre femme attendait M. le Chevalier qui arrivait sans vouloir déranger personne pour prendre un rafraîchissement. Car par hasard il avait soif. Oui là sans doute plus d'une jolie marquise, plus d'une grande comtesse au court jupon, au teint rose, à la jolie main, au corsage étroit entendit de doux propos que maint gentil abbé philosophe et athée glissait au milieu d'une conversation sur les sensations et les besoins de l'âme. Oui il y eut là peut-être bien des petits soupirs, des larmes et des baisers furtifs.

.....

Et tout cela avait passé, les marquises, les abbés, les chevaliers, - les propos des gentilshommes, - tout s'était évanoui, tout avait coulé, fui - les baisers, les amours, les tendres épanchements, les séductions des talons rouges, - le canapé était resté à sa place sur ses quatre pieds d'acajou mais son bois était vermoulu, et sa garniture en or s'était ternie et effilée.

Djalioh était assis à côté d'Adèle. Celle-ci fit la moue en s'asseyant, - et recula sa chaise, rougit et se versa précipitamment du vin. Son voisin en effet n'avait rien d'agréable car depuis un mois qu'il était avec M. Paul dans le château, il n'avait pas encore parlé, il était fantasque selon les uns, mélancolique disaient les autres, stupide, fou - enfin muet ajoutaient les plus sages.

Il passait chez Mme de Lansac pour l'ami de M. Paul - un drôle d'ami, pensaient tous les gens qui le voyaient.

Il était petit, maigre et chétif. Il n'y avait que ses mains qui annonçassent quelque force dans sa personne. Ses doigts étaient courts, écrasés, munis d'ongles robustes et à moitié crochus. Quant au reste de son corps il était si faible et si débile, il était couvert d'une couleur si triste et si languissante que vous auriez gémi sur cet homme jeune encore et qui semblait né pour la tombe comme ces jeunes arbres qui vivent cassés et sans feuilles.

Son vêtement complètement noir rehaussait encore la couleur livide de son teint, car il était d'un jaune cuivré. Ses lèvres étaient grosses et laissaient voir deux rangées de longues dents blanches - comme celles des singes et des nègres.

Quant à sa tête elle était étroite et comprimée sur le devant mais par derrière elle prenait un développement prodigieux. Ceci s'observait sans peine car la rareté de ses cheveux laissait voir un crâne nu et ridé.

Il y avait sur tout cela un air de sauvagerie et de bestialité étrange et bizarre qui le faisait ressembler plutôt à quel[que] animal fantastique qu'à un être humain.

Ses yeux étaient ronds, grands, d'une teinte terne et fausse et quand le regard plombé de cet homme s'abaissait sur vous on se sentait sous le poids d'une étrange fascination. Et pourtant - il n'avait point sur les traits un air dur ni féroce, il souriait à tous les regards - mais ce [rire] était stupide et froid.

S'il eût ouvert la chemise qui touchait à cette peau épaisse et noire vous eussiez contemplé une large poitrine qui semblait celle d'un athlète tant les vastes poumons qu'elle contenait respiraient tout à l'aise sous cette poitrine velue.

Ô son coeur aussi était vaste et immense - mais vaste comme la mer, immense et vide comme sa solitude.

Souvent, en présence des forêts, des hautes montagnes, de l'Océan - son front plissé se déridait tout à coup - ses narines s'écartaient avec violence et toute son âme se dilatait devant la nature comme une rose qui s'épanouit au soleil et il tremblait de tous ses membres, sous le poids d'une volupté intérieure - et la tête entre ses deux mains il tombait dans une léthargique mélancolie. Alors dis-je, son âme brillait à travers son corps comme les beaux yeux d'une femme derrière un voile noir.

Car ces formes si laides, si hideuses, ce teint jaune et maladif, ce crâne rétréci, ces membres rachitiques, tout cela prenait un tel air de bonheur et d'enthousiasme, - il y avait tant de feu et de poésie dans ces vilains yeux de singe, qu'il semblait alors comme remué violemment par un galvanisme de l'âme.

La passion chez lui devait être rage et l'amour une frénésie.

Les fibres de son coeur étaient plus molles et plus sonores que celles des autres. La douleur se convertissait en des spasmes convulsifs et les jouissances en voluptés inouïes.

Sa jeunesse était fraîche et pure. Il avait 17 ans ou plutôt soixante, cent et des siècles entiers, tant il était vieux et cassé, usé et battu par tous les vents du coeur, par tous les orages de l'âme.

Demandez à l'océan combien il porte de rides au front, comptez les vagues de la tempête.

Il avait vécu longtemps, bien longtemps, non point par la pensée. Les méditations du savant ni les rêves n'avaient point occupé un instant dans toute sa vie. Mais il avait vécu et grandi de l'âme - et il était déjà vieux par le coeur.

Pourtant ses affections ne s'étaient tournées sur personne, car il avait en lui un chaos des sentiments les plus étranges, des sensations les plus étranges. La poésie avait remplacé la logique et les passions avaient pris la place de la science. Parfois il lui semblait entendre des voix qui lui parlaient derrière un buisson de roses et des mélodies qui tombaient des cieux.

La nature le possédait sous toutes ces forces, volupté de l'âme, passions brûlantes, appétits gloutons.

C'était le résumé d'une grande faiblesse morale et physique avec toute la véhémence du coeur mais d'un fragile et qui se brisait d'elle-même à chaque obstacle comme la foudre insensée qui renverse les palais, brûle les diadèmes, abat les chaumières et va se perdre dans une flaque d'eau.

Voilà le monstre de la nature qui était en contact avec M. Paul, cet autre monstre ou plutôt cette merveille de la civilisation et qui en portait tous les symboles, - grandeur de l'esprit, sécheresse du coeur. Autant l'un avait d'amour pour les épanchements de l'âme - les douces causeries du coeur - autant Djalioh aimait les rêveries de la nuit et les songes de sa pensée.

Son âme se prenait à ce qui était beau et sublime comme le lierre aux débris, les fleurs au printemps, la tombe au cadavre, le malheur à l'homme, s'y cramponnait et mourait avec lui.

Où l'intelligence finissait - le cœur prenait son empire. Il était vaste et infini, car il comprenait le monde dans son amour. Aussi il aimait Adèle, mais d'abord comme la nature entière, d'une sympathie douce et universelle, puis peu à peu cet amour augment(a), à mesure que sa tendresse sur les autres êtres diminuait.

En effet nous naissons tous avec une certaine somme de tendresse et d'amour que nous jetons gaiement sur les premières choses venues, des chevaux, des places, des honneurs, des trônes, des femmes, des voluptés, quoi, enfin ? à tous les vents, à tous les courants rapides.

— Mais réunissons-la et nous aurons un trésor immense.

Jetez des tonnes d'or à la surface du désert - le sable les engloutira bientôt mais réunissez-les en un monceau et vous formerez des pyramides.

Eh bien il concentra bientôt toute son âme sur une seule pensée, et il vécut de cette pensée.

IV

La fatale quinzaine s'était expirée et évanouie dans une longue attente pour la jeune fille, dans une froide indifférence pour son futur époux.

La première voyait dans le mariage un mari - des cachemires, une loge à l'Opéra - des courses au Bois de Boulogne - des bals tout l'hiver - Ô tant qu'elle voudra et puis encore tout ce qu'une fillette de 18 ans rêve dans ses songes dorés et dans son alcôve fermée.

Le mari au contraire voyait dans le mariage - une femme, des cachemires à payer - une petite poupée à habiller - et puis encore tout ce qu'un pauvre mari rêve lorsqu'il mène sa femme au bal. Celui-là pourtant était assez fat pour croire toutes les femmes amoureuses de lui-même.

C'est une question qu'il s'adressait [toutes les fois] qu'il se regardait dans sa glace et lorsqu'il avait bien peigné ses favoris noirs.

Il avait pris une femme parce qu'il s'ennuyait d'être seul chez lui et qu'il ne voulait plus avoir de maîtresse depuis qu'il avait découvert que son domestique en avait une. - En outre le mariage le forcera à rester chez lui et sa santé ne s'en trouvera que mieux. Il aura une excuse pour ne plus aller à la chasse et la chasse l'ennuie. Enfin la meilleure de toutes les raisons, il aura - de l'amour, du dévouement - du bonheur domestique, de la tranquillité, des enfants... bah bien mieux que tranquillité, bonheur, amour, 50 mille livres de rente en bonnes fermes, en jolis billets de banque qu'il placera sur les fonds d'Espagne.

Il avait été à Paris, avait acheté une corbeille de 10 mille francs, avait fait cent 20 invitations pour le bal et était revenu au château de sa belle-mère, le tout en 8 jours. C'était un homme prodigieux.

C'était donc par un dimanche de septembre que la noce eut lieu. Ce jour-là il faisait humide et froid, un brouillard épais pesait sur la vallée, le sable du jardin s'attachait aux frais souliers des dames.

La messe se dit à dix heures, peu de monde y assista. Djalioh s'y laissa pousser par le flot des villageois et entra.

L'encens brûlait sur l'autel, on respirait à l'entour un air chaud et parfumé.

L'église était basse, ancienne, petite, barbouillée de blanc. Le conservateur intelligent en avait ménagé les vitraux. Tout autour du chœur il y avait les conviés, le maire, son conseil municipal, des amis, le notaire, un médecin et les chantres en surplis blancs.

Tout cela avait des gants blancs, un air serein, chacun tirait de sa bourse une pièce de 5 francs dont le son argentin tombant sur le plateau interrompait la monotonie des chants d'église. La cloche sonnait.

Djalioh se ressouvint de l'avoir entendue un jour chanter aussi sur un cercueil, il avait vu également des gens vêtus de noir prier sur un cadavre et puis portant ses regards sur la fiancée en robe blanche courbée à l'autel avec des fleurs au front, et un triple collier de perles sur sa gorge nue et ondulante, une horrible pensée le glaça tout à coup.

— Il chancela et s'appuy[a] dans une niche de saint vide en grande partie, une figure seule restait, elle était grotesque et horrible à faire peur.

À côté d'elle il était là lui - son bien-aimé, celui qu'elle regardait si complaisamment avec ses yeux bleus et ses grands sourcils noirs comme deux diamants enchâssés dans l'ébène.

Il avait un lorgnon en écaille incrusté d'or et il lorgnait toutes les femmes en se dandinant sur son fauteuil de velours cramoisi.

Djalioh était là, debout, immobile et muet, sans qu'on remarquât ni la pâleur de sa face, ni l'amertume de son sourire, car on le croyait indifférent et froid comme le monstre de pierre qui grimaçait sur sa tête, et pourtant la tempête régnait en son âme et la colère couvait dans son coeur comme les volcans d'Islande sous leurs têtes blanchies par les neiges. Ce n'était point une frénésie brutale et expansive, mais l'action se passait intimement, sans cris, sans sanglots, sans blasphèmes, sans efforts. Il était muet et son regard ne parlait pas plus que ses lèvres, son oeil était de plomb et sa figure était stupide.

De jeunes et jolies femmes vivent longtemps avec un teint frais, une peau douce, blanche, satinée, - puis elles languissent, leurs yeux s'éteignent, s'affaiblissent, se ferment enfin - et puis cette femme gracieuse et légère qui courait les salons avec des fleurs dans les cheveux, dont les mains étaient si blanches, exhalaient une odeur de musc et de rose, eh bien un beau jour, un de vos amis s'il est médecin vous apprend que deux pouces plus bas que l'endroit où elle était décolletée elle avait un cancer et qu'elle est morte, la fraîcheur de sa peau était celle du cadavre, c'est là l'histoire de toutes les passions intimes, de tous ces sourires glacés.

Le rire de la malédiction est horrible, c'est un supplice de plus que de comprimer la douleur.

Ne croyez donc plus alors ni aux sourires, ni à la joie, à la gaieté. À quoi faut-il donc croire ?...

Croyez à la tombe.

Son asile est inviolable et son sommeil est profond.

Quel gouffre s'élargit sous nous à ce mot : éternité. Pensons un instant à ce que veulent dire ces mots, vie, mort, désespoir, joie, bonheur, demandez-vous un jour que vous pleurerez sur quelque tête chère, et que vous gémirez la nuit sur un grabat d'insomnie, demandez-vous pourquoi nous vivons, pourquoi nous mourons, et dans quel but, à quel souffle de malheur, à quel vent du désespoir, grains de sable que nous sommes, nous roulons ainsi dans l'ouragan ? Quelle est cette hydre qui s'abreuve de nos pleurs et se complait à nos sanglots ? pourquoi tout cela... et alors le vertige vous prend et l'on se sent entraîné vers un gouffre incommensurable au fond duquel on entend vibrer un gigantesque rire de damné.

Il est des choses dans la vie et des idées dans l'âme qui vous attirent fatalement vers les régions sataniques comme si votre tête était de fer et qu'un aimant de malheur vous y entraînât. Ô une tête de mort ! ses yeux caves et fixes, la teinte jaune de sa surface, sa mâchoire ébréchée, sera-ce donc là la réalité, et le Vrai serait-il le Néant ?

C'est dans cet abîme sans fond du doute le plus cuisant, de la plus amère douleur que se perdait Djalioh. En voyant cet air de fêtes, ces visages riants, en contemplant Adèle, son amour, sa vie, le charme de ses traits, la suavité de ses regards - il se demanda pourquoi tout cela lui était refusé, semblable à un condamné qu'on fait mourir de faim devant des vivres et que quelques barreaux de fer séparent de l'existence.

Il ignorait aussi pourquoi ce sentiment-là était distinct des autres. Car autrefois si quelqu'un dans la chaude Amérique venait lui demander une place à l'ombre de ses palmiers, un fruit de ses jardins, il l'offrait, pourquoi donc, se demandait-il, l'amour que j'ai pour elle est-il si exclusif et si entier ?

C'est que l'amour est un monde, l'unité est indivisible.

Et puis il baissa la tête sur sa poitrine et pleura longtemps en silence comme un enfant.

Une fois seulement il laissa échapper un cri rauque et perçant comme celui d'un hibou mais il alla se confondre avec la voix douce et mélodieuse de l'orgue qui chantait un Te Deum.

Les sons étaient purs et nourris, ils s'élevèrent en vibrant dans la nef et se mêlèrent avec l'encens...

Il s'aperçut ensuite qu'il y avait une grande rumeur dans la foule, que les chaises remuaient et qu'on sortait, un rayon de soleil pénétrait à travers les vitraux de l'église, il fit reluire le peigne en or de la fiancée et brilla pour quelques instants sur les barres dorées du cimetière, seule distance qui séparât la mairie de l'église.

L'herbe des cimetières est verte, haute, épaisse et bien nourrie. Les conviés eurent les pieds mouillés, leurs bas blancs et leurs escarpins reluisants furent salis. Ils jurèrent après les morts.

Le maire se trouvait à son poste, debout au haut d'une table carrée couverte d'un tapis vert.

Quand on en vint à prononcer le Oui fatal, M. Paul sourit, Adèle pâlit, et Mme de Lansac sortit son flacon de sels.

Adèle alors réfléchit. La pauvre fille n'en revenait pas d'étonnement, elle qui quelque temps auparavant, était si folle, si pensive, qui courait dans les prairies, qui lisait les romans, les vers, les contes, qui galopait sur sa jument grise à travers les allées de la forêt, qui aimait tant à entendre le bruissement des feuilles, le murmure des ruisseaux - elle se trouvait tout à coup une dame.

C'est-à-dire quelque chose qui a un grand châte, - et qui va seule dans les rues.

Tous ces vagues pressentiments, ces commotions intimes du coeur, ce besoin de poésie et de sensations qui la faisaient rêver sur l'avenir, sur elle-même, tout cela allait se trouver expliqué, pensait-elle. Comme si elle allait se réveiller d'un songe.

Hélas, tous ces pauvres enfants du coeur et de l'imagination allaient se trouver étouffés au berceau entre les soins du ménage et les caresses qu'il faudra prodiguer à un être hargneux qui a des rhumatismes et des cors aux pieds et qu'on appelle : - un mari.

Quand la foule s'écartera pour laisser passer le cortège, Adèle se sentit la main piquée comme par une griffe de fer. C'était Djalioh qui en passant l'avait égratignée avec ses ongles. Son gant déchiré devint rouge de sang. Elle s'entoura de son mouchoir de batiste. En se retournant pour monter en calèche elle vit encore Djalioh appuyé sur le marchepied - un frisson la saisit et elle s'élança dans la voiture.

Il était pâle [comme] la robe de la mariée. Ses grosses lèvres crevassées par la fièvre et couvertes de boutons se remuaient vivement comme quelqu'un qui parle vite, - ses paupières clignotaient et sa prunelle roulait lentement dans son orbite, comme les idiots -

V

Le soir il y eut un bal au château et des lampions à toutes les fenêtres.

Il y avait [de] nombreux cortèges d'équipages, de chevaux et de valets.

De temps en temps on voyait une lumière apparaître à travers les ormes. Elle s'approchait de plus en plus en suivant mille détours, dans les tortueuses allées, enfin elle s'arrêtait devant le perron, avec une calèche tirée par des chevaux ruisselants de sueur. Alors la portière s'ouvrait et une femme descendait, - elle était jeune ou vieille, laide ou belle, en rose ou en blanc, comme vous voudrez, et puis après avoir rétabli l'économie de sa coiffure par quelques coups de main donnés à la hâte, dans le vestibule à la lueur des quinquets et au milieu des arbres verts et des fleurs et du gazon qui tapissaient les murs, elle abandonnait son manteau et son boa aux laquais, elle entra. On ouvre les portes à deux battants, on l'annonce, il se fait un grand bruit de chaises et de pieds. On se lève, on fait un salut et puis il s'ensuit ces mille et une causeries, ces petits riens, ces charmantes futilités qui bourdonnent dans les salons et qui voltigent de côtés et d'autres comme des brouillards légers dans une serre chaude.

La danse commença à dix heures.

Et au dedans on entendait le glissement des souliers sur le parquet, le frôlement des robes, le bruit de la musique, les sons de la danse.

Et au dehors, le bruissement des feuilles, les voitures qui roulaient au loin sur la terre mouillée, les cygnes qui battaient de l'aile sur l'étang, les aboiements de quelque chien du village après les sons qui partaient du château et puis quelques causeries naïves et railleuses de paysans dont les têtes apparaissaient à travers les vitres du salon.

Dans un coin était un groupe de jeunes gens, les amis de Paul, ses anciens compagnons de plaisir, en gants jaunes ou azurés, avec des lorgnons, des fracs en queue de morue, des têtes moyen âge et des barbes comme Rembrandt et toute l'école Flamande n'en vit et n'en rêva jamais.

— Dis-moi donc de grâce, disait l'un d'eux, membre du Jockey-Club, quelle est cette mine renfrognée et plissée comme une vieille, celle qui est là derrière la causeuse où est ta femme ?

— Ça ? - C'est Djalioh.

— Qui est-ce Djalioh ?

— Oh ceci, c'est toute une histoire.

— Conte-nous-la, dit un des jeunes gens qui avait des cheveux aplatis sur les deux oreilles et la vue basse, puisque nous n'avons rien pour nous amuser.

— Au moins du punch, repartit vivement un monsieur, grand, maigre, pâle et aux pommettes saillantes.

— Quant à moi je n'en prendrai pas et pour cause, c'est trop fort.

Des cigares, dit le membre du Jockey-Club.

— Fi des cigares, y penses-tu Ernest, devant des femmes.

— Elles en sont folles au contraire, j'ai dix maîtresses qui fument comme des dragons, dont deux ont culotté à elles seules toutes mes pipes.

— Moi j'en ai une qui boit du kirsch à ravir.

— Buvons, dit un des amis qui n'aimait ni les cigares, ni le punch, ni la danse, ni la musique.

— Non, que Paul nous conte son histoire.

— Mes chers amis, elle n'est pas longue, la voilà tout entière. C'est que j'ai parié avec M. Petterwell, un de mes amis qui est planteur au Brésil, un ballot de Virginie contre Mirsa, une de ses esclaves, que les singes... Oui, qu'on peut élever un singe, c'est-à-dire qu'il m'a défié de faire passer un singe pour un homme.

— Eh bien Djaliouh est un singe ?

— Imbécile, pour ça non.

— Mais enfin...

— C'est qu'il faut vous expliquer que dans mon voyage au Brésil je me suis singulièrement amusé. Petterwell avait une esclave noire nouvellement débarquée du vieux canal de Bahama, diable m'emporte si je me rappelle son nom. - Enfin, cette femme-là n'avait pas de mari. Le ridicule ne devait tomber sur personne. - Elle était bien jolie. Je l'achetai à Petterwell, jamais la sotte ne voulait de moi, elle me trouvait probablement plus laid qu'un sauvage.

Tous se mirent à rire, Paul rougit.

— Enfin un beau jour, comme je m'ennuyais, j'achetai à un nègre le plus bel orang-outang qu'on eût jamais vu. - Depuis longtemps l'Académie des sciences s'occupait de la solution d'un problème : savoir s'il pouvait y avoir un métis de singe et d'homme.

Moi j'avais à me venger d'une petite sotte de négresse et voilà qu'un jour après mon retour de la chasse, je trouve mon singe, que j'avais enfermé dans ma chambre avec l'esclave, évadé et parti, l'esclave en pleurs et toute ensanglantée des griffes de Bell. Quelques semaines [après] elle sentit des douleurs de ventre et des maux de coeur. Bien, enfin cinq mois après, elle vomit pendant plusieurs jours consécutifs. J'étais pour le coup presque sûr de mon affaire. Une fois elle eut une attaque de nerfs si violente qu'on la saigna des quatre membres car j'aurais été au désespoir de la voir mourir. - Bref au bout de sept mois un beau jour elle accoucha sur le fumier, elle en mourut quelques heures après mais le poupon se portait à ravir. J'étais ma foi bien content, la question était résolue.

J'ai envoyé de suite le procès-verbal à l'Institut et le ministre à sa requête m'envoya la croix d'honneur.

— Tant pis, mon cher Paul, c'est bien canaille maintenant.

— Raison d'écolier. Ça plaît aux femmes, elles regardent ça en souriant pendant qu'on leur parle. Enfin j'élevai l'enfant, je l'aimai comme un père.

— Ah ah, fit un monsieur qui avait des dents blanches et qui riait toujours, pourquoi ne l'avez-vous pas amené en France dans vos autres voyages ?

— J'ai préféré le faire rester dans sa patrie jusqu'à mon départ définitif, d'autant plus que l'âge fixé par le pari était seize ans car il fut conclu la première année de mon arrivée à Janeiro. Bref, j'ai gagné Mirsa, j'ai eu la croix à vingt ans, et de plus j'ai fait un enfant par des moyens inusités.

— Infernal, dantesque, dit un ami pâle.

— Risible, cocasse, dit un autre qui avait de grosses joues et un teint rouge.

— Bravo, dit le cavalier.

— À faire crever de rire, dit en se tordant de plaisir sur une causeuse élastique un homme sautant et frétilant comme une carpe, petit, court, au front plat, aux yeux petits, le nez épaté, les lèvres minces, rond comme une pomme et bourgeonné comme un cantaloup.

Le coup était fameux et partait d'un maître, jamais un homme ordinaire n'aurait fait cela.

— Eh bien que fait-il Djalioh ? aime-t-il les cigares ? dit le fumeur en en présentant plein les deux mains et en les laissant tomber avec intention sur les genoux d'une dame.

— Du tout mon cher, il les a en horreur.

— Chasse-t-il ?

— Encore moins, les coups de fusil lui font peur.

— Sûrement il travaille, il lit, il écrit tout le jour.

— Il faudrait pour cela qu'il sache lire et écrire.

— Aime-t-il les chevaux ? demanda le convalescent.

— Du tout.

— C'est donc un animal inerte et sans intelligence. Aime-t-il le sexe ?

— Un jour je l'ai mené chez les filles et il s'est enfui emportant une rose et un miroir.

— Décidément c'est un idiot, fit tout le monde.

Et le groupe se sépara pour aller grimacer et faire des courbettes devant les dames qui de leur côté, bâillaient et minaudaient en l'absence des danseurs. L'heure avançait rapidement au son de la musique qui bondissait sur le tapis entre la danse et les femmes. Minuit sonna pendant qu'on galopait.

Djalioh était assis depuis le commencement du bal sur un fauteuil à côté des musiciens. De temps en temps il quittait sa place et changeait de côté. - Si quelqu'un de la fête, gai et insouciant, heureux du bruit, content des vins, enivré enfin de toute cette chaîne de femmes aux seins nus, aux lèvres souriantes, aux doux regards, l'apercevait, - aussitôt il devenait pâle et triste.

Voilà pourquoi sa présence gênait et qu'il paraissait là comme un fantôme ou un démon. - Une fois les danseurs fatigués s'assirent.

Tout alors devint plus calme, on passa de l'orgeat et le bruit seul des verres sur les plateaux interrompait le bourdonnement de toutes les voix qui parlaient.

Le piano était ouvert, un violon était dessus, un archet à côté.

Djalioh saisit l'instrument, il le tourna plusieurs fois entre ses mains comme un enfant qui manie un jouet. Il toucha à l'archet et le plia si fort qu'il faillit le briser plusieurs fois.

Enfin il approcha le violon de son menton. Tout le monde se mit à rire, tant la musique était fausse, bizarre, incohérente. Il regarda tous ces hommes, toutes ces femmes, assis, courbés, pliés, étalés sur des banquettes, des chaises, des fauteuils, avec de grands yeux ébahis.

Il ne comprenait pas tous ces rires et cette joie subite.

Il continua :

Les sons étaient d'abord lents, mols, l'archet effleurait les cordes et les parcourait depuis le chevalet jusqu'aux chevilles sans rendre presque aucun son, puis, peu à peu sa tête s'anima, s'abaissant graduellement sur le bois du violon, son front se plissa, ses yeux se fermèrent et l'archet sautillait sur les cordes comme une balle élastique à bonds précipités.

La musique était saccadée, remplie de notes aiguës, de cris déchirants. On se sentait en l'entendant sous le poids d'une oppression terrible comme si toutes ces notes eussent été de plomb et qu'elles eussent pesé sur la poitrine.

Et puis c'était des arpèges hardis, des octaves qui montaient - comme une flèche gothique - des notes qui couraient en masse et puis qui s'envolaient - des sauts précipités - des accords chargés.

Et tous ces sons, tout ce bruit de cordes et de notes qui sifflent, sans mesure, sans chant, sans rythme - une mélodie nulle, - des pensées vagues et coureuses qui se succédaient comme une ronde de démons, - ou des rêves qui passent et s'enfuient poussés par d'autres dans un tourbillon sans repos, dans une course sans relâche.

Djalioh tenait avec force le manche de l'instrument et chaque fois qu'un de ses doigts se relevait de la touche, son ongle faisait vibrer la corde qui sifflait en mourant.

Quelquefois il s'arrêtait, effrayé du bruit, - souriait bêtement et reprenait avec plus d'amour le cours de sa rêverie, - enfin fatigué il s'arrêta, écouta longtemps pour voir si tout cela allait revenir - mais rien, la dernière vibration de la dernière note était morte d'épuisement. Chacun se regarda, étonné d'avoir laissé durer si longtemps un si étrange vacarme. - La danse recommença. - Comme il était près de trois heures on dansa un cotillon. Les jeunes femmes seules restaient. Les vieilles étaient parties ainsi que les hommes mariés et poitrinaires.

On ouvrit donc pour faciliter la valse la porte du salon, celles du billard et de la salle à manger, qui se succédaient immédiatement. Chacun prit sa valseuse, on entendit le son fêlé de l'archet qui frappait le pupitre et l'on se mit en train.

Djalioh était debout, appuyé sur un battant de la porte. La valse passait devant lui tournoyante, bruyante, avec des rires et de la joie.

Chaque fois il voyait Adèle tournoyer devant lui et puis disparaître - revenir - et disparaître - encore.

Chaque fois il la voyait s'appuyer sur un bras qui soutenait sa taille, fatiguée qu'elle était de la danse et des plaisirs - et chaque fois il sentait en lui un démon qui frémissait et un instinct sauvage qui rugissait dans son âme, comme un lion dans sa cage.

Chaque fois, à la même mesure répétée, - au même coup d'archet, à la même note, au bout d'un même temps, il voyait passer devant [lui] le bas d'une robe blanche à fleurs roses et deux souliers de satin qui s'entrebâillaient, et cela dura longtemps.

Vingt minutes environ. La danse s'arrêta, oppressée elle essuya son front et puis elle repartit plus légère, plus sauteuse, plus folle et plus rose que jamais.

C'était un supplice infernal, une douleur de damné. Quoi, sentir dans sa poitrine, toutes les forces qu'il faut pour aimer, et avoir l'âme navrée d'un feu brûlant et puis ne pouvoir éteindre le volcan qui vous consume et ni briser ce lien qui vous attache. - Être là attaché à un roc aride, la soif à la gorge, comme Prométhée, voir sur son ventre un vautour qui vous dévore - et ne pouvoir dans sa colère le saisir de ses deux mains et l'écraser.

Ô pourquoi, se demandait Djalioh dans son amère douleur, la tête baissée pendant que la valse courait et tourbillonnait folle de plaisir et que les femmes dansaient et que la musique vibrait en chantant, pourquoi donc ne suis-je pas comme tout cela, heureux, dansant - pourquoi suis-je laid comme cela et pourquoi ces femmes ne le sont-elles [pas], pourquoi fuient-elles quand je souris, pourquoi donc je souffre ainsi et je m'ennuie et je me hais moi-même ? Ô si je pouvais la prendre - elle - et puis déchirer tous les habits qui la couvrent, mettre en pièces et en morceaux, les voiles qui la cachent, et puis la prendre dans mes deux bras, fuir avec elle bien loin à travers les bois, les prés, les prairies, traverser les mers - et enfin arriver enfin à l'ombre d'un palmier et puis là la regarder bien longtemps et faire qu'elle me regarde aussi - qu'elle me saisisse de ses deux bras nus - et puis... ah... et il pleurait de rage.

Les lampes s'éteignaient,... la pendule sonna cinq heures. - On entendit quelques voitures qui s'arrêtaient, et puis danseurs et danseuses prirent leurs vêtements et partirent.

Les valets fermèrent les auvents et sortirent.

Djalioh était resté à sa place et quand il releva la tête - tout avait disparu, les femmes, - la danse et les sons, tout s'était envolé et la dernière lampe pétillait encore dans quelques gouttes d'huile qui lui restaient à vivre.

En ce moment-là l'aube apparut à l'horizon derrière les tilleuls.

VI

Il prit une bougie et monta dans sa chambre.

Après avoir ôté son habit et ses souliers il sauta sur son lit, abaissa sa tête sur son oreiller et voulut dormir.

Mais impossible.

Il entendait dans sa tête un bourdonnement prolongé, un fracas singulier, une musique bizarre. - La fièvre battait dans ses artères et les veines de son front étaient vertes et gonflées. Son sang bouillonnait dans ses veines, lui montait au cerveau et l'étouffait.

Il se leva et ouvrit sa fenêtre. L'air frais du matin calma ses sens. Le jour commençait, - et les nuages fuyaient avec la lune aux premiers rayons de la clarté. La nuit il regarda longtemps les mille formes fantastiques que dessinent les nuages, puis il tourna sa vue sur sa bougie dont le disque lumineux éclairait ses rideaux de soie verte.

Enfin au bout d'une heure il sortit.

La nuit durait presque encore, et la rosée était suspendue à chaque feuille des arbres. Il avait plu longtemps, les allées foulées par les roues des voitures étaient grasses et boueuses. Djaliouh s'enfonça dans les plus tortueuses et les plus obscures.

Il se promena longtemps dans le parc, foulant à ses pieds les premières feuilles d'automne, jaunies et emportées par les vents. Marchant sur l'herbe mouillée, à travers la charmille au bruit de la brise qui agitait les arbres, il entendait dans le lointain les premiers sons de la nature qui s'éveille.

Qu'il est doux de rêver ainsi en écoutant avec délices le bruit de ses pas sur les feuilles sèches et sur le bois mort que le pied brise, de [se] laisser aller dans des chemins sans barrière, comme le courant de la rêverie qui emporte votre âme, et puis une pensée triste et poignante souvent vous saisit longtemps en contemplant ces feuilles qui tombent, ces arbres qui gémissent et cette nature entière qui chante tristement à son réveil comme au sortir du tombeau. Et alors quelque tête chérie vous apparaît dans l'ombre, une mère, une amie, et les fantômes qui passent le long du mur noir, tous graves et dans des surplis blancs. - Et puis le passé revient aussi comme un autre fantôme, le passé avec ses peines, ses douleurs, ses larmes et ses quelques rires - enfin l'avenir qui se montre à son tour - plus varié, plus indéfini, entouré d'une gaze légère comme ces sylphides longtemps rêvées qui s'élèvent d'un buisson et qui s'envolent avec les oiseaux.

On aime à entendre le vent qui passe à travers les arbres en faisant plier leur tête et qui chante comme un convoi des morts, - et dont le souffle agite vos cheveux et rafraîchit votre front brûlant.

C'était dans des pensers plus terribles - qu'était perdu Djalioh.

Une mélancolie rêveuse pleine de caprice et de fantaisie - provient d'une douleur tiède et longue. Mais le désespoir est matériel et palpable.

C'était au contraire la réalité qui l'écrasait.

Ô la réalité, fantôme lourd comme un cauchemar et qui pourtant n'est qu'une durée comme l'esprit.

Pour lui, que lui faisait le passé qui était perdu et l'avenir qui se résumait dans un mot insignifiant : la mort ? Mais c'était le présent qu'il avait, la minute, l'instant qui l'obsédait.

C'était ce présent même qu'il voulait anéantir, le briser du pied, l'égorger de ses mains. Lorsqu'il pensait à lui, pauvre et désespéré, les bras vides, le bal et ses fleurs et ces femmes, Adèle et ses seins nus et son épaule et sa main blanche, lorsqu'il pensait à tout cela un rire sauvage éclatait sur sa bouche et retentissait dans ses dents comme un tigre qui a faim et qui se meurt. Il voyait dans son esprit le sourire de Paul, les baisers de sa femme. - Il les voyait tous deux étendus sur une couche soyeuse s'entrelaçant de leurs bras avec des soupirs et des cris de volupté, il voyait jusqu'aux draps qu'ils tordaient dans leurs étreintes, jusqu'aux fleurs qui étaient sur les tables et les tapis et les meubles et tout enfin qui était là, et quand il reportait la vue sur lui entouré des arbres, marchant sur l'herbe seul et les branches cassées, il tremblait. Il comprenait aussi la distance immense qui l'en séparait et quand il en venait à se demander pourquoi tout cela était ainsi, alors une barrière infranchissable se présentait devant lui - et un voile noir obscurcissait sa pensée.

Pourquoi Adèle n'était-elle pas à lui ? Ô s'il l'avait, comme il serait heureux de la tenir dans ses bras, de reposer sa tête sur sa poitrine et de la couvrir de ses baisers brûlants - et il pleurerait en sanglotant.

Ô s'il avait su comme nous autres hommes comment la vie quand elle vous obsède s'en va et part vite avec la gâchette d'un pistolet - s'il avait su que pour six sols un homme est heureux - et que la rivière engloutit bien les morts !... mais non, - le malheur est dans l'ordre de la nature. - Elle nous a donné le sentiment de l'existence pour le garder plus longtemps.

Il arriva bientôt aux bords de l'étang. Les cygnes s'y jouaient avec leurs petits, ils glissaient sur le cristal les ailes ouvertes et le cou replié sur le dos. Les plus gros, le mâle et la femelle, nageaient ensemble au courant rapide de la petite rivière qui traversait l'étang, de temps en temps, ils tournaient l'un vers l'autre leur long cou blanc et se regardaient en nageant, puis ils revenaient derrière eux, se plongeaient dans l'eau et battaient de l'aile sur la surface de l'eau qui se trouvait agitée de leurs jeux lorsque leur poitrine s'avavançait comme la proue d'une nacelle.

Djalioh contempla la grâce de leurs mouvements et la beauté de leurs formes. - Et il se demanda pourquoi il n'était pas cygne et beau comme ces animaux. Lorsqu'il s'approchait de quelqu'un on s'enfuyait, on le méprisait parmi les hommes. Que n'était-il donc beau comme eux, - pourquoi le ciel ne l'avait-il pas fait cygne, oiseau, quelque chose de léger, qui chante et qu'on aime ? - ou plutôt que n'était-il le néant ? Pourquoi, disait-il en faisant courir une pierre du bout de son pied, - pourquoi ne suis-je pas comme cela, je [la] frappe, [elle] court, et ne souffre pas. Alors il sauta dans la barque, détacha la chaîne, prit les rames et alla aborder de l'autre côté dans la prairie qui commençait à se parsemer de bestiaux.

Après quelques instants, il revint vers le château. Les domestiques avaient déjà ouvert les fenêtres et rangé le salon.

La table était mise car il était près de neuf [heures], tant la promenade de Djalioh avait été lente et longue.

Le temps passe vite dans la joie, vite aussi dans les larmes et ce vieillard court toujours sans perdre haleine.

Cours vite, marche sans relâche, fauche et abats sans pitié, - Vieille Chose à cheveux blancs. Marche, et cours toujours, traîne ta misère, toi qui es condamné à vivre et mène-nous bien vite dans la fosse commune, où tu jettes ainsi tout ce qui barre ton chemin.

VII

Après le déjeuner, la promenade, car le soleil perçant les nuages

commençait à se montrer. -

Les dames voulurent se promener en barque. La fraîcheur de l'eau les délasserait de leurs fatigues de la nuit. -

La société se divisa en trois bandes. Dans la même étaient Paul, Djalioh et Adèle. Elle avait l'air fatigué et le teint pâle. Sa robe était de mousseline bleue avec des fleurs blanches. Elle était plus belle que jamais.

Adèle accompagna son époux, par sentiment des convenances.

Djalioh ne comprit pas cela. Autant son âme embrassait tout ce qui était de sympathie et d'amour, autant son esprit résistait à tout ce que nous appelons : - délicatesse, usage, honneur, pudeur et convenance. Il se mit sur le devant et rama.

Au milieu de l'étang était une petite île formée à dessein pour servir de refuge aux cygnes, elle était plantée de rosiers dont les branches pliées se miraient dans l'eau en y laissant quelques fleurs fanées. La jeune femme émietta un morceau de pain, puis le jeta sur l'eau et aussitôt les cygnes accoururent, allongeant leur cou pour saisir les miettes qui couraient emportées par la rivière.

Chaque fois qu'elle se penchait et que la main blanche s'allongeait, Djalioh sentait son haleine passer dans ses cheveux et ses joues effleurant sa tête, - qui était brûlante.

L'eau du lac était limpide et calme mais la tempête était dans son coeur, plusieurs fois il crut devenir fou - et il portait les mains à son front, comme un homme en délire ou qui croit rêver.

Il ramait vite et cependant la barque avançait moins que les autres tant ses mouvements étaient saccadés et convulsifs. De temps en temps son oeil terne et gris se tournait lentement sur Adèle et se reportait sur [Paul]. Il paraissait calme, - mais comme le calme de la cendre qui couvre un brasier et puis l'on [n']entendait que la rame qui tombait dans l'eau, l'eau qui clapotait lentement sur les flancs de la nacelle et quelques mots échangés entre les époux - et puis ils se regardaient en souriant - et les cygnes couraient en nageant sur l'étang. - Le vent faisait tomber quelques feuilles sur les promeneurs et le soleil brillait au loin sur les vertes prairies où serpentait la rivière, et la barque glissait entre tout cela rapide et silencieuse.

Djalioh, une fois, se ralentit, porta sa main à ses yeux et [la] retira quelques instants après toute chaude et toute humide. Il reprit ses rames et les pleurs qui coulaient sur ses mains se perdirent dans le ruisseau. M. Paul, voyant qu'il était éloigné de la compagnie, prit la main d'Adèle et déposa sur son gant satiné un long baiser de bonheur qui retentit aux oreilles de Djalioh.

Madame de Lansac avait une quantité de singes. C'est une passion de vieille femme, seules créatures qui avec les chiens ne repoussent pas leur amour.

Ceci est dit sans maligne intention et s'il y en avait une ce serait plutôt pour plaire aux jeunes qui les haïssent mortellement. Lord Byron disait qu'il ne pouvait voir sans dégoût manger une jolie femme, il n'a peut-être jamais pensé à la société de cette femme, quelque 40 ans plus tard et qui se résumera [en] son carlin et sa guenon. Toutes les femmes que vous voyez si jeunes et si fraîches, eh bien si elles ne meurent pas avant la soixantaine, auront donc un jour la manie des chiens au lieu de celle des hommes et vivront avec un singe au lieu d'un amant.

Hélas c'est triste mais c'est vrai et puis après avoir ainsi jauni pendant une douzaine d'années et racorni comme un vieux parchemin au coin de son feu en compagnie d'un chat, d'un roman, - de son dîner et de sa bonne, cet ange de beauté mourra et deviendra un cadavre, c'est-à-dire une charogne qui pue et puis un peu de poussière, le néant... de l'air fétide emprisonné dans une tombe.

Il y a des gens que je vois toujours à l'état de squelette et dont le teint jaune me semble bien pétri de la terre qui va les contenir.

Je n'aime guère les singes et pourtant j'ai tort, car ils me semblent une imitation parfaite de la nature humaine. Quand je vois un de ces animaux (je ne parle pas ici des hommes) il me semble me voir dans les miroirs grossissants, mêmes sentiments, - mêmes appétits brutaux, - un peu moins d'orgueil et voilà tout.

Djalioh se sentait attiré vers eux par sympathie étrange. Il restait souvent des heures entières à les contempler, plongé dans une méditation profonde ou dans une observation des plus minutieuses.

Adèle s'approcha de leurs cages communes (car les jeunes femmes aiment quelquefois les singes probablement comme symboles de leurs époux) et leur jeta des noisettes et des gâteaux. - Aussi[tôt] ils s'élançèrent dessus, se chamaillant, s'arrachant les morceaux, comme des députés les miettes qui tombent du fauteuil ministériel et poussant des cris comme des avocats.

Un surtout s'empara du plus gros gâteau, le mangea bien vite, prit la plus belle noisette, la cassa avec ses ongles, l'éplucha et jeta les coquilles à ses compagnons d'un air de libéralité. Il avait tout autour de la tête une couronne de poils clairsemés sur son crâne rétréci, qui le faisait ressembler passablement à un roi.

Un second était humblement assis dans un coin, les yeux baissés d'un air modeste comme un prêtre et prenant par-derrière tout ce qu'il ne pouvait pas voler en face.

Un troisième enfin - c'était une femelle - avait les chairs flasques, le poil long, les yeux bouffis, il allait et venait de tous côtés avec des gestes lubriques qui faisaient rougir les demoiselles, - mordant les mâles, les pinçant et sifflant à leurs oreilles, celui-là ressemblait à mainte fille de joie de ma connaissance.

Tout le monde riait de leurs gentilleses et de leurs manières, c'était si drôle. Djalioh seul ne riait pas, assis par terre, les genoux à la hauteur de la tête, les bras sur les jambes et les yeux à demi morts tournés vers un seul point.

L'après-midi on partit pour Paris. Djalioh était encore placé en face d'Adèle, comme si la fatalité se plaisait perpétuellement à rire de ses douleurs.

Chacun fatigué s'endormait au doux balancement des soupentes et au bruit des roues qui allaient lentement dans les grandes ornières creusées par la pluie et les pieds des chevaux enfonçaient en glissant dans la boue.

Une glace ouverte derrière Djalioh donnait de l'air dans la voiture et le vent soufflait sur ses épaules et dans son cou.

Tous laissaient aller leurs têtes sommeillantes au mouvement de la calèche.

Djalioh seul ne dormait pas et la tenait baissée sur sa poitrine.

IX

On était aux premiers jours du mois de mai. Il était alors je crois sept heures du matin. - Le soleil se levait et illuminait de sa splendeur tout Paris qui s'éveillait par un beau jour de printemps.

Mme Paul de Monville s'était levée de bonne heure et s'était retirée dans un salon pour y terminer bien vite avant l'heure du bain, du déjeuner et de la promenade, un roman de Balzac.

La rue qu'habitaient les mariés était dans le faubourg Saint-Germain, déserte, large et toute couverte de l'ombre que jetaient les grands murs, les hôtels hauts et élevés et les jardins qui se prolongeaient avec leurs acacias, leurs tilleuls dont les touffes épaisses et frémissantes retombaient par-dessus les murs où les brins d'herbe perçaient entre les pierres.

Rarement on entendait du bruit si ce n'est celui de quelque équipage roulant sur le pavé avec ses deux chevaux blancs, ou bien encore la nuit celui de la jeunesse revenant d'une orgie ou d'un spectacle avec quelques ribaudes aux seins nus, aux yeux rouges, aux vêtements déchirés.

C'était dans un de ces hôtels qu'habitait Djalioh, avec M. Paul et sa femme.

Et depuis bientôt deux ans il s'était passé bien des choses dans son âme, et les larmes contenues y avaient creusé une fosse profonde.

Un matin, c'était ce jour-là dont je vous parle, il se leva, - et sortit dans le jardin où un enfant d'un an environ, entouré de mousseline, de gaze, de broderies, d'écharpes colorées, - dormait dans un berceau en nacelle dont la flèche était dorée aux rayons du soleil.

Sa bonne était absente, il regarda de tous côtés, s'approcha près, bien près du berceau, ôta vivement la couverture, et puis il resta quelque temps, à contempler cette pauvre créature sommeillante et endormie avec ses mains potelées, ses formes arrondies, - son cou blanc, ses petits ongles. Enfin il le prit dans ses deux mains, le fit tourner en l'air sur sa tête - et le lança de toutes ses forces sur le gazon - qui retentit du coup. L'enfant poussa un cri et sa cervelle alla jaillir à dix pas auprès d'une giroflée.

Djalioh ouvrit ses lèvres pâles et poussa un rire forcé qui était froid et terrible comme le regard des morts. Aussitôt il s'avança vers la maison, monta l'escalier, ouvrit la porte de la salle à manger, la referma, prit la clef, celle du corridor également, et arrivé au vestibule du salon, il les jeta par la fenêtre dans la rue. Enfin il entra dans le salon, doucement sur la pointe des pieds et une fois entré il ferma à double tour.

Un demi-jour l'éclairait à peine tant les persiennes soigneusement fermées laissaient entrer peu de lumière.

Djalioh s'arrêta et il n'entendit que le bruit des feuillettes que retournait la jolie main blanche d'Adèle, étendue mollement sur son sofa de velours rouge et le gazouillement des oiseaux de la volière qui étaient sur la terrasse et dont on entendait à travers les jalousies vertes les battements d'ailes sur le treillage en fer.

Dans un coin du salon à côté de la cheminée était une jardinière en acajou toute remplie de fleurs embaumantes, roses, blanches, bleues, hautes ou touffues avec un feuillage vert, une tige polie et qui se miraient par-derrière dans une grande glace.

Enfin il s'approcha de la jeune fille et s'assit à côté d'elle. Elle tressaillit subitement et porta sur lui ses yeux bleus égarés. Sa robe de chambre de mousseline blanche était flottante, ouverte sur le devant et ses deux jambes croisées dessinaient malgré ses vêtements la forme de ses cuisses.

Il y avait tout autour d'elle un parfum enivrant, ses gants blancs jetés sur le fauteuil avec sa ceinture, son mouchoir, son fichu, tout cela avait une odeur [si] délicieuse et [si] particulière que les grosses narines de Djalioh s'écartèrent pour en aspirer la saveur.

Ô il y a à côté de la femme qu'on aime une atmosphère embaumée qui vous enivre.

— Que me voulez-vous ? dit-elle avec effroi aussitôt qu'elle l'eut reconnu.

Et il s'ensuivit un long silence. Il ne répondit pas et fixa sur elle un regard dévorant, - puis se rapprochant de plus en plus, il prit sa taille de ses deux mains et déposa sur son cou un baiser brûlant qui sembla pincer Adèle comme la morsure d'un serpent. - Il vit sa chair rougir et palpiter.

— Ô je vais appeler au secours, s'écria-t-elle avec effroi. Au secours ! au secours ! Ô le monstre, ajouta-t-elle en le regardant.

Djalioh ne répondit pas. - Seulement il bégaya et frappa sa tête avec colère.

Quoi, ne pouvoir lui dire un mot, - ne pouvoir énumérer ses tortures et ses douleurs et n'avoir à lui offrir que les larmes d'un animal et les soupirs d'un monstre.

Et puis être repoussé comme un reptile - être haï de ce qu'on aime et sentir devant soi l'impossibilité de rien dire, - être maudit et ne pouvoir blasphémer.

— Laissez-moi de grâce, laissez-moi, est-ce que vous ne voyez pas que vous me faites horreur et dégoût ? Je vais appeler Paul, et [il] va vous tuer.

Djalioh lui montra la clef qu'il tenait dans sa main et il s'arrêta. Huit heures sonnèrent à la pendule - et les oiseaux gazouillaient dans la volière. On entendit le roulement d'une charrette qui passait puis elle s'écarta.

— Eh bien allez-vous sortir ? laissez-moi au nom du ciel. Et elle voulut se lever mais Djalioh la retint par le pan de sa robe, qui se déchira sous ses ongles.

— J'ai besoin de sortir, il faut que je sorte... il faut que je voie mon enfant. Vous me laisserez voir mon enfant - Une idée atroce la fit frémir de tous ses membres. Elle pâlit et ajouta :

— Oui mon enfant, il faut que je le voie et tout de suite, à l'instant.

Elle se retourna et vit grimacer en face d'elle une figure de démon. Il se mit à rire si longtemps, si fort, et tout cela d'un seul éclat, qu'Adèle pétrifiée d'horreur tomba à ses pieds, à genoux.

Djalioh aussi se mit à genoux puis il la prit, la fit asseoir de force sur ses genoux, et de ses deux mains il lui déchira tous les vêtements, il mit en pièces les voiles qui la couvraient - et quand il la vit tremblante comme la feuille sans sa chemise et croisant ses deux bras sur ses seins nus en pleurant, les joues rouges et les lèvres bleuâtres, il se sentit sous le poids d'une oppression étrange. - Puis il prit les fleurs, les éparpilla sur le sol. Il tira les rideaux de soie rose et, lui, ôta ses vêtements.

Adèle le vit nu, elle trembla d'horreur et détourna la tête. Djalioh s'approcha et la tint longtemps serrée contre sa poitrine. Elle sentit alors sur sa peau chaude et satinée la chair froide et velue du monstre.

Il sauta sur le canapé, jeta les coussins et se balança longtemps sur le dossier avec un mouvement machinal et régulier de ses flexibles vertèbres. Il poussait de temps en temps un cri guttural et il souriait entre ses dents.

Qu'avait-[il] de mieux à désirer, - une femme devant lui, - des fleurs à ses pieds, un jour rose qui l'éclairait, le bruit d'une volière pour musique et quelque pâle rayon de soleil pour l'éclairer.

Il cessa bientôt son exercice, courut sur Adèle, lui enfonça ses griffes dans la chair et l'attira vers lui, il lui ôta sa chemise.

En se voyant toute nue dans la glace entre les bras de Djalioh elle poussa un cri d'horreur et pria Dieu. - Elle voulait appeler au secours, mais impossible d'articuler une seule parole.

Djalioh en la voyant ainsi nue et les cheveux épars sur ses épaules s'arrêta immobile de stupeur, comme le premier homme qui vit une femme, il la respecta pendant quelque temps, lui arracha ses cheveux blonds, les mit dans sa bouche, les mordit, les baisa, puis il se roula par terre sur les fleurs, entre les coussins, sur les vêtements d'Adèle, content, fou - ivre d'amour.

Adèle pleurait et une trace de sang coulait sur ses seins d'albâtre.

Enfin sa féroce brutalité ne connut plus de bornes. - Il sauta sur elle d'un bond - écarta ses deux mains, l'étendit par terre et l'y roula échevelée...

Souvent il poussait des cris féroces et étendait les deux bras, stupide. - Et immobile. Puis il râlait de volupté - comme un homme qui se meurt.

Tout à coup il sentit sous lui les convulsions d'Adèle. Ses muscles se raidirent comme le fer. - Elle poussa un cri et un soupir plaintif qui furent étouffés par des baisers.

Puis il la sentit froide, - ses yeux se fermèrent, elle se roula sur elle-même - et sa bouche s'ouvrit.

Quand il l'eut bien longtemps sentie immobile et glacée, il se leva, la retourna sur tous les sens, embrassa ses pieds, ses mains, sa bouche, et courut en bondissant sur les murailles.

Plusieurs fois il reprit sa course, une fois cependant il s'élança la tête la première sur la cheminée de marbre et tomba immobile et ensanglanté, sur le corps d'Adèle.

X

Quand on vint à trouver Adèle, elle avait sur le corps des traces de griffes larges, profondes. Pour Djalioh, il avait le crâne horriblement fracassé. On crut que la jeune femme en défendant son honneur l'avait tué avec un couteau.

Tout cela fut dans les journaux. Et vous pensez s'il y en eut pour huit jours à faire des Ah et des Oh.

Le lendemain on enterra les morts. Le convoi était superbe, deux cercueils, celui de la mère et de l'enfant et tout cela avec des panaches noirs, des cierges, des prêtres qui chantent, de la foule qui se presse et des hommes noirs en gants blancs.

XI

— C'est bien horrible, s'écriait quelques jours après toute une famille d'épiciers réunis patriarcalement autour d'un énorme gigot dont le fumet chatouillait l'odorat.

— Pauvre enfant, dit la femme de l'épicier, aller tuer un enfant, qu'est-ce qu'il lui avait fait ?

— Comment, disait l'épicier, indigné dans sa vertu, homme éminemment moral, décoré de la croix d'honneur pour bonne tenue dans la garde nationale, et abonné au Constitutionnel, comment aller tuer ct'eu povre ptite femme, c'est indigne.

— Mais aussi, je crois que c'est l'effet de la passion, dit un gros garçon joufflu, le fils de la maison qui venait d'achever sa quatrième à 17 ans parce que son père était d'avis qu'on donnât de l'induction à la jeunesse.

— Ô faut-il que des gens aient peu de retenue, dit le garçon épicier en redemandant pour la troisième fois des haricots.

On sonna à la boutique et il alla vendre pour deux sous de chandelles.

XII

Vous voulez une fin à toute force n'est-ce pas ? et vous trouvez que je suis bien [long] à la donner, eh bien soit.

Pour Adèle elle fut enterrée. Mais au bout de deux ans elle avait bien perdu de sa beauté. Car on l'exhuma pour la mettre au Père-Lachaise et elle puait si fort qu'un fossoyeur s'en trouva mal.

— Et Djalioh ?

Ô il est superbe, verni, poli, soigné, magnifique. Car vous savez que le cabinet de zoologie s'en est emparé et en a fait un superbe squelette.

— Et M. Paul ?

— Tiens je l'oubliais. Il s'est remarié. Tantôt je l'ai vu au Bois de Boulogne et ce soir vous le rencontrerez aux Italiens.

PASSION ET VERTU

CONTE PHILOSOPHIQUE.

Peux-tu parler de ce que tu ne sens point.

Shakespeare, Roméo et Juliette, acte III, scène V.

I

Elle l'avait déjà vu, je crois, deux fois ; la première, dans un bal chez le ministre, la seconde au Français, et, quoiqu'il ne fût ni un homme supérieur ni un bel homme, elle pensait souvent à lui, lorsque, le soir, après avoir soufflé sa lampe, elle restait souvent quelques instants rêveuse, les cheveux épars sur ses seins nus, la tête tournée vers la fenêtre où la nuit jetait une clarté blafarde, les bras hors de sa couche, et l'âme flottant entre des émotions hideuses et vagues, comme ces sons confus qui s'élèvent dans les champs par les soirées d'automne.

Loin d'être une de ces âmes d'exception comme il y en a dans les livres et dans les drames, c'était un cœur sec, un esprit juste, et, par-dessus tout cela, un chimiste. Mais il possédait à fond cette théorie de séductions, ces principes, ces règles, le chic enfin, pour employer le mot vrai et vulgaire, par lesquels un habile homme en arrive à ses fins.

Ce n'est plus cette méthode pastorale à la Louis XV, dont la première leçon commence par les soupirs, la seconde par les billets doux et continue ainsi jusqu'au dénouement, science si bien exposée dans Faubas, les comédies du second ordre et les contes moraux de Marmontel. Mais maintenant un homme s'avance vers une femme, il la lorgne, il la trouve bien, il en fait le pari avec ses amis ; est-elle mariée, la farce n'en sera ne meilleure.

Alors il s'introduit chez elle, il lui prête des romans, la mène au spectacle, il a surtout soin de faire quelque chose d'étonnant, de ridicule, enfin d'étrange ; et puis, de jour en jour, il va chez elle avec plus de liberté, il se fait l'ami de la maison, du mari, des enfants, des domestiques ; enfin la pauvre femme s'aperçoit du piège, elle veut le chasser comme un laquais, mais celui-ci s'indigne à son tour, il la menace de publier quelque lettre bien courte, mais qu'il interprétera d'une façon infame, n'importe à qui fût-elle adressée ; il répétera lui-même à son époux quelque mot arraché peut-être dans un moment de vanité, de coquetterie ou de désir ; c'est une cruauté d'anatomiste, mais on a fait des progrès dans les sciences et il y a des gens qui dissèquent un cœur comme un cadavre.

Alors cette pauvre femme, éperdue, pleure et supplie ; point de pardon pour elle, point de pardon pour ses enfants, son mari, sa mère. inflexible, car c'est un homme, il peut user de force, de violence, il peut dire partout qu'elle est sa maîtresse, le publier dans les journaux, l'écrire tout au long dans un mémoire, et le prouver même au besoin.

Elle se livre donc à lui, à demi morte ; il peut même alors la faire passer devant ses laquais qui, tout bas, sous leurs livrées, ricanent en la voyant venir si matin chez leur maître, et puis quand il l'a rendue brisée et abattue, seule avec ses regrets, ses pensées sur le passé, ses déceptions d'amour, il la quitte, la reconnaît à peine, l'abandonne à son infortune ; il la hait même quelquefois, mais enfin il a gagné son pari ; et c'est un homme à bonnes fortunes.

C'est donc non un Lovelace, comme on l'aurait dit il y a soixante ans, mais bien un Don Juan, ce qui est plus beau.

L'homme qui possède à fond cette science, qui en connaît les détours et les replis cachés, n'est pas rare maintenant, cela est si facile, en effet, de séduire une femme qui vous aime et puis de la laisser là avec toutes les autres, quand on n'a pas d'âme ni de pitié dans le cœur ! Il y a tant de moyens de s'en faire aimer, soit par la jalousie, la vanité, le mérite, les talents, l'orgueil, l'horreur, la crainte même, ou bien encore par la fatuité de vos manières, le négligé d'une cravate, la prétention à être désespéré, quelquefois par la coupe de votre habit, ou la finesse de vos bottes ! Car combien de gens n'ont dû leurs conquêtes qu'à l'habileté de leur tailleur ou de leur cordonnier ?

Ernest s'était aperçu que Mazza souriait à ses regards. Partout il la poursuivait. Au bal, par exemple, elle s'ennuyait s'il n'était pas là. Et n'allez pas croire qu'il fût assez novice pour louer la blancheur de sa main ni la beauté de ses bagues, comme l'aurait pu faire un écolier de rhétorique, mais, devant elle, il déchirait toutes les autres femmes qui dansaient, il avait sur chacune les aventures les plus inconnues et les plus étranges, et tout cela la faisait rire et la flattait secrètement, quand elle pensait que sur elle on n'avait rien à dire. Sur le penchant du gouffre, elle prenait de belles résolutions de l'abandonner, de ne plus jamais le revoir, mais la vertu s'évapore bien vite au sourire d'une bouche qu'on aime.

Il avait vu aussi qu'elle aimait la poésie, la mer, le théâtre, Byron, et puis, résumant toutes ces observations en une seule, il avait dit : "C'est une sotte, je l'aurai", et elle, souvent aussi, avait dit en le voyant partir et quand la porte du salon tournait rapidement sur ses pas : "Oh ! je t'aime !".

Ajoutez à cela qu'Ernest lui fit croire à la phrénologie, au magnétisme et que Mazza avait trente ans, et qu'elle était toujours pure et fidèle à son mari, repoussant tous les désirs qui naissaient chaque jour en son âme et qui mouraient le lendemain ; qu'elle était mariée à un banquier, et que la passion dans les bras de cet homme-là était un devoir pour elle, rien de plus, comme de surveiller ses domestiques et habiller ses enfants.

II

Longtemps elle se complut dans cet état de service amoureux et à demi mystique, la nouveauté du plaisir lui plaisait, et elle joua longtemps avec cet amour, plus longtemps qu'avec les autres, et elle finit par s'y prendre fortement, d'abord d'habitude, puis de besoin. Il est dangereux de rire et de jouer avec le cœur, car la passion est une arme à feu qui part et vous tue lorsqu'on la croyait sans péril.

Un jour Ernest vint de bonne heure chez M<sup>me</sup> Willer ; son mari était à la Bourse, ses enfants étaient sortis, il se trouva seul avec elle. Tout le jour, il resta chez elle, et le soir, vers les cinq heures, quand il en sortit, Mazza fut triste, rêveuse, et de toute la nuit elle ne dormit pas.

Ils étaient restés longtemps, bien des heures, à causer, à se dire qu'ils s'aimaient, à parler de poésie, à s'entretenir d'amour large et fort comme on en voit dans Byron, et puis à se plaindre des exigences sociales qui les attachaient l'un à l'autre et qui les séparaient pour la vie ; et puis ils avaient causé des peines du cœur, de la vie et de la mort, de la nature, de l'océan qui mugissait dans les nuits ; enfin ils avaient compris le monde, leur passion, et leurs regards s'étaient même plus parlé que leurs lèvres qui se touchèrent si souvent.

C'était un jour du mois de mars, une de ces longues journées sombres et moroses qui portent à l'âme une vague amertume, leurs paroles avaient été tristes, celles de Mazza, surtout, avaient une mélancolie harmonieuse. Chaque fois qu'Ernest allait dire qu'il l'aimait pour la vie, chaque fois qu'il lui échappait un sourire, un regard, un cri d'amour, Mazza ne répondait pas, elle le regardait silencieuse, avec ses deux grands yeux noirs, son front pâle, sa bouche béante.

Ce jour elle se sentit oppressée, comme si une main invisible lui eût pesé sur la poitrine ; elle craignait, mais elle ne savait quel était l'objet de ses craintes, et se complaisait dans cette appréhension mêlée d'une étrange sensation d'amour, de rêverie, de mysticisme. Une fois elle recula son fauteuil, effrayée du sourire d'Ernest, qui était bestial et sauvage à faire peur, mais celui-ci se rapprocha d'elle aussitôt, lui prit les mains et les porta à ses lèvres ; elle rougit et lui dit d'un ton de calme affecté :

— Est-ce que vous auriez envie de me faire la cour ?

— Vous Faire la cour ? Mazza ! à vous ?

Cette réponse-là voulait tout dire.

— Est-ce que vous m'aimeriez ?

Il la regarda en souriant.

— Ernest, vous auriez tort.

— Pourquoi ?

— Mon mari ! y pensez-vous ?

— Eh bien, votre mari ! qu'est-ce que cela veut dire ?

— Il faut que je l'aime.

— Cela est plus facile à dire qu'à faire, c'est-à-dire que si la loi vous dit : "Vous l'aimerez", votre cœur s'y pliera comme un régiment qu'on fait manœuvrer ou une barre d'acier qu'on ploie des deux mains, et si moi je vous aime...

— Taisez-vous, Ernest, pensez à ce que vous devez à une femme qui vous reçoit comme moi, dès le matin, sans que son mari y soit, seule, abandonnée à votre délicatesse.

— Oui, si je vous aime à mon tour, il faudra que je ne vous aime plus parce qu'il le faudra, et rien de plus ; mais cela est-il sensé et juste ?

— Ah ! vous raisonnez à merveille, mon cher ami, dit Mazza en penchant sa tête sur son épaule gauche et en faisant tourner dans ses doigts un étui d'ivoire.

Une mèche de ses cheveux se dénoua et tomba sur ses joues, elle la rejeta par derrière avec un geste de la tête plein de grâce et de brusquerie. Plusieurs fois Ernest se leva, prit son chapeau comme s'il allait sortir, puis il se rasseyait et reprenait ses causeries.

Souvent ils s'interrompaient tous deux et se regardaient longtemps en silence, respirant à peine, ivres et contents de leurs regards et de leurs soupirs, puis ils souriaient.

Un moment, quand Mazza vit Ernest à ses pieds, affaissé sur le tapis de sa chambre, quand elle vit sa tête posée sur ses genoux, les cheveux en arrière, ses yeux tout près de sa poitrine, et son front blanc et sans ride qui était là devant sa bouche, elle crut qu'elle allait défaillir de bonheur et d'amour, elle crut qu'elle allait prendre sa tête dans ses bras, la presser sur son cœur et la couvrir de ses baisers.

— Demain, je vous écrirai, lui dit Ernest.

— Adieu !

Et il sortit.

Mazza resta l'âme indécise et toute flottante entre des oppressions étranges, des ressentiments vagues, des rêveries indicibles ; la nuit elle se réveilla, la lampe brûlait et jetait au plafond un disque lumineux qui tremblait en vacillant sur lui-même, comme l'œil d'un damné qui vous regarde ; elle resta longtemps, jusqu'au jour, à écouter les heures qui sonnaient à toutes les cloches, à entendre tous les bruits de la nuit, la pluie qui tombe et bat les murs, et les vents qui soufflent et tourbillonnent dans les ténèbres, les vitres qui tremblent, le bois du lit qui criait à tous les mouvements qu'elle lui donnait en se retournant sur ses matelas, agitée qu'elle était par des pensées accablantes et des images terribles, qui l'enveloppaient tout entière en la roulant dans ses draps.

Qui n'a ressenti, dans des heures de fièvre et de délire, ces mouvements intimes du cœur ? ces convulsions d'une âme qui s'agite et se tord sans cesse sous des pensées indéfinissables, tant elles sont pleines tout à la fois de tourments et de voluptés, vagues d'abord et indécises comme un fantôme ? cette pensée bientôt se consolide et s'arrête, prend une forme et un corps, elle devient une image, et une image qui vous fait pleurer et gémir. Qui n'a donc jamais vu, dans des nuits chaudes et ardentes, quand la peau brûle et que l'insomnie vous ronge, assise aux pieds de votre couche une figure pâle et rêveuse, et qui vous regarde tristement ? ou bien elle apparaît dans des habits de fête, si vous l'avez vue danser dans un bal, ou entourée de voiles noirs, pleurante ; et vous vous rappelez ses paroles, le son de sa voix, la langueur de ses yeux.

Pauvre Mazza ! pour la première fois elle sentit qu'elle aimait, que cela allait devenir un besoin, puis un délire du cœur, une rage ; mais dans sa naïveté et son ignorance, elle se traça bien vite un avenir heureux, une existence paisible où la passion lui donnerait la joie, et la volupté le bonheur.

En effet, ne pourra-t-elle vivre contente dans les bras de celui qu'elle aime et tromper son mari ? “Qu'est-ce que tout cela ? se disait-elle auprès de l'amour” ; elle souhaitait cependant de ce délire du cœur et s'y plongeait de plus en plus, comme ceux qui s'enivrent avec plaisir et que les boissons brûlent. Oh ! qu'elles sont poignantes et amères, il est vrai, ces palpitations du cœur, les angoisses de l'âme, entre un monde de vertu qui s'en va et un avenir d'amour qui arrive. Le lendemain, Mazza reçut une lettre ; elle était en papier satiné, toute embaumante de rose et de musc, elle était signée d'un E entouré d'un paraphe ; je ne sais ce qu'il y avait, mais Mazza relut la lettre plusieurs fois, elle en retourna les deux feuillets, en considéra les plis, elle s'enivra de son odeur embaumée, puis la roula en boulette et la jeta au feu ; le papier consumé s'envola (pendant quelque temps, et revint enfin se reposer doucement sur les chenets comme une gaze blanche et plissée.

Ernest l'aime ! il le lui a dit ! Oh ! elle est heureuse, le premier pas est fait, les autres ne lui coûteront plus ; elle pourra maintenant le regarder sans rougir, elle n'aura plus besoin de tant de ménagements, de petites mines de femme pour se faire aimer ; il vient lui-même, il se donne à elle, sa pudeur est ménagée, et c'est cette pudeur qui reste toujours aux femmes, ce qu'elles gardent même au fond de leur amour le plus brûlant, des plus ardentes voluptés, comme un dernier sanctuaire d'amour et de passion, où elles cachent comme sous un voile tout ce qu'elles ont de brutal et d'efféminé.

Quelques jours après, une femme voilée passait presque en courant le pont des Arts ; il était sept heures du matin.

Après avoir longtemps marché, elle s'arrêta à une porte cochère et elle demanda M. Ernest ; il n'était pas sorti, elle monta. L'escalier lui semblait d'une interminable longueur, et, quand elle fut parvenue au second étage, elle s'appuya sur la rampe et se sentit défaillir ; elle crut alors que tout tournait autour d'elle et que des voix basses chuchotaient à ses oreilles en sifflant ; enfin elle posa une main tremblante sur la sonnette. Quand elle entendit son battement perçant et répété, il y eut un écho qui résonna dans son cœur, comme par une répercussion galvanique.

Enfin la porte s'ouvrit, c'était Ernest lui-même. — Ah ! c'est vous, Mazza ?

Celle-ci ne répondit pas, elle était pâle et toute couverte de sueur ; Ernest la regardait froidement, en faisant tourner en l'air la corde de soie de sa robe de chambre, il avait peur de se compromettre.

— Entrez, dit-il enfin.

Il la prit par le bras et la fit asseoir de force sur un fauteuil. Après un moment de silence :

— Je suis venue, Ernest, lui dit-elle, pour vous dire une chose : c'est la dernière fois que je vous parle, il faut que vous me quittiez, que je ne vous revoie plus.

— Parce que ?

— Parce que vous m'êtes à charge, que vous m'accablez, que vous me feriez mourir !

— Moi ! comment cela, Mazza ?

Il se leva, tira ses rideaux et ferma sa porte.

— Que faites-vous ? s'écria-t-elle avec horreur.

— Ce que je fais ?

— Oui.

— Vous êtes ici, Mazza, vous êtes venue chez moi. Oh ! ne niez pas, je connais les femmes, dit-il en souriant.

— Continuez, ajouta-t-elle avec dépit.

— Eh bien, Mazza, c'est assez.

— Et vous avez assez d'insolence pour me dire cela en face, à une femme que vous dites aimer ?

— Pardon ! oh ! pardon !

Il se mit à genoux et la regarda longtemps.

— Eh bien, oui, moi aussi je t'aime, plus que ma vie ; tiens, je me donne à toi.

Et puis là, entre les quatre parois d'une muraille, sous les rideaux de soie, sur un fauteuil, il y eut plus d'amour, de baisers, de caresses enivrantes, de voluptés qui brûlent, qu'il n'en faudrait pour rendre fou ou pour faire mourir. Et puis quand il l'eut bien flétrie, usée, abîmée dans ses étreintes, quand il l'eut rendue lasse, brisée, haletante, quand, bien des fois, il eut serré sa poitrine contre la sienne et qu'il la vit mourante dans ses bras, il la laissa seule et partit.

Le soir, chez Véfour, il fit un excellent souper où le champagne frappé circulait en abondance ; on l'entendit dire tout haut, vers le dessert : "Mes chers amis, j'en ai encore une !"

Celle-la était rentrée chez elle, l'âme triste, les yeux en larmes, non de son honneur qui était perdu, car cette pensée-là ne la torturerait nullement ; s'étant d'abord demandé ce que c'était que l'honneur et n'y ayant vu au fond qu'un mot, elle avait passé outre, mais elle pensait aux sensations qu'elle avait éprouvées, et ne trouvait en y pensant, rien que déception et amertume. "Oh ! ce n'est pas là ce que j'avais rêvé !" disait-elle.

Car il lui sembla, lorsqu'elle fut dégagée des bras de son amant, qu'il y avait en elle quelque chose de froissé comme ses vêtements, de fatigué et d'abattu comme son regard, et qu'elle était tombée de bien haut, que l'amour ne se bornait pas là ; se demandant enfin si, derrière la volupté, il n'y en avait pas une plus grande encore, ni après le plaisir une plus vaste jouissance, car elle avait une soif inépuisable d'amours infinis, de passions sans bornes. Mais quand elle vit que l'amour n'était qu'un baiser, une caresse, un moment de délices où se roulaient entrelacés, avec des cris de joie, l'amant et sa maîtresse, et puis que tout finit ainsi, que l'homme se relève, la femme s'en va, et que leur passion a besoin d'un peu de chair et d'une convulsion pour se satisfaire et s'enivrer, l'ennui lui prit à l'âme, comme ces affamés qui ne peuvent se nourrir.

Mais elle quitta bientôt tout retour sur le passé pour ne songer qu'au présent qui souriait, elle ferma les yeux sur ce qui n'était plus, secoua comme un songe les anciens rêves sans bornes, ses oppressions vagues et indécises, pour se donner tout entière au torrent qui l'entraînait, et elle arriva bientôt à cet état de langueur et de nonchalance, à ce demi-sommeil ou l'on sent que l'on s'endort, qu'on s'enivre, que le monde s'en va loin de nous, tandis que l'on reste seul sur la nacelle où vous berce la vague et qu'entraîne l'océan ; elle ne pensa plus ni à son mari ni à ses enfants, encore moins à sa réputation, que les autres femmes déchiraient à belles dents dans les salons, et que les jeunes gens, amis d'Ernest, vautraient et vilipendaient à plaisir dans les cafés et les estaminets.

Mais il y eut tout à coup pour elle une mélodie jusqu'alors inconnue dans la nature et dans son âme, et elle découvrit dans l'une et dans l'autre des mondes nouveaux, des espaces immenses, des horizons sans bornes ; il sembla que tout était né pour l'amour, que les hommes étaient des créatures d'un ordre supérieur, susceptibles de passions et de sentiments, qu'ils n'étaient bons qu'à cela et qu'ils ne devaient vivre que pour le cœur. Quant à son mari, elle l'aimait toujours et l'estimait encore plus ; ses enfants lui semblaient gracieux, mais elle les aimait comme on aime ceux d'un autre.

Chaque jour, cependant, elle sentait qu'elle aimait plus que la veille, que cela devenait un besoin de son existence, qu'elle n'aurait pu vivre sans cela ; mais cette passion, avec laquelle elle avait d'abord joué en riant, finit par devenir sérieuse et terrible, une fois entrée dans son cœur, elle devint un amour violent, puis une frénésie, une rage. Il y avait chez elle tant de feu et de chaleur, tant de désirs immenses, une telle soif de délices et de voluptés qui étaient dans son sang, dans ses veines, sous sa peau, jusque sous ses ongles, qu'elle était devenue folle, ivre, éperdue, et qu'elle aurait voulu faire sortir son amour des bornes de la nature ; il lui semblait qu'en prodiguant les caresses et les voluptés, en brûlant sa vie dans des nuits pleines de fièvre, d'ardeur, en se roulant dans tout ce que la passion a de plus frénétique, de plus sublime, il allait s'ouvrir devant elle une suite continue de voluptés, de plaisirs.

Souvent, dans les transports du délire, elle s'écriait que la vie n'était que la passion, que l'amour était tout pour elle ; et puis, les cheveux épars, l'œil en feu, la poitrine haletante de sanglots, elle demandait à son amant s'il n'aurait pas souhaité, comme elle, de vivre des siècles ensemble, seuls sur une haute montagne, sur un roc aigu, au bas duquel viendraient se briser les vagues, de se confondre tous deux avec la nature et le ciel, et de mêler leurs soupirs aux bruits de la tempête ; et puis elle le regardait longtemps, lui demandant encore de nouveaux baisers, de nouvelles étreintes, et elle tombait entre ses bras, muette et évanouie.

Et quand, le soir, son époux, l'âme tranquille, le front calme, rentrait chez lui, lui disant qu'il avait gagné aujourd'hui, qu'il avait fait le matin une bonne spéculation, acheté une ferme, vendu une rente, et qu'il pouvait ajouter un laquais de plus à ses équipages, acheter deux chevaux de plus pour ses écuries, et qu'avec ces mots et ces pensées il venait à l'embrasser, à l'appeler son amour et sa vie, oh ! la rage lui prenait à l'âme, elle le maudissait, repoussant avec horreur ses caresses et ses baisers, qui étaient froids et horribles comme ceux d'un singe.

Il y avait donc dans son amour une douleur et une amertume, comme la lie du vin, qui le rend plus âcre et plus brûlant.

Et quand, après avoir quitté sa maison, son ménage, ses laquais, elle se retrouvait avec Ernest, seule, assise à ses côtés, alors elle lui contait qu'elle eût voulu mourir de sa main, se sentir étouffée par ses bras, et puis elle ajoutait qu'elle n'aimait plus rien, qu'elle méprisait tout, qu'elle n'aimait que lui ; pour lui elle avait abandonné Dieu et le sacrifiait à son amour, pour lui elle laissait son mari et le donnait à l'ironie, pour lui elle abandonnait ses enfants ; elle crachait sur tout cela à plaisir ; religion, vertu, elle foulait tout cela aux pieds, elle vendait sa réputation pour ses caresses, et c'était avec bonheur et délices qu'elle immolait tout cela pour lui plaire, qu'elle détruisait toutes ses croyances, toutes ses illusions, toute sa vertu, tout ce qu'elle aimait enfin, pour obtenir de lui un regard ou un baiser. Et il lui semblait qu'elle serait plus belle en sortant de ses bras, après avoir reposé sur ses lèvres, comme les violettes fanées qui répandent un parfum plus doux.

Oh ! qui pourrait savoir combien il y a parfois de délices et de frénésie sous les deux seins palpitants d'une femme !

Ernest, cependant, commençait à l'aimer un peu plus qu'une grisette ou une figurante, il alla même jusqu'à faire des vers pour elle, qu'il lui donna ; en outre, un jour, je le vis avec les yeux rouges, d'où l'on pouvait conclure qu'il avait pleuré... ou mal dormi.

Un matin, en réfléchissant sur Mazza, assis dans un grand fauteuil élastique, ses pieds sur ses deux chenets, le nez enfoncé sous sa robe de chambre, tout en regardant la flamme de son feu qui pétillait et montait sur la plaque en langues de feu, il lui vint une idée qui le surprit d'une manière étrange ; il eut peur.

En se rappelant qu'il était aimé par une femme comme Mazza, qui lui sacrifiait, avec tant de prodigalité et d'effusion, sa beauté, son amour, il eut peur et trembla devant la passion de cette femme, comme ces enfants qui s'enfuient loin de la mer en disant qu'elle est trop grande, et une idée morale lui vint en tête, car c'était une habitude qu'il venait de prendre depuis qu'il s'était fait collaborateur au Journal des connaissances utiles et au Musée des familles ; il pensa, dis-je, qu'il était peu moral de séduire ainsi une femme mariée, de la détourner de ses devoirs d'épouse, de l'amour de ses enfants, et qu'il était mal à lui de recevoir toutes ces offrandes qu'elle brûlait à ses pieds comme un holocauste. Enfin il était ennuyé et fatigué de cette femme, qui prenait le plaisir au sérieux, qui ne concevait qu'un amour entier et sans partage, et avec laquelle on ne pouvait parler ni de romans, ni de modes, ni d'opéra.

Il voulut d'abord s'en séparer, la laisser là et la rejeter au milieu de la société, avec les autres femmes flétries comme elle ; Mazza s'aperçut de son indifférence et de sa tiédeur, l'attribua à de la délicatesse, et ne l'en aima que davantage. Souvent Ernest l'évitait, s'échappait d'elle, mais elle savait le rencontrer partout, au bal, à la promenade, dans les jardins publics, aux musées ; elle savait l'attendre dans la foule, lui dire deux mots et lui faire monter la rougeur au front, devant tous ces gens qui la regardaient.

D'autre fois, c'était lui qui venait chez elle, il entraît avec un front sévère, un air grave ; la jeune femme, naïve et amoureuse, lui sautait au cou et le couvrait de baisers, mais celui-ci la repoussait avec froideur, et puis il lui disait qu'ils ne devaient plus s'aimer, que, le moment de délire et de folie une fois passé, tout devait être fini entre eux, qu'il fallait respecter son mari, chérir ses enfants et veiller à son ménage, et il ajoutait qu'il avait beaucoup vu et étudié, et qu'au reste la Providence était juste, que la nature était un chef-d'œuvre et la société une admirable création, et puis que la philanthropie, après tout, était une belle chose et qu'il fallait aimer les hommes.

Et celle-ci alors pleurait de rage, d'orgueil et d'amour ; elle lui demandait, le rire sur les lèvres mais l'amertume dans le cœur, si elle n'était plus belle et ce qu'il fallait faire pour lui plaire, et puis elle lui souriait, lui étalant à la vue son front pâle, ses cheveux noirs, sa gorge, son épaule, ses seins nus. Ernest restait insensible à tant de séductions, car il ne l'aimait plus, et s'il sortait de chez elle avec quelque émotion dans l'âme, c'était comme les gens qui viennent de voir des fous ; et si quelque vestige de passion, quelque rayon d'amour venait à se rallumer chez lui, il s'éteignait bien vite avec une raison ou un argument.

Heureux donc les gens qui peuvent combattre leur cœur avec des mots et détruire la passion, qui est enracinée dans l'âme, avec la moralité, qui n'est collée que sur les livres comme le vernis du libraire et le frontispice du graveur.

Un jour, dans un transport de fureur et de délire, Mazza le mordit à la poitrine et lui enfonça ses ongles dans la gorge. En voyant couler du sang dans leurs amours, Ernest comprit que la passion de cette femme était féroce et terrible, qu'il régnait autour d'elle une atmosphère empoisonnée qui finirait par l'étouffer et le faire mourir, que cet amour était un volcan à qui il fallait jeter toujours quelque chose à mâcher et à broyer dans ses convulsions, et que ses voluptés, enfin, étaient une lave ardente qui brûlait le cœur. Il fallait donc partir, la quitter pour toujours, ou bien se jeter avec elle dans ce tourbillon qui vous entraîne comme un vertige dans cette route immense de la passion, qui commence avec un sourire et qui ne finit que sur une tombe.

Il préféra partir.

Un soir, à dix heures, Mazza reçut une lettre, elle y comprit ces mots :

“Adieu, Mazza ! je ne vous reverrai plus ; le ministre de l'intérieur m'a enrôlé d'une commission savante qui doit analyser les produits et le sol même du Mexique. Adieu ! je m'embarque au Havre. Si vous voulez être heureuse, ne m'aimez plus, aimez au contraire la vertu et vos devoirs ; c'est un dernier conseil. Encore une fois adieu ! je vous embrasse.

“Ernest.”

Elle la relut plusieurs fois, accablée par ce mot adieu ; elle restait les yeux fixes et immobiles sur cette lettre qui contenait tout son malheur et son désespoir, où elle voyait s'enfuir et couler tout son bonheur et sa vie ; elle ne versa pas une larme, ne poussa pas un cri, mais elle sonna un domestique, lui ordonna d'aller chercher des chevaux de poste et de préparer sa chaise. Son mari voyageait en Allemagne, personne ne pouvait donc l'arrêter dans sa volonté.

A minuit elle partit, elle allait rapidement en courant de toute la vitesse des chevaux. Dans un village, elle s'arrêta pour demander un verre d'eau et repartit, croyant après chaque côte, chaque colline, chaque détour de la route, voir apparaître la mer, but de ses désirs et de sa jalousie, puisqu'elle allait lui enlever quelque'un de cher à son cœur. Enfin, vers trois heures d'après-midi, elle arriva au Havre.

A peine descendue, elle courut au bout de la jetée et regarda sur la mer... une voile blanche s'enfonçait sous l'horizon.

IV

Il était parti ! parti pour toujours, et quand elle releva sa figure toute couverte de larmes, elle ne vit plus rien que l'immensité de l'océan.

C'était une de ces brûlantes journées d'été, où la terre exhale de chaudes vapeurs comme l'air embrasé d'une fournaise. Quand Mazza fut arrivée sur la jetée, la fraîcheur salée de l'eau la ranima quelque peu, car une brise du sud enflait les vagues, qui venaient mollement mourir sur la grève et râlaient sur le galet. Les nuages noirs et épais s'amoncelaient à sa gauche, vers le soleil couchant, qui était rouge et lumineux sur la mer ; on eût dit qu'ils allaient éclater en sanglots. La mer, sans être furieuse, roulait sur elle-même en chantant lugubrement, et quand elle venait à se briser sur les pierres de la jetée, les vagues sautaient en l'air et retombaient en poudre d'argent.

Il y avait dans cela une sauvage harmonie, Mazza l'écouta longtemps, fascinée par sa puissance ; le bruit de ces flots avait pour elle un langage, une voix ; comme elle, la mer était triste et pleine d'angoisses ; comme elle, ses vagues venaient mourir en se brisant sur les pierres et ne laisser sur le sable mouillé que la trace de leur passage. Une herbe, qui avait pris naissance entre deux fentes de la pierre, penchait sa tête toute pleine de la rosée, chaque coup de vague venait la tirer de sa racine, et chaque fois elle se détachait de plus en plus ; enfin elle disparut sous la lame, on ne la revit plus ; et pourtant elle était jeune et portait des fleurs ? Mazza sourit amèrement, la fleur était, comme elle, enlevée par la vague dans la fraîcheur du printemps.

Il y avait des marins qui rentraient, couchés dans leur barque ; en tirant derrière eux la corde de leurs filets, leur voix vibrait au loin, avec le cri des oiseaux de nuit, qui planaient en volant de leurs ailes noires sur la tête de Mazza et qui allaient tous s'abattre vers la grève, sur les débris qu'apportait la marée. Elle entendait alors une voix qui l'appelait au fond du gouffre, et, la tête penchée vers l'abîme, elle calculait combien il lui faudrait de minutes et de secondes pour râler et mourir. Tout était triste comme elle dans la nature, et il lui sembla que les vagues avaient des soupirs et que la mer pleurait.

Je ne sais cependant quel misérable sentiment de l'existence lui dit de vivre, et qu'il y avait encore sur la terre du bonheur et de l'amour, qu'elle n'avait qu'à attendre et espérer, et qu'elle le reverra plus tard ; mais, quand la nuit fut venue et que la lune vint à paraître au milieu de ses compagnes, comme une sultane au harem entre ses femmes, et qu'on ne vit plus que la mousse des flots, qui brillait sur les vagues comme l'écume à la bouche d'un coursier, alors que le bruit de la ville commença à s'évanouir dans le brouillard, avec ses lumières qui s'éteignaient, Mazza repartit.

La nuit — il était peut-être deux heures — elle ouvrit ses glaces et regarda dehors. On était dans une plaine et la route était bordée d'arbres, les clartés de la nuit passant à travers leurs branches les faisaient ressembler à des fantômes aux formes gigantesques, qui couraient tous devant Mazza et remuaient au gré du vent, qui sifflait à travers leurs feuilles, leur chevelure en désordre. Une fois la voiture s'arrêta au milieu de la campagne, un trait se trouvait cassé, il faisait nuit, on n'entendait que le bruit des arbres, l'haleine des chevaux haletant de sueur, et les sanglots d'une femme qui pleurait seule.

Vers le matin, elle vit des gens qui allaient vers la ville la plus voisine, portant au marché des fruits tout couverts de mousse et de feuillage vert ; ils chantaient aussi, et comme la route montait et qu'on allait au pas, elle les écouta longuement. "Oh ! comme il y a des gens heureux !" dit-elle.

Il faisait grand jour, c'était un dimanche ; dans un village à quelques heures de Paris, sur la place de l'église, à l'heure où tout le monde en sortait, il y avait un grand soleil qui brillait sur le coq de l'église, et illuminait sa modeste rosace. Les portes, qui étaient ouvertes, laissaient voir à Mazza, du fond de sa voiture, l'intérieur de la nef et les cierges qui brillaient dans l'ombre sur l'autel ; elle regarda la voûte de bois, peinte de couleur bleue, et les vieux piliers de pierre nus et blanchis, et puis toute la suite des bancs où s'étalait une population entière, bigarrée de vêtements de couleur ; elle entendit l'orgue qui chantait, et il se fit alors un grand flot dans le peuple et l'on sortit. Plusieurs avaient des bouquets de fausses fleurs et des bas blancs ; elle vit que c'était une noce, on tira des coups de fusil sur la place, et les mariés sortirent.

La bru avait un bonnet blanc et souriait en regardant le bout des pattes de sa ceinture, qui étaient de dentelle brodée ; le marié s'avancait à côté d'elle, il voyait la foule d'un air heureux et donnait des poignées de main à plusieurs. C'était le maire du pays, qui était aubergiste et qui mariait sa fille à son adjoint, le maître d'école. .

Un groupe d'enfants et de femmes s'arrêta devant Mazza pour regarder la belle calèche et le manteau rouge qui pendait de la portière, tout cela souriait et parlait haut. Quand elle eut relayé, elle rencontra, au bout du pays, le cortège qui entrait à la mairie, et le sourire vint sur sa bouche quand elle vit l'écume de ses chevaux qui tombait sur les mariés et la poussière de leurs pas qui salissait leurs vêtements blancs ; elle avança la tête et leur lança un regard de pitié et d'envie, car de misérable elle était devenue méchante et jalouse. Le peuple alors, en haine des riches, lui répondit par des injures et l'insulta, en lui jetant des pierres sur les armoiries de sa voiture.

Longtemps, dans la route, à moitié endormie par le mouvement des ressorts, le son des grelots et la poussière qui tombait sur ses cheveux noirs, elle pensa à la noce du village, et le bruit du violon qui précédait le cortège, le son de l'or et les voix des enfants qui avaient parlé autour d'elle, tout cela tintait à ses oreilles comme l'abeille qui bourdonne ou le serpent qui siffle.

Elle était fatiguée, la chaleur l'accablait sous les cuirs de sa calèche, le soleil dardait en face, elle baissa la tête sur ses coussins de drap blanc et s'endormit. Elle se réveilla aux portes de Paris.

Quand on a quitté la campagne et les champs et qu'on se retrouve dans les rues, le jour semble sombre et baissé, comme dans ces théâtres de foire qui sont lugubres et mal éclairés. Mazza se plongeait avec délices dans les rues les plus tortueuses ; elle s'enivra du bruit et de la rumeur qui venait la tirer d'elle-même et la reporter dans le monde, elle voyait rapidement, et comme des ombres chinoises, toutes les têtes qui passaient devant sa portière, toutes lui semblaient froides, impassibles et pâles ; elle regarda avec étonnement, pour la première fois, la misère qui va pieds nus sur les quais, la haine dans le cœur et un sourire sur la bouche, comme pour cacher les trous de ses haillons ; elle regarda la foule qui s'engouffrait dans les spectacles et les cafés, et tout ce monde de laquais et de grands seigneurs qui s'étale comme un manteau de couleur au jour de parade.

Tout cela lui parut un immense spectacle, un vaste théâtre, avec ses palais de pierre, ses magasins allumés, ses habits de parade, ses ridicules, ses sceptres de carton et ses royautés d'un jour. Là, le carrosse de la danseuse éclabousse le peuple, et là l'homme se meurt de faim, en voyant des tas d'or derrière les vitres ; partout le rire et les larmes, partout la richesse et la misère, partout le vice qui insulte la vertu et lui crache à la face, comme le châle usé de la fille de joie qui effleure en passant la robe noire du prêtre. Oh ! il y a dans les grandes cités une atmosphère corrompue et empoisonnée, qui vous étourdit et vous enivre, quelque chose de lourd et de malsain, comme ces sombres brouillards du soir qui planent sur les toits.

Mazza aspira cet air de corruption à pleine poitrine, elle le sentit comme un parfum, et la première fois, alors, elle comprit tout ce qu'il y avait de large et d'immense dans le vice, et de voluptueux dans le crime.

En se retrouvant chez elle, il lui sembla qu'il y avait longtemps qu'elle était partie, tant elle avait souffert et vécu en peu d'heures. Elle passa la nuit à pleurer, à rappeler sans cesse son départ, son retour ; elle voyait de là les villages qu'elle avait traversés, toute la route qu'elle avait parcourue ; il lui semblait encore être sur la jetée, à regarder la mer et la voile qui s'en va ; elle se rappelait aussi la noce avec ses habits de fête, ses sourires de bonheur ; elle entendait de là le bruit de sa voiture sur les pavés, elle entendait aussi les vagues qui mugissaient et bondissaient sous elle ; et puis elle fut effrayée de la longueur du temps, elle crut avoir vécu un siècle et être devenue vieille, avoir les cheveux blancs, tant la douleur vous affaisse, tant le chagrin vous ronge, car il est des jours qui vous vieillissent comme des années, des pensées qui font bien des rides.

Elle se rappela aussi, en souriant avec regret, les jours de son bonheur, ses vacances paisibles sur les bords de la Loire, où elle courait dans les allées des bois, se jouant avec les fleurs, et pleurant en voyant passer les mendiants ; elle se rappela ses premiers bals, où elle dansait si bien, où elle aimait tant les sourires gracieux et les paroles aimables ; et puis encore ses heures de fièvre et de délire, dans les bras de son amant, ses moments de transport et de rage, où elle eût voulu que chaque regard durât des siècles et que l'éternité fût un baiser elle se demanda alors si tout cela était parti et effacé pour toujours, comme la poussière de la route et le sillon du navire sur les vagues de la mer.

Enfin la voilà revenue, mais seule ! plus personne pour la soutenir, plus rien à aimer. Que faire ? quel parti prendre ? oh ! la mort, la tombe cent fois, si, malgré son départ et son ennui, elle n'avait eu au cœur un peu d'espérance.

Qu'espérait-elle donc ?

Elle l'ignorait elle-même, seulement elle avait encore foi à la vie ; elle crut encore qu'Ernest l'aimait, lorsqu'un jour elle reçut une de ses lettres ; mais ce fut une désillusion de plus.

La lettre était longue, bien écrite, toute remplie de riches métaphores et de grands mots ; Ernest lui disait qu'il ne fallait plus l'aimer, qu'il fallait penser à ses devoirs et à Dieu, et puis il lui donnait en outre d'excellents conseils sur la famille, l'amour maternel, et il terminait par un peu de sentiment, comme M. de Bouilly ou M<sup>me</sup> Cottin.

Pauvre Mazza ! tant d'amour, de cœur et de tendresse pour une indifférence si froide, un calme si raisonné ! Elle tomba dans l'affaissement et le dégoût. "Je croyais, dit-elle un jour, qu'on pouvait mourir de chagrin !". Du dégoût elle passa à l'amertume et à l'envie.

C'est alors que le bruit du monde lui parut une musique discordante et infernale, et la nature une raillerie de Dieu ; elle n'aimait rien et portait de la haine à tout ; à mesure que chaque sentiment sortait de son cœur, la haine y entraît si bien qu'elle n'aimait plus rien au monde, sauf un homme. Souvent, quand elle voyait dans les jardins publics, des mères avec leurs enfants, qui jouaient avec eux et souriaient à leurs caresses, et puis des femmes avec leurs époux, des amants avec leurs maîtresses, et que tous ces gens-là étaient heureux, souriaient, aimaient la vie, elle les enviait et les maudissait à la fois ; elle eût voulu pouvoir les écraser tous du pied, et sa lèvre ironique leur jetait en passant quelque mot de dédain, quelque sourire d'orgueil.

D'autres fois, quand on lui disait qu'elle devait être heureuse dans la vie, avec sa fortune, son rang, que sa santé était bonne, que ses joues étaient fraîches et qu'on voyait qu'elle était heureuse, que rien ne lui manquait, elle souriait cependant, la rage dans l'âme : "Ah ! les imbéciles, disait-elle, qui ne voient que le bonheur sur un front calme et qui ne savent pas que la torture arrache des rires."

Elle prit la vie, dès lors, comme un long cri de douleur. Si elle voyait des femmes qui se paraient de leur vertu, d'autres de leur amour, elle raillait leur vertu et leurs amours ; quand elle trouvait des gens heureux et confiants en Dieu, elle les tourmentait par un rire ou par un sarcasme ; les prêtres ? elle les faisait rougir, en passant devant eux, par un regard lascif, et riait à leurs oreilles ; les jeunes filles et les vierges ? elle les faisait pâlir par ses contes d'amour et ses histoires passionnées. Et puis l'on se demandait quelle était cette femme pâle et amaigrie, ce fantôme errant, avec ses yeux de feu et sa tête de damnée ; et si on venait à vouloir la connaître, on ne trouvait au fond de son existence qu'une douleur et dans sa conduite que des larmes.

Oh ! les femmes ! les femmes ! elle les haïssait dans l'âme, les jeunes et les belles surtout, et quand elle les voyait dans un spectacle ou dans un ball, à la lueur des lustres et des bougies, étalant leur gorge ondulante, ornées de dentelles et de diamants, et que les hommes empressés souriaient à leurs sourires, qu'on les flattait et les vantait, elle eût voulu froisser ces vêtements et ces gazes brodées, cracher sur ces figures chéries, et traîner dans la boue ces fronts si calmes et si fiers de leur froideur. Elle ne croyait plus à rien, qu'au malheur et à la mort.

La vertu pour elle était un mot, la religion un fantôme, la réputation un masque imposteur comme un voile qui cache les rides. Elle trouvait alors des joies dans l'orgueil, des délices dans le dédain, et elle crachait en passant sur le seuil des églises.

Quand elle pensait à Ernest, à sa voix, à ses paroles, à ses bras qui l'avaient tenue si longtemps palpitante et éperdue d'amour, et qu'elle se trouvait sous les baisers de son mari, ah ! elle se tordait de douleur et d'angoisse et se roulait sur elle-même, comme un homme qui râle et agonise, en criant après un nom, en pleurant sur un souvenir. Elle avait des enfants de cet homme, ces enfants ressemblaient à leur père, une fille de trois ans, un garçon de cinq, et souvent, dans leurs jeux, leurs rires pénétraient jusqu'à elle ; le matin, ils venaient l'embrasser en riant, quand elle, elle leur mère, avait veillé toute la nuit dans des tourments inouïs et que ses joues étaient encore fraîches de ses larmes.

Souvent, quand elle pensait à lui, errant sur les mers, ballotté peut-être par la tempête, à lui qui se perdait peut-être dans les flots, seul et voulant se rattacher à la vie, et qu'elle voyait de là un cadavre bercé sur la vague, ou vient s'abattre le vautour, alors elle entendait des cris de joie, des voix enfantines qui accouraient pour lui montrer un arbre en fleurs, ou le soleil qui faisait reluire la rosée des herbes. C'était pour elle comme la douleur de l'homme qui tombe sur le pavé et qui voit la foule rire et battre des mains.

Alors que pensait Ernest, loin d'elle ? Parfois, il est vrai, quand il n'avait rien à faire, dans ses moments de loisir et de désœuvrement, en pensant à elle, à ses étreintes brûlantes, à sa croupe charnue, à ses seins blancs, à ses longs cheveux noirs, il la regrettait, mais il s'empressait d'aller éteindre dans les bras d'une esclave le feu allumé dans l'amour le plus fort et le plus sacré ; d'ailleurs, il se consolait de cette perte avec facilité, en pensant qu'il avait fait une bonne action, que cela était agir en citoyen, que Franklin ou Lafayette n'auraient pas mieux fait, car il était alors sur la terre nationale du patriotisme, de l'esclavage, du café et de la tempérance, je veux dire l'Amérique.

C'était un de ces gens chez qui le jugement et la raison occupent une si grande place qu'ils ont mangé le cœur comme un voisin incommode ; un monde les séparait, car Mazza, au contraire, était plongée dans le délire et l'angoisse, et tandis que son amant se vautrait à plaisir dans les bras des négresses et des mulâtresses, elle se mourait d'ennui, croyant aussi qu'Ernest ne vivait que pour elle et ressentait un mal dont il se moquait dans son rire bestial et sauvage ; il se donnait à une autre. Tandis que cette pauvre femme pleurait et maudissait Dieu, qu'elle appelait l'enfer à son secours et se roulait en demandant si

Satan enfin n'arriverait pas, Ernest, peut-être, au même moment où elle embrassait avec frénésie un médaillon de ses cheveux, au même moment peut-être, il se promenait gravement sur la place publique d'une ville des États-Unis, en veste et en pantalon blanc comme un planteur, et allait au marché acheter quelque esclave noire qui eût des bras forts et musclés, de pendantes mamelles et de la volupté pour de l'or.

Du reste, il s'occupait de travaux chimiques, il y avait plein deux immenses cartons de notes sur les couches de silex et les analyses minéralogiques, et d'ailleurs le climat lui convenait beaucoup, il se portait à ravir dans cette atmosphère embaumée d'académies savantes, de chemins de Fer, de bateaux à vapeur, de cannes à sucre et d'indigo.

Dans quelle atmosphère vivait Mazza ? Le cercle de sa vie ni était pas si étendu, mais c'était un monde à part, qui tournait dans les larmes et le désespoir, et qui enfin se perdait dans l'abîme d'un crime.

VI

Un drap noir était tendu sur la porte cochère de l'hôtel, il était relevé par le milieu et formait une espèce d'ogive brisée, qui laissait voir une tombe et deux flambeaux, dont les lumières tremblaient, comme la voix d'un mourant, au souffle froid de l'hiver qui passait sur ces draps noirs tout étoilés de larmes d'argent. De temps en temps, les deux fossoyeurs qui avaient soin de la fête se rangeaient de côté pour faire place aux conviés arrivant l'un après l'autre, tous vêtus de noir avec des cravates blanches, un jabot plissé et des cheveux frisés ; ils se découvraient en passant près du mort, et trempaient dans l'eau bénite le bout de leur gant noir.

C'était dans l'hiver, la neige tombait ; après que le cortège fut parti, une jeune femme, entourée d'une mante noire, descendit dans la cour, marcha sur la pointe des pieds à travers la couche de neige qui couvrait les pavés, et elle avança sa tête pâle entre ses voiles noirs pour voir le char funèbre qui s'éloignait ; puis elle éteignit les deux bougies qui brûlaient encore, elle remonta, défit son manteau, réchauffa ses sandales blanches au feu de sa cheminée, détourna la tête encore une fois, mais elle ne vit plus que le dos noir du dernier des assistants qui tournait à l'angle de la rue.

Quand elle n'entendit plus le ferraillement monotone des roues du char sur le pavé, et que tout fut passé et parti, les chants des prêtres, le convoi du mort, elle se jeta sur le lit mortuaire, s'y roula à plaisir, en criant dans les accès de sa joie convulsive : "Arrive maintenant ! à toi, à toi tout cela ! Je t'attends ! viens donc ! A toi, mon bien-aimé, la couche nuptiale et ses délices ! à toi, à toi seul, à nous deux un monde d'amour et de voluptés ! Viens ici, je m'y étendrai sous tes caresses, je m'y roulerai sous tes baisers". Elle vit sur sa commode une petite boîte en palissandre que lui avait donnée Ernest. C'était comme ce jour-la, un jour d'hiver, il arriva, entouré de son manteau, son chapeau avait de la neige, et quand il l'embrassa, sa peau avait une fraîcheur et un parfum de jeunesse qui rendait les baisers doux comme l'aspiration d'une rose. Cette boîte avait, au milieu, leurs chiffres entrelacés M et E, son bois était odoriférant, elle y porta ses narines et y resta longtemps contemplative et rêveuse.

Bientôt on lui amena ses enfants, ils pleuraient et demandaient leur père ; ils voulurent embrasser Mazza et se consoler avec elle, celle-ci les renvoya avec sa femme de chambre, sans un mot, sans un sourire. Elle pensait à lui, qui était bien loin et qui ne revenait pas.

VII

Elle vécut ainsi plusieurs mois, seule avec son avenir qui avançait, se sentant chaque jour plus heureuse et plus libre, à mesure que tout ce qui était dans son cœur s'en allait pour faire place à l'amour ; toutes les passions, tous les sentiments, tout ce qui trouve place dans une âme était parti, comme les scrupules de l'enfance, la pudeur d'abord, la religion ensuite, la vertu après, et enfin les débris de tout cela qu'elle avait jetés comme les éclats d'un verre brisé. Elle n'avait plus rien d'une femme, si ce n'est l'amour, mais un amour entier et terrible, qui se torturait lui-même et brûlait les autres, comme le Vésuve qui se déchire dans ses éruptions et répand sa lave bouillante sur les fleurs de la vallée.

Elle avait des enfants, ses enfants moururent comme leur père ; chaque jour ils pâlissaient de plus en plus, s'amaigrissaient, et la nuit ils se réveillaient dans le délire, se tordant sur leur couche d'agonie en disant qu'un serpent leur mangeait la poitrine, car il y avait là quelque chose qui les déchirait et les brûlait sans cesse, et Mazza contemplait leur agonie avec un rire sur les lèvres, qui était rempli de colère et de vengeance.

Ils moururent tous deux le même jour. Quand elle vit clouer leurs bières, ses yeux n'eurent point de larmes, son cœur pas de soupir ; elle les vit d'un œil sec et froid enveloppés dans leurs cercueils, et lorsqu'elle fut seule enfin, elle passa la nuit, heureuse et confiante, l'âme calme et la joie dans le cœur. Pas un remords ni un cri de douleur, car elle allait partir le lendemain, quitter la France après s'être vengée de l'amour profané, de tout ce qu'il y avait eu de fatal et de terrible dans sa destinée, après s'être raillée de Dieu, des hommes, de la vie, de la fatalité qui s'était jouée d'elle un moment, après s'être amusée à son tour de la vie et de la mort, des larmes et des chagrins, et avoir rendu au ciel des crimes pour ses douleurs.

Adieu, terre d'Europe, pleine de brouillards et de glaciers, où les cœurs sont tièdes comme l'atmosphère et les amours aussi flasques, aussi mous que ses nuages gris ; à moi l'Amérique et sa terre de lieu, son soleil ardent, son ciel pur, ses belles nuits dans les bosquets de palmiers et de platanes. Adieu le monde, merci de vous ; je pars, je me jette sur un navire. Va, mon beau navire, cours vite ! que tes voiles s'enflent au souffle du vent, que ta proue brise les vagues, bondis sur la tempête, saute sur les flots, et dusses-tu te briser enfin, jette-moi avec tes débris sur la terre où il respire !

Cette nuit-là fut passée dans le délire et l'agitation, mais c'était le délire de la joie et de l'espérance. Lorsqu'elle pensait à lui, qu'elle allait l'embrasser et vivre pour toujours avec lui, elle souriait et pleurait de bonheur.

La terre du cimetière, où reposaient ses enfants, était encore fraîche et mouillée d'eau bénite.

VIII

On lui apporta, le matin, une lettre ; elle avait sept mois de date. C'était d'Ernest. Elle en brisa le cachet en tremblant, la parcourut avidement ; quand elle l'eut terminée, elle recommença sa lecture, pâle d'effroi et pouvant à peine lire. Voici ce qu'il y avait :

“Pourquoi, madame, vos lettres sont-elles toujours aussi peu honnêtes ? la dernière surtout ? Je l'ai brûlée, j'aurais rougi que quelqu'un y jetât les yeux. Ne pourriez-vous enfin avoir plus de bornes dans vos passions ? Pourquoi venez-vous sans cesse, avec votre souvenir, me troubler dans mes travaux, m'arracher à mes occupations ? que vous ai-je fait pour m'aimer tant ?

“Encore une fois, madame, je veux qu'un amour soit sage ; j'ai quitté la France, oubliez-moi donc comme je vous ai oubliée, aimez votre mari ; le bonheur se trouve dans les routes battues par la foule, les sentiers de la montagne sont pleins de ronces et de cailloux, ils déchirent et vous usent vite.

“Maintenant je vis heureux, j'ai une petite maison charmante, sur le bord d'un fleuve, et, dans la plaine qu'il traverse, je fais la chasse aux insectes, j'herborise, et quand je rentre chez moi, je suis salué par mon nègre qui se courbe jusqu'à terre, et embrasse mes souliers quand il veut obtenir quelque faveur ; je me suis donc créé une existence heureuse, calme et paisible, au milieu de la nature et de la science, que n'en faites-vous autant ? qui vous en empêche ? on peut ce qu'on veut.

“Pour vous, pour votre bonheur même, je vous conseille de ne plus penser à moi, de ne plus m'écrire. A quoi bon cette correspondance ? à quoi cela nous avancera-t-il, quand vous direz cent fois que vous m'aimez et que vous écrirez encore sur les marges, tout autant de fois : je t'aime ?

“Il faut donc oublier tout, madame, et ne plus penser à ce que nous avons été l'un vis-à-vis de l'autre ; n'avons-nous pas eu chacun ce que nous désirions ?

“Ma position est à peu près faite, je suis directeur principal de la commission des essais pour les mines, la fille du directeur de première classe est une charmante personne de 17 ans, son père a soixante mille livres de rentes, elle est fille unique, elle est douce et bonne, elle a beaucoup de jugement et s'entendra à merveille à diriger un ménage, à surveiller une maison.

“Dans un mois, je me marie ; si vous m'aimez comme vous le dites toujours, cela doit vous faire plaisir, puisque je le fais pour mon bonheur.

“Adieu, madame Willers, ne pensez plus à un homme qui à la délicatesse de ne plus vous aimer, et si vous voulez me rendre un dernier service, c'est de me faire passer au plus vite un demi-litre d'acide prussique, que vous donnera très bien, sur ma recommandation, le secrétaire de l'Académie des sciences ; c'est un chimiste fort habile.

“Adieu, je compte sur vous, n'oubliez pas mon acide.

“Ernest VAUMONT.”

Quand Mazza eut lu cette lettre, elle poussa un cri inarticulé, comme si on l'eût brûlée avec des tenailles rouges.

Elle resta longtemps dans la consternation et la surprise. “Ah ! le lâche ! dit-elle enfin, il m'a séduite et il m'abandonne pour une autre ! Avoir tout donné pour lui et n'avoir plus rien ! jeter tout à la mer et s'appuyer sur une planche, et la planche vous glisse des mains, et l'on sent qu'on s'enfonce sous les flots !”

Elle l'aimait tant, cette pauvre femme ! elle lui avait donné sa vertu, elle lui avait prodigué son amour, elle avait renié Dieu, et puis encore — oh ! bien pis encore — son mari, ses enfants qu'elle avait vus rôler, mourir, en souriant, car elle pensait à lui. Que l'aire ? que devenir ? Une autre, une autre femme à qui il va dire : je t'aime ! à qui il va baiser les yeux, les seins, en l'appelant sa vie et sa passion ; une autre ! et elle ? en avait-elle eu d'autre que lui ? pour lui n'avait-elle pas repoussé son mari dans la couche nuptiale ? ne l'avait-elle pas trompé de ses lèvres adultères ? ne l'avait-elle pas empoisonné en versant des larmes de joie ?

C'était son Dieu et sa vie, il l'abandonne après s'être servi d'elle, après en avoir assez joui, assez usé ; voilà qu'il la repousse au loin, et la jette à l'abîme sans fond, celui du crime et du désespoir !

D'autres fois, elle ne pouvait en croire ses yeux, elle relisait cette lettre fatale et la couvrait de ses pleurs.

Oh ! comment ! disait-elle après que l'abattement eut fait place à la rage, à la fureur, oh ! comment, tu me quittes ? mais je suis au monde, seule, sans famille, sans parents, car je t'ai donné et famille et parents ; seule, sans honneur, car je l'ai immolé pour toi ; seule, sans réputation, car je l'ai sacrifiée sous tes baisers, à la vue du monde entier qui m'appelait ta maîtresse. Ta maîtresse ! dont tu rougis maintenant, lâche !

Et les morts, où sont-ils ?

Que Faire ? que devenir ? J'avais une seule idée, une seule chose au cœur, elle me manque ; irai-je te trouver ? mais tu me chasseras comme une esclave ; si je me jette au milieu des autres femmes, elles m'abandonneront en riant, me montreront du doigt avec fierté, car elles n'ont aimé personne, elles, elles ne connaissent pas les larmes. Oh ! tiens ! puisque je veux encore de l'amour, de la passion et de la vie, ils me diront sans doute d'aller quelque part où l'on vend à prix fixe de la volupté et des étreintes, et le soir, avec mes compagnes de luxure, j'appellerai les passants à travers les vitres, et il faudra, quand ils seront venus, que je les fasse jouir bien fort, que je leur en donne pour leur argent, qu'ils s'en aillent contents, et que je ne me plaigne pas encore, que je me trouve heureuse, que je rie à tout venant, car j'aurai mérité mon sort !

Et qu'ai-je fait ? je t'ai aimé plus qu'un autre. Oh ! grâce ! Ernest ; si tu entendais mes cris, tu aurais peut-être pitié de moi, moi qui n'ai pas eu de pitié pour eux, car je me maudis maintenant, je me roule ici dans l'angoisse et mes vêtements sont mouillés de mes larmes.

Et elle courait éperdue, puis elle tombait, se roulant par terre en maudissant Dieu, les hommes, la vie elle-même, tout ce qui vivait, tout ce qui pensait au monde ; elle arrachait de sa tête des poignées de cheveux noirs, et ses ongles étaient rouges de sang.

Oh ! ne pouvoir supporter la vie ! en être venue à se jeter dans les bras de la mort comme dans ceux d'une mère ! mais douter encore, au dernier moment, si la tombe n'a pas des supplices et le néant des douleurs ! être dégoutée de tout ! n'avoir plus de foi à rien, pas même à l'amour, la première religion du cœur, et ne pouvoir quitter ce malaise continu, comme un homme qui serait ivre et qu'on forcerait à boire encore !

Pourquoi donc es-tu venu dans ma solitude m'arracher a mon bonheur ? J'étais si confiante et si pure, et tu es venu pour m'aimer, et je t'ai aimé !

Les hommes, cela est si beau quand ils vous regardent ! Tu m'as donné de l'amour, tu m'en refuses maintenant, et moi je l'ai nourri par des crimes, voilà qu'il me tue aussi ! J'étais bonne alors, quand tu me vis, et maintenant je suis féroce et cruelle, je voudrais avoir quelque chose à broyer, à déchirer, à flétrir, et puis après à jeter au loin comme moi. Oh ! je hais tout, les hommes, Dieu ; et toi aussi je te hais, et pourtant je sens encore que pour toi je donnerais ma vie !

Plus je t'aimais, plus je t'aimais encore, comme ceux qui se désaltèrent avec l'eau salée de la mer et que la soif brûle toujours. Et maintenant je vais mourir !... la mort ! plus rien, quoi ! des ténèbres, une tombe, et puis... l'immensité du néant. Oh ! je sens que je voudrais pourtant vivre et faire souffrir comme j'ai souffert. Oh ! le bonheur ! où est-il ? mais c'est un rêve ; la vertu ? un mot ; l'amour ? une déception ; la tombe ? que sais-je ?

Je le saurai.

IX

Elle se leva, essuya ses larmes, tâcha d'apaiser les sanglots qui lui brisaient la poitrine et l'étouffaient ; elle regarda dans une glace si ses yeux étaient encore bien rouges de pleurs, renoua ses cheveux et sortit s'acquitter du dernier désir d'Ernest.

Mazza arriva chez le chimiste ; il allait venir. On la fit attendre dans un petit salon au premier, dont les meubles étaient couverts de drap rouge et de drap vert ; une table ronde en acajou au milieu, des lithographies représentant les batailles de Napoléon sur les lambris, et, sur la cheminée de marbre gris, une pendule en or où le cadran servait d'appui à un Amour qui se reposait de l'autre main sur ses flèches. La porte s'ouvrit comme la pendule sonnait deux heures, le chimiste entra. C'était un homme petit et mince, l'air sec et des manières polies ; il avait des lunettes, des lèvres minces, de petits yeux renfoncés. Quand Mazza lui eut expliqué le motif de sa visite, il se mit à l'aire l'éloge de Ernest Vaumont, son caractère, son cœur, ses dispositions ; enfin il lui remit le flacon d'acide, la mena par la main au bas de l'escalier, il se mouilla même les pieds dans la cour en la reconduisant jusqu'à la porte de la rue.

Mazza ne pouvait marcher dans les rues tant sa tête était brûlante ; ses joues étaient pourpres et il lui sembla plusieurs fois que le sang allait lui sortir par les pores. Elle passa par des rues où la misère était affichée sur les maisons, comme ces filets de couleur qui tombent des murs blanchis, et en voyant la misère elle disait : je vais me guérir de votre malheur ; elle passa devant le palais des rois et dit, en serrant le poison dans ses deux mains : Adieu, l'existence, je vais me guérir de vos soucis ; en rentrant chez elle, avant de fermer sa porte, elle jeta un regard sur le monde qu'elle quittait, et sur la cité pleine de bruit, de rumeurs et de cris : Adieu, vous tous ! dit-elle.

X

Elle ouvrit son secrétaire, cacheta le flacon d'acide, y mit l'adresse, et écrivit un autre billet ; il était adressé au commissaire central.

Elle sonna et le donna alun domestique.

Elle écrivit sur une troisième Feuille : “J’aimais un homme ; pour lui j’ai tué mon mari, pour lui j’ai tué mes enfants, je meurs sans remords, sans espoir, mais avec des regrets”. Elle la plaça sur sa cheminée.

“Encore une demi-heure, dit-elle, bientôt il va venir et m’emmènera au cimetière.”

Elle ôta ses vêtements, et resta quelques minutes à regarder son beau corps que rien ne couvrait, à penser à toutes les voluptés qu’il avait données et aux jouissances immenses qu’elle avait prodiguées à son amant.

Quel trésor que l’amour d’une telle femme !

Enfin, après avoir pleuré, pensant à ses jours qui s’étaient enfuis, à son bonheur, à ses rêves, à ses caprices de jeunesse, et puis encore à lui, bien longtemps ; après s’être demandé ce que c’était que la mort, et s’être perdue dans ce gouffre sans fond de la pensée qui se ronge et se déchire de rage et d’impuissance, elle se releva tout à coup comme d’un rêve, elle prit quelques gouttes du poison, qu’elle avait versées dans une tasse de vermeil, but avidement, et s’étendit, pour la dernière fois, sur ce sofa où si souvent elle s’était roulée dans les bras d’Ernest, dans les transports de l’amour.

XI

Quand le commissaire entra, Mazza râlait encore ; elle fit quelques bonds par terre, se tordit plusieurs fois, tous ses membres se raidirent ensemble, elle poussa un cri déchirant.

Quand il approcha d’elle, elle était morte.

AGONIES .

PENSÉES SCEPTIQUES.

À MON AMI

ALFRED LE POITTEVIN

CES PAUVRES FEUILLES SONT DÉDIÉES
PAR L'AUTEUR.
BIZARRES COMME SES PENSÉES, INCORRECTES COMME L'ÂME,
ELLES SONT L'EXPRESSION
DE SON CŒUR ET DE SON CERVEAU.

Tu les a vues éclore, mon cher Alfred, les voilà réunies sur un tas de papier. Que le vent disperse les feuilles, que la mémoire les oublie, ce méchant cadeau te rappellera nos vieilles causeries de l'an passé.

Sans doute ton cœur se dilatera en te ressouvenant de ce suave parfum de jeunesse qui embaumait tant de pensées désespérantes, et si tu ne peux lire les caractères qu'aura tracés ma main tu verras couramment dans le cœur qui les a versés.

Maintenant je te les envoie comme un soupir, comme un signe de la main à un ami qu'on espère revoir.

Peut-être riras-tu plus tard, quand tu seras un homme marié, rangé et moral, en rejetant les yeux sur les pensées d'un pauvre enfant de seize ans qui t'aimait par-dessus toute chose et qui déjà avait l'âme tourmentée de tant de sottises.

20 avril 1838.

G<sup>ve</sup> Flaubert.

Titre singulier, n'est-ce pas ? et à voir ainsi cet arrangement de lettres insignifiant et banal, jamais on ne se serait douté qu'il pût renfermer une pensée sérieuse.

Agonies ! eh bien, c'est quelque roman bien hideux et bien noir, je présume ; vous vous trompez, c'est plus, c'est tout un immense résumé d'une vie morale bien hideuse et bien noire.

C'est quelque chose de vague, d'irrésolu, qui tient du cauchemar, du rire de dédain, des pleurs et d'une longue rêverie de poète. Poète ? puis-je donner ce nom à celui qui blasphème froidement avec un sarcasme cruel et ironique et qui, parlant de l'âme, se met à rire ? Non, c'est moins que de la poésie, c'est de la prose ; moins que de la prose, des cris ; mais il y en a de faux, d'aigus, de perçants, de sourds, toujours de vrais, rarement d'heureux. C'est une œuvre bizarre et indéfinissable comme ces masques grotesques qui vous font peur.

Il y aura bientôt un an que l'auteur en a écrit la première page, et depuis, ce pénible travail fut bien des fois rejeté, bien des fois repris. Il a écrit ces feuilles dans ses jours de doute, dans ses moments d'ennui, quelquefois dans des nuits fiévreuses, d'autres fois au milieu d'un bal, sous les lauriers d'un jardin ou sur les rochers de la mer.

Chaque fois qu'une mort s'opérait dans son âme, chaque fois qu'il tombait de quelque chose de haut, chaque fois qu'une illusion se défaisait et s'abattait comme un château de cartes, chaque fois enfin que quelque chose de pénible et d'agité se passait sous sa vie extérieure calme et tranquille, alors, dis-je, il jetait quelques cris et versait quelques larmes. Il a écrit sans prétention de style, sans désirs de gloire, comme on pleure sans apprêt, comme on souffre sans art.

Jamais il n'a fait ceci avec l'intention de le publier plus tard ; il a mis trop de vérité et trop de bonne foi dans sa croyance à rien, pour la dire aux hommes.

Il l'a fait pour le montrer à un, à deux tout au plus, qui lui serreront la main après l'avoir entendu et qui ne lui diront pas : c'est bien, mais qui diront : c'est vrai.

Enfin, si par hasard quelque main malheureuse venait à découvrir ces lignes, qu'elle se garde d'y toucher ! car elles brûlent et dessèchent la main qui les touche, usent les yeux qui les lisent, assassinent l'âme qui les comprend.

Non ! si quelqu'un vient à découvrir ceci, qu'il se garde de le lire ; ou bien, si son malheur l'y pousse, qu'il ne dise pas après : c'est l'œuvre d'un insensé, d'un fou, mais qu'il dise : il a souffert quoique son front fût calme, quoique le sourire fût sur ses lèvres et le bonheur dans ses yeux. Qu'il lui sache gré — c'est un de ses proches de lui avoir caché tout cela — de ne point s'être tué de désespoir avant d'écrire, et enfin d'avoir réuni dans quelques pages tout un abîme immense de scepticisme et de désespoir.

I

Je reprends donc ce travail commencé il y a deux ans, travail triste et long, symbole de la vie : la tristesse et la longueur.

Pourquoi l'ai-je interrompu si longtemps ? pourquoi ai-je tant de dégoût à le faire ? qu'en sais-je ?

II

Pourquoi donc tout m'ennuie-t-il sur cette terre ? pourquoi le jour, la nuit, la pluie, le beau temps, tout cela me semble-t-il toujours un crépuscule triste, où un soleil rouge se couche derrière un océan sans limites ?

Oh ! la pensée, autre océan sans limites ; c'est le déluge d'Ovide, une mer sans bornes, où la tempête est la vie de l'existence.

III

Souvent je me suis demandé pourquoi je vivais, ce que j'étais venu faire au monde, et je n'ai trouvé là dedans qu'un abîme derrière moi, un abîme devant ; à droite, à gauche, en haut, en bas, partout des ténèbres.

IV

La vie de l'homme est comme une malédiction partie de la poitrine d'un géant, et qui va se briser de rochers en rochers en mourant à chaque vibration qui retentit dans les airs.

V

On a souvent parlé de la Providence et de la bonté céleste ; je ne vois guère de raisons d'y croire. Le Dieu qui s'amuserait à tenter les hommes pour voir jusqu'où ils peuvent souffrir, ne serait-il pas aussi cruellement stupide qu'un enfant qui, sachant que le hanneton va mourir, lui arrache d'abord les ailes, puis les pattes, puis la tête ?

VI

La vanité, selon moi, est le fond de toutes les actions des hommes. Quand j'avais parlé, agi, fait n'importe quel acte de ma vie, et que j'analysais mes paroles ou mes actions, je trouvais toujours cette vieille folle nichée dans mon cœur ou dans mon esprit. Bien des hommes sont comme moi, peu ont la même franchise.

Cette dernière réflexion peut être vraie, la vanité me l'a fait écrire, la vanité de ne pas paraître vain me la ferait peut-être ôter.

La gloire même, après qui je cours, n'est qu'un mensonge.

Sotte espèce que la nôtre ! je suis comme un homme qui, trouvant une femme laide, en serait amoureux.

VII

Quelle chose grandement niaise et cruellement bouffonne que ce mot qu'on appelle Dieu !

VIII

Pour moi, le dernier mot du sublime dans l'art sera la pensée, c'est-à-dire la manifestation de la pensée, aussi rapide et spirituelle que la pensée.

Quel est l'homme qui n'a pas senti son esprit accablé de sensations et d'idées incohérentes, terrifiantes et brûlantes ? L'analyse ne saurait les décrire, mais un livre ainsi fait serait la nature. Car qu'est-ce que la poésie, si ce n'est la nature exquise, le cœur et la pensée réunis ?

Oh ! si j'étais poète, comme je ferais des choses qui seraient belles !

Je me sens dans le cœur une force intime que personne ne peut voir. Serai-je condamné toute ma vie à être comme un muet qui veut parler et écume de rage ?

Il y a peu de positions aussi atroces.

IX

Je m'ennuie, je voudrais être crevé, être ivre, ou être Dieu pour faire des farces.

Et m....

ANGOISSES.

I

À quoi bon faire ceci ? à rien. Car à quoi bon apprendre la vérité quand elle est triste ? à quoi bon venir pleurer au milieu des rires, gémir dans un banquet joyeux, et jeter le suaire des morts sur la robe de la fiancée

II

Oh ! oui, pourtant, laissez-moi vous dire combien mon âme a de blessures saignantes ; laissez-moi vous dire combien mes larmes ont creusé mes joues.

III

— Eh quoi ? tu ne crois à rien ?

— Non.

— Pas à la Gloire ?

— Regarde l'envie.

— Pas à la générosité ?

— Et l'avarice ?

— Pas à la liberté ?

— Tu ne t'aperçois donc pas du despotisme qui fait courber le cou du peuple ?

— Pas à l'amour ?

— Et la prostitution ?

— Pas à l'immortalité ?

— En moins d'un an les vers déchirent un cadavre, puis c'est la poussière, puis le néant ; après le néant... le néant, et c'est tout ce qu'il en reste.

IV

L'autre jour, on exhumait un cadavre, on transportait les morceaux d'un homme illustre dans un autre coin de la terre ; c'était une cérémonie comme une autre, aussi belle, aussi pompeuse, aussi fardée qu'un enterrement à l'exception près que dans un enterrement la viande est fraîche, dans la seconde elle est pourrie. Tout le monde attendait le fossoyeur, lorsque, enfin, au bout de dix minutes, il arriva en chantant. C'était un bien brave homme que cet homme, indifférent pour le présent, insoucieux pour l'avenir ; il avait un chapeau de cuir ciré, et une pipe à la bouche.

L'opération commença. Après quelques pelletées de terre, nous vîmes le cercueil ; Le bois en était de chêne et à demi consumé, car un seul coup le rompit maladroitement. Alors nous vîmes l'homme, l'homme dans toute son affreuse horreur. Pourtant une vapeur épaisse qui s'éleva aussitôt nous empêcha pendant quelque temps de bien distinguer : son ventre était rongé, sa poitrine et ses cuisses étaient d'une blancheur mate ; en s'approchant de plus près, il était facile de reconnaître que cette blancheur était une infinité de vers qui rongeaient avec avidité.

Ce spectacle nous fit mal, un jeune homme s'évanouit.

Le fossoyeur n'hésita pas ; il prit cette chair infecte entre ses bras et l'alla porter dans le char qui était à quelques pas plus loin. Comme il allait vite, la cuisse gauche tomba par terre ; il la releva avec force et la mit sur son dos, puis il vint recouvrir le trou. Alors il s'aperçut qu'il avait oublié quelque chose, c'était la tête. Il la tira par les cheveux. C'était quelque chose de hideux à voir que ces yeux ternes et à moitié fermés, ce visage gluant, froid, dont on voyait les pommettes et dont les mouches lui dévoraient les yeux.

Où était donc alors cet homme illustre ? où était sa gloire, ses vertus, son nom ?

L'homme illustre, c'était quelque chose d'infect, d'indécis, de hideux, quelque chose qui répandait une odeur fétide, quelque chose dont la vue faisait mal.

Sa gloire ? vous voyez, on le traite comme un chien de basse qualité, car tous ces hommes étaient venus là par curiosité — oui, par curiosité — poussés par ce sentiment qui fait rire l'homme à la vue des tortures de l'homme, poussés par ce sentiment qui excite les femmes à montrer leurs belles têtes blondes aux fenêtres, un jour d'exécution. C'est ce même sentiment naturel qui porte l'homme à se passionner pour ce qu'il y a de hideux et d'amèrement grotesque.

Quant à ses vertus ? on ne s'en souvenait plus, car il avait laissé des dettes après sa mort, et ses héritiers avaient été obligés de payer pour lui.

Son nom ? il était éteint, car il n'avait point laissé d'enfants, mais beaucoup de neveux qui soupiraient depuis longtemps après sa mort.

Dire qu'il y a un an, cet homme-là était riche, heureux, puissant, qu'on l'appelait monseigneur, qu'il habitait dans un palais, et que maintenant il n'est rien, qu'on l'appelle un cadavre et qu'il pourrit dans un cercueil ! ah ! l'horrible idée ! Et dire que nous serons comme cela, nous autres qui vivons maintenant, qui respirons la brise du soir, qui sentons le parfum des fleurs ! ah ! c'est à en devenir fou. Dire qu'après ce moment il n'y a rien ! rien ! et toujours le néant ! toujours ! Voilà encore qui passe l'esprit de l'homme. Oh ! vraiment, est-ce qu'après la vie tout est fini et fini pour l'éternité ? dites, est-ce qu'il ne subsiste rien ?

Imbécile regarde une tête de mort !

V

Mais l'âme ?

Ah ! oui, l'âme ! Si tu avais vu l'autre jour le fossoyeur avec un chapeau de cuir ciré sur le coin de l'oreille, avec son brûle-gueule bien culotté ; si tu avais vu comment il a ramassé cette cuisse en pourriture, et comme tout cela ne l'empêchait pas de siffler en ricanant : jeunes filles, voulez-vous danser ? tu aurais ri de pitié, et tu aurais dit : L'âme, c'est peut-être cette exhalaison fétide qui sort d'un cadavre.

Il ne faut pas être philosophe pour deviner cela.

VI

Pourtant il est si triste de penser qu'après la mort tout s'en va ! Oh ! non ! vite un prêtre ! un prêtre qui me dise, qui me prouve, qui me persuade que l'âme existe dans le corps de l'homme.

Un prêtre ! mais lequel ira-t-on chercher ? celui-là dîne chez l'archevêque ; un autre fait le catéchisme ; un troisième n'a pas le temps.

Eh quoi donc ? ils me laisseront mourir ! moi qui me tords les bras de désespoir, qui appelle la haine ou l'amour, Dieu ou Satan ? Ah ! Satan va venir, je le sens.

Au secours ! Hélas ! personne ne me répond.

Cherchons encore.

J'ai cherché, et je n'ai pas trouvé ; j'ai frappé à la porte, personne ne m'a ouvert et on m'y a fait languir de froid et de misère, si bien que j'ai failli en mourir.

En passant dans une rue sombre, tortueuse et étroite, j'ai entendu des paroles mielleuses et lascives, j'ai entendu des mots de volupté et j'ai vu un prêtre et une prostituée qui blasphémaient Dieu et qui dansaient des danses impudiques ; j'ai détourné la vue et j'ai pleuré. Mon pied heurte quelque chose, c'était un christ en bronze, un christ dans la boue !

VII

Il appartenait probablement au prêtre, qui l'avait jeté avant d'entrer, comme un masque de théâtre ou un habit d'arlequin.

Dites-moi maintenant que la vie n'est pas une ignoble farce, puisque le prêtre jette son Dieu pour entrer chez la fille de joie ! Bravo ! Satan rit, vous voyez bien ; bravo ! il triomphe. Allons j'ai raison ; la vertu c'est le masque, le vice c'est la vérité. Voilà pourquoi peu de gens la disent, c'est qu'elle est trop hideuse à dire. Bravo ! la maison de l'honnête homme c'est le masque, le lupanar c'est la vérité, la couche nuptiale c'est le masque, l'adultère qui s'y consomme c'est la vérité ; la vie c'est le masque, la mort c'est la vérité ; la religieuse c'est le masque, la fille de joie c'est la vérité ; le bien c'est faux, la mort c'est vrai.

VIII

Ah ! criez bien fort, faiseurs de vertu aux gants jaunes ; criez bien fort, vous qui parlez de morale et entretenez des danseuses ; criez fort, vous qui faites plus pour votre chien que pour votre laquais ; criez fort, vous qui condamnez à mort l'homme qui tue par besoin, vous qui tuez par mépris ; criez fort, juges dont la robe est rouge de sang ; criez fort, vous qui montez chaque jour à votre tribunal sur les têtes que vous y avez abattues ; criez fort, ministres aux mains crochues, vous qui vous vantez des places accordées à l'époux et payées par sa femme par sa pauvre femme qui vous demande pardon, grâce, pitié, merci, qui embrassait vos genoux, qui se cramponnait au drap bleu de votre bureau aux pieds d'or, qui se cachait les yeux dans les draps rouges de vos fenêtres, vous qui avez brisé son honneur, vous dont la noire bouche a dit : cet homme sera directeur des postes, et qui en même temps avez craché sur le visage de sa femme !

IX

Enfin on m'indiqua un prêtre.

J'allai chez lui, je l'attendis quelques instants et je m'assis dans sa cuisine devant un grand feu ; sur ce feu pétillait dans une large poêle une énorme quantité de pommes de terre.

Mon homme arriva bientôt ; c'était un vieillard à cheveux blancs, au maintien plein de douceur et de bonté. "Mon père, lui dis-je en l'abordant, je désirerais avoir un moment d'entretien avec vous."

Il m'introduisit dans une salle voisine ; mais à peine avais-je commencé, qu'entendant du bruit dans la cuisine : "Rose, s'écria-t-il, prenez donc garde aux pommes de terre."

Et en me détournant, je vis, grâce à la clarté de la chandelle, que l'amateur de pommes de terre avait le nez de travers et tout bourgeonné.

Je partis d'un éclat de rire, et la porte se referma aussitôt sur mes pas.

Dites maintenant, à qui la faute ? Je suis venu là pour m'éclairer dans mes doutes, eh bien, l'homme qui devait m'instruire, je l'ai trouvé ridicule. Est-ce ma faute, à moi, si cet homme a le nez crochu et couvert de boutons ? est-ce ma faute si sa voix avide m'a semblé d'un timbre glouton et bestial ? Non certes, car j'étais entré là avec des sentiments pieux.

Ce n'est pourtant point non plus la faute de ce pauvre homme si son nez est mal fait et s'il aime les pommes ; du tout, la faute est à celui qui fait les nez crochus et les pommes de terre.

X

Du nord au sud, de l'est à l'ouest, partout où vous irez, vous ne pouvez faire un pas sans que la tyrannie, l'injustice, l'avarice, la cupidité ne vous repoussent avec égoïsme ; partout, vous dis-je, vous trouverez des hommes qui vous diront : Retire-toi de devant mon soleil ; retire-toi, tu marches sur le sable que j'ai étalé sur la terre ; retire-toi, tu marches sur mon bien ; retire-toi, tu aspires l'air qui m'appartient. Oh ! oui, l'homme est un voyageur qui a soif ; il demande de l'eau pour boire, on la lui refuse, et il meurt.

XI

Oui, la tyrannie pèse sur les peuples et je sens qu'il est beau de les en affranchir ; je sens mon cœur se soulever d'aise au mot liberté comme celui d'un enfant bat de terreur au mot fantôme, et ni l'un ni l'autre ne sont vrais. Encore une illusion détruite, encore une fleur fanée.

XII

Bien des gens sans doute essaieront de la conquérir, cette belle liberté, fille de leurs rêves, idole des peuples ; beaucoup tenteront, et ils succomberont sous le poids de leur fardeau.

XIII

Jadis il y avait un voyageur qui marchait dans les grands déserts d'Afrique ; il osa s'avancer par un chemin qui abrégait sa route de quinze milles, mais qui était dangereux, rempli de serpents, de bêtes féroces et de rochers difficiles à franchir.

Et il se faisait tard, il avait faim, il était fatigué, malade, et il pressait le pas pour arriver plus tôt ; mais à chaque pas il rencontrait des obstacles ; pourtant il était courageux et marchait la tête haute.

Et au milieu de son chemin, voilà que se présente tout à coup à ses yeux une énorme pierre. Or c'était dans un sentier escarpé, couvert de ronces et d'épines.

Il fallait donc ou rouler cette pierre jusqu'au haut de la montagne, ou tâcher d'escalader cette roche, ou bien encore attendre jusqu'au matin pour voir s'il n'arriverait pas d'autres voyageurs qui voulussent l'aider.

Mais il avait tellement faim, la soif le tourmentait si cruellement qu'il résolut de faire tous ses efforts pour faire en sorte d'arriver à la hutte la plus voisine, qui était encore à quatre milles de là ; il se mit donc à s'aider des pieds et des mains pour monter en haut de la roche.

Il suait à grosses gouttes, ses bras se contractaient avec vigueur et ses mains saisissaient convulsivement chaque brin d'herbe qui s'offrait à lui ; mais l'herbe manquait et il retombait découragé. Plusieurs fois il renouvela ses efforts, ce fut en vain.

Et toujours il retombait plus faible, plus harassé, plus désespéré ; il maudissait Dieu et blasphémait ; enfin il tenta une dernière fois. Cette fois il réunit toutes les forces dont il était capable ; après une prière à Dieu, il monta.

Oh ! quelle était humble, sublime, tendre, cette courte prière ! N'allez pas croire qu'il récita quelque chose qu'une nourrice lui ait apprise dans son enfance ; du tout, ses paroles, c'était des larmes, et ses signes de croix ses soupirs. Il monta donc, bien résolu à se laisser mourir de faim s'il ne réussissait pas.

Le voilà en route, il monte, il avance, il lui semble qu'une main protectrice l'attire vers le sommet, il lui semble voir sourire la face de quelque ange qui l'appelle à lui, puis tout à coup tout change ; c'est comme une vision effroyable qui s'empare de ses sens, il entend le sifflement d'un serpent qui glisse sur la pierre et qui va l'atteindre, ses genoux plient sous lui, ses ongles qui s'accrochaient aux sinuosités de la roche se retournèrent en dehors... Il tomba à la renverse. Que faire maintenant ?

Il a faim, il a froid, il a soif, le vent siffle dans l'immense désert rouge, et la lune s'obscurcit dans les nuages.

Il se mit à pleurer et à avoir peur comme un enfant ; il pleura sur ses parents qui mourront de douleur, et il eut peur des bêtes féroces.

“Car, se disait-il, il fait nuit, je suis malade, les tigres vont venir me déchirer.”

Il attendit longtemps quelqu'un qui voulût le secourir, mais les tigres vinrent, le déchirèrent et burent son sang.

Eh bien, je vous le dis, il en est de même de vous autres qui voulez conquérir la liberté ; découragés de vos efforts, vous attendrez quelqu'un pour vous aider.

Mais quelqu'un ne viendra pas... oh ! non.

Et les tigres viendront, vous déchireront et boiront votre sang comme celui du pauvre voyageur.

XIV

Oh ! oui, la misère et le malheur règnent sur l'homme !

Oh ! la misère ! la misère ! vous ne l'avez peut-être jamais ressentie, vous qui parlez sur les vices des pauvres. C'est quelque chose qui vous prend un homme, vous l'amaigrit, vous l'égorge, l'étrangle, le dissèque et puis après elle jette ses os à la voirie ; quelque chose de hideux, de jaune, de fétide, qui se cache dans un taudis, dans un bouge, sous l'habit d'un poète, sous les haillons du mendiant. La misère ? c'est l'homme aux longues dents blanches, qui vient vous dire avec sa voix sépulcrale, le soir, dans l'hiver, au coin d'une rue : "Monsieur, du pain" ! et qui vous montre un pistolet ; la misère ? c'est l'espion qui se glisse derrière votre paravent, écoute vos paroles et va dire au ministre : "Ici, il y a une conspiration ; là, on fait de la poudre". La misère ? c'est la femme qui siffle sur les boulevards entre les arbres ; vous vous approchez d'elle, et cette femme a un vieux manteau usé ; elle ouvre son manteau, elle a une robe blanche, mais cette robe blanche a des trous ; elle ouvre sa robe et vous voyez sa poitrine, mais sa poitrine est amaigrie, et dans cette poitrine il y a la faim. Ah ! la faim ! la faim ! oui, partout la faim, jusque dans son manteau dont elle a vendu les agrafes d'argent, jusque dans sa robe dont elle a vendu la garniture de dentelles, jusque dans les mots dits avec souffrance : "viens ! viens" ! Oui, la faim jusque dans ses seins où elle a vendu des baisers !

Ah ! la faim ! la faim ! ce mot-là, ou plutôt cette chose-là a fait les révolutions ; elle en fera bien d'autres !

XV

Le malheur, lui, avec sa figure aux yeux caves, va plus loin ; il pose sa griffe de fer jusque sur la tête du roi, et pour percer son crâne brise sa couronne. Le malheur ? il assomme un ministre, il siège au chevet d'un grand, il va chez l'enfant, le brûle, le dévore, blanchit ses cheveux, creuse ses joues et le tue ; il se tord, il rampe comme un serpent, et il tord les autres et les fait ramper aussi. Oh ! oui, le malheur est impitoyable, insatiable ; sa soif est continuelle, c'est comme le tonneau des Danaïdes qui était sans fond ; lui, son avidité est sans fin. Aucun homme ne peut se vanter d'avoir échappé à ses coups, il s'attache aux jeunes, il les embrasse, les caresse, mais ses caresses sont comme celles du lion, elles laissent des marques saignantes ; il vient tout à coup au milieu de la fête, des rires, de la joie et du vin.

Il aime surtout à frapper les têtes couronnées. Jadis il y avait dans une salle basse du Louvre un homme, non, je me trompe, un fou, et ce fou montrait sa figure livide à travers les barreaux de ses fenêtres dont les vitres étaient brisées et par lesquelles entraient les oiseaux de nuit, il était couvert de haillons dorés. De l'or sur des haillons ! songez à cela et vous rirez. Ses mains se crispaient avec rage, sa bouche écumait, ses pieds tout nus frappaient les dalles humides. Oh ! c'est que, voyez-vous, lui, lui l'homme aux haillons dorés, il entendait au-dessus de sa tête le bruit du bal, le retentissement des verres, le bourdonnement de l'orgue. Et il mourut ensuite, le pauvre fou ; on l'enterra sans honneurs, sans discours, sans larmes, sans pompes, sans fanfares ; rien de tout cela. Et c'était le roi Charles VI.

Plus tard il y en eut un autre qui éprouva encore un sort plus affreux et plus cruel. Qui eût dit, à ses beaux jours de jeunesse, qui eût dit que cette belle tête de jeune homme tomberait avant l'âge, et par la main du bourreau ? Un jour il y avait dans une salle du Temple une famille qui se désolait et qui pleurait à chaudes larmes, parce qu'un de ses membres allait périr ; et c'était un père de famille qui embrassait ses enfants et sa femme, et lorsqu'ils eurent bien pleuré, après que le cachot eut retenti des cris de leur désespoir, la porte s'ouvrit, un homme entra ; c'était le geôlier. Après le geôlier, ce fut le bourreau, qui d'un coup de guillotine décapita toute la vieille monarchie ; et le peuple hurlait de joie autour de la sanglante estrade et vengeait sur cette tête tous ces supplices passés. Cet homme, c'était Louis XVI.

Non loin de là, un autre roi tomba encore ; mais, comme celle d'un colosse, sa chute fit trembler la terre. Pauvre grand homme, tué à coup d'épingles comme un lion par les mouches ! Ah ! que cette haute figure était belle, quoique posée sur ses genoux ! Ah ! que ce géant était grand à son lit de mort ! qu'il était grand sur son trône ! qu'il est grand chez le peuple !

Et qu'est-ce que tout cela, un lit de mort, une tombe, un trône, un peuple ? Quelque chose qui fait rire Satan. Rien ! Rien ! toujours le néant ! Et pourtant c'était Napoléon, le plus malheureux des rois, le plus grand des hommes. Eh bien oui, c'est cela, que l'habit aille à la taille de chacun : la misère aux peuples, le malheur aux rois.

XVI

Ah ! le malheur ! le malheur ! voilà un mot qui règne sur l'homme, comme la fatalité sur les siècles et les révolutions sur la civilisation.

XVII

Et qu'est-ce que c'est qu'une révolution ? un souffle d'air qui ride l'océan, s'en va et laisse la mer agitée.

XVIII

Et qu'est-ce que c'est qu'un siècle ? une minute dans la nuit.

XIX

Et qu'est-ce que le malheur ? la vie.

XX

Qu'est-ce qu'un mot ? rien ; c'est comme la réalité, une durée.

XXI

Qu'est-ce que l'homme ? ah ! qu'est-ce que l'homme ? qu'en sais-je, moi ? Allez demander à un fantôme ce qu'il est ; il vous répondra, s'il vous répond : je suis l'ombre d'un tel. Eh bien, l'homme c'est l'image du Dieu. Duquel ? c'est de celui qui gouverne. Est-il fils du Bien, du Mal ou du Néant ? choisissez des trois, c'est une trinité.

XXII

Et dans le temps que j'étais jeune et pur, que je croyais à Dieu, à l'amour, au bonheur, à l'avenir, à la patrie ; dans le temps que mon cœur bondissait au mot : liberté ! alors — oh ! que Dieu soit maudit par ses créatures ! — alors Satan m'apparut et me dit : viens, viens à moi ; tu as de l'ambition au cœur et de la poésie dans l'âme, viens, je te montrerai mon monde, mon royaume à moi.

Et il m'emmena avec lui et je planais dans les airs comme l'aigle qui se berce dans les nuages.

Et voilà que nous arrivâmes en Europe.

Là, il me montra des savants, des hommes de lettres, des femmes, des fats, des bourreaux, des rois, des prêtres, des peuples et des sages ; ceux-là étaient les plus fous.

Et je vis un frère qui tuait son frère, une mère qui prostituait sa fille, des écrivains qui trompaient le peuple, des prêtres qui trahissaient les fidèles, la peste qui mange les nations, et la guerre qui moissonne les hommes ; là, c'était un intrigant qui rampait dans la boue, arrivait jusqu'aux pieds des grands, leur mordait le talon ; ils tombaient, et alors il tressaillait de joie de la chute qu'avait faite cette tête en tombant dans la boue.

Là, un roi savourait ses sales débauches dans la couche d'infamie où de père en fils ils reçoivent des leçons d'adultère.

IVRE ET MORT .

I

C'était dans quelque bon gros bourg de Touraine ou de Champagne, le long de ces fleuves qui arrosent tant de vignobles, par une pluvieuse et froide soirée, alors que toutes les lumières s'étaient éteintes, et le cabaret du Grand-Vainqueur resplendissait seul de clarté au milieu du silence et du brouillard. Ceux qui passaient dans la route voyaient, à travers les vitres et les rideaux rouges, se dessiner des formes vagues et chancelantes. Parfois, si l'on ouvrait les portes et que la petite sonnette fit entendre ses cris répétés, on entendait des chansons folles et endormies, des cris, des bravos, des paroles bruyantes comme l'éclat des verres, et une exhalaison de chaleur, de fumée et d'eau-de-vie s'élançait au dehors en épaisses rafales.

Dites-moi un plus beau lieu d'asile qu'un tel lieu, en hiver contre le froid, en été contre le chaud, les uns pour s'y réchauffer, les autres pour s'y rafraîchir, et presque tous finissant par s'échauffer en se rafraîchissant.

Non un élégant café, avec ses clartés d'or, ses lustres, ses glaces, ses fleurs, ce rendez-vous du stupide banquier, du marchand d'asphalte, du bon ton et des pantalons à guêtres, et où il n'est permis que de s'y griser pour 400 francs. Loin de moi ce lieu musqué et décent, où la mère peut conduire sa fille et où le badaud de province s'extasie sur les bonnes manières de Paris, en se faisant voler sa montre. Fuyez ce bureau de cristal, ces lambris écrasés de dorures, cette femme de 50 ans, à la mise simple, à la tenue modeste et qui semble la statue de l'ennui, occupée dans ses moments de loisir à casser du sucre ; fuyez le vacillement flamboyant du gaz, ces grands journaux gisants ou repliés sur des tables de marbre, et ces hommes gonflés de suffisance et bouffis de rien, avec leur or se dessinant en relief dans les poches d'un gilet à fleurs ; fuyez enfin ces cris de l'opulence ennuyeuse et tout ce tapage d'argent.

Oh ! que j'aime bien mieux un simple cabaret comme celui-ci, avec sa joie libre, ses allures franches, ses têtes dormeuses et rouges s'appuyant, avec un gros rire sur les lèvres, contre la simple peinture couleur lie de vin qui décore les lambris ! que j'aime son atmosphère chaude, grise, odorante, son plafond noirci de tabac, ses quinquets modestes qui filent, ses banquettes en velours rouge usées, où pendant bien des ans tant de passions se sont assouvies, tant d'ardents désirs se sont apaisés ; ses glaces tachées de mouches et fêlées, ses tables de marbre noir aux pieds vermoulus, ses tabourets d'une paille grise, et surtout cela un bourdonnement d'ivresse, une clameur épaisse et gaie, des poitrines, nues et des mains nerveuses étreignant des verres, des lèvres épaisses et rougies de vin baisant délicatement le tuyau d'une pipe aimée.

Quelle plus belle chose ! Est-il un plus beau point de vue sous lequel on puisse envisager la nature humaine, un qui soit plus chrétien et plus doux, plus digne d'un philanthrope d'Amérique ou d'un banquier de Londres ami des hommes ? En effet, depuis l'empereur jusqu'au mendiant, depuis la princesse et la grande dame jusqu'à la fille des rues, est-il une créature ayant un palais et une âme faite à l'image de Dieu qui ne connaisse la douceur d'un petit verre ? Or le cabaret du Grand-Vainqueur était le plus aimable cabaret qu'on puisse aimer.

Chacun le retrouvait toujours dans ses jours de peines ou de bonheur, dans l'adversité ou la Fortune, offrant à tous ses présents qui, comme ceux de la nature, font évanouir tous les soucis et engourdissent toutes les pénibles réalités.

On y voyait en permanence la maîtresse du lieu, invariablement posée sur un banc rembourré de velours d'Utrecht rouge avec des clous d'or, entre la statue bronzée de Napoléon derrière elle, et devant, sur le comptoir, une longue file de pots d'étain échelonnés par rang de taille.

C'était une lemme dont on ne datait plus l'âge qu'aux replis de la peau de son cou, qui semblait celle d'un canard incuit, et aux poils gris et rudes qui se hérissaient sur son triple menton ; un bonnet blanc, mais dont les tuyaux élevés et empesés formaient un soleil, encadrait une figure dormeuse et rouge, aux lourdes paupières, au nez aplati et relevé, à la lèvre noircie jusqu'aux gencives d'un sillon de tabac.

Sa taille, tapissée de paquets de graisse, était enfermée dans une robe bleue avec des taches blanches, et dont on voyait le lacet serpenter le long du dos.

Tout le jour elle était accoudée sur le vieux comptoir, dont les pieds jadis dorés étaient couverts de taches, d'écorchures grises et d'empreintes de doigts épais, raccommoquant des chaussettes ou un vieux pantalon bleu avec du fil blanc.

Ainsi on la trouvait toujours bonne et douce, calme au milieu du bruit, et parant seulement sans murmurer ses carafons menacés, d'un revers de main ou d'un geste conservateur.

Le petit poêle en tôle, placé au milieu de l'appartement, était rouge et bourdonnait en faisant trembler son tuyau ; autour de lui se trouvaient rangés des mariniers, avec leurs chemises rouges, leurs longues barbes droites et leurs joues enflammées ; des laboureurs avec leurs cheveux longs, leur dos voûté, le front calme et réfléchi, leurs gamaches blanches qui leur montent jusqu'aux genoux et leur gilet rouge rayé ; puis encore de joyeux garçons de la campagne, aux grands yeux clairs, avec leurs cheveux ras et droits, une blouse bleue, un col raide et empesé jusqu'aux oreilles et serré par une cravate de couleur, roulée en cordon.

Au milieu d'eux se trouvaient deux hommes qu'on ne pouvait ranger dans aucune de ces classes ; tout le cercle semblait les respecter et les regarder avec admiration, comme des gloires illustres et avérées.

Taciturnes et sombres, ils étaient là comme deux ennemis, jaloux réciproquement de leurs forces et de leurs renommées, ils échangeaient des regards de pitié et des sourires d'un insultant dédain. Le plus grand des deux était sec et mince, un nez épais et allongé, une barbe et des cheveux noirs, quelque chose dans toute sa personne de nerveux et de rusé ; l'autre au contraire était petit, carré, aux membres forts et trapus, la barbe rouge, de grands yeux à fleur de tête, de la force et de la stupidité.

C'étaient les deux plus intrépides buveurs de vingt lieues à la ronde, capables chacun de rester des nuits au combat et d'en sortir victorieux, le premier toujours sur la défensive, usant d'une tactique sage et modérée, le second plein d'impétuosité et de colère, faisant ruisseler sur son palais des bouteilles entières qui s'engloutissaient dans cet estomac gigantesque.

Fiers tous deux de leur gloire, ils passaient dans le village aussi impassibles et aussi contents d'eux-mêmes qu'un Dieu au milieu de ses adorateurs ; jamais, en effet, aucune défaite n'avait souillé leurs gloires, et quand leurs compagnons d'orgie étaient étendus sur le pavé de la salle, ils sortaient en haussant les épaules de pitié pour cette pauvre nature humaine, qui s'enivre si facilement d'une bouteille de vin, d'un peu de gloire, d'un peu de bonheur, toutes choses lus ou moins vides et qui s'épuisent.

En effet, leur gloire en valait bien une autre. Gloire du génie, gloire des richesses, gloire de roi, gloire d'ivrogne, chacune a ses délices, ses haines, ses déceptions. Celle-ci faisait envie à toute la jeunesse du pays, et au jeune maître du château qui faisait venir de Paris du vin et des femmes et des amis, qui usait de tout cela, s'en lassait vite, et qu'une bouteille de champagne faisait tomber sur son sofa de damas, que l'opulence s'efforçait de rendre crapuleux et qui n'était que bêtement ridicule.

C'était pour eux une mission dont ils s'acquittaient largement. Comme tous les grands hommes appelés sur cette terre qui les méconnaît, eux aussi étaient méconnus des classes supérieures qui ne comprennent seulement, il est vrai, que les passions qui avilissent, mais non celles qui dégradent.

Une femme de bon ton eût passé de l'autre côté du trottoir, s'ils se fussent hasardés de venir apporter dans Paris leur force de géant ; elle eût rougi, se fût écriée : horreur !... et peut-être elle allait faire la cour à son amie la baronne, dont le mari d'abord avait été commis, puis chef de bureau, puis banquier, baron, marquis et pair de France, qui n'avait eu d'autre mérite que d'avoir peu de conscience, un bon tailleur, une belle chaîne à sa montre, et une femme habile dont il s'était servi comme les mendiants de leurs plaies, en vivant d'un mépris qui était pour lui un revenu, une ferme, un loyer.

L'homme d'État, tiré pompeusement par son attelage de chevaux blancs et s'étalant complaisamment sur des coussins de velours bleu, au milieu de ses livrées, eût éclaboussé sans scrupule et renversé avec la flèche de son carrosse ces deux rustres en chemises rouges, vacillant dans la rue comme un navire sur la mer ; il se serait regardé dans une glace spacieuse, aurait dit bien des fois moi, se serait découvert beau et eût trouvé du génie jusque dans le moindre pli de sa robe de chambre bigarrée et retombant majestueusement sur son parquet ciré. Et cet homme ne dort pas, ne mange pas, ne boit pas ; il n'a jamais eu d'autre ciel que celui de son lit, d'autres hommes que ceux qui le servent et sur qui il marche ; il est ambitieux comme Alexandre et rampant comme un serpent sans vigueur ; ce n'est qu'un laquais du ministre qui lui paie ses pages par des places, des croix, des honneurs, des dîners auxquels il ne mange pas tant il est content d'y être. Et un jour viendra, où le ministre ou le roi qu'il sert viendront à s'éteindre, comme une chandelle qui a brûlé quelque temps, qui meurt et qu'on remplace par une autre ; et tout cela s'évanouira ; l'ivresse de la gloire et de l'ambition sera partie, il se réveillera de ce songe, et quel réveil !

Le philanthrope, cet homme qui aime les autres comme un naturaliste aime un musée d'animaux, qui porte un chapeau bas, des habits noirs, des souliers larges, eût sans doute pleuré de douleur en voyant ces deux hommes entrant joyeusement au cabaret, lui qui est membre de la Société de tempérance et qui a des maux d'estomac ; et ce même homme, après avoir pendant quarante ans versé tout son argent aux pauvres, avoir fait mettre son nom dans les journaux, avoir pris des actions aux chemins de fer, correspondu avec toutes les académies savantes dont il se fait beaucoup d'honneur d'être membre, arrive un jour à voir que tout l'a trompé, que les actions du chemin de fer ont baissé, que les journaux ont menti, que les académies sont sottes, que les hommes sont faux et que lui-même est un niais ; il se réveille de ce songe, et quel réveil !

Alors il se nourrit de réflexions et de pensées amères, il décoche des sarcasmes sur la nature humaine et sur la nature de Dieu, sur les saisons, sur le froid, sur le chaud ; mais tout cela ne lui donne ni un manteau, ni une paire de bottes... ni son bonheur qu'il a perdu.

Et tous vous diront qu'ils sont supérieurs ; ils diront qu'il vaut mieux vendre sa conscience et son corps pour servir aux intrigues, aux crimes, pour qu'on vous foule la tête comme un marchepied, que cela enfin est plus noble que de s'endormir ivre de vin sur le plancher d'un cabaret, un lieu, disent-ils, où le premier entré est acheté. Comme si le monde aussi n'était pas qu'un lieu vénal, où tout se vend, où ceux qui ont, de l'or entrent et puisent à flots : amours, voluptés, richesses, honneurs, empires, gloires, triomphes.

Sans doute la fille de joie, parée tout le jour sur le seuil de sa porte, comme un morceau de viande à l'étal du boucher ; sans doute le ministre maigre de soucis, ce chien de cour dansant, gambadant et se pliant pour amuser son maître, le banquier couché sur des tas d'or comme Job sur son fumier de corruption, le philanthrope froid comme la pierre d'un hôpital, le poète si creux d'idées, si rempli de vanité et d'une folie orgueilleuse qu'on appelle le génie ; sans doute la vénalité, la richesse, la prostitution, la débauche, tout ce qu'on appelle le monde enfin, vous dira qu'il est noble ; tous vous diront qu'ils ont une âme, une âme pure, âme qui glisse sur les parquets, qui filtre sur les lambris dorés des palais, qui nage dans l'atmosphère des grandes villes, âme sur laquelle on marche, âme qu'on foule aux pieds, qu'on vend aux boutiques, âme à tant pour l'acheteur, âme de femme et de poète qui se vend pour la vanité, âme de roi pour la tyrannie, âme de ministre pour l'ambition, âme de pauvre pour l'or — l'or est noble, sa noblesse est vieille comme le monde ; — sans doute il faut mieux détruire des populations entières que les caves d'un cabaret, il faut mieux s'enivrer de sang que de vin et arriver enfin soûls de la vie que soûls d'une bouteille.

Eh bien, non !

Honneur à la passion la plus douce, la plus noble, la plus vertueuse, la plus philosophique de toutes les passions, passion des sages et des Dieux, car ceux d'Homère s'enivrent comme des laquais, et l'Olympe va danser à la barrière, le dimanche, et se met en goguette une fois la semaine. Celle-là, au moins, est sans déception et sans lendemain, passion qu'on peut toujours satisfaire.

Vraiment, est-ce que la plus belle classification psychologique vaudra pour vous les rangs symétriques d'une cave bien montée ? est — il une passion, un caprice qui dure aussi longtemps qu'une gorgée de bon vin ?
